LORD ELCHO said, his hon. Friend (Mr. Stirling) had found fault with him for not having sent his laquais de place or gone himself to ascertain the authenticity of the Pisani picture. The best reason, however, for not going himself was, that he left Venice the day after he had been told this story. He was delighted now to hear from so great an authority as the hon. Secretary to the Treasury that there was no doubt that this Paul Veronese was an original. The hon. Gentleman stated that the letter, for the accuracy of which he (Lord Elcho) had to a certain extent vouched, was a tissue of misrepresentations. He could only say, however, that the facts he had stated were repeated to him before he left Venice and before he had seen the letter, which he, therefore, had reason to believe was correct. Then the hon. Gentleman stated that the constitution of the National Gallery was approved by the House. Now, the fact was, that the House never had an opportunity of approving it. The constitution was drawn up by the hon. Member himself at the Treasury, and the first time the House heard of it was when it was asked to vote the salaries of these gentlemen. He would remind the House, however, that exception was taken to the salary of the secretary and of the paid travelling agent, and that in 1855, upon the question of the latter gentleman's salary, a Vote was taken in a morning sitting in the month of August, when forty-five voted in favour, and thirty-eight against it. He might say, therefore, that the House had not been consulted as to the constitution of the National Gallery, and that when this point had been brought before the House only a narrow majority had decided in its favour. His hon. Friend the Secretary for the Treasury stated that a gentleman had offered £400 more than the nation had given for the Paul Veronese of last year. Then all he (Lord Elcho) could say was, that he strongly recommended the Government to accept the offer. His hon. Friend had so stoutly come forward in defence of these Paul Veroneses, and had taken the responsibility of the purchases so readily upon himself, that he (Lord Elcho) was reminded of a joke upon the subject made by his hon. Friend the Secretary of the Admiralty last year, who said that he didn't believe the picture was a Paul Veronese—he believed it was a Wilson. When the cleaning process was under discussion some years ago he remembered the present Under Secretary for the India Board came down to the House quite aghast, and he said, "What do you think I saw up there? Why, I found those ruffians scrubbing the 'Woman taken in Adultery.'" Well, that barbarous and unnatural proceeding had been defended by the hon. Gentleman on the Treasury bench. His right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Colonies said that Sir C. Eastlake had been harshly alluded to in the course of the discussion. He (Lord Elcho) was sure that he had said nothing with regard to Sir C. Eastlake which his most intimate friend could have objected to. He believed Sir C. Eastlake to be a thorough gentleman and a most accomplished man, and in those respects he was perfectly fit for the situation which he held. He differed from his right hon. Friend as to the value of the Pisani picture. He did not say that we ought to have no pictures of the Venetian school. He admired those pictures as much as it was possible to do, but he objected to giving an enormous price for a second-rate picture by a second-rate master of that school, and he wished the Committee, by their vote, to mark their disapproval of the sum which had been given for it. He would also suggest that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cox) should limit his Motion to the reduction of the £5,000 for civil contingencies. Still he (Lord Elcho) was of opinion that the surplus over and above the purchase money for pictures each year should be carried over to the next; and that, if a special case arose, a special grant should be made for the purpose.

Mr. Wilson

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER trusted that the Committee, before coming to a vote on this question, would look to the real facts of the case, and would not be led away by any prejudice which might have been created by the unfair statements which had been made. It was admitted on all hands to be a matter of national policy that we should have a National Gallery. That Gallery had been founded by gifts to the country, and it had been augmented by valuable purchases. Those purchases had been in successive years sanctioned by Parliament, and it was now agreed that the collection should be not only maintained, but increased from time to time by purchases. It was also agreed that they should devote, not a small sum, but £10,000 a year for the purchase of pictures for the enrichment of the National Gallery. That sum, therefore, was voted each year, and was placed at the disposal of a board of Trustees consisting of noblemen and gentlemen who were well acquainted with art, whose names were before the public, and who were the advisers of the Government with respect to the purchase of pictures. Their secretary and director was Sir C. Eastlake, the President of the Royal Academy, who, besides being himself a most accomplished artist, was intimately acquainted with the history of art and with the quality of pictures. If the Government were not to be justified in acting upon the advice of so eminent an authority in matters of painting their action would be paralyzed, and it would be impossible for them to take a step safely in any department of art. It was impossible for the Government to have special knowledge upon a subject of this sort, and if Sir C. Eastlake were eminently fitted by his qualifications to advise them, they were fully justified in acting upon the advice of the Board of Trustees, and Sir C. Eastlake, the director. Under these circumstances the Government were advised by the Trustees to purchase a picture of first-rate European celebrity—the Pisani picture of the “Family of Darius before Alexander,” which had long enjoyed the reputation of being a genuine picture of Paul Veronese. Hon. Gentlemen had spoken as if there were a doubt of the genuineness of the picture. In page 41 of the Estimates, however, would be found a passage from the manuscript notes of a German writer named Rumohr—a gentleman of first-rate authority in matters of art—quite as high an authority as his noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), as the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Coningham), or as Mr. Morris Moore. He ventured to think that on this subject Rumohr was quite equal to any of them, or to all of them put together. Rumohr said:—

“The celebrated picture of the wife of Darius mistaking Hephæstion for Alexander. In excellent condition; perhaps the only existing criterion

by which to estimate the genuine original colouring of Paul Veronese. It is remarkable how entirely the genius of the painter precludes criticism on the quaintness of the treatment. The treatment of colour, especially in the flesh, and the excellence of the execution, are such as to render us almost unjust to other great colourists. In the presence of this work we forget for a time all other productions in painting.”

Some years ago Lord Aberdeen authorized the purchase of this very picture for £10,000, and thought himself unfortunate in not being able to purchase it. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) apprehended, therefore, that there could be no doubt of the genuineness of the picture, of the reputation it enjoyed, and of the high value placed upon it. If a Government were to purchase pictures for a National Gallery, it seemed to him that they discharged their duty better by purchasing a great and celebrated picture, even at a high price, than by buying a number of second or third rate pictures. A nation could give high prices for pictures, and had large spaces in which to exhibit them; but few private individuals could hang up the Pisani picture of Paul Veronese, if it were presented to them, because no house of moderate dimensions would hold it. He contended, therefore, that such a picture was peculiarly fitted for a National Gallery. He had learned by experience, that there was scarcely any duty more difficult to discharge than that of buying pictures for a National Gallery—for himself, he declared that he would infinitely rather negotiate a loan for £10,000,000 than he would undertake to purchase a single picture—yet he deliberately maintained that the Government were fully justified in having purchased this picture at the price they gave for it; and if they had to make the decision again, even after the criticisms of his noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire and of his hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, they would adopt precisely the same course as they had adopted. Did his noble Friend rest his case on the difference between £10,000 and £13,000? If so, that somewhat narrowed the point, because his noble Friend would admit that the finest picture in the world might be worth the larger sum. But his noble Friend said, the Government were wrong, because they gave too much for it. [Lord ELCHO: Hear, hear!] And because no picture by Paul Veronese was worth £13,000. But by what possible means was the value of pictures to be ascertained? The Government were advised that the value given for this picture was not excessive, and they accordingly offered it. Was this a vote of censure upon the Government or upon the Venetian school, or upon the painter Paul Veronese? He owned he could not understand where the censure was to lie. He had been told that forty or fifty years ago the two painters whose works fetched most at auctions in this country were Rubens and Salvator Rosa. Well, that had been altered, and now his noble Friend said, they ought to buy nothing but Pietro Perugino and the pure Italian school. [Lord ELCHO: No, no!] At all events, his noble Friend would not have the Venetian school. [Lord ELCHO: Yes.] Well, then, his noble Friend said he would have the Venetian school. He was at a loss to know on what principle the Government were to buy pictures for the National Gallery, or how they were to escape censure next year, even if they sought to profit by the admonitions that had been addressed to them. He trusted that, after the conflicting opinions which had been given on the purchase of these pictures, the Committee would see the difficulty that the Government had to encounter. The Government had acted for the best, and if they had not made a wise choice, they had at least taken the best advice that they could obtain. With regard to the establishment charges of the National Gallery, they had been settled in 1854, in a Treasury minute, which had been acquiesced in by the House, and there was every reason to believe that they had met with approval. He trusted that the Committee would not, by adopting the Amendment, deprive the Government of all power of purchasing pictures for the nation.

MR. SPOONER said, his advice to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he complained of the difficulty and opposition he encountered in purchasing pictures, was to buy no pictures. It was his intention to vote for every reduction of the vote for purchasing pictures, because he did not think the public received sufficient advantage for the money so laid out. He was also of opinion that the House had no right to tax for these pictures those who never enjoyed the sight of them. The Committee were, in fact, voting away the public money for their own amusement.

MR. COX said, he would acquiesce in the suggestion of the noble Lord (Lord Elcho), and therefore he would beg that his Motion might be withdrawn, and that the division should be taken on the reduction of the Vote by £6,541. He was astonished to hear it said by the Secretary for the Colonies that the House never appeared in so unfavourable a point of view as in looking after the expenditure of the people's money. He did not know what he had been sent to that House for, if not to look after the public expenditure.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that the hon. Gentleman had grossly, though of course unintentionally, misrepresented him. He did not say that the House was improperly occupied in canvassing the expenditure, but that he did not think it ever appeared to less advantage than when it was engaged in discussing the merits of individual objects of art.

MR. CONINGHAM said, that he had been charged by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies with having made a personal attack upon Sir C. Eastlake. He had made no attack upon Sir C. Eastlake's character; he had only impugned his judgment and capacity as Governor of the National Gallery, and he submitted that he had fully established his case. The Report drawn up by the Committee of 1853, which was the production of a noble Lord, a personal friend of Sir C. Eastlake, did not venture to whitewash him, and it was so against the evidence, that the Chairman of the Committee protested against his own Report. Mr. Van Rumohr, who had been alluded to, was the author of a bad cookery-book, but being a dilettante, he had a collection of bad pictures. He was, however, a protégé of Dr. Waagen, who induced the Prussian Government to buy his bad pictures. With regard to Paul Veronese, he was a painter of the third class, whose pictures were not rare. Correggio was one of the rarest of the Italian masters, and yet two of his most splendid and beautiful pictures were bought a few years ago of the Marquess of Londonderry for £11,000, which was considered a large sum at the time. The sum of £13,000 for one of Paul Veronese's pictures was, therefore, an extravagant and monstrous amount. The fact was, that a wretched daub had been purchased, which was found not to be by Paul Veronese, and then this purchase was made to cover that mistake.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I must confess that the contrast which this discussion exhibits to the scene I have just left produces a painful impression on my mind. I have just come from the town of Manchester, where the contributions of a few spirited and intelligent merchants have, at the expense of £100,000, procured for the people of that neighbourhood, and for those who choose to go there from other parts of the country, the temporary enjoyment of witnessing a magnificent collection of pictures; and now, when I arrive in this House, I find the representatives of the people haggling and boggling about a petty sum, and seeking to censure the Government for having given what my hon. Friend calls the excessive amount of £13,600 for a picture which the Secretary for the Colonies and the Secretary to the Treasury have properly denominated as a picture of world-wide reputation. It is in vain for the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Coningham) or for the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) or his valet de place in Venice, to tell us that Paul Veronese was not a master of great value, and that the picture in question is not one that eminently deserves a place in a national collection. It may be true that Paul Veronese is not reckoned so high as some other masters of whom the Committee has been told; but there is this peculiarity with respect to Paul Veronese, that not only is he a great example of colouring, but he is one of the most instructive painters in point of composition whose works could be placed in a gallery where instruction as well as gratification and enjoyment are the objects for which the pictures have been collected together. I hope the Committee, after having had the amusement of listening to the observations of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire, and hearing the personalities of the hon. Member for Brighton, who has probably vented his long-pent-up stream of indignation against that amiable, accomplished, and distinguished man, Sir Charles Eastlake—I hope, now that those two hon. Members have had their swing on their favourite topic—that the Committee will gravely and seriously consider the question before them, and will, if they think that Parliament was right in wishing this country to possess a gallery of pictures worthy of its reputation, if they think that Parliament was right in having placed at the disposal of the Government, from year to year, a sum for the purchase of pictures—come to the conclusion that the Government has purchased for this National Gallery a picture of great value, which has long been an object of attention to everybody who has visited the country where it was placed, which the Government of that country was very much indisposed to allow to quit their territory, and the possession of which will do honour to this country, and conduce greatly to the promotion of those objects for which a national gallery is useful and valuable. I trust that the Committee will regard the subject seriously, and not put it on the narrow ground on which it has been placed by some hon. Members, but will consider that the question on which we are about to vote is, whether this country is to add to the collection in the National Gallery, or whether Parliament will altogether change the system which has hitherto been pursued, and decide that henceforth no addition shall be made to the national collection of paintings.

Motion made, and Question put, "That a sum, not exceeding £16,624, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expenses of the National Gallery, including the purchase of Pictures, to the 31st day of March, 1858."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 89; Noes 194: Majority 105.

LORD ELCHO then said, that he was sorry to give the Committee the trouble of dividing again, but the last was not the question on which he wished to take their opinion. His Motion referred to the salaries of the Secretary and Travelling Agent, and therefore, as he deemed that of the Secretary, which was fixed at £750, to be exorbitant, he should propose that it be reduced to £500; while, regarding the office of Travelling Agent to be vicious in principle, and useless in practice, he should propose that that office, as well as the salary attached to it—£300 per annum—be abolished. With that view, he should move that the Vote be reduced by a sum of £550.

Question put, "That a sum, not exceeding £22,615, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expenses of the National Gallery, including the purchase of Pictures, to the 31st day of March, 1858."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 123; Noes 161: Majority 38.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

The following Votes were also agreed to:—

- (5.) £3,539, Magnetic Observations.
- (6.) £500, Royal Geographical Society.
- (7.) £1,000, Royal Society.
- (8.) £3,050, Bermudas.

(9.) £6,878, British North American Provinces.

(10). £3,541, Indian Department in Canada.

VISCOUNT BURY said, that he rose in accordance with his notice to call the attention of the Committee to this subject, and to ask two questions of the Secretary of State for the Colonies. He trusted he should justify himself in the eyes of the Committee for so doing by saying that when he had the charge of the department in Canada, to which the Vote referred, he had been directed to draw up a Report as to the most practicable mode of withdrawing this Vote from the Estimates. That Report had been officially submitted to the Government through Sir Edmund Head, but had not been adopted by the Colonial Office, and, although he could not venture to complain of that, he wished to state the reasons why he dissented from the principle upon which the Vote was framed. In the Report which he had prepared he had pointed out that if it was necessary that this item should be omitted from the Estimates the best plan to adopt would be to pay down a certain sum which, if administered with proper economy, would render the Department self-supporting. His suggestion then not having been adopted, as he had stated, he was induced to lay before the Committee certain facts connected with this matter, in the hope of persuading the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies to reconsider the opinion which he had pronounced in his despatch. The present state of the Indian Department was by no means satisfactory, and might easily be amended by putting the whole charge of the Department upon the Canadian Legislature. The Committee was aware that the sum which used to appear on the Estimate had been greatly reduced, the sum which used to be employed in purchasing presents for the Indians having been no longer needed, and all the money now asked for was for the support of the Indian Department in Canada, so that the Vote which a few years ago was something between £12,000 and £14,000 had now dwindled down to £3,500. This country had assumed the care of the Indians in such a manner that to do away now with the support which was granted to them would assume the appearance of a breach of faith. He was aware that some persons said that the Indian tribes were in a moribund state, and the sooner they were destroyed the better; but the weakness of a dependent was no reason, in his opinion, for withdrawing all support after this country had assumed the care of them. Others, again, said that the presents to the Indians produced a demoralizing effect, and in that opinion he concurred, for he knew that as soon as the rifles or coats or blankets were given to them they used to sell them, and get very drunk with the money. He did not approve of the system of presents, but he could not assent to the principle of putting the whole charge of the Department on the Indian funds. Almost all the tribes in Upper Canada had had a reserve of land for their own use, which becoming more valuable from the spread of white settlements had been sold, and, the proceeds having been invested, had become a small annuity, and upon that fund it was proposed to place the whole charge of the Indian Department. The result of such a proceeding would inevitably be to swamp those funds. The books of the Department, containing registers of the land sales, were voluminous; the correspondence was very extensive; and the interests of a large proportion of the white population who had purchased lands from the Indians were involved in this question. That was one argument against the abolition of the department, but his principal reason for objecting to such a measure was the total ruin in which it would involve the red men. He would also ask the Committee to consider whether the Indian funds were capable of sustaining the burden which it was proposed to throw upon them. In 1855 the cost of this department exceeded £8,000, £4,777 of which was defrayed from the Indian funds, and the balance was provided from the Imperial exchequer. The proceeds of the Indian lands were about £9,000, and if the whole of this charge were thrown upon the Indians they would have only about £350 left for the support of 6,300 persons. The Indians, he must observe, could not enter into competition with white labourers, in consequence of their ignorance of the English language. With regard to the question whether the Imperial Government ought or ought not to support these Indians, he rested his case upon the practice which had hitherto been pursued. Great Britain, in dealing with the aboriginal tribes, had recognized a species of sovereignty in the red population, and had promised them protection in return for the territory they had ceded. During the American wars

we had petted the Indians and made them most glowing promises, but when they were no longer useful as military allies our sympathy for them seemed to have ceased. A Committee of that House which sat in 1837 expressed an opinion that, as far as was practicable, the Indians should be placed solely and entirely under the control of the Imperial authority, and the same view had been taken by Lord Glenelg, Colonel Bruce, Lord Elgin, and others who had considered the subject. He (Viscount Bury) thought that if for the purpose of saving a trifling expense, they took this small sum from the remnant of a great people, they were submitting this country to great degradation. He thought they ought manfully to face this difficulty, and he would leave the matter in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman. He wished, before he sat down, to call the attention of the Colonial Secretary to the claims of the old officers of this department, who had entered it at a time when they were required to perform military services, and in the expectation that when they were invalided or were no longer fit for service some provision would be made for them. Four of these officers, namely, Mr. Chesney, Captain Anderson, Colonel Napier, and Mr. Ironside, had served with great distinction in the department for upwards of forty years, and he hoped the Government would consider their claims to retiring pensions.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he was sure the Committee would be of opinion that his noble Friend had only taken a very natural and honourable course in pleading, in his place in Parliament, for those who were the special objects of his care when he was at the head of the Indian department in Canada. The noble Lord had on this occasion expressed similar opinions to those which he had communicated officially to the Government, and he (Mr. Labouchere) could only repeat the answer which he had given to the noble Lord in his official capacity. It was quite true that the expense of the Indian department had been in the course of regular and constant diminution for several years. He must say, however, that the House had not acted harshly or precipitately, but had always desired, in carrying out what they conceived to be just and proper principles, to do so with as little inconvenience as possible to those Indians whose interests were affected. Earl Grey, when Secretary of State for the Colonies, gave notice of his intention to withdraw the chief item of expense, the presents to the Indians. At that time the sum voted by the House was £13,000 or £14,000. All that was asked for this year was about £3,500. The chief point in dispute between himself and his noble Friend was as to the management of the Indian estates. His noble Friend thought that the cost of management should be defrayed by the Imperial Government, while he (Mr. Labouchere) held that, as a general principle, where estates were granted for a particular object, the cost of management ought to come out of the estates themselves, and could see no reason why this principle should be departed from in the case of the Indians. In considering this question he had had the benefit of two Reports,—one from his noble Friend, advocating the views which he had expressed in that House, and the other from his immediate predecessor, Mr. Oliphant, who entertained entirely opposite opinions. The able Governor General of Canada, Sir E. Head, would soon be in England on leave, and he (Mr. Labouchere) would discuss this subject with him and obtain his advice upon it. What his noble Friend suggested was that the Government should ask that House to vote a sum of £80,000, which should be invested in Canadian securities, and the interest of which should be devoted to Indian purposes. He (Mr. Labouchere) felt that such would not be a proper application of the funds of this country, and that he could not ask the House for any such sum. He himself felt the greatest sympathy with the Indians, whose welfare must, he believed, depend mainly on the conduct of the Canadians and of the Canadian Government, and it was therefore with much pleasure that he had that day learned that an Act had passed the Colonial Legislature, giving to the Indians the same political privileges as were enjoyed by the whites. He gave his noble Friend full credit for the ability with which he managed the affairs of the Indian department while he was at its head, and for the zeal with which he had brought this subject before the House. He could assure him that his attention would continue to be directed to this subject, and that it would be his anxious desire to do what was right by this very interesting portion of the Canadian population. As to the details of the pensions he was at present not sufficiently informed, but he would make inquiries into that part of the subject.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that some years ago he visited some of these Indian settlements. He found the people exceedingly comfortable and very well spoken of by their neighbours. His impression was that the grant ought to be withdrawn.

SIR EDWARD BUXTON said, that the position of the Indians must mainly depend on the conduct of the Canadian Legislature. He hoped, however, that Her Majesty's Government would keep an eye on these Indians until they settled down into the habits of civilization.

Vote agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

WAREHAM ELECTION—REPORT.

House informed, that the Committee had determined,—

That John Hales Calcraft, esquire, is duly elected a Burgess to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Wareham.

And the said Determination was ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

NEW ZEALAND.

COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

MR. LABOUCHERE moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the expediency of guaranteeing by Act of Parliament the liquidation of a loan to be contracted in pursuance of an Act passed by the Legislature of New Zealand for defraying the debt of the colony to the New Zealand Company, toward extinguishing the native title to lands in certain portions of the colony, and for other purposes. He said that the necessity for doing so arose from the difficulties which had arisen between the colony and the New Zealand Company. When he entered the Colonial Office, he found that the noble Lord, the Member for the City of London, had sanctioned an arrangement by which the company agreed to accept a sum of £200,000 in full of all claims on the colony. This amount has to be raised by a loan under the guarantee of this country. When the proposal came before the Colonial Legislature, those portions of the colony which were not involved in the transaction with the company objected to have this sum charged on the customs duties of the whole colony, but offered to agree to a loan of 500,000, if the balance was applied to general purposes. He thought it better to have the opinion of a Select Committee before he introduced any Bill to the House. But no time was to be lost, as the matter was urgent.

Mr. Labouchere

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed,

“To inquire into the expediency of guaranteeing by Act of Parliament, the liquidation of a loan to be contracted in pursuance of an Act passed by the Legislature of New Zealand, for defraying the debt of the Colony to the New Zealand Company, toward extinguishing the native title to lands in certain portions of the Colony, and for other purposes.”

House adjourned at One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, July 3, 1857.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1<sup>a</sup> Burial of the Dead within the City and Liberties of London; In closure Acts Amendment.

2<sup>a</sup> Sites for Workhouses; Charitable Uses.

3<sup>a</sup> Grand Juries (Ireland) Act (1836) Amendment; Turnpike Trusts Arrangements; Hanley Borough Incorporation.

ROYAL ASSENT.—Consolidated Fund (£8,000,000); Insurance on Lives (Abatement of Income Tax) Continuance; Ministers' Money (Ireland); County Cess (Ireland); Court of Exchequer (Ireland).

RATE OF EXCHANGE—INDIA.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he saw by the newspapers that the Directors of the East India Company had altered the rate of exchange at which they were prepared to receive funds in this country for Bills drawn on the Indian Government. This alteration was merely a reduction of one farthing in the rupee, but it amounted to 2½d. in the pound; and its effect had immediately been to create a reduction in the price of bar silver and dollars, which of late had been exported to a considerable extent to India. It might be that the Court of Directors had adopted this step at the suggestion of Her Majesty's Government, in order to check the export of silver to that country, which had been increasing to an alarming extent; but whether the step had been taken on this ground or, by offering more favourable terms of remittance, to obtain a large accession of funds to the home treasury in this country, the effect upon the Government of India would be precisely the same. The Indian Government remitted the funds for home expenditure chiefly by two modes. It advanced the funds of India on the security of goods hypothecated to the Company, and on bills payable to the Company here; and it paid in India bills drawn by the Company in this country on account of money paid into the home treasury. Over the funds it remitted on the security of hypothecated goods the Government of India had power. It could limit the amount of those funds at its pleasure; but it had no power over the sums it paid in discharge of bills sent from this country. The revenue of India at the present moment was subject to three considerable dangers, the first of which was the non-collection of the revenue. There could be no doubt that the largest portion of the country above Agra was in such a state that the difficulty of collecting the revenue must be extremely great. In India no one paid if he could help it; and if it appeared probable that there would be a deficiency in the means of enforcing payment, the revenue would not be regularly paid. More than that, large as was the cash balance of the Government of India, it was by no means accumulated in two or three places, but was distributed and separated in the various treasuries in India. He regretted that there was reason to believe the mutineers of Delhi must have obtained possession of a sum of £400,000 or £500,000. He did not say that the whole of this sum belonged to the Government. The stock of the Delhi Bank must be included in it, but the largest portion of the sum must have belonged to the Government. These treasuries were dispersed all over the country, and when the Government was understood to have a sufficient force at its disposal for their protection they were perfectly safe; but when the contrary was the case, and when a state of things such as that which at present existed in India prevailed, there was no security that these treasuries might not be seized upon by parties who were anxious to enrich themselves at the expense of the Government. It was, further, the custom in India not to transmit money from place to place to any considerable extent by means of bills, but by escorts of military, consisting of regular troops, and occasionally by police. Under present circumstances the Government could not, however, altogether depend upon the regular troops, and therefore could not resort to them as a means of escort. It was therefore in the position of having to encounter great difficulties in the collection of the revenue—of being open to the inconvenience of having the money which was collected plundered—and of not being able to send it to the great centre from which payments were made, owing to the want of an escort on which reliance could be placed. Bearing in mind those triple difficulties, he should entreat the Government to consider most carefully the question whether it might not be expedient to leave it to the discretion of the Government in India whether they should remit or not the sums which might be necessary for expenditure in this country. There might be cases of emergency in which it would be absolutely essential for the Government of India to retain those funds in its own hands to provide for its own security. The Government in this country—the Court of Directors—had other means of supply, as, for instance, by the issue of India bonds or by the assistance of Her Majesty's Government, who, he concluded, would be ready to lend their aid in case of any emergency which might arise. His own immediate predecessor, as he understood, when the catastrophe which took place at Cabool occurred, had called upon the Court of Directors not to require him to make remittances to this country for a period of two years. The subject was one of no ordinary importance, and he wished, therefore, earnestly to call the attention of the Government to the question whether, by means of any extraordinary demand for money to be remitted to this country, the Government of India might not be precluded from taking those steps which, under existing circumstances, they might deem to be absolutely necessary for their own safety.

EARL GRANVILLE assured the noble Earl that the reduction in the rate of exchange was altogether attributable to the ordinary operations of commerce. There was no fear of any undue drain upon the Indian Treasury, as the amount of bullion in the hands of the Governor General was at present £10,000,000, while he had opened a loan of £3,000,000 to meet any contingency which might arise. He, however, quite admitted the importance of the subject, and the noble Earl might rest satisfied that the Government would take the necessary precautions to prevent the drain of money from India to any extensive extent, particularly under existing circumstances.

THE PEERAGE OF IRELAND—PROOF OF RIGHT TO VOTE.—RESOLUTIONS.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR rose, pursuant to notice, to move a Resolution with respect to the petitions of peers claiming a right to vote at the election of representative peers for Ireland, and said that in those cases in which the heir to a peerage in this country applied for a writ to enable him to take his seat in their Lordships' House, the course taken was simply to apply—nominally to the Crown, but, practically speaking, to the Lord Chancellor, who merely required that evidence of the marriage of the parents of the applicant should be produced, the expense of the whole proceeding amounting to from £5 to £10 only. When, however, a person succeeded to an Irish peerage, and claimed, not a seat in that House, but merely to have a record made of his right to vote at the election of representative Peers for Ireland, he had to pay, instead of £5 or £10, a sum amounting to between £100 and £150. That was a state of things which, in his opinion, called for a remedy, and the Select Committee which had last year sat to consider the subject had recommended that a measure should be introduced to Parliament with the view of removing the hardship to which he referred. He, however, having directed his attention to the matter, had come to the conclusion that it was not necessary to resort to legislation in order to accomplish that object. The matter was entirely within their Lordships' power. By the Act of Union all questions affecting the right to vote at elections of Irish Peers were to be decided by the House of Lords, and Orders of the House were drawn up at the time to govern the proceedings. A petition was presented; that petition was referred to a Committee of Privileges, and on that Committee it was usual for them to hear the party and his evidence by counsel at the bar. The consequence of that was, that very great expense was unnecessarily incurred. In ordinary cases there would be no more difficulty in determining who was the heir in the case of a claim to vote for a representative Peer than there would be in determining the heir of an English Peer who had the hereditary right to a seat in that House, and he thought that it would be desirable to assimilate the procedure in the two cases. The noble and learned Lord concluded by moving the following Resolution:—

“That all Petitions claiming a Right to Vote at the Election of Representative Peers for Ireland, by virtue of Peerages under which a Right to vote has been admitted by the House of Lords of the United Kingdom, be referred to The Lord Chancellor or Lord Keeper of the Great Seal to consider and report thereupon; and The Lord Chancellor or Lord Keeper is upon such Reference to consider the Matter of the said Petition, and to make his Report thereupon to the House.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE complained of the burdens imposed upon the Irish Peers, and supported the Resolution.

LORD REDESDALE said, he thought that Legislative authority was necessary. The Act of Union directed that the claim should be decided by a Committee of Privileges, and did not contemplate the delegation of such a power to an individual, not even to the Lord Chancellor; and, by adopting this Resolution great difficulty would arise, and a most dangerous precedent be set. The matter ought to be referred to a Committee of Privileges, which, in fact, was the whole House, with this difference, that while three Members formed a House, seven Members were necessary to form a Committee of Privileges.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that he did not propose that the House should be bound by the Report of the Lord Chancellor; the House could come to such conclusion as it might think fit.

On Question, Resolved in the affirmative; and the said Resolution ordered to be added to the Roll of Standing Orders.

MURDER OF MR. PRICE AT MELBOURNE.

ADDRESS FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

EARL TALBOT rose to move for correspondence relative to the murder of the late Mr. John Price, of Melbourne, Inspector of Convicts. He wished to call attention to this disgraceful and diabolical murder of a near relative of his. It was not necessary for him to go into the harrowing details of this barbarous transaction, but it would suffice to say that Mr. Price was in the execution of his duty among the convicts when they rose and literally stoned him to death, and made an attempt to do the same to the other officers present. It was, no doubt, the result of a plan and combination, and there was every reason to suppose that the plan was devised in consequence of a false and morbid sympathy out of doors for the persons who had murdered Mr. Melville, and who were acquitted on a point of law. He had a report of the inquest on Mr.

Price, which showed that there was a morbid sympathy for criminals in the colony, which required to be inquired into, and if possible put a stop to. The jury returned a verdict of wilful murder against fifteen of the prisoners, and they added, "that, in their opinion, one cause of the occurrence was the misplaced sympathy of the public for the persons in the case alluded to, which by some means had become known to the convicts, and had caused a spirit of insubordination to arise among them since the trial of the murderers of William Melville, in November last." Now, he (Earl Talbot) would venture to think that this was a subject which ought to be investigated by the Executive Government. Those convicts were sent out under sentence for heinous crimes, and it was the duty of the Executive Government to see that they were properly guarded, and kept from contact with the public out of doors, and free from those influences which had led to this catastrophe. Mr. Price's character was unimpeachable, and during the time he was an Inspector of Convicts in Norfolk Island he did his duty with equal kindness and firmness, and when the convicts were removed from that place the same duties were imposed upon him at Melbourne as he formerly discharged at Norfolk Island. He would read an extract from a Melbourne paper, which would give the House some notion of the feeling on the subject in the colony. The noble Earl read an extract, to the effect "that an attempt had been made by a party of long-sentence convicts to escape, in resisting which Mr. Price fell; insubordination was now the rule in the hulks; the convicts defied their custodians, and had got among them a copy of a report of a meeting of the citizens' committee, a self constituted body, at which Mr. Price was held up as a cruel, inhuman monster, and it had become the prison talk that the ruffians who murdered Mr. Melville had been acquitted; and these things having found their way into the hulks had produced such effects that the convicts were in a state of insubordination, under the belief that they had with them the sympathy of the public outside." At the inquest, Captain Blanchard, in his evidence, said, "that Mr. Price's manner was kind and almost fatherly; that since Mr. Melville's case his difficulties had increased; he had lost his control over the men, and yet he had to go among them; the sympathy of the press and the public had had a great effect on the men, and when Mr. Price refused them a request, it was always done kindly." The officers were unarmed, and the reason given for this was, that as there were only twelve or thirteen men to control 150 or 160 of these desperate ruffians, they were afraid that if they carried arms the convicts would seize them and turn them against themselves. It seemed that newspapers were allowed to get among the convicts. He thought he had said enough to prove that this was a case worthy of their attention, and he hoped that the Government would, not only for the sake of the Imperial Government, but for the sake of his lamented departed relative, take some steps to control those dastardly ruffians. He hoped they would lay on the table any correspondence relating to the matter which was in their possession, and give an assurance that the matter should be inquired into, and justice done to the memory of his lamented friend. He had heard that the Colonial Legislature had made a provision for Mr. Price's widow and orphans; and he had an additional claim on the sympathy of this country, as he had married a near relative of Sir John Franklin.

Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Correspondence relative to the Murder of the late Mr. John Price, of Melbourne, Inspector of Convicts.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the noble Earl had justly characterized this case as a most diabolical outrage, and Her Majesty's Government would make every inquiry into the subject. He would be ready to lay the correspondence on the table.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSFER OF REAL PROPERTY.

MR. FAWCETTE'S PETITION.

LORD BROUGHAM rose to call the attention of the House to Mr. Fawcette's petition, presented on the 12th of June, and to beg the attention of their Lordships to the great difficulty and ruinous expense attendant on the practice of the law relating to the transfer of real property. Ten days ago he presented that petition from his learned and able friend, who had been many years a conveyancer of great eminence, was now a magistrate of the county of Cumberland, and who, with the late Mr. Aglionby, had prepared the Summary Jurisdiction Bill, which had effected so great an improvement in our criminal law. Their Lordships might recollect that he (Lord Brougham), in presenting the Carlisle petition, declined to bring in the Bill, conceiving it should originate in the Commons. Mr. Fawcette, in his present petition, addressed that House on the subject of the great grievance which landed proprietors and persons who wished to become purchasers of land suffered, owing to the state of the law and practice relating to the conveyance and transfer of real property. Mr. Fawcette stated, in support of a plan he proposed for a change in the law of real property, and particularly of registration of titles, his own experience as steward of a manor. He said that he had been for thirty years steward of one of the largest manors in England, containing some 400 or 500 tenements; during his stewardship nearly every tenement had been transferred by sale, or exchange, or death; and in every case the transfer was effected by means of a deed which contained on an average only 190 words; that there was no description of the parcels, except the number of the tenement in the manor book, and where it was situated; and never during the thirty years he was steward of that manor had any question of boundary, or identity of the parcels arisen; while the expense of the transfer amounted to—what would their Lordships think, who were constrained to pay for the transfer of one acre or a thousand acres £700 or 800? Why, to 7s. He did not mean to say that the expense of inquiry into title would ever be so small in the whole system of transfer of land; but he did say that this proved, at the very least, that a great and salutary change might be made in the law with respect to the conveyance of real property. The Master of the Rolls in Ireland had said, in his evidence before the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the state of the law of real property, that our system of conveyancing, and, indeed, our whole law relative to the transfer of real property, was one which might have been devised expressly for the purpose of rendering land as little an article of commerce and as little vendible and purchaseable as possible. The Legislature, the Courts, and the lawyers had created the system. [A Noble LORD: And the Attorneys.] His noble Friend said, that he ought not to forget the attorneys; he had included them among the lawyers. After the subject had been mooted in the other House, Bills were sent down from their Lordships' in 1852 and 1853, to that House, and were referred to a Select Committee. The result was a recommendation of the appointment of a Commission of learned lawyers, with some laymen, to inquire into the whole question connected with the conveyance of land. A Commission was accordingly appointed, and made a report, containing most valuable information and a number of most useful suggestions. Nothing could be worse than the present state of the law on this subject. Land, instead of being as easily transferable as bank-stock, was, owing to the principle and practice of our law, the most difficult article of transfer. In fact, it was in some cases actually impossible to transfer it. He, therefore, heartily rejoiced to hear that the Commission had recommended the introduction of two most important measures with respect to this subject, and he hoped his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack would comfort the House by letting them know that these measures were not only in the course of preparation, but were in a forward state. It was most judicious of the Commissioners to recommend that along with a measure for the registration of titles, there should also be a measure for the improvement of the law respecting the conveyance of land. Generally speaking, these important measures would meet with no great opposition. There might be some difficulty with respect to the registration of titles, from the want of the proper charts and maps. The Select Committee of their Lordships to whom the subject of registration was referred some years ago, had found that a great difficulty. But the Tithe Commissioners possessed a great body of maps and charts, as did the municipal corporations; so that he would fain hope there might be found a sufficient body of maps and charts to render legislation possible. He begged to direct their Lordships' attention to the working of the Encumbered Estates Court in Ireland, which had done so much good in that country—a point on which he had been mistaken when he at first supposed that it would not lead to beneficial results. In the period of five years ending in 1854, no fewer than 2,400 cases were tried and disposed of by that court. Of these 1,448 terminated in sale, and the value of the property sold amounted to £14,133,000. Great advantages were derived in Ireland from that court. In the first place, there was the excellent and indefeasible Parliamentary title to land which it afforded; then there was the cost of proceeding which was exceedingly light; but if it had been much larger, it would have been as nothing compared with the incalculable advantages obtained under the Act. So much were these advantages appreciated, that in many instances frauds were committed, in order to bring property under the operation of the Act. Perhaps they might be called pious frauds, though on that point he was not called to give an opinion; at the same time he might say, that as he did not believe there was such a thing as a white lie, so neither did he believe there could be a pious fraud. But, at any rate, frauds were committed. People trumped up debts—signed bills, for example, when there were no transactions, and made it appear that there were incumbrances on property, so as to enable them to come within the scope and the advantages of the Incumbered Estates Court. Now, why should inestimable benefits like these be confined to incumbered estates? Why should not the owners of unincumbered estates have similar benefits? The Commissioners on the law of real property had expressed an opinion in favour of the extension of the principle of the system of the Incumbered Estates Court, so that there might be some such court for the transfer of all property; and it was suggested that it ought to be done by an improvement in the procedure of the Court of Chancery. He thought the Commissioners were well advised in saying that some such system should be adopted in this country, though on the manner of making it there might be differences of opinion. The course recommended by the Commissioners was, that two Bills should be prepared, one for the improvement of the law on the transfer of land, and one for the establishment of a system of registration of titles. Whether we should ever get the benefit of a Parliamentary title to estates he could not say; but he had great hopes that, to a certain extent, this would be effected, and that there would be some statutory guarantee of title to land. The proposal of the Commissioners was, that as by the Acts passed many years ago an indefeasible title is given to all land purchased and sold under the Ordnance Department, compensation being given if within a certain period a claim was put forward for the land, the same principle might be applied generally. In other countries great facilities are given for land transfer, and he saw no reason why they should not go across the Channel to France for an example of legislation on this point. In that country the period of "limitation," as it was called, was ten years, whereas in our own country, it was thirty, and in many cases forty years. It was no doubt invidious to be asked to copy foreign institutions, but when those institutions were found to have produced great good, as the laws regulating the transfer of land in Ireland, in France, Belgium, and America had done, it would be most unwise not to avail ourselves of the examples which those countries afforded. He hoped the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack would be able to assure the House that Bills upon this subject were in a forward state, and would be speedily laid before Parliament. He would only add, that it was of the greatest importance that those who were intrusted, not only with the examination of titles to property, but who were to act as officers of courts where such titles might come in question, should possess a complete and accurate knowledge of their profession, and therefore he trusted that the Inns of Court would see the necessity of requiring all persons to undergo a compulsory examination before being called to the bar.

Lord Brougham

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he would admit that the subject introduced by the noble and learned Lord was both difficult and important. One of his first acts after he received the Great Seal at the beginning of 1853 was to ask their Lordships' sanction to a measure for facilitating the transfer of real property by establishing an effectual system of registration. That Bill, as his noble and learned Friend had said, was passed by their Lordships and sent down to the House of Commons; but in consequence of objections raised against it there it had not become law. The subject was referred by the House of Commons to a Committee, and they recommended that a Royal Commission should issue to consider the existing state of the Law, and to report their opinion as to what alteration was necessary. Towards the end of the same year that Commission was accordingly appointed, and the difficulty, as well as the importance of the subject might be inferred from the fact that though the Commissioners were not idle, they were occupied the whole of the years 1854, 1855, and 1856, and part of 1857, before they were able to make any Report satisfactory to themselves. Pending that Commission, and until he knew what they might recommend, he did not think it would have been proper for him to originate any measure. Nevertheless, in consequence of the length of time that elapsed before that Report was prepared, at the close of last year, he had prepared a measure which he thought could not possibly be at variance with the recommendations which the Commissioners might make, while, of itself, he believed the measure would be attended with great public benefit. That Bill he should soon be in a position to lay on their Lordships' table, and he would, with their permission, briefly explain its outline. One of the greatest sources of complication in reference to the transfer of real property was the mode in which mortgages, judgments, and other charges were dealt with. He proposed that when mortgages and judgments were given as securities charged upon real estate, the present complicated mode of procedure should cease; that any party being possessed of real property might charge upon it £5,000, £10,000, or any other sum; and instead of the instrument by which the charge was imposed, containing all the complicated provisions relating to power of sale, power of appointing receivers, and other matters, he proposed to enact that the mere charging of the land should carry with it as incidents all those provisions which were usually inserted in mortgages, and charges of a similar nature. He proposed, also, that there should be a register in the Court of Common Pleas of all such mortgages and charges, which would show at once whether the property was incumbered or not, and any one who proposed to purchase or lend money on land might ascertain exactly what charges were upon it. Considering the various uses to which real property was applied—as a future provision for families, marriage settlements, and other purposes—it was in vain to expect that they could ever make the transfer of such property as easy as the transfer of Bank stock; but at the same time there could be no question that the law in this respect might be materially improved. He pledged himself that during the recess the subject should receive full attention from the Government, and if, by the plan recommended by the Commission or by any other means, he could see his way to a real improvement, he should be prepared to introduce some measure for the purpose of carrying it out.

LORD CAMPBELL expressed his earnest
The Lord Chancellor

est hope that the law respecting the transfer of real property might be improved, and that it admitted of improvement there could be no doubt. He had hoped for some years that he should go down to posterity as the author of a general measure for the registration of real property; but that hope, like many others, was destined to disappointment. He was glad, however, to find that the cause had not been abandoned, and he should be most willing to lend his aid in carrying out such an improvement as that which had been suggested by his noble and learned Friend. Another improvement he had taken much interest in was the compulsory examination of students for the bar, and that also he hoped yet to see carried out.

EARL FITZWILLIAM suggested that in any measure that might be enacted for establishing a new and more simple form of conveyance, not only should the new form be made legal, but the old form declared to be illegal. The certainty that the old form would not be recognized in law, would induce people generally to adopt the new form. He trusted also that no system of registration would be established that would afford facilities for gratifying mere curiosity.

SALE OF OBSCENE BOOKS, &c.,
PREVENTION BILL.
COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

LORD CAMPBELL, in moving that the House go into Committee upon the Bill, said, he was sorry he could not meet the convenience of some of their Lordships by postponing the Committee on this Bill, but he felt he would be guilty of a dereliction of duty if he were to do so; for, unless he pushed forward the Bill that evening, he would be unable to carry a measure that Session which he believed to be urgently demanded. On the occasion of his moving the second reading of the Bill, he was so much surprised by some of the criticisms that he had to encounter that he had made up his mind to abandon it altogether; but since then he had received such strong solicitations to proceed from various Members of that House, from clergymen of all denominations, from many medical men, from fathers of families, and from young men who themselves had been inveigled into those receptacles of abomination against which his Bill was directed, and had suffered most lamentably from that catastrophe, that he thought it his duty to persevere; and he had the hope that from the alterations in the Bill which he would shortly state to their Lordships, it would not meet with further opposition. He was sure that the Bill was opposed in the first instance only from a misapprehension of its object. He had no desire whatever to interfere by legislation with books, or pictures, or prints, such as were described to their Lordships the other evening as being endangered by this measure. The keeping, or the reading, or the delighting in such things must be left to taste, and was not a subject for legal interference; but when there were people who designedly and industriously manufactured books and prints with the intention of corrupting the public morals, and when they succeeded in their infamous purpose, he thought it was necessary for the Legislature to interpose and to save the public from the contamination to which they would otherwise be exposed. He now knew more certainly than he did before, that there were receptacles for the sale and exhibition of these abominable books and prints, which had the most lamentable effect, and which the law as it stood at present was altogether insufficient to put down. An indictment might be preferred, and a conviction obtained, but after the conviction the sale from the very same shop, by reason of the advertisement which the indictment published to the world, was more rapid and more fatal than before; and the only chance of putting an end to these abominations was to give a right—with all proper limitations, so that there should be no danger of abuse—to search the deposits of objectionable books and prints, to seize them, and to burn or otherwise destroy them. He knew that such receptacles did exist, and he was convinced that they could be readily reached if the proposed power were given, and that his measure would work easily and be most effectual. He did not wish to create any new offence, but to leave the common law—by which it was a misdemeanour to publish such abominable books or prints—as it stood—the object being to give facilities for seizing obscene publications and destroying them. He had already explained to their Lordships the stringent powers which existed with respect to gambling houses; and Customs' officers, under the powers they possessed, had repeatedly seized large importations of indecent books and prints; but in Holywell-street the keepers of these abominable publications set decency and law at defiance. If there were the same powers of searching for these books as for "uncustomed goods," or as in gambling houses for dice and cards, the public might be relieved from these contaminations. Having been very ably assisted, he had introduced some modifications into the Bill, so as to prevent its being obnoxious to any objection. The operative part consisted of two clauses: one was to empower justices of the peace, upon an affidavit being made that there was reason to suspect that these publications were kept in a house for sale and exhibition, to grant a warrant for searching; the other clause empowered the Chief Commissioner of Police, where he had reasonable information that these books were kept, to grant a warrant of the same kind. He believed that the liberties of the subject would be in no danger if Sir Richard Mayne had the same power which was possessed by the head of the police in every capital in Europe. That power had, however, been objected to, and he had been obliged to abandon this provision, which he did on the principle that half a loaf was better than no bread. Into the other clause he had introduced modifications which he believed to be unnecessary, but which would be harmless. The Bill, as it originally stood, only required an affidavit that the person making it had reasonable ground to suspect that these books were kept for sale and exhibition. The Bill as now amended, required that the complainant should swear that he had reason to believe, and did believe, that these books or prints were kept in store for sale or exhibition. Another Amendment enacted that the complainant should set forth the facts on which he entertained that belief, and if the justice were satisfied on these facts that the books and prints were kept as alleged, he might issue his search-warrant, with this additional guard—that he must be satisfied they were such books and prints as that their publication would constitute a misdemeanour by the common law. There was also this further security, that the magistrate must not only be satisfied that the publication of these books and prints was a misdemeanour, but a misdemeanour which ought to be prosecuted by indictment. He had been asked what he proposed to do with these indecent publications, and he therefore proposed that after condemnation they should be burnt or otherwise destroyed. He would not enter into details of the appalling extent to which the sale of these publications was carried, but would move that the House do now resolve itself into a Committee on the said Bill.

Motion agreed to. House in Committee accordingly.

LORD CAMPBELL said, he would ask their Lordships to agree to the clauses pro formâ, in order that the Amendments he had made might be printed.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR suggested that the Bill should make it an indictable offence against the party in whose possession these books and prints were discovered, if a jury found that they were kept for sale.

LORD CAMPBELL said, it had been held by the Court of Queen's Bench that it was an indictable offence to procure these books and prints for circulation, just as it was an offence to procure false coin for circulation. He therefore held it unnecessary to introduce such a provision; but if his noble and learned Friend thought otherwise he had no objection to adopt the suggestion.

Amendments made: the Report thereof to be received on Monday next.

House adjourned at a Quarter past Seven o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, July 3, 1857.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Public Health Act (Aldershot); Land Tax Commissioners' Names; Boundaries of Land (Ireland).

2° Probates and Letters of Administration (Ireland); Glebe Lands (Ireland); East Quay Wall Tax (Dublin).

THAMES AND MEDWAY CONSERVANCY BILL—CONSIDERATION.

Order for the Consideration of this Bill read.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, this Bill had for its object a purpose which he conceived was most legitimate—namely, the compromise of a suit long pending between the Crown and the Corporation of London with reference to the shores and bed of the river Thames within the limits of that Corporation. His attention had been drawn to this Bill by the Report of the Board of Trade. He had already stated to the House his strong opinion that the

Lord Campbell

Board of Trade was the guardian of the public rights, and in the faithful discharge of its duties the Board frequently came into collision with powerful bodies, and had to make statements before the House and Committees of the House which sometimes were disagreeable to the private parties and corporate bodies whom those statements affected. In this case he believed the Bill was not opposed; but it went before a Select Committee, and there was also sent to that Committee a Report of the Board of Trade. There were two points in this Bill, which, although the Bill was a private one, were of great public importance, and involved an important public principle. The first was in reference to the constitution of the body of conservators, and the second in reference to the application of the funds raised from shipping by that body. Now, with respect to the first point, he saw on the Treasury bench his right hon. Friends the Secretary for the Colonies and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who, in 1854, were Members of a Commission to which was referred the question respecting the rights and charters of the City of London, and in that investigation this question of the conservancy of the river was brought before them, and in their Report they expressed an opinion which was set forth in the Report of the Board of Trade, and was to this effect:—They recommended that the principal control of the navigation of the Thames should be vested in a Board composed of the Lord Mayor, the First Lord of the Admiralty, the President of the Board of Trade, the First Commissioner of Woods, and the Deputy Master of the Trinity House, and that they be empowered to employ persons having the requisite professional knowledge. Now, this Bill provided a body of conservators composed altogether of other people. It was proposed that the conservators should consist of the Lord Mayor of London, of two conservators chosen by the Court of Aldermen, and four by the Common Council, and that there should be four or five others, one being the Deputy Master of the Trinity House, two or three recommended by Government, one by the Board of Trade, and one by the Corporation of the Trinity House. It would be observed that in this composition the corporate element of the City of London would at all times have a majority. There would be seven corporators, and if all the other members were on all occasions to act together, yet the Government would be in a constant minority. This was in opposition to the general principle involved in the recommendation of the Report of the Commissioners on Charges on Shipping. The Board of Trade, adopting the views of the Commissioners who had sat on this subject, stated that they had thought it right to report upon other harbour Bills in the present Session, and from these Reports it would be seen they were of opinion that the body to whom any great harbour should be entrusted should possess all the legal powers requisite for the management of the harbour and all matters relative thereto, and also the knowledge and experience requisite to the due performance of its duties, but above all that it should be responsible for their due performance. The present Bill appeared to have none of the above conditions; the new body would not be the sole body having the conservancy of the Thames, and would not possess all the powers requisite for the due performance of its duties, the Government nominees would be in a minority, and, as against the members chosen by the London Corporation, would possess no power. It would, therefore, be impossible to hold them responsible for the conservation of the river. The Corporation of London would continue to exercise the local power, whilst it would be no more responsible, but would be far less responsible in the exercise of it than at present. That was the opinion of the Board of Trade with regard to the new conservators. But he had said there was another principle hardly less important—namely, the application of the funds to be raised, and especially if those funds consisted in any degree of dues raised from shipping. The Bill imposed certain new tolls on steamers plying on the Thames. Now, the Report stated that these dues were undoubtedly taxes on the trade of the port, and according to the Report of the Commissioners on local dues on shipping they ought to be abolished or applied to harbour purposes. In the latter case they would naturally form part of the conservancy fund. Now, so far from this recommendation of the Board of Trade being adopted, he believed that by the provisions of this Bill the dues in question were to be carried to the general conservancy fund, and so far from the surplus fund being applied to the reduction of the dues, there was another application of that surplus fund which showed that it was not contemplated to apply them to that purpose.

He attached the greatest importance to the principle that these bodies should, as far as possible, be elected and not nominated—elected by those who contributed to the fund, and not nominated by those close bodies which had heretofore maintained the control over it; and secondly, he held that another great principle was that the dues levied on shipping should not be exacted to any greater extent than shipping purposes required. These principles were upheld in a Bill introduced by the Government last year, which gave full effect to the Report of the Commissioners, not only as regarded the conservancy, but in all other particulars. He was, therefore, anxious to hear some explanation from Her Majesty's Government accounting for that departure from these principles which was manifested in the present measure. He believed there were peculiar circumstances in reference to the compromise with the Corporation of the City which might make this a special case; but as he attached great importance to the principles involved, he trusted Her Majesty's Government would state to the satisfaction of the House why that departure was in this instance necessary, and express their determination to give validity to the recommendations of the Commissioners of the Board of Trade on all suitable occasions.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he trusted that he should be able to satisfy the House that no departure from the principles laid down in the Report of the Corporation Commission had been assented to by the Government, and that the only variation which had been assented to was one of detail, and not of principle. The arrangement embodied in this Bill was intended to put an end to a long-pending difference between the Crown and the City of London with respect to the rights of the Crown over the bed and shores of the Thames. The Crown was advised that it was entitled to—that it had a property in the bed and shores of the Thames, and whatever revenue might accrue from leases of the land between high and low water mark. Practically, all the benefit of that land had accrued to the City of London, and the receipts had been applied to the conservancy of the river. The City of London claimed the property in the soil of the river in right of the conservancy. The case of the Crown was, that the title to the bed and shores was independent of the conservancy, and though its advisers did not dispute the right of the city to the conservancy, they asserted that the Crown held the bed and shores by an independent right; and thus the question stood at issue between the Crown and the Corporation. Those rival claims led to a long litigation, which threatened to be most expensive, and an attempt was made in 1846 to settle the question. In that year a conference took place between the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, who was then First Minister, Lord Morpeth, Chief Commissioner of Woods and Forests, and Lord Auckland, First Lord of the Admiralty, the result of which was, that a Bill for the settlement of the debated question was agreed upon and a new constitution of the Conservancy Board was also agreed upon, to consist of fifteen conservators, ten to be nominated by the corporation and five by the Crown. In 1847, that Bill was introduced and committed, and re-committed, but owing to the lateness of the Session it did not pass into law. Subsequent negotiations took place with regard to the litigation, and attempts were made by successive Attorneys General to bring it to an end. It remained, however, pending till the end of last Session, and during the inquiry into the corporation by the Commission, of which his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Sir John Patteson, and himself were Members, it was agreed that the Commissioners should not go into the question respecting which the litigation was pending, and accordingly they only went into the question of conservancy. Well, as he had before observed, the litigation was pending up to the end of last Session; and it was thought very desirable that the litigation should be terminated, inasmuch as the conservancy of the river was to a great extent paralyzed from a want of those funds which were applied to the defence of the corporation against the claim of the Crown. A conference accordingly took place between himself on the part of the Government, and Mr. Stuart Wortley, the then Recorder of the City of London on the part of the Corporation, and the result was an agreement, by which the City recognized the right of the Crown, which it had previously contested, and the Crown consented to two-thirds of the revenues arising from the bed and soil of the Thames, being paid to the Conservancy Board, the other third to be paid to the Crown. It was also determined that, on these terms the litigation should cease, that a Board of Conservancy should be created, in which the Government, together with the Trinity House, should be more strongly represented than had been previously agreed to by the Corporation; that all the funds necessary for maintaining the conservancy should be furnished, as heretofore, from the dues levied upon the port and other sources of revenue accruing to the Corporation; that the whole of the debt which was due for the portion of the river above bridge should be paid by the Board; and that no liability should be accepted by the Government. It was also agreed that the portions above and below bridge should be consolidated, whereas previously they had been distinct. That agreement was embodied in a Treasury Minute, drawn up at the end of the late Session of Parliament. The first portion of that Minute declared that—

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

“The Department of Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues, and the Corporation of London, shall complete the agreement for putting an end to the suit as settled by the Attorney General in 1854, according to which the right of the Crown in the bed and shores of the river, with the exceptions specified in the agreement, were to be granted to the Corporation, as conservators of the river, upon trust to pay to the Crown one-third of all moneys arising from the bed and soil, and to apply the other two-thirds to the improvement of the navigation and banks of the river.”

There was a further stipulation respecting the constitution of the Board, and then the Minute went on to say—

“That the whole river should be under one management, and the funds of the two portions of the river brought into common stock, and placed at the disposal of the Conservancy Board, for the maintenance and improvement of the navigation, both above and below bridge.”

And it was further provided that—

“When all the said revenues of the river are transferred to the new Board, the Board should take upon itself the burden of the existing debt, which has been incurred in the maintenance and improvement of the upper portion of the river.”

That debt at one time amounted to £199,900, but by successive payments it had been reduced by £69,000, leaving a sum of £130,900 now due. It should also be stated, that the Corporation of London had expended £50,000 of their own money within the last few years in improving the navigation of the River Thames above London Bridge. Under these circumstances, he submitted that it was an advantageous arrangement for the Government that they should retain one-third of the revenue arising from the bed and shores of the river, that the remaining two-thirds should be devoted to the improvement of the navigation, that the debt should remain a charge upon the Conservancy revenue, and that those sums which the City had been in the habit of bestowing, from time to time, upon the improvement of the conservancy, should continue to be furnished from their resources. The only remaining question was, as to the construction of the Conservancy Board. Now, this Bill certainly did not comply with the principle laid down by his right hon. Friend—namely, that the Board ought to consist of elected members. It should be remembered, however, that the Board, as suggested by the Report of the Commissioners, also deviated from that principle; for they recommended that the Board should consist of high officers of the Crown, who were not to be supposed to superintend the details, but who were to be invested with authority to employ the services of subordinate officers who should perform that duty. It was thought better that there should be nominees, both of the Corporation and of the Government; that the Corporation should appoint seven conservators, the Lord Mayor being one, the Aldermen furnishing two, and the Common Council four; that the Admiralty should appoint two, the Board of Trade one, and the Trinity House two. Considering that the Government did not furnish any new funds for the improvement of the conservancy, it appeared to him that this arrangement gave them a fair share in the representation at the Board. The principle which he contended for was, that the Conservancy Board should not be exclusively a Corporation Board, but that the Government and the Trinity House should be adequately represented there. This would not be a question of mere preponderance of numbers, as between the seven and five members nominated by the Corporation and by the Government with the Trinity House respectively. Where a Government was represented at a Board, its members always obtained that weight and authority which naturally belonged to their position as representatives of the executive power, so that this was not a point of mere arithmetical proportion. If, however, it should be found on experience that the views of the Government were unduly overruled by the Corporation members, and that the interests of the public were sacrificed to any corporation interests, it would undoubtedly be the duty of the Government representatives to bring the matter under the consideration of the Executive, who, if they found that the constitution of the Board as now proposed was unsatisfactory, would then feel called upon to adopt other measures. He confessed, however, that he did not anticipate any such consequence, and believed that the Board, as constituted, would work satisfactorily. On the whole, then, he thought that the Bill was one to which the House might give its consent with the greatest propriety.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to inquire whether the Corporation had agreed to pay any money to the Government for its concurrence in this measure?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER repeated that Government was to receive one-third of the revenue of the soil of the river.

MR. LOCKE KING said, that whatever might be the merits of the case, the House had heard sufficient, he thought, to satisfy it that the question was one of great importance; and in order that it might receive the consideration it merited, he moved the postponement of the second reading until this day week.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that complaints had been made, and not without very strong reason, of the mismanagement of the Thames conservancy, by the Corporation. In 1836, he remembered, a Committee of this House was appointed to inquire into the subject, and the opinion of that Committee was very strongly expressed that an entire change ought to take place, and that the powers vested in the Corporation should be handed over to persons holding high office—for example, to the First Lord of the Admiralty, the President of the Board of Trade, the Deputy Master of the Trinity House, and the Lord Mayor. He believed the Government at that time intended to carry out the recommendation of the Committee, but there was some talk of a reform of the Corporation, and the whole thing was deferred. Now, he thought the same course should be adopted on the present occasion. They had been recently again promised a reform of the Corporation, which, for some reason or other, had been delayed, and this question of the Thames conservancy ought to be postponed, and to form part of the measure contemplated, if, indeed, the Government had not altogether abandoned their intention to bring in such a Bill.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that he should oppose the adjournment of the debate, on the ground that all the facts were before the House, and that hon. Members were as perfectly able to form an opinion on the merits of the Bill then, as they would be in a week's time. For his own part, he entirely concurred in the principle laid down by his right hon Friend (Sir J. Graham). As a general rule, he believed it was most important that all taxes levied upon commerce in this country should be devoted to strictly commercial purposes, and should be expended under the management of an independent and responsible Board. This general principle, he hoped, would not be lost sight of by the House, and any departure from it in the present instance could only be justified by the special circumstances of the case. Into these circumstances he should not enter; they had been fully stated by his right hon. Friend (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), who had proved beyond doubt, he thought, that in the present case they had to deal with a very complicated state of things, and with circumstances of complete speciality, and that the Government were justified in the course they had taken. At the same time, he should be sorry if this course should lead the House to relax their adherence on future occasions to that which, as a general rule, ought always to be kept in view.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, that he was in the position of four-fifths probably of the Members of the House, and knew nothing of the provisions of this private Bill. Before the House decided upon passing it, they should know what power of taxation it conferred upon the Corporation; and next, they should also take care that the Corporation levied not one farthing more upon shipping than was actually required for the conservancy of the river. There might be clauses in the Bill to meet these points; but the House should have time to investigate the matter, and he should therefore vote for the adjournment of the debate.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER did not understand that the Bill conferred any new powers upon the Board of levying taxes. It merely transferred the existing dues, and according to the last return he found that the amount expended upon the conservancy of the river in one year exceeded by £2,844 the amount received from dues; while one of the advantages of the new arrangement was that the City had been induced to continue the practice, which it had followed for several years past, of supplying the deficiency from its other revenues.

MR. HENLEY said, he hoped the House would not assent to the Motion for adjourning the debate. He saw no good that could arise from the adjournment, and thought the House quite competent to decide upon the question at once. He could not forget that there had been twelve or thirteen years of useless litigation between the Crown and the City respecting certain rights; that that litigation had continued all the time without the courts of law being able to come to a final decision; and that it might still continue for another twelve or thirteen years but for the arrangement proposed by this Bill. So far as he understood the measure, the Board appeared to be fairly constituted. He did not see that there was any likelihood of jobbing either on the part of the Crown or the Corporation; for they were pretty well guarded on both sides. In fact, one party would be sure to show up the other, if any attempt were made to do what was wrong or unjust to the public. Under the circumstances, he confessed that he regarded the arrangement, on the whole, to be a favourable one to all parties; for it must be borne in mind that the rights were disputed in the first instance—that the actual right to the shore of the river was disputed. As far as the Corporation were concerned, the Bill fully guarded against their taking a farthing of the money for themselves, but every farthing would have to be laid out in the proper conservancy of the river.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, that, as the adjournment of the debate would impede the progress of the Bill, he ventured to recommend that the opinion of the House should be taken upon the third reading; and in the meantime he hoped that hon. Members would read the Report of the Board of Trade on the measure as it stood. He thought that the constitution of the Board of Conservancy was objectionable, inasmuch as it gave an invariable standing majority to the Corporation. It was moreover at variance with the recommendation of two Cabinet Ministers—the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary of State for the Colonies—and with the measure introduced last Session by the Government, which adopted the recommendation of the Commission, and named a chosen body, in which the Corporation had only one representative, in the person of the Lord Mayor. He had not studied the Bill, except through the Report of the Board of Trade, but, as he understood it, there was in it a new power of taxation upon shipping above bridge, and upon all steamers plying between Putney and Teddington. There was also an application of any surplus arising from dues, which he thought was objectionable. The Board of Trade recommended that if the surplus increased the dues should be lowered, but the Bill applied it in another way. Moreover, the measure appeared to him to have a most important bearing upon the coal dues, the corn metage, and all the great questions of taxation affecting the interests of the Corporation of London. It was called a private Bill, but a more important public measure, involving great public principles, had seldom been brought under the consideration of the House. He had discharged his duty in having called the attention of the House to it. It would not be reasonable, he thought, to arrest the progress of the Bill in its present stage, but he suggested that the sense of the House should be taken with respect to it upon the third reading.

Mr. Labouchere

SIR JOHN SHELLEY asked the Government to give an assurance that the third reading should not be fixed for an earlier period than that day week.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that no doubt it was desirable to give sufficient time for the consideration of the Report of the Board of Trade to which his right hon. Friend had referred. The Bill was not a Government Bill, however, but was promoted by one of the hon. Members for the City of London, who would perhaps fix a day for the third reading.

SIR JAMES DUKE said, he begged to assure the House that the Corporation intended this Bill to confer a benefit upon the mercantile classes and upon the public generally, and if he did not believe that that would be its object he should wash his hands of it and give it no support. The Corporation had expended no less than £50,000 beyond their receipts in the improvement of the river Thames, and they were willing to provide that sum out of their general income. They also had a further debt of £137,000 on bond arising from expenses incurred about the upper navigation of the river. They desired to work cordially with the Trinity House, with the Board of Trade, and with the Government; they had no corporate interests to serve in the matter, and their only work was to improve the navigation of the river, and to confer a benefit upon the commercial interests of the City. He also begged to remind the House that the Corporation was in a different position to what it was some years ago, for now every resident freeman of the City had an opportunity of voting, and that was a sufficient check to prevent jobbing. If the Bill were read a second time, he would have no objection to appoint the third reading for Tuesday next. If he delayed it to a later period the Bill could not be introduced into the House of Lords this Session.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that after next Wednesday no private Bill could go up to the House of Lords from this House; so that if the third reading were postponed until that day, it would be tantamount to defeating the measure.

MR. LOCKE KING said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn; Amendments made; Bill to be read 3<sup>d</sup>.

TEWKESBURY ELECTION.

House informed, that the Committee had determined,—

That John Martin, esquire, is duly elected a Burgess to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Tewkesbury.

And the said Determination was ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

THE ADJOURNED INDIAN DEBATE.

QUESTION.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he would beg to ask the first Lord of the Treasury, what day he will give for the conclusion of the Indian debate, the adjournment of which, on the 23rd June, was agreed to by the President of the Board of Control on the ground of the great importance of the subject? He would also beg to ask, whether the noble Lord did not consider the importance of the debate much increased by the recent news from India?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I must correct the recollection of the noble Lord, who seems to imagine that my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Control, consented to the adjournment of the debate, solely upon the ground of the importance of the subject. Now, I think the reason the debate was adjourned was, because it happened to be between twelve and one in the morning: and as many hon. Gentlemen wished to speak, it was impossible to resist the Motion for the adjournment. I confess, Sir, that I do not exactly see the connection between the important news which has lately been received from India and the promotion of the growth of cotton on the north-west coast of that country; but that is not material. I am afraid I cannot consent to the request of the noble Lord to name a day, because we have a great many Bills of importance which it is most desirable to advance; and there are a great many Votes in the Estimates which have not yet been considered. I am afraid, therefore, that those who wish to take part in the discussion to which the noble Lord refers, must find a time for it themselves.

REPORT ON SCIENCE AND ART.

QUESTION.

SIR DENHAM NORREYS said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, why the Fourth Report of the Department of Science and Art has not been issued to Members with their Votes as in previous years; why it was not issued to Members before the 1st day of July (and then only on special application at the office for the sale of papers), the Estimate for the Department of Science and Art having been voted on the 29th day of June; and whether arrangements cannot be made to have the future Reports of the Department issued to Members at such a period of the Session as shall allow examination of the Report previous to the Estimate for the Department being voted by the House?

MR. WILSON said, the delay in presenting the Report arose from some mistake, in consequence of the Department of Science and Art being in the present year transferred from the control of the Board of Trade to that of the Board of Education. The reason why the Report was not issued to hon. Members was, because the Printing Committee had decided that papers presented by command, and being of a voluminous nature, and not in many cases of general interest, should not be distributed like the other Parliamentary papers, but should be given to hon. Members on application.

SIR DENHAM NORREYS said, he thought it desirable that some notice of the papers presented by command should be given to Members.

Viscount Palmerston

MR. WILSON said, he thought so too, and he would suggest that a list of such papers as were ready should be specified in the daily Votes distributed to Members.

ORDNANCE SURVEY OF SCOTLAND.

QUESTION.

SIR DENHAM NORREYS said, he would now beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, when the Supplemental Estimate for the Ordnance Survey of Scotland will be presented to the House, and whether any orders or instructions have been issued to the Ordnance Department in respect of the scale on which the Survey of Scotland and England is to be drawn in future?

MR. WILSON said that, in reply to the first question, he believed the Estimate would be presented to the House within a fortnight. With regard to the second question of the hon. Baronet, he begged to state that, after the decision at which the House arrived the other evening, the Treasury received from the Ordnance Department a letter requesting to be informed what course they should pursue. The Treasury replied to the effect, that in accordance with the decision of the House, all future works which were not now actually commenced must be drawn upon the six-inch scale, and so long as the House continued to entertain its present views, that course would be implicitly followed. In order, however, that hon. Members might be satisfied on the subject, he had moved for the production of the letter from the Ordnance Department, and the reply of the Treasury, and he believed they would be in the hands of hon. Members to-morrow morning.

COMMUNICATION BETWEEN LONDON AND DUBLIN—QUESTION.

MR. CORRY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, whether the Government has accepted the conditions of a contract for an improved Postal and Passenger Communication between London and Dublin?

MR. WILSON said, he hoped that an arrangement had at last been effected on the subject. Only one point still remained to be settled, and he could not believe that there would be any difficulty in concluding a satisfactory arrangement between the North-Western Railway Company and the Post Office. He would, in a few days, be able to lay the formal conditions of the contract upon the table; but the outlines of the arrangement were, that four vessels of 300 feet in length, of 1,700 tons burden, and of 600 nominal horse power, capable of working up to 3,000 horse power, should be provided for the service, so that the passage should be performed within three hours and three quarters. The whole journey between London and Kingstown was to be performed in eleven hours, and between London and Dublin in eleven hours and a half each way. The periods of arrival and departure would be stated in a Minute, which he hoped to be in a condition to lay upon the table in the course of a few days.

MR. VANCE said, he should be glad to know when the new arrangement would come into operation?

MR. WILSON's reply was inaudible.

TREATMENT OF LUNATICS.

QUESTION.

MR. DRUMMOND said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, what report he received from the Commissioners of Lunacy with regard to the complaint of Thomas Tilley, that he had been confined in an iron jacket in a dark room for seven weeks in the Beverley Retreat for lunatics near York, to which Commissioners the said complaint was sent for investigation?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, several months ago he received a complaint of the treatment to which Thomas Tilley had been subjected, not in the Beverley Retreat, alluded to by the hon. Member for West Surrey, but in the Gate Helmsley Lunatic Asylum, near York, which he referred forthwith, according to the usual practice, to the Commissioners in lunacy for the purpose of investigation. Two of the Commissioners were immediately deputed to make a full inquiry into the case, and they reported the result to the Board. The Board sent him extracts from that Report; but a copy of the entire Report with Minutes of the evidence was sent to the committee of visitors of the asylum. The extracts received by him fully confirmed the statements as to the use, in the case of this patient, of means of restraint and other treatment which the Commissioners strongly condemned; but it did not appear, however, that the confinement had been in a dark room, or had lasted so long as seven weeks. The iron jacket, too, did not belong to the asylum, but had been brought to it with a patient from York. It also appeared that the conduct of the patient Tilley was of the most violent description, and that he had escaped no less than six times, and while at large had committed acts of the greatest violence. The Commissioners also stated other extenuating circumstances, speaking favourably of the general management of the asylum, though they passed a severe censure upon the conduct adopted with regard to this patient. He was informed that the Commissioners had since again visited the asylum, and satisfied themselves that due care was now taken against the recurrence of any similar practices; and he had no doubt the inquiry would produce very beneficial results.

On the Motion "That the House at its rising adjourn till Monday,"

THE RED RIVER SETTLEMENT.

QUESTION.

MR. WYLD said, he believed that a body of troops was about to be sent from Canada to the Red River Settlement. The distance from the place of embarkation to the Red River Settlement would, by the ordinary route across the lakes, be about 1,200 miles; but it was stated that the troops were to be sent up the river St. Lawrence, round the shore of Labrador, and landed on the eastern shore of Hudson's Bay—a distance of 4,200 miles. He believed that a very strong feeling was entertained on this subject in Canada, as Canadian merchants had offered to convey the troops without expense to the Government to the eastern shore of Lake Superior; he would, therefore, beg to ask the Under Secretary for War whether it is the intention of the Government to adopt the shorter or the longer route?

SIR JOHN RAMSDEN said the hon. Gentleman was perfectly correct in stating that a detachment of troops was being sent round to the Red River Settlement by sea, and which was a much more circuitous route than that by the lakes and overland; but the obstacles in the latter route were so great that it would be almost impossible at present to overcome them. It was true that there was steam communication the whole distance from Toronto to the western end of Lake Superior, but at that point it would be necessary to cross a tract of country 300 miles in extent, which was, he believed, entirely uninhabited, which was intersected by rivers and swamps, and in which, at present, no means of transit existed. That route was, in fact, utterly impracticable, and it had, therefore been deemed necessary that the troops should make the long détour of which the hon. Gentleman complained. He might add, as he had before stated, that these troops had been sent at the request of the Hudson's Bay Company, and at their cost.

MR. WYLD said, the Canadian Legislature had voted £300 for the formation of a road in the district to which the hon. Baronet had alluded. The country, so far from being impassable, was average prairie land, and he believed the real reason why the troops were not sent by that route was because the Hudson's Bay Company were alarmed lest a road should be opened from Canada to their settlements.

SIR JOHN RAMSDEN said, he had been informed that the Canadian Legislature had passed a Vote for the formation of a road, but that road was not yet opened. It was necessary that the troops should be sent out immediately, and they had therefore been sent round by sea.

BOARD OF HEALTH—QUESTION.

MR. PALK said, he wished to ask the Home Secretary if it is the intention of the Government to bring in any Bill to remedy the defects proved before a Select Committee of the present Board of Health. It would be in the recollection of the House that the Bill under which the Board of Health now existed was passed in the year 1848; that that Bill had been condemned over and over again; that it had been submitted to Committees, and that various Members of the present administration had attempted to make such modifications and alterations in its provisions as should induce Parliament to adopt it as a permanent measure. Upon all occasions, however, they had failed, and upon the last occasion, which was the Session of 1856, that House, by a large majority, refused to give the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Hertford (Mr. Cowper), permission to introduce the Bill which he then asked leave to bring in. The right hon. Gentleman succeeded, however, in obtaining from the House a continuance of the then existing Act, upon the specific pledge that early in the present Session a Bill should be brought in to amend and remedy the defects which had been proved and admitted to exist in the Board of Health Act. They had now arrived at a period of the Session when it was extremely doubtful whether any measure of that sort could be introduced; and that circumstance would be fraught with great injury and evil to towns and districts under the present Board of Health, because they had spent all the money they were authorized to raise without having completed the necessary drainage and other works for which they had placed themselves under that Board. Another class had also been deeply aggrieved by the conduct of the Government, because they had been waiting year after year for the promised measure, to enable them to take those steps for the cleansing of their towns which the increase in their population demanded. The only Bill that had been brought before the House was one which the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary was most successful in carrying through a second reading; but he carried it through with so much exertion that he totally forgot to explain or comment upon the nature of that measure. It was nothing more, however, than a simple Bill to render permanent all the evils and defects of the existing law, which had been so repeatedly condemned. It professed to transfer the powers of the Board of Health to the Privy Council, and to save the country £3,000 a year; but it was, in fact to perpetuate the defects of the Act of 1848. He (Mr. Palk) wished, therefore, to know whether it was the intention of the Government to redeem the pledge by means of which they had obtained the renewal of that Act, or whether the promises then made by them were only made for the purpose of gaining time?

Sir John Ramsden

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he thought it desirable not to make any statement in anticipation of the discussion which would probably take place at a later period of the evening, when the House went into Committee on the General Board of Health Bill; but he might state in reply to the question put to him by the hon. Gentleman, that a Bill had been prepared for materially amending the Act of 1848, although he could not admit that that Act was condemned by the Select Committee, as the hon. Member seemed to infer.

IMMIGRATION TO BRITISH GUIANA.
QUESTION.

MR. T. BARING said, that he had given notice to present a petition from British Guiana on the immigration of free labourers, but he had since decided as the better way of calling the attention of the Government to the subject to ask a question of the President of the Board of Trade. At the end of March last a most respectable and influential meeting had been held at George Town, Demerara, to take into consideration the supply of labour for the wants of the colony; that a resolution to petition Parliament on the subject was adopted unanimously at that meeting; and a petition in accordance with that resolution had been forwarded to him with a request that he would present it to the House of Commons. He had readily undertaken that duty, because the petition demanded nothing incompatible with justice; because it uttered no angry complaints as to the effect of the commercial policy of this country upon the colony in question; because it indicated no party or political bias; and because it manifested no feeling of hostility towards any particular Minister. That petition, moreover, stated facts and circumstances in connection with the colony as well as with this country which demanded, in his (Mr. Baring's) opinion, the immediate consideration of Her Majesty's Government, and which claimed the attention and sympathy of the House. It was not necessary for him to refer to the importance to the mother country of the prosperity of the Colonies, especially those colonies which, like the colony in question, produced articles which entered largely into the consumption of the population of this country; nor to discuss the importance of proving the advantages of free labour over slave labour in the production of these articles. British Guiana comprised an extent of 70,000 square miles, and contained upwards of 50,000,000 of acres of the most fertile land; it had the advantage of an excellent internal communication by means of its large rivers; and it had a great extent of sea coast. Moreover, it was within a month or six weeks' sail of this country; and therefore in a most favourable position for supplying it with produce. Of this immense surface, however, there were only some 60,000 acres under cultivation because of the deficiency of labour, although the soil and climate were calculated to grow cotton as well as sugar, and notwithstanding the cotton from that quarter had obtained a medal at the Great Exhibition. Of the population of 90,000, about one-fourth only could be called labourers, and to these must be added some 20,000 Portuguese and coolies. The practical problem to be solved, therefore, was how labour was to be furnished to a colony so rich in all other advantages without interfering with the obligations due to humanity. Unfortunately, natives of Africa, of India, or of China, were the only persons who could cultivate the soil in the climate of that colony; and the complaint of the petitioners was, that they were hampered in obtaining a supply of labour from these sources by the various and unnecessary restrictions that had been imposed upon the immigration of labourers. He (Mr. Baring) was quite ready to allow that, if it should be found that the effect of emigration to our colonies from Africa led to all those unnatural wars and those acts of barbarity which distinguished the slave trade, we ought not to listen to the suggestion of procuring a supply of labour for the colony of British Guiana from that quarter of the globe. But this was a question which ought not to be neglected, and if emigration from Africa were resorted to in order to furnish the means of labour, in this case it was a source of supply which ought to be watched by the Government. The petitioners prayed that they might be permitted to import emigrants from any part of the globe in which a British Consul resided. If Africa were excluded, what was the case with regard to India? An attempt had been made to procure coolies, but in India there was the greatest restriction imposed upon emigration. Only 350 coolies were allowed to leave in one ship, however large that ship might be; and the Great Eastern, which could convey 10,000 passengers, would be confined to the smaller number, if she sailed from Calcutta. The result of this restriction was, that an inferior class of ships were taken up for the emigration of coolies; and he (Mr. Baring) had been informed that the mortality and disease on board French emigrant ships of a large size, with a greater number of labourers on board, was considerably less than in British ships of a smaller capacity, which the restriction in question brought into the trade, to the exclusion of others better adapted for it in every respect. That was the first clog to the supply of labour for the Colonies. The next was the regulation making it compulsory on the Colonies to send back the labourer, at their own expense, when his term of five or ten years had expired. The coolie was not allowed to stay; he was not permitted to take an equivalent in money, but he was obliged to go back, and the colony had to pay the cost of his transport. What the colonists wished was, that the coolie, who, in many cases, had amassed considerable sums of money by the end of his servitude, should be suffered to make his own bargain, for which he was perfectly competent; and they objected to being shackled with these restrictions. The principle that ought to be adopted in this case was the same as had been adopted in commercial matters—that of absolute freedom, so far as was compatible with what was due to humanity. The principle acted upon was, on the contrary, almost prohibition, through the stringent nature of the regulations insisted on, and of these regulations he thought the colonists had a just right to complain. The result was, that, in the seven years, from 1848 to 1854, 22,000 labourers had been imported into the colony, of which 10,000 only were coolies, the remainder being from Madeira and Sierra Leone. These labourers were all in better circumstances in the colony than they could be at home; for they were able sometimes to earn as much as 1s. an hour, but they could constantly obtain from 2s. 6d. to 3s. wages on short time each day. In 1834 an ordinance was passed by the Indian Government by which, under the plea of preventing hardship to the labourer, the emigration of coolies was virtually suspended; and now there were no longer any means of obtaining labour for British Guiana from India. But then it might be said that China was open to the colonists. But while the Chinese had been flocking to every other colony, and had been carried in British ships to many foreign possessions, they had not been allowed to enter British Guiana. In that colony there had been a virtual prohibition of Chinese labour during the last few years, not on the ground of international policy, nor because the Chinese, as a class, were not industrious and useful labourers, nor because they would not answer the purpose for which they were required, nor because they did not increase the prosperity of the colonies in which they had settled—Singapore and Java for instance—but because they were not accompanied by their wives. It had, however, always been the course of emigration that the males went out first and the females followed after; and it was shown by the condition of the Chinese themselves in Java and in other places of the Eastern Archipelago to which they had migrated. Besides that, marriages in China presented an almost insuperable difficulty in the case of the poorer emigrant, inasmuch as, instead of the father giving a dowry with his daughter, the husband was expected to pay the father for his wife. The real question in the case was, what the Government proposed to do for the purpose of taking steps to obtain labour. It was a question of the greatest importance to the future of the colony; and on its solution depended not only the prosperity of the colony, but also the prosperity of this country, inasmuch as it involved the cheapness or dearness of articles of primary consumption. Moreover, it involved the further problem of how far it could be proved to the world that our Colonies, with free labour alone, were able to compete with the sugar and cotton-growing States of America. In this delicate and complicated matter it was desirable that the Colonies should act in concert with the Government in endeavouring to mitigate the evils complained of, and, in the exercise of his discretion, he should now simply ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies whether Her Majesty's Government had adopted any measures to facilitate immigration into British Guiana?

Mr. T. Baring

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he entirely concurred in the opinions of his hon. Friend, that no more important question relating to our colonial policy could possibly engage the attention of the House than that which his hon. Friend had brought forward; nor did he differ from his hon. Friend, in any essential degree, as to the general principles he had enunciated. Important as the subject was at all times, it was especially so under existing circumstances. The present very high price of sugar was drawing the attention of all the sugar-producing countries of the world to the supply of labour—a matter which lay at the very foundation of their cultivation, and formed the very life-blood of their prosperity. It was, therefore, the duty of the Government, by all lawful means, to provide our Colonies with a proper supply of labour, not only for the sake of the colonists themselves, but because there was no more effectual mode of discouraging slavery and the slave trade than by proving to the world that, under a state of freedom, these articles of general consumption, especially sugar, could be produced with quite as much advantage as under compulsory labour. He had always held that the importation of free labourers to the West Indies should be promoted in every legitimate way ; but there were certain conditions for its regulation, to which they ought steadfastly to adhere. Those conditions were, first, that they should take care that the laws of humanity were not violated ; that every man who engaged himself as a labourer was a free agent ; and that no system of internal slave trade, with all its attendant atrocities, should be fostered in the country from which these persons were brought. Next, their passage across the seas should be so managed as to guard against the recurrence of any of those fearful calamities on board the vessels which formerly excited so much horror among the people of England. The third condition which ought to be enforced was, that when the labourers reached the Colonies, they should be treated with all the humane consideration due to free men, and that, under no system of so-called apprenticeship or contracts, should the institution of slavery, on which he trusted the brand of this country had been indelibly fixed, be in any degree revived. Another condition, scarcely less important than any of the foregoing, was, that in any such plan of immigration, a due proportion between the sexes should be observed, and that a reasonable number of women should be introduced, to avoid the frightful evil inseparable from the carrying of an exclusively male population to any British possession. Under these restrictions, the Government were anxious to encourage emigration to our Colonies, from whatever source that emigration might be derived. The hon. Member talked as if nothing had been done of late years in this matter. But, in fact, an immense emigration, under stringent regulations, had been conducted, in many instances, with signal benefit both to the Colonies and to the emigrants themselves. In the case of the Mauritius, they had a striking exemplification of the possibility of cultivating sugar by free labour, not only at a profit, but at a greater profit than by slave labour. From its proximity to India, the Mauritius had no difficulty in procuring an ample supply of labour, and within the last ten years, as many as 100,000 coolies had been transported thence to that island, and were engaged in the cultivation of its sugar plantations. The result was, an enormous increase in the production of that colony, with a high state of consequent prosperity, which, so far from being purchased at the expense of inhumanity towards these labourers, enabled them to accumulate property, and settle on the island, or, if they returned to their native country, they carried the fruits of their industry with them. There was no pretext whatever for saying that the coolies in the Mauritius were not duly protected and benefited by the system there in operation. He (Mr. Labouchere) could assure his hon. Friend that if our West Indian possessions had not enjoyed the same advantages to an equal degree, that had not been the result of any unnecessary obstruction on the part of the Government, but was owing to their geographical position in relation to the source of the supply of labour not being so favourable as that of the Mauritius. His hon. Friend asked why they confined themselves to India, and did not go to Africa and China. It was due no less to the remarks of so high an authority as his hon. Friend than to the importance of the subject itself, that the House should know that it was on no light or ill-considered grounds that the Government had discouraged emigration to the West Indies from these two countries. The attempt to obtain a supply of labour from Africa had been made in our own possessions, and on the Kroo coast, but without success. The experiments, which had been tried with the greatest care, had entirely failed ; and he was satisfied that any extensive efforts to procure negroes would infallibly lead to the fostering of an internal system of slavery in Africa. It might be said, it could do no harm to take the negro away from domestic slavery, and transport him as a free labourer to our Colonies. That might be true if they looked only to the case of the individual negro ; but, what would be the result ? His place would be immediately filled up by somebody else. This would increase the value of the negro, and speedily cause a revival of all the horrors incident to intestine war, and an internal slave trade. The greatest caution ought to be exercised before they took steps which might lead to such monstrous results. He had been gratified beyond expression by the accounts he had received during the last two years, describing the growth of legitimate traffic on the western coast of Africa. Commerce, peace, civilization, and, let him add, Christianity, were spreading in those regions. A recent communication from the Governor of Sierra Leone stated that he had seen fifty canoes coming down the river laden with native produce; and it was remarkable how the exportation of palm oil and other products was increasing. They were, therefore, at length, exercising a substantial influence on the internal condition of Africa, and they ought to have a care how they did anything to destroy this newborn commerce, and to mar such fair prospects. With regard to the importation of labour from China, to which a gentleman from British Guiana had informed him the hopes of that colony were more especially directed, he would admit the Chinese made very useful and industrious labourers; they were hardy, frugal, willing to work, and moreover, did not want to be sent back again; and if they could be induced to go out to British Guiana, and to other parts of the West Indies, they would be valuable auxiliaries to the cultivator. Still, it was most important that the rule requiring that a certain number of women should accompany the male Chinese emigrants should be adhered to. At one time there were no less than 20,000 of those emigrants, and only three women in the colony of Victoria. They were all labourers, and the state of things became so shocking to the moral feelings of the colonists, that they adopted a peculiar plan for keeping Chinese emigrants out of the colony. They imposed a tax of £10 upon every Chinese emigrant that came into it. But that plan failed, because neighbouring colonies did not adopt it, and the emigrants having obtained an entrance into them, contrived by indirect means to pass into the colony of Victoria. The question of inducing Chinese women to follow the men was not, by any means, so simple as his hon. Friend seemed to consider; for Her Majesty's Government had received from Sir John Bowring the strongest remonstrances against any attempt to induce Chinese women, by Government agency, to emigrate from China, because it would infallibly produce a system of fraud and violence of the most reprehensible character. The Government held the whole question to be of such grave importance that they instructed Lord Elgin, on his going out to China, to avail himself of every opportunity of obtaining correct and unprejudiced information on it, and he (Mr. Labouchere) could assure his hon.

Mr. Labouchere

Friend, on the part of the Government, that if he could see his way to a plan for encouraging Chinese emigration to our Colonies, without introducing evils of the most alarming magnitude, he should rejoice to adopt it. His hon. Friend had said that there were several minute regulations with regard to the coolies, which operated as checks to their emigration. He seemed to think that the master of a coolie in one of our colonies was compelled to convey him to his native country. That was not so. All that they were obliged to do was, to give them a back-passage money, which was quite a different thing from expelling them from the colonies. He (Mr. Labouchere) could only say, it appeared to him the time had come when that question might be fairly considered. The coolies were now so much accustomed to West Indian labour, that they could judge for themselves on that point; but it was a point on which the Indian Government felt great difficulty. The state of the question now was this:—He (Mr. Labouchere) had written to the Indian Government, requesting them to give their most serious consideration to the matter, and he inferred from their answer, there was some probability as to their relaxing that rule. They had, however, always attached the greatest importance to it, because they were apprehensive that the coolies might be taken in. They thought it was only fair to the coolies, that after so long a residence as that of ten years in a colony, they should be furnished with the means of returning to their own country. He should be very glad if it should be found possible, consistently with the interests of those poor people, to relax the rule. His hon. Friend had said that, although the French authorities, in permitting the emigration of coolies from Pondicherry, followed a different rule from ours with regard to the tonnage of the vessels, that there was less mortality in the French ships than in the English. That was a startling fact, if true. He could only say, the Emigration Commissioners informed him that that was contrary to their experience, and that the rule laid down by them, of one coolie to a ton, was the proper rule; that it could not be altered without danger, and that it would be against the sanitary regulations which it was thought necessary to observe in this matter, to follow the French rule. That subject was also one of importance, and he had directed strict inquiry to be made on the spot by impartial persons.

The Government could have no object in retaining any restrictions, except those which were necessary to secure to the coolies fair and proper treatment in their passage across the ocean. Every suggestion from the Colonies on this subject had received, and would receive, the most attentive consideration from the Government; but the national faith and honour, and the interests of the Colonies themselves in the long run, required that they should not depart from that policy which this country had persevered in for so many years with regard to emigration to the West Indies. His hon. Friend said there was an arbitrary rule as to the number of emigrants to be taken in any vessel. The rule arose from this: that the emigration agents supposed vessels of a moderate size, and not exceeding a certain tonnage, were the most convenient for conducting this emigration, and that if vessels of a larger size were employed, they would be kept too long waiting before they could be filled. This rule, therefore, was adopted for the convenience of the colony itself. If anything could increase the desire of Her Majesty's Government to consult the wishes of the people of British Guiana, it would be the temperate tone of their petition, and the importance of discouraging the horrors of the slave trade in other countries.

GROWTH OF COTTON IN INDIA. OBSERVATIONS.

MR. HADFIELD said, he deeply regretted the position in which the Motion with regard to the growth of cotton in India had been placed. The House was aware that it would be impossible for the hon. and learned Member for Devonport (Sir E. Perry) to resume the adjourned debate upon that subject, because the whole of the future part of the Session was now in the hands of the Government. He did hope the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) would reconsider his decision. In the manufacturing districts much alarm was felt as to the supply of cotton, and it would be a great misfortune if the adjourned debate on the growth of cotton in India should not be resumed, and if the important communications expected from the President of the Board of Control should not be made. What would the country think when they saw the House spend the greater part of one night in a debate about the price of a picture, and yet unable to find time for discussing the claims of India, and the great benefit that would result to our manufacturing districts from the cultivation of cotton in that country? He appealed to the noble Lord to afford them an opportunity for a full discussion of this important subject.

LORD ADOLPHUS VANE-TEMPEST said, the noble Lord had added sarcasm to refusal this evening by telling hon. Members that they must find a day for themselves for the resumption of this debate. The noble Lord must have known that in the present state of the business of the House that was impossible. He now begged to ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Control at what period he proposed to make his Indian statement to the House. That statement was usually made just before the festive season of the whitebait dinner at Greenwich, when a very small number of Members were present, and those very exhausted. Surely the Indian budget should be brought forward at a period of the Session when there was likely to be a fuller attendance.

SIR ERSKINE PERRY repeated a suggestion he had formerly made, that, instead of submitting to the House his Indian statement at the end of the Session, in the first ten days of August, when, perhaps, not more than twenty hon. Members were present, the President of the Board of Control should make it in the first ten days of the Session, when no Government business was before the House, and when the House, being then in full possession of its faculties, would probably give its attention to what seemed a rather distasteful subject. The affairs of India just now were so extremely interesting that he trusted the noble Lord would listen to the appeal made to him, and give a day for the continuation of the cotton debate.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, he was perfectly ready to introduce the statement respecting India on any day hon. Members wished, but the House itself would complain if measures of immediate urgency were retarded for a statement and a debate which, however important, would have no immediate consequence. The same might be said of the Motion of the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. J. B. Smith). He had not objected to the adjournment of the discussion the other night, because the hour was late, and he thought it right to say something on the question, but he had never made any promise on the part of the Government that they would give up a night for the purpose. The noble Lord (Lord A. V. Tempest) complained that his noble Friend at the head of the Government had "added sarcasm to refusal" by telling hon. Members that they must find a night for themselves. It was, however, perfectly open to them to take either Tuesdays or Wednesdays for the resumption of the debate. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Devonport (Sir E. Perry) now suggested that the Indian statement should be made at the beginning, instead of at the end of the Session. The reason why this statement had hitherto been made at the latter period was that the Indian accounts were generally made up to April, and delay took place in order that they might be produced. He was ready, however, to submit his statement at any time, though, whether it was made at the beginning or the close of the Session, he feared he should be equally unsuccessful in securing a good attendance on the part of hon. Members. An instance of the apathy which prevailed on Indian subjects was given some nights ago, when the House was nearly counted out on the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaid); and there was also a very small attendance during the discussion introduced by the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. J. B. Smith), though that was a subject which interested many persons in this country. At present he could not name any day for the Indian Budget, and certainly not before the end of the month could he hope to introduce it. Before sitting down he could not help saying a few words upon what had fallen from the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Thomas Baring) as to the alleged disposition of the Indian Government to prohibit the exportation of coolies. Now, so far from entertaining such a disposition, the Indian Government were anxious by every possible means to assist the coolie emigration, but it was their duty to see that these persons embarked with a perfect knowledge of what they were about, and that the voyage was performed in good and seaworthy vessels. As to making any relaxation with regard to the return passage, a measure of this sort had been viewed with much jealousy by the Indian authorities, because that return passage was supposed to afford the greatest security which could be given for the independence of the coolie. It was said, why not leave the coolie to make his own bargain? But it could not be maintained that he was a perfect match for the planter, or that the Government should not watch over the transactions between them. He had, however, with the concurrence of the Court of Directors, written a dispatch giving instructions that this subject should be properly considered in India; and if any means could be suggested by which the existing restrictions could be removed, while at the same time due precautions continued to be taken to secure the independence and fair treatment of the Coolie,—if, for example, a satisfactory method could be adopted of commuting his return passage for land, while it left him at perfect liberty to claim his return passage if he thought fit—he was certain there would be no indisposition on the part of the Indian Government to take these suggestions into consideration.

Mr. Vernon Smith

MR. KERSHAW observed, that he could not quite agree with those who thought the House apathetic on the subject of India; but, whatever might be the feeling here, he could assure the House that the country was becoming more than ever interested in the affairs of India; and in the northern districts especially it was no wonder that this should be so. The short supply of cotton and the consequent want of employment were already telling, and in the borough with which he was connected he believed two-thirds of the mills had been working short time for at least a month past. Under these circumstances, he joined in the appeal to the noble Lord to fix a day for the renewal of the debate.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, that the numerous applications which had been made to the noble Lord for a day on which to resume the discussion did not show that there was that apathy on the subject which the right hon. Gentleman had stated to exist. It was true that when the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaid) brought on the question there was a disinclination on the part of the House to entertain it; but he was informed that that arose from an impression that the hon. Member was in some degree forestalling the Motion of the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. J. B. Smith), and that to raise a discussion upon the state of India on the petition of the missionaries was hardly a fitting mode of introducing the question to the House. As the noble Lord at the head of the Government had informed the House that they must find a day for themselves for renewing the debate, the noble Lord must not object if, availing themselves of the forms of the House, they should bring it on in a manner not quite so regular and formal as they could have wished.

MR. CAMPBELL observed, that the disastrous intelligence recently received from India, the disaffection of a portion of the native regiments, and the insecurity of life and property which prevailed there would seem to render it desirable that a day should be appointed for concluding the debate.

MR. TURNER said, he also wished to express his concurrence in this view, and assure the House that the question excited a great amount of interest out of doors. He regretted exceedingly that the noble Lord at the head of the Government had not made an effort to give them a night for the further discussion of the subject. The noble Lord had recently visited Manchester, where he had seen a vast population, well attired, and apparently in prosperous circumstances, assembled together to give a loyal reception to their Sovereign. If the noble Lord should visit Manchester towards the close of the year, he feared that he would see it under a different aspect. He would still find the factories closed, and see no smoke issuing from their chimneys; but the cause would be the stoppage of trade, and the consequent absence of employment arising from the scarcity of cotton.

Motion agreed to.

House at rising to adjourn till Monday next.

PONTEFRAC T ELECTION.

House informed, that the Committee had determined—

That William Wood, esquire, is duly elected a Burgess to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Pontefract.

And the said Determination was ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

NEW WRITS—MOTION.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON, in rising to propose the Resolution of which he had given notice with respect to the issuing of new writs consequent upon the unseating of a Member for bribery or treating, said, that it was one which the House had agreed to on former occasions. Its object was, that if arising out of the circumstances of an election there should appear to be grounds for taking any measure affecting the borough itself, time might be given for hon. Members to make any Motion they might think fit upon the matter; and that the new writ might not be issued by surprise so as to preclude the House from taking into consideration any circumstances disclosed by the proceedings of the Election Committee affecting the borough itself.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That in all cases when the Seat of any Member has been declared void by an Election Committee, on the grounds of Bribery or Treating, no Motion for the issuing of a new Writ shall be made without seven days previous notice being given in the Votes."

MR. DISRAELI said, he had no doubt that the House would come to a unanimous decision upon this subject; but he would beg them to consider, before they assented to the Motion, what might be the consequences if the Resolution were framed in terms of so stringent a character as those proposed by the noble Lord. The precedents in favour of this Resolution were not very numerous. It was of modern introduction into the practice of the House, and he could not call to his recollection more than two instances which were similar to the present. In both those cases the House came to a Resolution like that now proposed under circumstances of considerable party excitement and personal feeling in regard to particular elections. They now could consider the question with a complete exemption from those influences, and it was therefore highly desirable that they should not agree to a Resolution the consequences of which might be very different from those which he believed the noble Lord proposed to effect. The Resolution appeared to him (Mr. Disraeli) to be of too stringent a character. It would be quite possible, if it passed, that a city or borough might be disfranchised, by means of it, for the greater part or the whole of a Session. Suppose, for example, that a Report was made to the House finding that a Member was not duly elected, and that the new Resolution was appealed to, a week must elapse before a new writ could be moved for. Hon. Gentlemen might then very naturally say, "Here is a grave charge against this constituency, but we have no proof of it; evidence has been taken before the Committee, and we must wait until that evidence is in the hands of every hon. Member." That would lead to a delay, probably, of a month or six weeks at least. Then there must be another week by this Resolution before the Motion for a new writ could be brought forward. Then hon. Gentlemen might say that they had not had time to consider "this important case;" although the case really might be very paltry; and, in fact, the whole Session might pass without the city or borough being represented in that House. Again, towards the end of a Session there might be a Report; there might not be time to bring the subject to an issue, and during the whole of the recess the place might be unrepresented; for he need scarcely remind hon. Members that it was not merely in debates in that House that constituencies were represented. There were important matters which concerned them during the vacation, when they wanted Members to represent their interests to the Minister, if they were menaced or were not sufficiently defended. All Resolutions of this kind were necessarily of an unconstitutional character. He was not, however, arguing against the general principle of the Resolution, but he thought the House should take care to adopt a Resolution which, while it effected the object in view, produced the least possible inconvenience. They should take security that so unusual and unconstitutional a proceeding should not be had recourse to unless there were a bond fide case which required it. He thought that there ought to be a special Report from the Committee, at least, to justify it, and if the noble Lord would not allow a feeling of suspicion to weigh with him in accepting a suggestion made from his (Mr. Disraeli's) side of the House, he would suggest that the House should not have recourse to the proposal of the noble Lord, unless the Committee which had unseated the Member at the same time reported their opinion that the writ should be suspended for the period named by the noble Lord. This arrangement would attain all the advantages proposed, and would at the same time be a great safeguard against the abuses and inconveniences to which he had referred. He proposed, therefore, that the Resolution should pass in this form:—

"That in all cases when the seat of any Member has been declared void by an Election Committee on the grounds of bribery or treating, and such Committee has reported that in their opinion the writ for a new election should be suspended, no Motion for the issuing of a new writ shall be made without seven days' previous notice being given in the Votes."

Mr. Disraeli

MR. T. DUNCOMBE observed, that he considered that the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman would defeat all the objects of the Resolution, which had worked very well in the last Parliament. It was, no doubt, a stretch to suspend the issue of the writ when once the Committee had declared a seat vacant, but it was the duty of the House, when the Committee declared that a Member had been guilty of bribery, to take care that the vacancy should not be filled up unless they were satisfied that the constituency had not abused its privileges. The Resolution was agreed to in 1852, after the passing of the Bill which empowered the Crown, on an address from both Houses of Parliament, to issue a Commission to inquire into the extent of the corrupt practices in the constituency. But if they were to rely on the Report of the Committee, how could they ascertain whether it was a case to justify an Address to the Crown or not? The right hon. Gentleman must be aware that even if two or three hundred cases of bribery could be proved, the counsel before the Committee confined themselves to one or two cases sufficient to unseat the Member, but kept the others back to save the constituency. Would a Committee be justified in recommending the House to suspend the writ when only one or two cases had been proved, and they had no power to institute any further investigation? In the last Parliament five Commissions were issued on the recommendation of the Committees, in the case of Canterbury, Cambridge, Hull, Maldon, and Barnstaple, and in each case the result was the discovery of a far greater amount of corruption than had been proved before the Committees, and the five constituencies were reported to have been guilty of corrupt practices, quite as strong, if not stronger, than any to be found in the Report on which they had disfranchised Sudbury and St. Albans, and the five writs were suspended until after the passing of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act. He thought there was ample ground for resolving that the issuing of the writ should not depend on the Report of the Committee, and the Amendment would only provide the means for evading a valuable Resolution, which had been found to work well in practice.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the object of the Resolution was to prevent a writ from being issued, without previous notice to the House, in order to enable them to become acquainted with the facts of the case. Under the existing law, there was a power given to the Committee to make a special Report as to the existence of corrupt practices, and that further inquiry was necessary; in that event, the issuing of the writ was suspended, and therefore the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman was quite unnecessary in such a case. The object of the Resolution was to take care that the writ should not be issued as a matter of course when the seat was declared vacant; but he felt there was very considerable force in the objection of the right hon. Gentleman—to laying down a general rule of suspension; it might happen that a single case of bribery would unseat a Member at the end of a Session, and they could not desire that a constituency should on that account remain unrepresented for perhaps several months. If the Report was made at the close of the Session, the borough or county would be also exposed to the inconvenience of a very lengthened canvass. At the same time, precautions ought to be taken against surprise by the immediate issuing of the writ. He did not know whether it was intended to alter the Resolution then; but he would suggest that it should be withdrawn for further consideration. He would propose to leave out the seven days, and insert two days, or perhaps the words “without previous notice,” would be sufficient to meet the difficulty, as that period would enable any hon. Member who conceived there was ground for the further suspension of the writ to bring the matter before the House.

MR. DISRAELI said, he did not wish to press the suggestion which he had thrown out for the consideration of the Government; but he should be glad to have the further consideration of the question postponed until Monday, when the House would have an opportunity of listening to the opinions of some of their most intelligent and influential Members who were absent at that moment.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he had no objection to that course, as the Resolution ought not to be adopted without full deliberation.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SUPPLY — MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES.

House in Committee. Mr. FITZROY in the Chair.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed, “That a sum, not exceeding £24,728, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of the Salaries of the Governors, Lieutenant Governors, and others, in the West Indies, and certain other Colonies, to the 31st day of March 1858.”

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY inquired whether the grant of £3,500 for the Governor of Jamaica was a new grant?

MR. LABOUCHERE replied in the negative.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that the grant for the salary of the Governor of Jamaica was placed upon the taxes of this country for the first time three years ago. The people of Jamaica, for a vast number of years, had always paid the salary of their Governor; but in 1854, on account of the distress in Jamaica, it was proposed that £3,500, being one-half of the salary, should be paid out of the taxes of this country for a period of three years. Since that time he had received a communication from Jamaica stating that the people there did not want this country to be taxed for their Governor. It appeared that the salary of the Governor of Jamaica had amounted originally to £7,000, and that after the Parliament of this country had agreed to pay half of that amount, the Assembly of Jamaica had reduced their contribution, first to £2,500 a year, and subsequently to £1,500 a year. It had, upon a former occasion, been distinctly stated, upon the part of the Government, that the continuance of the contribution from this country would be required only for a period of three years, in order to meet the distress under which Jamaica was then suffering. That period had elapsed, and the distress had ceased to exist, and he, therefore, saw no good reason why the payment of the amount in question should not be dispensed with. Under these circumstances, he should move that the Vote be reduced by a sum of £3,500. He perceived that there was also an item of £1,800 contained in the Vote for the payment of the annual salary of the Governor of Western Australia, which was the only one of the Australian Colonies on whose account a similar payment was made. Taking into account the fact that the state of that colony was now one of great prosperity, he saw no good reason why the item should be retained in the Vote, and, therefore, unless he heard some good reason assigned for its continuance, he should move its rejection also.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That a sum, not exceeding £21,228, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of the Salaries of the Governors, Lieutenant Governors, and others, in the West Indies, and certain other Colonies, to the 31st day of March 1858."

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that within his recollection it had been a frequent subject of discussion in Parliament whether the salaries of the Governors of our Colonies ought or ought not to be paid out of the funds of this country; and he had heard some of the most distinguished Members of the House—such, for instance, as the late Sir R. Peel, his noble Friend near him (Lord Palmerston), and the noble Lord the Member for London, contend that considering the Imperial position which those high functionaries filled, their relations to the Crown and the Colonies, and the importance of securing their perfect independence, the cost of their maintenance ought to be defrayed out of the Imperial Exchequer. But, perhaps, at the present moment, there existed great practical objections to carrying that principle into effect. At all events, he felt that in the case of flourishing Colonies it was only natural that the House of Commons should decline to take upon themselves such a charge. But he did not think that they ought to object to meet the moderate demands which were made on them under peculiar circumstances by that vote. It should be remembered, that almost all of this not large sum of £24,728 was to go to the payment of the salaries of the Governors of our West Indian Colonies, and that these Colonies had of late years been placed in an exceptional position by circumstances which he need not then detail. He was happy to be able to admit that they were at present recovering from their depression, and that they were in the enjoyment of a state of comparative prosperity; but he would add, that he hoped the House would not be disposed to deal harshly with them on the first return of their better fortunes. With respect to the payment of the salary of the Governor of Jamaica, his hon. Friend who had just sat down was correct in stating that the arrangement came to upon that subject was one of a provisional character, and that it had been understood that it should be open to reconsideration. When he had last addressed the House in reference to the matter he had proposed that the existing arrangement should continue throughout the period of Sir H. Barkly's tenure of office, which he had then anticipated would extend over three or four years. But it had since been suddenly brought to a close by the transference of that able and distinguished public servant to the Governorship of the Colony of Victoria. It then became a question for the consideration of himself (Mr. Labouchere) and of the Treasury whether they should place Governor Darling, the successor of Sir H. Barkly, in a position in which his first act in his new office would probably be a dispute with the Assembly of Jamaica with respect to the payment of his salary; and as he had arrived at the conviction that it was extremely desirable to avoid such a collision, he had thought it proper to ask the House to agree to the payment of that moderate charge. He had, therefore, retained the item of £3,500 in the Vote, and when it was borne in mind that the residence of the Governor of Jamaica was a very extensive building and required a large sum of money to keep it up, he was of opinion that the Committee ought not to regard the item as exorbitant. With regard to the payment of the salary of the Governor of Western Australia, he had to observe that that Colony was to some extent differently situated to the other Australian Colonies, which had received representative Governors, and were therefore bound to provide for their own expenditure. Western Australia was also used as a convict settlement for Imperial purposes; and that was, in his opinion, a sufficient reason why this country should bear a portion of the cost of its Government. Under all the circumstances of the case he hoped that his hon. Friend would not think it necessary to press his Amendment to a division.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he did not propose that there should be any diminution in that Vote. It seemed to him, on the contrary, that it was too little in amount, and that considering the cost of living in the West Indies, too small an allowance was made to those Governors. But there were one or two details in the Vote with respect to which he should be glad to receive some explanations. He found that there was set down a sum of £4,000 for the Governor of the Windward Islands. He wished to know where that functionary resided? [Sir C. Wood: In Barbadoes.] He had always understood that Barbadoes was popularly called one of the Leeward Islands. There was also a Vote of £3,000 for the Governor of the Leeward Islands, and he had to ask where that officer resided? [Sir C. Wood: At Antigua.] Again, upon that point, he had to observe that he believed Antigua was usually considered a Windward Island, and he did not know whether it had ceased to be so named.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, the question was not whether the Vote was too large in amount, but who were the persons upon whom its payment should devolve. It was better he thought that the Colonies should themselves be allowed to defray the expenses of their own Government, and he certainly could not concur in the justice of the view taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies, that because the Governor of Jamaica had a large house to maintain his salary should therefore be correspondingly increased. He saw no reason why that gentleman should not live in a smaller house, unless, indeed, the colonists, consulting their own dignity, chose to defray the charge of locating him in a more expensive establishment.

MR. A. MILLS said, he did not mean to oppose the Vote; but he wished to take that opportunity of expressing a hope that the time was not distant when those payments for colonial governors would disappear from our Estimates, and the Colonies provide for their own expenses.

MR. BRISCOE said, he wished to know whether the Committee was to understand that the right hon. Gentleman proposed that that payment to the Governor of Jamaica was to cease on the occasion of the next change in the office?

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he could not give any pledge upon that subject. When Governor Darling was appointed, he had been told that the Vote would be proposed to the Committee, and this had been done; but as regards the future he (Mr. Labouchere) wished to leave the matter open for future consideration.

MR. F. CROSSLEY remarked, that he considered that if the Colonies appointed their own governors they would be better governed than at present.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he was not surprised at what had fallen from the gallant Admiral, because he had never known him to oppose any Vote, however extravagant, since he had had a seat in that House. No doubt his constituents of Southwark would be much obliged to him. All the Colonies, except the West India Colonies, paid the expenses of their own Government, and Her Majesty's Ministers were not acting wisely in saddling the country with a new charge like that of the Vote for the Governor of Jamaica; and, moreover, it was a distinct understanding that the Vote should be discontinued after the lapse of three years. Considering, however, that there were probably not forty Members present, and therefore, if he divided, that the House might be counted out, he would not press his Amendment to a division.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, the attack made upon him by the hon. Member was most unjust. He had always endeavoured to do his duty to his constituents by checking extravagant expenditure, although certainly he could not always vote with the hon. Member, who appeared to him to be in the habit, without reason of any description, to move, if a sum of £4,000 was asked for, that it be reduced to £3,000, or if £3,000, that it be reduced to £2,000. He should recommend the hon. Gentleman to look to his own line of conduct before he ventured to reprimand others.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) £21,450, Stipendiary Justices in the West Indies, and the Mauritius.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he must object to the item of £7,200 for the salaries of magistrates in Jamaica. He should like to know what possible good this country derived from that expenditure. The charge had been introduced at the time of the emancipation of the slaves, but now appeared to be permanent.

MR. LABOUCHERE explained that at the period of the emancipation of the negroes in the West Indies an arrangement had been made for the appointment in those Colonies of stipendiary magistrates, whose services it was thought would be for some time required in the administration of justice, and whose salaries were to be paid out of the Imperial Exchequer. The charge, however, would not be permanent, unless those officials proved immortal; for when any of them died, the vacancy so created was not to be filled up, or at least was not to be filled up at the expense of this country; and in point of fact, the Vote had in that way been reduced since last year by a sum of £2,850. This was the first time he had ever heard the Vote objected to.

MR. BENTINCK said, he would remind the Committee and the hon. Gentleman who objected to all these small sums, that a heavy blow had been inflicted on the property of the West Indies in the year 1834, and that those Colonies had since been subjected to additional disasters, in consequence of the determination of the mother country to carry out, at all hazards, the policy of free trade.

Vote agreed to; as was also,

(3.) £10,230, Civil Establishments, Western Coast of Africa.

(4.) £19,609, St. Helena.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that one item in this Vote required explanation. It appeared that the Governor of that island had within a period of four years withdrawn from the commissariat chest a sum of £18,800, in consequence of some misunderstanding, as it was mildly called. He wished to know whether there was to be any further charge upon that account?

MR. WILSON said, that until a few years ago the establishment of St. Helena was supported by a Vote of the House, but in 1846 it was resolved that it should be paid by the Colony itself. The Governor, by some mistake of his instructions, thought that he was justified in withdrawing from the commissariat chest any deficiency for the extraordinary expenses of the island. That went on for four years without its being discovered, and when it was discovered a Treasury Minute was passed, in which they very strongly repudiated their right to repay this sum. The matter had remained in abeyance since 1851. The island had been successful in paying its current expenditure, but it had not been so successful as to enable it to repay the sum thus taken from the commissariat chest. Under these circumstances he (Mr. Wilson) had thought it was useless to keep the account open, and that the best course was to repay to the commissariat chest the amount which had been drawn from it. The arrangement had, on the whole, been advantageous to this country, for no Vote had recently been taken for the expenses of the establishment at St. Helena, which were defrayed entirely from the local revenue.

Vote agreed to; as were also,

(5.) £960, Heligoland.

(6.) £3,831, Falkland Islands.

(7.) £5,700, Labuan.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he must complain of the expense of the Government establishments there, and thought that they ought to be given up.

MR. LABOUCHERE stated, that the expectations which had been formed with regard to this Colony had not been realized, but he thought the Government had been fully justified in trying the experiment of establishing a colony in Labuan, where there was a magnificent harbour, and where it had been supposed that a large supply of coal might be obtained, which would have proved very beneficial in the case of a war, and with reference to steam communication with the East. He was ready to admit that the Companies which undertook to work those coal mines, had not been very successful, but at the same time he did not think the experiment ought to be prematurely abandoned, and he asked the Committee to give it a fair trial. If upon further experience it should be found inexpedient to maintain the Colony, he should not be disposed to protract the experiment.

Mr. Bentinck

MR. MAGUIRE remarked, that he wished to inquire whether it was necessary for that experiment that the treasurer at Labuan should receive a salary of £500, which amounted to a charge of 16 per cent upon the entire amount he was called upon to distribute? He (Mr. Maguire) was not surprised that the right hon. Gentleman entertained serious misgivings with regard to the success of this Colony, and he (Mr. Maguire) was disposed to think the best course would be to abandon it altogether. In a despatch from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Labouchere) to the Governor of the colony (Mr. Edwards) the following passage occurred:—

“Your Report exhibits extensive sickness, calling for drainage which the Colony is too poor to execute; public buildings falling into decay for want of necessary repairs; and, finally, a landslip which has damaged the works and buried some of the coal of the Archipelago Company. You inform me that the fever is peculiarly fatal to Chinamen, so that it has driven away some of the Chinese settlers, and has kept away other native settlers whose presence would be of advantage.”

The island, it must be remembered, depended mainly upon the labour of Chinamen, to whom the climate appeared to be extremely fatal, and there did not seem to be any probability of the establishment of a permanent Colony.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he would state as a reply to the question of the hon. Gentleman, that if the treasurer depended solely for his salary upon a percentage on the amount of expenditure his emoluments would be almost worthless, and he did not think that £500 was too high a salary for a gentleman occupying a position of so much trust and importance.

MR. W. EWART said, he wished to ask if there was any prospect of the coal mines becoming productive for commercial purposes?

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that very sanguine expectations had been entertained at first, with regard to the produce of the coalfields at Labuan. In consequence of accidents and other circumstances these expectations had not been realized, though, he believed, that some hopes were still entertained of success, but he did not think the experiment ought to be carried on much longer. He was, however, of opinion that the experiment ought to have a fair trial, for if a really useful British settlement could be established at Labuan, it would be of the utmost importance to this country.

Vote agreed to ; as was also,

(8.) £10,000, Hong Kong.

(9.) £13,424, Emigration Board, &c.

MR. ADDERLEY said, the gradual diminution of this Vote proved the uselessness of this Board. When this Vote commenced, the Colonies took no part in the promotion of emigration; now, however, they took a very active one. At one time it was a great object with the Imperial Legislature to induce the poor to emigrate, because there was supposed to be a surplus population. The reverse was the case now. It was, however, still a great object with the Colonies, and he hoped it would long continue to be so, to encourage emigration from Great Britain in preference to emigration from any other part of the world. That being so, the Colonies should bear the expense. That they thought so themselves was evident, for they actually voted sums which were sent over to this country to be disposed of by the Board. This produced the anomaly that the funds belonged to one party, and the agency to another. The Colonies were much dissatisfied with the management of these funds, so much so that they had established an agency of their own, though it was subsidiary to the Board. He did not object to the maintenance of those officers who were entrusted with the carrying out of the Passengers Act, but he thought it more advisable that they should be placed under the control of the Colonial Office. He should not oppose the Vote at present, because he felt that the Board could not be instantly abolished, but he gave notice that when he had received the returns he had moved for on the subject, he should call the attention of the House to the question with the view to the reduction of that part of the Vote which referred to the chairman, commissioner, secretary, establishment, and contingencies, when these estimates should be brought forward next year.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that the hon. Gentleman seemed to think the business of the Emigration Board had decreased. He was not prepared with the statistics at that moment, or he could show that the fact was otherwise. He had indeed been enabled to recommend that the establishment should be diminished to the amount of one Commissioner, and he believed that, notwithstanding the carrying out of that recommendation two years ago, no public department was better conducted. The Board had still very important duties to perform, in connection with passenger vessels, coolie emigration, and claims made on the Treasury, and it would, for the present at least, be quite impossible to dispense with their services. He might also state that the Bill relating to the appointment of emigration agents which had been introduced into the Legislature of the Colony of Victoria had not yet passed. He thought it of importance that the emigration offices should continue under the direction of a distinct department, which, however, was under the control of the Colonial Office. There certainly was not room at the latter department for the admission of a new branch, in fact they had hardly room for their own clerks.

MR. BRISCOE said, he would not go into the question whether the population of this country was in excess, but there certainly were large numbers of persons who could not obtain employment. For instance, great difficulty in getting employment was experienced by persons discharged from prisons and reformatories. He thought it well worth the attention of the Government and the Emigration Board, whether some portion of the funds at the disposal of the latter might not be devoted to assisting those who were discharged from the reformatory at Red Hill and other similar institutions to emigrate.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he should much regret if this Vote were to be diminished by a single farthing, knowing the frauds that were detected by these officers. He would beg to instance a case in which, upon overlooking the provisions of a vessel in which 200 persons were going out, it was found that what had been put on board as bread was really clay made up into the form of biscuits; and another case in which, after a vessel of 1,500 tons had been three times inspected by the officer at Liverpool, and on each occasion found to have the right number of men on board—in fact a full crew—a hooker came alongside a few minutes after the officer had left, on the termination of the last inspection, and took away twelve of the crew. A storm came on soon after she had set sail; and, the crew not being sufficient to manage the vessel, the captain was obliged to put into an Irish port for repairs, and to make up the deficiency of the crew. He hoped nothing would be done to diminish the efficiency of the staff. He did not wish to encourage emigration, but if people would emigrate, they ought to be protected against the frauds of the land-sharks.

MR. KINNAIRD begged to remind the hon. Gentleman who spoke last that the hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Adderley) had not objected to the continuation of the emigration offices, but only to that of the Board. And he (Mr. Kinnaird) feared that the existence of that Board prevented the Colonies from doing all that they might do to promote emigration. While he admitted that the condition of emigrant ships had been greatly improved of late, still he would urge that, if possible, a more rigid inspection of them should be kept up at the different outports.

MR. PALK complained of the restriction which the Emigration Board placed on the classes emigrating in particular districts. Artisans, skilled labourers, and good domestic servants, he believed, were the only classes allowed a free passage.

MR. VANCE remarked that he wished to know if the money granted by Government in aid of emigration was given on any particular principle. There were complaints made in Ireland, that by the exercise of political patronage in particular districts, there the peasantry were enabled to emigrate at the expense of the nation, but not in others. He should like to know on what principle, if any, the aid was granted.

MR. LABOUCHERE could assure the hon. Member that political influence had nothing whatever to do with the choice of emigrants. The whole of the arrangements connected with the system of emigration in this country, as well as all the appointments for carrying them out, were made by a permanent officer at the head of the Emigration Department, and the Colonial Office had nothing whatever to do with those arrangements or appointments. As to the principle on which free passages were granted, the requirements of the Colony were always studied with respect to the class of emigrants sent out from time to time, as well for the interests of the Colony as of the emigrants themselves, care being taken that the latter should be of an age and condition to be useful members of the society among whom they were destined to live.

MR. W. H. G. LANGTON said, that he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would take into consideration the claims of Bristol as a Government emigration port.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that any representation on that subject would be duly considered. The Emigration Board had no objection to place agents at any port where they could be usefully employed.

Vote agreed to; as was also

(10.) £2,175, Distressed Emigrants in Canada and New Brunswick.

(11.) £120,000, Holyhead Harbour.

MR. LINDSAY said, he wished to call the attention of the Committee to the enormous sum of money expended on the works at Holyhead Harbour from time to time. From £628,000, which was the original estimate for the new harbour of refuge, the total cost of the works to the present time had run up to £1,303,000, and the Committee had no guarantee that the expenditure would stop at that point. It was now proposed to extend the pier 500 feet further into the sea than was originally intended, which would of course be attended with very considerable expense. The original object of the harbour, of which he had no complaint to make, was that it should be used as a packet station between this country and Ireland; but it had since been determined to make the place a harbour of refuge. If harbours of refuge were required in St. George's Channel, he much doubted whether Holyhead was one of the places best adapted for the purpose. Then it was asked for on the ground of increase of trade, but he thought he could show by a reference to figures that the port had not increased to a very great extent. He found from a not very intelligible return made by Captain Skinner, the port commander at Holyhead, that the number of vessels entering the new harbour of Holyhead in the six months ending the 30th of June, 1852, was 255, having an aggregate tonnage of 15,285, and that in the six months ending the 30th of June, 1856, the number was 1,117, having an aggregate tonnage of 83,848. Now, 255 vessels—the number which entered in the first half of the year 1852—assuming they were each of the burden of sixty tons, would have an aggregate tonnage of 15,300. Now, many a ship-owner owned 15,000 tons of shipping; he (Mr. Lindsay) himself owned as much. And if one steamer of 80 tons register entered the port of Holyhead each day, that one steamer alone would represent a tonnage of 14,600 in six months. If two steamers of 280 tons register entered each day it would give a gross tonnage of 83,000 tons, and therefore he did not see any reason why, upon the ground of increased trade, the Committee should be called upon to vote more money. But it was said to be the intention of the Government to make Holyhead a port of call for American packets, not only for the mails and passengers, but for their cargoes. If, however, the American packets were removed from Liverpool, they would go to some point at the extreme west, such as Milford Haven or Galway, and not to Holyhead. As long as the House went on voting money for harbours of refuge, those harbours would never be finished. The only way to get them finished was to stop the supplies.

Mr. Maguire

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, it was quite right that the attention of the Committee should be called to the expenditure of sums which, no doubt, in the aggregate were very large; but the hon. Gentleman had a little misunderstood the facts of this case. The hon. Gentleman said they were going to convert the packet harbour of Holyhead into a harbour of refuge. The hon. Gentleman was under an entire mistake, and had evidently not taken the trouble to refer to papers which for the last three years had been on the table of the House. As long ago as 1844, it was proposed that Holyhead should not only be the principal line of communication between this country and Ireland, but that it should be a harbour of refuge. It was so intended when first the construction commenced in 1847. Ample information had been given from time to time. There were two Commissions and a Report in 1843. In 1844, Mr. Rendell was called upon to submit a plan to the Treasury, and in consequence he laid before them a proposal for a packet station in connection with a harbour of refuge. Another Report, with estimates, was made in 1845, and on the 3rd of April, 1846, the Treasury authorized the construction of a harbour for a packet station and for a harbour of refuge at Holyhead. In 1847 there was a further Report by three naval officers, confirming former Reports, that Holyhead would be most convenient, not only for a packet station, but for a harbour of refuge. The hon. Gentleman said, one reason given for the Vote was the increasing trade of Holyhead; he begged to assure the hon. Gentleman that he would not find in any of the papers a syllable about the trade of Holyhead, the fact being that the trade there was not worth the construction of a harbour of refuge. The object was to afford shelter to the numerous vessels passing up and down the Irish Channel. The trade of Liverpool, Ireland, and America was intimately concerned in the existence of a harbour of refuge at Holyhead, which was a safe harbour, accessible at all times of tide, and sufficiently marked by lights to be easily entered. He did not know where the hon. Gentleman got his notion about the removal of the Liverpool packets, but there was not a word in any of these papers to justify it. It was hardly probable that, with the enormous commercial intercourse which existed between Liverpool and America that vessels with cargo would start from any other place than Liverpool. It had been thought by some persons that, as Liverpool was not the best port in the world, it might be convenient for the Liverpool packets to call at Holyhead to land passengers and mails, which would enable them to arrive so much the earlier and start so much the later. The hon. Gentleman said he did not understand what was the use of a harbour of refuge at Holyhead, but he would call attention to the number of vessels which had availed themselves of it. In the course of thirty years, the trade and shipping of the country had enormously increased, and the original plan was enlarged in order to increase the roadstead at Holyhead, and to afford greater accommodation. Representations were made to the Admiralty by Captain Skinner that the number of vessels taking refuge in the harbour was very greatly increasing, and on consulting with the hydrographer of the Admiralty it was determined to increase the accommodation. A return which had been laid upon the table of the House showed how great this increase had been; and here he would remark that what the Committee ought to look to was the number of vessels and not the amount of tonnage. This return gave the number of vessels which had taken refuge in the harbour in each six months from the 1st of January, 1852, up to the present time. These numbers, in the successive half years, were 255, 259, 483, 810, 831, 840, 834, 872, 1,117, and, in the half year ending December 31, 1856, 1,325. This rapid increase was of itself a complete justification of the demand for additional accommodation. Moreover, the necessity of providing the means of rapid communication with Ireland must not be overlooked. A contract had lately been entered into for an improved communication, and the vessels which would be required to carry it out with the specified speed, would have to be of an increased size, so that additional accommodation would be requisite for them also. On a former occasion the House had called upon the Government to undertake the improvement of Holyhead Harbour, and he hoped, therefore, that they would not now sanction this proposition for stopping the works which were going on.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he wished to know whether in the 1,325 vessels quoted by the right hon. Baronet as having taken refuge in Holyhead Harbour during the last six months, were included the short passage steamers which left the harbour in the morning and came in in the evening? If so, they of themselves would be sufficient to make up the number. He was in favour of harbours of refuge, if necessary, and also in favour of rapid communication between London and Dublin; but he thought that a case was hardly made out for the proposed expenditure of £100,000 for the harbour.

MR. BENTINCK said, the harbour under consideration was the new harbour, and if the practice had not been altered since he was last at Holyhead, the steam packets were confined to the old harbour. [Sir C. Wood: Hear.] He had no knowledge of what was the original intention of Holyhead Harbour, but so long as he remembered, it had always been talked of as being for the double purpose of facilitating communication with Ireland and affording a place of refuge for vessels in stress of weather. The increased number of vessels which took advantage of the harbour as a place of refuge showed the necessity of additional accommodation, while he considered it as superior for that purpose to any other harbour which had been suggested on that coast. But, however that might be, he certainly did not think the stopping all supplies would be the best way of remedying the general demerits of the system which now existed with reference to harbours.

Sir Charles Wood

MR. LINDSAY said, that the words of the Vote showed that it was the intention of the Government to remove the American packet station from Liverpool to Holyhead. He would repeat, however, that if there was to be any removal of the station it ought to be removed to some port in the extreme west. The increase of vessels which appeared in the return as having taken refuge in the harbour was very great, but it was also apparent, from the tonnage of those vessels, that the majority of them must have been but fishing smacks. It was, no doubt, advisable that we should have a good harbour at Holyhead, but what he said was, that to vote a large sum of money to make the harbour a postal station for America was a great mistake.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he could bear testimony from personal observation that the number of vessels which took refuge in Holyhead Harbour had not been exaggerated by the First Lord of the Admiralty. He would further observe, that whether the vessels taking refuge were large or small, it did not affect the value of the harbour, as the object of a harbour of refuge was to save life as well as property.

MR. BENTINCK said, the name of Captain Skinner having been mentioned, he wished to say, that he had known that gentleman for a great many years, that he was highly distinguished in his profession, and that he knew no man whose opinion on any subject connected with that profession he would more readily take.

MR. O'FLAHERTY observed, that he thought the House ought to know exactly what was the great object in view in laying out so much money on Holyhead Harbour. If it was right that, in addition to being a packet station for Ireland, it should also be a harbour of refuge and a point of communication between Liverpool and America, he had certainly no objection; but they should be exactly informed on the subject, in order that the whole question might be thoroughly considered by the House. He demanded, on the part of other ports, both of England and Ireland, that there should be a fair consideration of this question, and that those places should not be checkmated by these annual grants to Holyhead. He could not help thinking that the Government had an object different from that which appeared on the face of the Vote.

MR. JOSEPH LOCKE said, he thought there ought to be some expression of the opinion of the House relative to the annual increases in these Estimates. Last year there was a very large increase in the sum voted, and the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty had told them this was done with the unanimous sanction of the House. This year there was an increase of £100,000, and if quietly agreed to, the unanimity of the House would be urged next year in favour of another large Vote for the same objects. He objected to the practice of adding to the Estimates after they had been laid before the House. If such things were allowed, it would be impossible to keep a proper guard over the public purse.

MR. SCHNEIDER said, he also was able to speak of the great advantages which the shipping trade of the West of England had derived from Holyhead as a harbour of refuge. Encouragement was given to vessels to put to sea when it was known that there was a harbour of refuge for them to flee to in circumstances of distress. Last winter twenty-five vessels belonging to himself took refuge in Holyhead, and many of them would not have put to sea at the time they did but for the knowledge that they had that harbour to run into. He thought the Government had conferred a great boon upon the country in erecting Holyhead into a harbour of refuge.

MR. HUDSON observed, that he did not object to a harbour of refuge at Holyhead or any other place, but he complained that nothing was done for the north of England. The Government had promised to relieve the shipping interest of the north from the payment of passing tolls—a heavy tax from which they derived no benefit whatever—but that promise had not been fulfilled. Harbours of refuge were much desired by the inhabitants of the north of England, and he confessed he did not see why Holyhead, Dover, and a few other places should alone have public money bestowed on them for these purposes. He wished it to be understood that in future he would oppose any grant of money for harbours of refuge to other parts of the country if the north of England were not included.

Vote agreed to.

(12.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £224,000, be granted to Her Majesty, towards defraying the Expense of constructing certain Harbours of Refuge, to the 31st day of March 1858."

MR. HENLEY said, there could be no doubt, after the discussion that had taken place upon the last Vote, as to the importance of the subject of harbours of refuge, though, at the same time, it was not unattended with difficulties. His principal desire in rising to address them was, to call the attention of the Committee to the objects for which the Channel harbours had been commenced, the progress that had been made with them, especially Dover harbour, and the probable period in which the works would be completed. He also wished to know whether the Government intended to carry out the works which had been recommended, or whether they had other intentions. The inquiry about Dover commenced about seventeen or eighteen years ago, when a commission was issued—known as Sir James Gordon's Commission—to inquire into the state of the south-eastern ports. The instructions given to that commission were, to visit the coast between the mouth of the Thames and Selsea Bill, and to examine and report upon the state of the existing harbours, with a view to making them available for various objects. The first object in view was, to afford shelter for vessels passing down Channel, in case of stress of weather; next to make places of refuge for merchant ships from enemies' cruisers in time of war; and thirdly, and most especially to render them fit as stations for armed steam vessels for the protection of our trade in the Channel. Those instructions were followed, and the commission reported that they were decidedly in favour of constructing deep-water harbours by means of breakwaters detached from the main land, upon the same principle as that at Plymouth Sound, and connected with the shore, as in Kingston harbour. The Commissioners added that, in their opinion, the most eligible position for such a station was Dover Bay. In order to prove that military and naval objects were those which Government had chiefly in view, he might mention that the commission was composed of three fighting men—an admiral, a captain, and a colonel—a Trinity-house master, and two civil engineers.

Nothing, however, appeared to have resulted from that commission, and about 1842, a committee, known as the Shipwreck Committee, sat, and recommended many things, but it only touched lightly on harbours of refuge. In 1844 and 1845 another commission was appointed, in which also the fighting element largely predominated, and they recommended, in their first Report on the 7th of August, 1844, that a harbour be constructed at Dovor, and that the works should be immediately commenced by carrying out that portion which communicated with Cheesman's Head. They added, that only one work should be taken at a time, giving the preference to Dovor, and in the second place to Portland, or Seaham. All the Commissioners signed that Report except one, Sir William Symonds, who protested against the adoption of Dovor, and reported in favour of Dungeness. Nothing, however, was done, although the question had been under consideration for upwards of four years. He did not, however, find fault with the delay, but he mentioned these circumstances to show that successive Governments had given the subject their most careful and deliberate attention. Mr. Walker and several other engineers were next employed to prepare plans for the harbour, and also to state their opinions as to whether the shingle and silt would destroy the works when completed. They reported in favour of beginning at Cheesman's-head, but said that no safe conclusion could be arrived at with respect to the shingle and silt; and, in 1845, they recommended that the south front should be proceeded with. He now came to the second Report of the Commissioners, which was communicated to the Government in 1846. The Commissioners stated, in the first instance, that they were decidedly in favour of a harbour in Dovor Bay, adding that the chief points for consideration were the area, the outlines, the position, the entrances, and the mode of construction. They also recommended that the works should be commenced at as many points as practicable, and expressed their earnest hope that no pecuniary considerations would be allowed to delay the accomplishment of an object of such vast importance for the welfare of our shipping, and the general interests of the country. They also went at some length into the question of construction, and the consequence was, that two of the Commissioners

Mr. Henley

—Sir William Symonds and Sir Howard Douglas—dissented from the Report, the former stating that a large area was unnecessary, as the harbour would be visited only by war steamers, post-office packets, and a few disabled or straggling merchant vessels, and that the evidence with regard to silting, and the mode of construction adopted by a majority of the Commissioners—namely, an upright wall—was conflicting and unsubstantial. The reasons of Sir Howard Douglas were stated at length and with great ability in a paper addressed to the Government. The impression left upon his (Mr. Henley's) own mind, after carefully reading the evidence given before the Commissioners, was, that almost any amount of respectable testimony might be obtained on behalf of the most contradictory propositions. No man, whether professional or non-professional, who looked at the list of the eminent scientific gentlemen who were examined by the Commissioners, and saw how they disagreed, would venture to give an opinion upon the subject. Hydrostatics and hydraulics, particles in motion and particles at rest, assertions of some witnesses that Plymouth was a total failure, contrasted with those of others, that it was a great success—these things, with many more, danced through the evidence in the most extraordinary manner, producing a jumble and confusion of ideas which it would be difficult to describe. His own opinion was, if he might venture to have one, that, as in many other instances, the votes went one way, and reason another. At last, however, in the autumn of 1847, after a deliberation of seven or eight years, the works were commenced, the Commissioners having decided—Sir Howard Douglas and Sir William Symonds dissenting—to build the walls nearly upright, and to enclose an area of about 520 acres. The estimated expense was stated to be about £2,500,000. He now came to the progress of the works, and here he must express the strong opinion, which he thought would be shared by the Committee, that it was very desirable the country should be informed what the Government really meant to do with these works—whether they intended to carry them out upon the original plans, or how they proposed to modify them. They began with taking some £30,000 or £40,000 a year, and the first contract, which was for a length of 800 feet, was concluded in 1854. A second contract was then entered into for 1,000 feet, still proceeding upon the plans which accompanied the final Report of the Commissioners, and in which no material alteration was made, except as to size and the position of the entrances. Up to the present time, therefore, the progress of the works had been extremely slow. Only 800 feet out of one mile and three-quarters, which was the length of the whole plan, were completed in 1854, with some little extension of the foundations, and the contract which had been entered into since then for 1,000 feet was to extend over ten years, ending in 1864, being at the rate of 100 feet per annum. It did not seem to him that the works had progressed even at that rate, and he would presently make some observations to show the reason why they had not done so. This work had to be executed by means of the diving-bell in deep water; and here he could not help taking this opportunity of saying that he believed no praise could be too high for the skill of the engineers and the whole of the persons employed in carrying out the undertaking. It was right to state that he was not here to find fault with the workmanship, for he believed that it would be impossible to carry out a difficult and arduous work with greater skill, energy, and industry, or with greater perseverance. He was bound to bear his willing testimony to that. The work, however, was proceeding at a very slow pace. The Secretary of the Treasury, the other night, in explaining the progress made with the works at Holyhead Harbour, made some remarks so pertinent to his present subject that he could not help quoting them, especially as he was sure they had the sanction of Her Majesty's Government. He said—

“If important public works of this kind were to be carried out at all, the quicker they were advanced the better for the interests of the community. While the works continued unfinished a vast capital was lying idle, from which the public derived no advantage; whereas, the sooner they were brought to completion the sooner would the country reap the benefit of the expenditure.”

In every word of this he heartily concurred. To carry out great works of this nature in a dribbling manner was nothing less than a waste of public money. Both the Commissioners and Mr. Walker had advised that the works at Dover should be begun simultaneously at more places than one, and completed as rapidly as possible; and they also attached greater importance to this harbour than to any of the other works which they recommended. These suggestions had not, however, been practically attended to. He would now call the attention of the House to some facts to prove his assertions as to the slow progress of the works. Only 800 feet of the masonry had been finished in seven years up to 1854. Another 1,000 feet were contracted to be finished in ten years more, which would bring them to the year 1864. The former part of the work had been executed in comparatively shallow water, but now the operations had to be carried on at about forty-six feet below low water-mark. There still remained to be completed, according to the plans, 8,500 feet, which, at the present rate of progress—namely, 100 feet per annum—would take eighty-five years. If they added to this the seven years required to finish the 1,000 feet contracted to be finished up to 1864, this would give them a period of ninety-two years over which the work would extend. Surely this slow rate of progress involved a great waste of capital, upon which the hon. Gentleman whom he had quoted would dilate at some length. But taking the work done in deep water, and averaging it with that done in shallow water, they would find that between 1847 and 1855 the actual rate of progress was not 100 feet but only eighty-six feet per annum. Indeed, in 1855, only forty-six feet of the foundations had been laid, and in 1856 fifty feet more; and as it was clear the work could not proceed faster than the foundations, instead of the undertaking being completed in 100 years, if it went on at the present rate it would probably require 200 years. Surely, this was a very unsatisfactory prospect; and therefore he thought it would not be considered unreasonable if he asked the Government to state for his information and that of the country, whether they intended to carry out this work according to the recommendation of various Commissions. Sir W. Symonds apprehended some difficulty as to the foundations. Let the Committee mark the facts disclosed on this point in successive Reports from Messrs. Burgess and Walker. In April, 1855, Mr. Walker said—

“The progress of the works has been much delayed by the weather, and also from the chalk foundation not proving so good as in the portion nearer the shore, as stated in our special report of the 29th of July, 1854.”

The special Report here referred to had not been laid before the House. In July, 1855, Mr. Walker followed up his former statements in these words—

"The surface of the chalk being still of an inferior quality, it has been necessary to sink the masonry a considerable depth into it to obtain a good foundation. The foundations are forty-one feet below low water, spring tides."

The Report of the 10th of October, in the same year, said the foundation was still retarded from the necessity of removing a large quantity of soft material before it could be laid. It added, "The foundations are being laid forty-three feet below low water, spring tides." In July, 1856, Mr. Walker reported that "the soft nature of the bottom still retards the progress of the works;" and on the 8th of October, of the same year, he said, "The foundations are being laid upon the same description of bottom as described in our former reports, forty-five feet below low water, spring tides." In April, 1857, the Report stated—

"The walls are now being placed at forty six feet below low water, spring tides, upon a foundation of broken flints and sand. This, though not so satisfactory as the solid chalk, has shown no symptom of insufficiency."

What might be the value of "broken flints" as a foundation he could not say; but to build upon "sand" was not commonly reckoned a very satisfactory process. He begged to ask the Government whether, in the face of these public Reports, they meant to go on with the execution of these works in their entirety, and when they expected them to be completed? The Commissioners distinctly recommended that means should be taken to ascertain what would be the extent of the silting. It was said that the quantity of silting deposited each year was six inches. If that were so the harbour would be filled up long before the expiration of 100 years. He therefore wished to know whether the Government had taken any measures to ascertain what silting, if any, there had been. There were other points on which no information was given in the Reports, but on which he should be glad to receive from the Government as much information as they possessed. A civil engineer named Brooks had written letters to the public journals, stating that the water had altered very much in depth at its entrance. It would be satisfactory to know whether that was correct. Another matter which bore very much upon the time at which the harbour would be completed was the interruption that the work had experienced from time to time from gales of wind. Mr. Walker's Reports, curiously enough, stated some things which certainly threw some light upon those discussions which took place before the Commission, as to the manner in which the harbour should be constructed. One point discussed by learned men at that time was whether, in point of fact, there was any percussion by the sea, some maintaining that there was and others that there was not. Mr. Walker's Report, dated January, 1851, referring to the storm which took place on the 23rd of October, 1850, stated that portions of the new works were thrown down during the storm, as they were unable to withstand the continued shocks. Now he (Mr. Henley) apprehended that shocks meant something like percussions. The successive gales and continued shocks washed upwards of 200 tons of stones out of their beds. He had been told by persons conversant with the subject that these stones were of very large size, and that they had been fastened to each other by cramps, in the strongest manner known to engineers. On another occasion the same thing took place. In 1853 many stones were replaced, and it became necessary to take up many other stones in order to replace them. Again, in 1854 a portion of the stones was displaced, and 240 feet of the staging was carried away. These accidents had no doubt occasioned great delay, but it was a matter of great importance to the House to be informed whether the Government really intended to complete the work as recommended by the Commissioners, and whether they intended to proceed at a more rapid rate with it than at the rate of forty or fifty feet a year, for if not, it would occupy from 150 to 200 years in construction, and be like the works at Cherbourg, and other places, portions of which were, up and down, and up and down again, before the whole was completed. The Government ought to state distinctly whether they intended to make a harbour of refuge at all at Dover, or whether they thought they had gone far enough, and that sufficient shelter for the ordinary class of vessels was afforded by the present pier. It was quite clear that the harbour was at present a defence against enemies rather than against storms. The Government had, of course, been occupied by other matters during the last two or three years, and that might be a reason for the dilatoriness with which the work had been proceeded with. He did not intend to oppose the Vote, because he thought the House was not in possession of sufficient information to warrant him in taking that course.

Mr. Henley

He had no objection to make against the manner in which the works were being proceeded with at other harbours; but, as the Government had taken about eight years to consider the question as to Dover Harbour, they ought to tell the House what decision they had arrived at.

MR. AYRTON said, the right hon. Gentleman had misapprehended what his hon. Friend (Mr. Lindsay) had said with regard to Holyhead Harbour. He did not deny that small vessels required as much protection as large ones, but he maintained that they required a different sort of protection. Not more than six or seven vessels of ninety tons had entered the harbour, and, notwithstanding the accommodation already provided, it was proposed to add 100 additional feet to it.

THE CHAIRMAN interrupted the hon. Gentleman by reminding him that the Vote with respect to Holyhead Harbour had been agreed to.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he did not think it was necessary for him to follow the right hon. Gentleman opposite throughout the lengthy details into which he had entered. If any hon. Gentleman had any desire for more detailed information on the subject, he might refer to the evidence given before the Committee of 1848 on Miscellaneous Estimates, before which he (Sir C. Wood) was examined at very great length as to the origin of these harbours of refuge. The right hon. Gentleman had correctly stated, that two Commissions had sat upon the subject, and that it had been considered for a long time by different Governments. The result was the commencement of the works at Dover to which the right hon. Gentleman had referred. He had also correctly stated, that several gentlemen, learned in such matters, gave very discordant opinions about these works, and he (Sir C. Wood) was not sure that a much more satisfactory result could be arrived at by the House, if the question of construction were again discussed by them. So far as he understood the drift of the right hon. Gentleman's observations, they were directed first to ascertain the plan which the Government proposed to carry into execution at Dover; and next to complain, that the progress of the works was not quite so rapid as was desirable. As regarded the great question, whether the Government had made up its mind to construct the whole harbour as recommended by the Commission, he was afraid he could not give the right hon.

Gentleman any satisfactory explanation, for the simple reason that, as far as he knew, the subject had never seriously been considered by any Government. The two Commissions which had reported, differed as to the area which should be included in that harbour, as well as upon other points, the estimate in the one case being £2,000,000, and in the other £2,500,000. One of these Commissions, in their Report, said—

“ Entertaining the strong opinion we have expressed of the necessity of providing, without delay, a sheltered anchorage in Dover-bay, we venture to urge upon your Lordships' attention the advantage of immediately beginning the works by carrying out the portion which is to commence at Cheesman's-head. Whatever may be finally decided as to the form and extent of the works in Dover bay, the pier from Cheesman's-head, run out into seven fathoms water, appears to be indispensable as a commencement, and it will afford both facility and shelter to the works to be subsequently carried on for their completion. This will give sheltered access to the present harbour during south-west gales, and protect it from the entrance of shingle from the westward; it will afford time, also, for observation on the movement of the shingle within the bay, and for further inquiry as to the tendency which harbours of large area on this part of the coast may have to silt up.”

That which was recommended as the indispensable commencement of the larger harbour was to carry out the pier from Cheesman's-head into seven fathoms water, and this was all which the Government, up to the present time, had decided upon doing. In 1847, as the right hon. Gentleman had stated, a contract was entered into for carrying out a pier to the extent of 800 feet, beginning from Cheesman's-head, seven years being the time within which that portion of the work was to be executed. In 1853, a further contract was entered into for the extension of this work 1,000 feet further, which would accomplish the original design of carrying out the pier to the westward of the existing harbour into six and a half or seven fathoms of water. This was the extent of work at present contracted for. If the ultimate decision of the Government should be not to construct the larger harbour, a most valuable work would still have been completed, capable of sheltering vessels and of holding a steamer at any state of the tides. The importance of a place of this kind, into which a steamer stationed in the Channel for the protection of our trade could run at any time for the purpose of coaling, would at once be appreciated by the hon. and gallant Admiral (Sir C. Napier). The right hon. Gentleman asked, what had been the effect of the pier upon the present harbour. He was happy to say, that the erection of that pier had entirely prevented the accumulation of shingle within the old harbour. The right hon. Gentleman had then referred to a recommendation from the Commissioners, that the work should be commenced in various places at once. The Government, however, thought it much more wise to act upon the other recommendation which he had alluded to, and to commence only so much of the work as was likely to be of immediate use, and to afford a permanent shelter for vessels, whatever might be the decision of the Government with respect to carrying out the entire scheme. As far as it had gone, the erection of the pier was found, as he had said, to have prevented the accumulation of shingle in the harbour, while it afforded great protection from the south-west gales. He quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman, that the work was one which reflected the highest credit upon the engineers and upon all engaged in it. As to its progress, that depended upon the amount of money voted. No doubt, the work might be proceeded with much more rapidly—he was speaking now on the authority of the engineer—if a larger sum were appropriated to carry it on. There were, however, certain economic conditions which interfered. So long as a number of these works were in course of construction, the amount expended on each must be kept within certain bounds, so that the gross amount expended in this way might not be too large. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman, that it would be desirable to make more rapid progress; but at the same time it was not true that the works already erected were of no service, and that the money as yet expended was thrown away. On the contrary, he had shown that these works, as far as they had gone, were of the greatest possible advantage to the harbour. This was not a case in which the work was valueless until the whole was completed. Of course, when the whole plan was executed a greater amount of shelter would be afforded, but every successive fifty feet added to that shelter. With regard to the silting, the mere erection of a breakwater running out at right angles from the shore was not calculated to have any effect on the silting-up of the harbour. That question would arise only in the event of an enclosed harbour, and no perceptible effect had been produced one way or the other by the construction of this breakwater.

Sir Charles Wood

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he did not believe that Dover harbour would ever, properly speaking, be a harbour of refuge. If they turned to a chart they would at once see that, with a westerly or south-westerly wind, the whole of the trade coming up the Channel would pass the North Foreland and run to the Downs, where they would be perfectly safe. For vessels coming from the westward, therefore, Dover would be perfectly useless; and masters of ships navigating the Channel would tell them that they would no sooner think of running into Dover than they would of getting to the moon. He believed that the construction of a harbour of refuge at Dover was a hobby of the late Duke of Wellington; but he (Sir C. Napier) was certain that it was utterly valueless for such a purpose. If, however, the work did not proceed more rapidly than at present, it would not be finished for 200 years. So they had better give up all idea of making it on a grand scale, and maintain it, not as a harbour of refuge, but as a place to which our steam ships might resort for the protection of trade in the event of war. In his opinion, if a harbour of refuge was made anywhere, it ought to be either at Sandwich, or in proximity to the Goodwin Sands.

MR. BENTINCK said, that what the House had heard from the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) and the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark (Sir C. Napier), showed pretty clearly that the best thing to do was to stick to the original plan of 1,800 feet from Cheesman's-head. The point they had now to consider was, who was the responsible party to originate these harbours, to decide upon the locality, and also upon the manner in which the works should be carried out. That was a point which ought to be clearly understood before they came to a decision. A Committee had recently been appointed to inquire into the subject of harbours of refuge, and it was not his intention to offer the slightest disrespect to those hon. Gentlemen; but he must say that to submit to such a Committee questions like these he had just mentioned, was simply ridiculous. It was utterly impossible for the ablest men in that House to deal with these subjects, for this reason—that the evidence they had to examine was such that they must be able to test from practical personal knowledge the value of that evidence before they could arrive at a decision. Every hon. Gentleman who was conversant with inquiries before Committees of this House knew that local engineers would often express the strongest opinions in favour of their own particular locality, no doubt in good faith, but still influenced by local prejudices. Now, unless the Committee was composed entirely of engineers, he defied them to test the value of such evidence, and ascertain which was the man who was giving fair evidence, and which was trying to impose upon the Committee. When they came to decide as to the best localities for harbours of refuge they came to a still more difficult question; and this Committee, on which he believed there was only one naval man, would have to decide which was the best locality, say on the east coast of England, for a harbour of refuge, upon the evidence of North Sea pilots and masters of coasters. In a case like that what possible chance had a Committee of this House, unless practically conversant with the subject, of cross-questioning with any advantage men of that description? The thing was useless. The fact was that they were going on in the dark, and unless they knew the authority upon which those works were to be carried out, the sooner they were put a stop to the better. He trusted, then, that the House would be informed what were the questions referred to the Committee just appointed, and how far it was intended the inquiries of that Committee should extend. With regard to the Vote for the harbour at Alderney, it was not his own opinion only, but that of men of the highest authority, that every shilling laid out there had been wasted, and that the money might as well have been thrown into the sea. The great difficulty was for a sailing vessel to get in there at all. And as to supposing that in time of war it would be of any use in watching Cherbourg, the harbours of Portland and Spithead were much better adapted for that purpose, and were within almost as convenient a distance. With regard to Portland, the work there was, in many respects, a most useful one. It was a great national work, and he trusted it would be persevered in.

SIR GEORGE PECIHELL observed, that he had always understood that Dover Harbour had been created in deference to the wishes of the Duke of Wellington, as a harbour of aggression rather than a harbour of refuge, his Grace's opinion being that it was absolutely essential that something should be done to protect the coasts of this country, especially about that spot. The Dover Harbour might be a valuable resort to our steamers and other vessels in the English Channel, but he should rejoice if anything were done to relieve the mercantile marine from the gross impositions called "passing tolls," which were now levied upon vessels sailing through the Straits of Dover.

MR. LIDDELL remarked, that he did not rise to offer any opposition to the Vote, but he believed that the harbours of Dover, Portland, and Alderney, as now proposed, were the basis of a great system of national defence, which had received the sanction, approval, and recommendation of the late Duke of Wellington. He objected, however, to works in the nature of national defences being placed on the Estimates as harbours of refuge for shipping. He also thought that the country should be fairly informed of their ultimate expense. The harbour of refuge at Dover would cost not much less than £5,000,000; the works at Alderney about £1,300,000; and those at Jersey about £600,000 or £700,000. Now he wished to point out to the Government that the coast extending from the Humber to the Forth was unprovided with a single place of refuge into which during north-easterly gales vessels could run with safety. Remembering the proportion which the trade of the Tyne and the Wear bore to the coasting trade of the entire country—the amount of shipping and the number of wrecks, which was greater within a given radius of this coast than on all the rest of the English coast—it was no wonder that the ship-owners of the north-east coast felt a little aggrieved at the vast cost of the works now forming at Dover and elsewhere, while their own claims met with no recognition.

MR. LINDSAY said, he believed that the subject of a harbour of refuge on the north-east coast had better be left to the Select Committee appointed a few days ago to consider the subject of harbours of refuge. He also doubted whether the House of Commons was warranted in spending so much money at Dover and Alderney, seeing that there were various parts of the coast where harbours were more required. He should move the reduction of the Vote by £134,000 in order that the question of Dover Harbour and Alderney Harbour might be referred to the Committee just appointed. The reference need not delay the progress of the works more than a few months.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £90,000, be granted to Her Majesty, towards defraying the Expense of constructing certain Harbours of Refuge, to the 31st day of March 1858."

SIR JOHN JOHNSTONE observed, he could corroborate the statement of the hon. Member for Northumberland, and could testify to the strong opinion upon the north-east coast that a harbour of refuge ought to be constructed there. He believed that during the last sixteen years a sum of £3,500,000 had been laid out in connection with harbours of refuge throughout the kingdom, while not a penny had been laid out upon the north-east coast for that purpose. He hailed with great satisfaction the circumstance that a Select Committee had been appointed to investigate the subject, because he felt assured that it would be found that, owing to the number of shipwrecks which took place on the north-east coast, the establishment of harbours of refuge there would be found to be a work of pressing necessity.

MR. WARRE said, he had never heard so unreasonable a proposition as the one before the House, which went to cut down the expenditure upon works which all present wished to see completed. He trusted that the Committee would not sanction the reduction of the Vote.

MR. HENLEY said, it was to be inferred, from what had fallen from the right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Admiralty, that Dover ought to be struck out of the category of harbours of refuge, and that the breakwater there ought to be regarded as being constructed merely with the view of facilitating the entrance of packets into the harbour, and providing for the coaling of steamers. In future the charge for this purpose ought to form part of the Post Office and Naval Estimates. Still, it became worthy of the consideration of the Committee whether so large a sum as was proposed should be expended simply for the attainment of that object. But, while such was his opinion, he could not vote that the sum be struck out, inasmuch as if the underground works of the breakwater were not completed, the money which had already been expended upon them might be perfectly thrown away.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the title of "harbours of refuge," under which head the Vote for Dover and Alderney had for some years been taken, was, perhaps, not very appropriate. The fact was, that they were not aggressive harbours, as some hon. Gentlemen had stated, but harbours of military defence. At the time at which a Vote had been taken for them, it had been deemed desirable not to attract the attention of neighbouring nations, whose susceptibility might have been awakened by their formation, and consequently their real purpose had been veiled under the more pacific designation of harbours of refuge, for which purpose they had to some extent been made available. The real object of their construction had, however, been the defence of our coasts and the protection of our trade. In corroboration of that statement, he should read to the Committee the opinion of the Duke of Wellington upon the subject. It was as follows:—

Mr. Lindsay

"I should say that, considering the want of protection from the weather or from military attacks in the Channel, the trade of the port of London will be in a very precarious situation, and will be a very losing one in a variety of ways in time of war, if something is not done beforehand, if anybody will just consider the advantage the French coast enjoys over the coast of this country in the observation of what is passing at sea. It is to the southward; they have the sun at their back, they see everything quite clear, and it is very possible from the coast of France to calculate to a moment at what period a vessel coming up Channel will arrive at particular points, and they may be in readiness to seize her at any point which may happen to be unguarded, supposing the vessel to be without convoy, and supposing that there should be no naval succour at that point to take care of her."

It was clear, then, he thought, that the principle upon which the harbours in question had been constructed was that of providing stations of military defence on the south-eastern coast, but the time had now passed when it was possible or necessary to attempt to delude anybody, for every one must know the object of such works as those at Alderney. When the breakwater at Dover was completed, by carrying it out into seven fathoms water, as recommended by the Commissioners, the harbour would be found a most valuable station for steamers, where they might lie in safety, and take in coal; but, as the Committee would perceive, the right hon. Gentleman opposite was wrong in supposing that that was the sole object of its construction. He could not concur in the opinion that an efficient watch could not be kept on the French coast from those harbours, inasmuch as he believed it impossible that a vessel could leave the port of Cherbourg without being seen from Alderney. With respect to harbours of refuge on the north-east coast, they stood on a perfectly difficult footing, for they must be looked on as mere commercial harbours of refuge for the preservation of trading vessels.

MR. BENTINCK said, the statement of the right hon. Gentleman proved that a Committee of the House was not the proper place to discuss those questions. If Alderney were intended to watch Cherbourg, it could not fulfil that intention, as 500 vessels might leave Cherbourg without a single vessel in Alderney seeing them. He thought that a Commission properly constituted would be the proper tribunal to which to refer the whole subject, and he could not but regard the work, so far, as having led to an expense which would ultimately prove quite useless.

MR. PEASE did not think that the dignity of the House could be maintained by commencing these works, and then not carrying them out to any useful purpose. He deplored what he considered a serious waste of money in respect to one or two of the harbours in question, but he wished that the Committee about to be appointed should be encouraged in considering the question of such harbours of refuge as might be wanted for the purpose of commerce and humanity.

Amendment put, and negatived.

Original question put, and agreed to.

(13.) £12,000, Captured Negroes, &c.

SIR GEORGE PECHELL said, he rose to express his opinion that the time had arrived when the Government must change the policy they had hitherto pursued. He thought that either a treaty should be concluded with Spain, or that the Government should take the matter into their own hands, and station a great number of cruisers off the coast of Cuba, instead of the coast of Africa. Keeping up insufficient naval establishments on the coast of Cuba was a positive waste of money. He should like to hear some statement of the number of negroes captured of late, and also of the grants of money, amounting to £1,291, to ex-King Pepple. There was a grant of £1,200 to Mrs. Backhouse, widow of the Commissary Judge at the Havannah, who was murdered in consequence of his zeal and activity in the cause in which he was employed. He did not think that the widow of a man who had lost his life in the service of his country should have been placed on that list.

MR. GREGORY remarked, that he should be sorry to make invidious allusions to oppressed potentates, but he thought, before the Committee voted a grant of £1,200 to King Pepple, they should know something of the good he had done. He had heard something of this ex-King, and he believed that since his fallen fortunes the monarch incurred but a moderate expenditure, his chief luxuries being rum and tobacco. He had seen a picture of Pepple sitting in a very unkingly position on a puncheon of rum, with a pipe in his mouth, his costume being a cocked hat and a laced coat, while all the rest of his person was in a primitive state of nature. The rest of the kings and chiefs in the list had only received £190 altogether, while King Pepple had got more than six times that amount.

MR. AYRTON said, he had seen King Pepple the other night, and if every item in the Vote was as justifiable as the amount paid to that individual, he would pass it over without objection. That unfortunate person had been the King of Bonny, and made a treaty with the British Government, whereby he agreed to suppress the slave trade in his country for a very small sum. That treaty was, he believed, in strict accordance with the policy which the Government had for many years pursued, and the item in the Vote was for the payment of the balance of the subsidy due under that treaty. He could conceive no better way of putting down the slave trade than by entering into treaties with the chieftains on the coast; but those treaties once made should be scrupulously observed. It seemed unfortunate, however, that the end of all treaties between native chiefs and this country was the dethronement of those chiefs and the annexation of their territory, and that had been the case with this unfortunate ex-King. He trusted, however, that the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs would inquire into the circumstances, and that justice would be done to him. As to the ludicrous picture which had been drawn by the hon. Member for Galway, he could only say that when he saw the ex-King he was as well dressed as the hon. Member himself.

MR. WILSON said, that he begged to remind the Committee that what was before the Committee was a mere memorandum of the expense incurred during the past year, and not an Estimate for the expenses of the year following. With regard to the two items to which reference had been made, he was sure that no one who was acquainted with the eminent services registrar. The arrangements at Canton were on an equally liberal scale. Then the consul—Mr. Parkes, he believed, the gentleman with whom they had lately become historically acquainted for the good service he had done this country—received £1,800 a year. Of course, he required a vice-consul, who received £750 a year; and there was besides a vice-consul at Whampoa, who received the same amount. These gentlemen could not speak Chinese, and therefore they required the assistance of an interpreter, who was paid £700 a year, and he had a first assistant, who again required a second assistant, and, as if they could not get on without further aid, they had three Chinese writers or linguists. The whole cost of the consulate at Canton was £4879 a year, and he hoped some explanation of the expenditure would be afforded to the Committee.

MR. WILSON said, he would first observe that the word “assistant” was in the East synonymous with the term “clerk.” In most merchants’ offices in London there were first clerks, second clerks, third clerks, and so on; and the consular officers mentioned in the Estimate, although called “assistants” were really clerks. The hon. and learned Gentleman, in referring to the “first assistant and keeper of records,” seemed to assume that the other assistants aided in keeping the records. The fact was, however, that the first clerk alone kept the records, and the other assistants or clerks had nothing whatever to do with them, but were engaged in the general business of the consulate. With regard to the interpreters, about four years ago Lord Clarendon considered it most important, that Englishmen who held important offices in the principal ports of China should be thoroughly acquainted with the Chinese language. The consequence was, that a number of young Englishmen were sent out at the low salaries of £200 a year, to learn the language, with a view of qualifying themselves for appointments, and the large number of supernumerary interpreters was thus accounted for. The Committee were aware that our trade with China had recently increased most rapidly, and he hoped they would not think that the sum included in this Estimate was a large amount to spend, not upon one port alone, but upon five or six ports. The amounts were:—for Hong Kong, £10,424; for Canton, £4879; for Amoy, £3,320; for Foochowfoo, £2,820; for Ningpo, £1,650; and for Shanghai, £4,082.

Mr. Whiteside

MR. WHITESIDE said, that he knew the hon. Secretary would be in a difficulty in giving the required information. He had listened very attentively to his brief explanation, but he was just as wise as he was before. The hon. Gentleman had complained of the manner in which he had read this Estimate. He had read it as he found it. Seeing in it “first assistant keeper of the records” and then “second assistant,” he concluded that he was a second assistant in keeping the records. The hon. Gentleman now said that the latter was a clerk, and when asked what he and the third and fourth assistants did he answered in a very satisfactory manner, “the general business of the office.” What was the general business of the department? There was a superintendent capable of doing the business, and very effectually he had done it. The thirteen supernumerary interpreters he supposed were men intimate with the Chinese language, and able to explain now to Sir J. Bowring what it was the Chinese at Canton meant to say to him, of which he had himself not the least idea. Now, however, the Secretary of the Treasury had informed the Committee, with his usual lucidity, that they were not interpreters, but young men who were learning the language, and that at some time, perhaps when Canton had been blown to atoms, they would be able to speak to the Emperor if they should ever arrive at His Majesty’s presence. If the Estimate had stated that this was a sum of money for instructing young Englishmen to speak Chinese it would have been intelligible, but as the matter stood this was one of the most extraordinary explanations that he had ever heard. He thought that his original proposition to reduce the number of these young men from thirteen to six and a half was a good one. The hon. Gentleman had said nothing about the four Chinese writers or linguists. He said that our trade with China was very lucrative, but he might reflect that that trade would very soon be reduced to nothing, and therefore that argument would no longer avail. The best man of business on the Treasury Bench having given an explanation of this matter which left the Committee as much in the dark as it was before, he should move to reduce the Vote by a sum of £2,533—a reduction which he proposed to effect by doing away with one-half of the supernumerary interpreters, and abolishing the offices of the assistant Chinese secretary, the third and fourth assistants and two of the Chinese linguists. After this reduction the amount of the Vote would be £125,089—a very ample margin for doing nothing in Canton, and therefore he thought that the reduction which he now proposed was a very safe and proper one.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £122,556, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Expense of the Consular Establishments Abroad, to the 31st day of March 1858."

MR. WISE trusted that the House would not agree to this Amendment. He had recently conversed with a gentleman who had resided in China upon the subject of the Chinese Department, and he was assured by him that the allowances proposed to be made by this Vote were most reasonable and proper ones.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The hon. and learned Gentleman opposite does not, I think, present himself to the House as a guide in this matter under very clear colours. He professes himself to be entirely in the dark, and to know nothing of the matter upon which he proposes that we should come to a vote. I fully believe that statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman, because the manner in which he has treated the subject fully bears out the description which he has given of himself. I think that in general when hon. Gentlemen undertake to discuss Estimates it would be convenient to the House and advantageous to themselves that they should make themselves a little acquainted with the matter with which they are dealing. The hon. and learned Gentleman has been very pleasant upon the notion that nothing is done by any of these officers at Hong Kong, that the whole of our trade with China is confined to the port of Canton, and that, as the communication with that port is cut off, there is no longer any trade, there is no business to be done, and all these gentlemen are sitting with their hands before them and doing nothing but receive their salaries. That is a very pretty flourish of imagination. There is no man who is more capable than is the hon. Member of painting a picture which has no foundation in reality, and amusing the House with little flourishes of genius, eloquence, and the inventive faculty, and if we were assembled simply for amusement, and to witness exertations of intellect, I am sure that we should at all times be happy to hear the hon. and learned Gentleman at even greater length than that at which he sometimes favours us with his views upon public affairs. On the present occasion, however, he has not, in making a great many observations which are not founded in fact, paid sufficient regard to the lateness of the hour (twenty minutes after Twelve o'clock). He might have known that the duties of Sir John Bowring, the Superintendent of Trade, and of the clerks and officers under him are not confined to Canton, but that he receives reports from and communicates with all the other ports. The correspondence is of considerable extent, and involves a great deal of labour. The hon. and learned Gentleman is, I dare say, a very good linguist, but I doubt whether he has among his various attainments acquired any knowledge, even a rudimental one, of the Chinese language; although perhaps some of the things which he says here are as unintelligible to the House as if they were spoken in Chinese. If he were acquainted with even the rudiments of that language he would know that it is very difficult to acquire, and that even the life of a professional gentleman would not be long enough to enable him to master it sufficiently for even the most ordinary purposes of communication. Unless the tongue can express sounds which are intelligible to the hearers—the hon. and learned Gentleman is perhaps not always aware of that difficulty—it is impossible to make oneself intelligible—perhaps I am not making myself intelligible. But unless that be done communications are useless. For the purposes of trade it is very necessary that those who communicate together should fully understand each other. For that purpose it is essential that our staff should understand the Chinese language, and, as the attainment of a knowledge of that language is a work of great difficulty, the hon. and learned Gentleman must not be surprised if a large number of young men are sent out to learn it, and if it is a long time before they become sufficiently masters of it to be useful in communication. It is not desirable to rely upon natives, because you cannot place so much confidence in them as you can in British interpreters. My noble Friend at the head of the Foreign Office has sent out these young men to gain a knowledge of the Chinese language, and I venture to say that no money is better employed than that which is spent upon their education. The hon. Gentleman who has just addressed the House has stated from his own knowledge that those who are conversant with these matters are of opinion that this establishment is by no means more extensive than the public service requires. The climate is one which very severely affects British constitutions. While I was at the Foreign-office many very valuable men either came home on account of ill-health or fell victims on the spot to the severity of the climate. Therefore I can assure the House that whatever the hon. and learned Gentleman may think of the extent of this establishment it is by no means greater than is required to meet the wants of the public service—wants which come out of an increasing trade of the utmost value to this country, and which cannot be extended unless there are proper public servants on the spot. I am quite sure that no one who knows anything of China will be of opinion that this is too large an establishment, or that the amount of the salaries and expenses at all exceeds what is required by the necessities of the case.

MR. HENLEY said, the noble Lord at the head of the Government would admit that if it was necessary in verbal communications between the natives of two different countries that they should be able to make themselves mutually intelligible, it was quite as important that written or printed documents should be readily understood. In this case the Government had put before the Committee a document framed in such a manner that they themselves did not appear to understand it, nor could any one else, and that was exactly what his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Whiteside) had complained of. It was the ambiguity with which the estimate in reference to the Vote under consideration was drawn up that had given rise to the discussion which had taken place; and if the Government in framing it had called assistants, clerks, and the thirteen supernumerary interpreters, young gentlemen who were learning the Chinese language, the paper would have been understood by everybody. He (Mr. Henley) observed £4,000 or £5,000 put down for the Chinese mission. He took it the members of that mission could not be at Canton now, and he wished to know what was to be done with them in the event of the continuance of hostilities?

MR. WILSON reminded the right hon.

Viscount Palmerston

Gentleman that this was an Estimate for next year, and that it was necessary for the Committee to provide the salaries for the next year. Mr. Parkes and his staff would, of course, be called into requisition to assist Lord Elgin on his arrival in China; and, besides, it was not desirable to drop public servants in that remote part of the world in an abrupt manner, and without providing for the payment of their annual salaries.

MR. WHITESIDE: The noble Lord is of opinion that it is not quite becoming in a Member of Parliament to ask for an explanation of an unintelligible Vote under the consideration of the House. The noble Lord may possibly understand all the details of this Vote as perfectly as he affects to do. Of course the noble Lord understands everything, or, at all events, he talks as if he did, which with some is much the same thing, and a very valuable quality in a Prime Minister. But the Committee cannot have failed to notice that the noble Lord never touched a single item of the Estimates under consideration, and that is an adroit and often a most successful mode of dealing with a subject—to attack your adversary, ask what business he has to intermeddle with a question on which he desires an explanation, and then assume that everybody else understands the whole matter except himself. By “interpreters,” then, on this occasion, it appears I am to understand thirteen young Englishmen who are learning the Chinese tongue. The noble Lord is pleased with that explanation, and has been happy in turning on me the whole force of his wit. Sir, nobody speaks with half the effect of a Prime Minister. There are always plenty to laugh with him. But if the noble Lord, who has been accustomed during the greater part of his public life to speak from the Treasury bench, had sat to-night on this side of the House, and had—as I have ventured to do—asked for an explanation of an unintelligible Vote, he would have turned the whole subject into the happiest ridicule, and made a far better speech than he has done in reply to my humble observations. It comes to this, that Lord Clarendon, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has told the noble Lord that it is necessary to make all these appointments, and to send out the young friends of official men to fill these places. This fact remains, that whereas the House voted £33,000 for this purpose last year, they are now asked to vote £39,000 this year. The noble Lord has given what he thinks an explanation of the matter, which may perhaps be satisfactory to some hon. Gentlemen who sit on the same side of the House with him; but I am sure the reason of the thing is with me, and I have only to say that I shall not press the Motion which I ventured to make to the Committee, and I shall be sincerely glad if the House do not have to divide on any more serious matter connected with the state of our relations with the Chinese nation.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he begged to move that the Chairman report progress, on the ground that the next Vote contained several objectionable items which could not be satisfactorily discussed at that hour of the night (a quarter to One o'clock).

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report progress, and ask leave to sit again."

MR. WILSON observed, that he hoped they would proceed with the next Vote.

MR. BLACK remarked, that he hoped the hon. Member for Lambeth would divide in favour of reporting progress. He had to complain that the Reformatory Institutions Bill was kept on the Orders of the Day, when it was not intended to proceed with it on the evenings for which it stood. He really thought such a course extremely discourteous on the part of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department.

SIR GEORGE GREY explained that if the hon. Gentleman had done what several other hon. Gentlemen had done, and asked him at what hour he intended to bring on the Reformatory Institutions Bill, he would have learned that it was not his intention to do so at anything like a late hour. At the same time he must add that the hon. Gentleman ought to remember that it was exceedingly difficult to avoid placing orders on the paper when there was a chance of bringing them on.

MR. CROSSLEY said, this was just one of the many occasions which made him the more keenly regret the absence of the late Mr. Brotherton, who was accustomed to interfere to prevent the House continuing its discussions after Twelve o'clock at night. It was now nearly One o'clock, and he would therefore support the Motion that the Chairman report progress. He contended, also, that it would be for the public interest, as well as the individual welfare of every hon. Member of the House, that in future all business which was likely to give rise to discussion, and which was undisposed of after midnight, should stand over.

MR. W. WILLIAMS repeated that there were many objectionable items in the next Vote, which it would be unreasonable to ask the Committee to discuss at that time of night.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, it would take as much time to divide as to discuss the Vote, which was the only remaining one on the paper. He hoped, therefore, that the Amendment would be withdrawn.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(16.) £22,500, Extraordinary Expenses, Ministers at Foreign Courts.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he wished to draw attention to the great expense of the embassy at Constantinople; they had already voted £1,500 for six paid attachés, but in this Vote was an item of £1,120 for interpreters, attachés, and clerks; he would also wish for some explanation of the item £1,605 for extra couriers.

MR. WISE called attention to the increase of late years in these charges. In 1851 the Vote was £16,000; in 1853, £18,500; in 1855, £25,000, and now, £37,500. There was a charge of £180,000 a year on the Consolidated Fund for foreign missions, and this sum was for miscellaneous expenses.

MR. WILSON said, the printed details applied to the expenditure last year. The circumstance of the war being just concluded caused the expenses with respect to Turkey to be heavy. Extraordinary expenses were caused by the coronation at Moscow and the ordinary expenses of the Russian mission, recommenced in consequence of the war being terminated.

MR. BLACKBURN asked for explanation of an item of £1,284 loss on exchanges. For the Two Sicilies it was £449. He imagined draughts on England would be at a premium abroad. He could find no credit for any gains on exchanges.

MR. WILSON said, that this allowance was only made for loss of exchange on the disbursements made by the Ambassadors for the public service and not on their salaries. For many years it had been the practice not to give credit for gains on exchange, but within the last eighteen months an arrangement had been made with the Foreign Office, by which loss would be charged against and gain paid to the Treasury.

MR. WISE said, that there was a loss of 10 per cent on exchange with the Two Sicilies. If that were allowed to the wealthy Ambassador, why was not the same privilege granted to the less well-paid Consul?

MR. WILSON said, that in consequence of the exceptional state of things, an allowance had been made to the Consul in that particular instance.

MR. HENLEY understood the loss on exchange applied only to extraordinary expenses. What was the nature of those expenses?

MR. WILSON said, they appeared in the details of this Vote.

MR. HENLEY wished to have some explanation of one item. The extraordinary expenses of the Two Sicilies were £1,060, and the loss on exchange was £449. As the extraordinary expenses included the loss on exchange, the £449 must be charged with respect to expenses of £600.

MR. WILSON was unable to explain that, but would inquire.

Vote agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported on Monday next.

Committee to sit again on Monday next.

House adjourned at half-after One o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, July 6, 1857.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—3<sup>d</sup> Dulwich College; Militia (Ireland) Act (1854) Amendment; Oxford University.

THE SCHOONER "MARIA"—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY wished to put a question to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs relative to a case of some hardship. It was the case of a Captain Ouseley, commander and part owner of the schooner Maria, which had been seized by the Venezuelan Government. It appeared that a boat had been detached from the schooner in order to procure provisions at Caraccas. On board the boat there were some few yards of cloth which the crew intended merely to barter for the provisions of which they stood in need. They were, however, accused of smuggling, and the boat was consequently seized. The captain was brought before the authorities of the country, and fined 100 dollars for a breach of the Custom House rules of Venezuela. Not satisfied with this, the Government of that country also seized the schooner, which was then engaged in a regular and legitimate trade—that of carrying cattle to Demerara. The seizure occurred on the 7th of March, 1856. Since then a correspondence had taken place between his noble Friend (the Earl of Clarendon) and the brother-in-law of Captain Ouseley; and it appeared that no notice whatever had been taken of this transaction by our Chargé d'Affaires at Caraccas, and that no communication on the subject had been sent by that officer to the Foreign Office in answer to inquiries that had been addressed to him regarding it. In the meantime, Captain Ouseley had presented a bill against the authorities of Venezuela for damages to the amount of something like £3,000. He wished his noble Friend to explain, if he could, how such a proceeding as this, affecting a vessel that was British built, British manned, and British owned, should have taken place without any interference on the part of our Chargé d'Affaires on the spot, or without the knowledge of the Foreign Office being drawn to it.

Mr. Wilson

THE EARL OF CLARENDON was sorry that he could not afford his noble Friend the explanation he desired. It was perfectly true that neither before nor since the information relative to this case had been given to the Foreign Office by the parties interested had he received any Report on the subject from our Chargé d'Affaires at Caraccas. As soon as the circumstances came to his knowledge he put himself in communication with the Commissioner of Venezuela, who was then about to return to that country, and requested him to be good enough to lay the matter under the notice of the Venezuelan Government. Since then, however, he had not heard anything of that gentleman's proceedings. Although he had not yet succeeded in obtaining any information respecting this transaction, he trusted that before much longer he should receive some explanation on the subject.

CONVEYANCE OF TROOPS TO INDIA.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARDIGAN wished to ask the noble Lord the Secretary for War whether it was true that the reinforcements of European infantry and cavalry about to be despatched to India for the purpose of suppressing the serious insurrection which had broken out in that country were to be sent out in sailing vessels instead of in steamers? After what had happened during the war in the Crimea, the Government would be profiting little by past experience if, when they had so many war and merchant steamers at their command, they sent out these troops, whose speedy presence was required to meet a critical emergency, by sailing vessels.

LORD PANMURE said, he could assure the noble Earl that the most attentive consideration of the Government had been given to this question of the best means of sending reinforcements to India with the greatest expedition possible. The difficulty in the use of steam vessels was the delay necessarily caused by coaling. This operation made it necessary for steamers to call at several ports; whereas sailing vessels were able to shorten the course by keeping further from shore. The result was, that the sailing vessels arrived at their destination as soon, if not sooner, than steam vessels. It was on a conviction that this would prove the case in the present instance which had induced the Government, after an attentive consideration of the matter, to give the preference to sailing vessels.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, that he could not speak on that matter from very recent experience; no doubt steam navigation had since then greatly improved; but when he was in India no steamer made so good a passage as a sailing vessel, and this arose in consequence of the coaling difficulty referred to by his noble Friend (Lord Panmure). He should add, that this was the most favourable season at which a sailing vessel could start with troops for India.

ALLEGED REVIVAL OF THE SLAVE TRADE—EXPLANATION.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he found he had exaggerated the number of what were called free negroes about to be conveyed to the French colonies from the coast of Africa. He understood that the number was not 20,000, as he had stated, but 10,000. He was sure that no scheme for the revival of the slave trade would obtain the assent of the Emperor of the French. His noble Friend (the Earl of Clarendon) had also been charged with conniving at this virtual re-opening of the slave trade; but he (Lord Brougham) felt confident that no one would regard such a scheme with more suspicion than his noble Friend (the Earl of Clarendon). It must be admitted that there was the greatest difference between carrying off free negroes, or whatever they might be called, to a slave colony, and carrying them to colonies in which slavery was abolished. Yet, as regarded the Africans, even although they might be carried to colonies in which slavery was abolished, yet any scheme of this kind ought to be viewed with distrust, and to be most carefully and scrupulously watched.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, that some misunderstanding existed with regard to a deputation that recently waited upon the First Lord of the Treasury on this subject. The main object of that deputation was to represent to the Prime Minister some facts connected with the increase of the slave trade and the necessity of repressing it, not so much on the coast of Africa as by means of additional gunboats and steamers on the shores of Cuba. The want of free labour in some of the colonies was certainly a matter of discussion among that deputation, and one gentleman gave an opinion on that subject. But as far as he (the Earl of Shaftesbury) was concerned—and he believed he might say the same for the other members of the deputation—their opinion was, that to endeavour to set on foot a scheme for carrying free negroes from the coast of Africa would be to all intents and purposes a revival of the slave trade, the most accursed crime that ever was perpetrated.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he should be sorry if their Lordships should run away with the idea that if some plan were adopted, or could be discovered, for getting free labourers from Africa, that that was necessarily a renewal of the slave trade. If that were clearly shown, there was an end of the matter. But on the score both of policy and humanity the question was worthy the consideration of those who wished to take a broad and statesmanlike view of the subject. On the other side of the Atlantic there were millions of acres that could not be cultivated by white men, and if they were not cultivated by blacks they must remain sterile ; while millions of negroes willing to labour were confined to the coasts of Africa. On the other hand, looking at it in a philanthropic point of view, there might be a danger of renewing the slave trade. He trusted, however, that their Lordships and the Government would not take it for granted that any efforts or experiments in the direction which the French Government were now taking must inevitably result in the revival of the horrors of the slave trade.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON said, he had made inquiry into the matter in consequence of the speech delivered by his noble and learned Friend the other evening, and he found that the condition of the assent of the French Government to the contract was that it should be an engagement of free labourers, and that the negroes should be sent to those colonies where labour was wanted. It was intended to take all possible securities against abuses ; but he agreed with his noble and learned Friend, that no plan of this sort, however carefully it might be devised, could be safely carried out without a liability to the revival of the slave trade.

INDIAN ADMINISTRATION—THE CIVIL SERVICE.

RETURNS MOVED FOR.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE, in rising to move for Returns relative to the Civil Service in India, said, that as he believed there was no objection to their production, and as there must before long be a general inquiry into the administration of the Indian Government, he would not detain their Lordships at any length. When the present disturbances were put down—and he had no doubt they would be quelled at much less cost and with much less difficulty than some persons supposed, Parliament must inquire into the causes of the state of things which recent events had proved to exist in the Indian army. To suppose that this was a mere question of greased cartridges was absurd. The Returns which he desired would be of great service in the prosecution of these investigations, and would show what was the amount of administrative force at the disposal of the Indian Government. At present he spoke upon imperfect information, but it appeared to him that they were expecting the present Governor General to administer the affairs of India with the same number of civil servants that were at the disposal of the Indian Government in 1846, when our territory was much smaller in extent. To show their Lordships that he had not adopted that opinion without due authority, he should quote a passage from the Minute of Lord Dalhousie, which had been laid upon the table of their Lordships' House in the course of the last year. He learned from the 12th paragraph of that Minute that "in eight years four Indian kingdoms had passed under the sceptre of Her Majesty, and that various chieftainships and smaller districts had been brought under her sway." Among the smaller acquisitions the Governor General enumerated Khyrpore, Ungool, Sikkim, some Nepaulese sirdars, Mundote, the Nawab Nazim of Bengal, and the States of Central India. Then there were, besides these, the Punjab, Rangoon, Nagpore, Sattara, Hyderabad, and Oude ; the population thus brought under the dominion of this country amounting to nearly 11,000,000 of souls, while the extent of territory thus acquired amounted to 207,637 square miles. It also appeared, from a Return which had been laid upon the table of their Lordships' House that the amount of revenue derived from those recent additions to our territory in India was £4,330,000 per annum. That in Europe would be a large and important country by itself. Notwithstanding that large increase, however, in the extent of our territory, he could not ascertain that any corresponding addition had been made to our civil service in India. The number of the covenanted civil servants in that country were, he found, in 1846, 431, while in 1856 it was not more than 432. It was quite clear, therefore, that we were imposing upon the Governor General of India the task of ruling an empire of considerably-enlarged proportions with precisely the same staff as had been appointed in 1846 to administer the affairs of a much smaller territory. How long, he would ask, were we to continue that policy ? Was our Indian Government to be the only Government in the world which was not to possess that elastic character by which the number of the public servants was adapted to the requirements of the State ? What was the resource which, under those circumstances, was open to the Governor General when a demand for an increase in the number of the civil servants arose ? Why, in the case in which an office of high importance was to be filled, he was debarred from going beyond the covenanted service, and from calling to his aid any member of the uncovenanted civil service, however qualified such person might be. What was the consequence? He was obliged to resort to the military department, and to take officers away from the duties of their profession to fill civil employments. Thus, when an increase in the number of civil servants in India became imperative, a diminution of the military force was the invariable result. He had heard it stated, that the number of officers who were under those circumstances taken away from their regiments, amounted to no less than 25 per cent. That such a state of things existed he attributed to the fault of no individual; he deemed it to be the result of the system—and he trusted the Government would, by agreeing to the production of the Returns for which he rose to move, place their Lordships and the country in a position to obtain accurate information upon a subject so important to the efficient administration of the affairs of our Indian empire. The noble Marquess concluded by moving that there be laid before the House a “Return of the Number of Officers belonging to and employed in the Civil Service of the East India Company, distinguishing those in the Covenanted from those in the Uncovenanted Service, and in receipt of not less than £400 a year Salary, on the 1st of January, 1846, and a similar return for the 1st of January, 1856 ;

The Earl of Malmesbury

“And, also, Return of the Number of Military Officers employed in Diplomatic, Political, or other Civil Services, on the 1st of January, 1846, and a similar Return for the 1st of January, 1856.”

THE EARL OF ALBEMARLE rose, to express a hope that their Lordships would have the assurance of the Government that a full and searching inquiry into the condition of India in all its branches would be instituted. If such an inquiry took place, it would, he thought, be found necessary to make very material changes in the policy which had hitherto been adopted towards that country, and especially in one portion of that policy—he alluded to that by which the annexation of the territories of princes whose dominions bordered upon our own was brought about. In the adoption of that system, indeed, might be found one of the causes which had led to the mutinies which had lately taken place. In support of that reform he might state, that about fifteen months since he had had a long conversation with an intelligent Mahomedan Native of India in reference to the annexation of Oude, and the gentleman in question upon that occasion observed to him, “If you annex Oude, you will find that disaffection will break out among the Native troops, and for this reason—they are all drawn from the agricultural, but not from the peasant class. They are what you would call in this country yeomen, or small landlords. They are of the highest caste, being either Rajpoots or Brahmins, and are of a most inflammable character. They number about 50,000, and will necessarily be deprived of many of their privileges by the annexation of their territory.” Such was the opinion of the gentleman to whom he had referred; and he might add, that it had also been pointed out to him that the new land revenue system which the Government had introduced into the North-Western Provinces of India, and which was made to follow the annexation of this new territory, was regarded by the Natives as a great hardship, inasmuch as under its operation every man’s property was surveyed, and each of those 50,000 sepoys would thus be compelled to make out his title to the land in his possession. He understood that Her Majesty’s Ministers might rely upon the fact that 140 petitions had already emanated from the sepoys of Oude in reference to that subject, and he therefore trusted that the Government would institute the most minute inquiries into the system to which he had adverted. He had only that morning received a newspaper from India, called the Rising Sun, dated May 20, which contained a quotation from another journal, complaining of the irritating nature of the survey of the lands in that country.

Motion agreed to.

HIGH AND LOW WATER-MARK—RIGHTS OF THE CROWN—PETITIONS.

THE EARL OF DERBY presented Petitions from the Llanelly Railway and Dock Company, under their common seal, and from David Lewis, of Shadey, Carmarthenshire, complaining of the Enforcement of the Rights of the Crown between High and Low Water-Mark. He was very much afraid that he should very imperfectly do justice to the merits of the petitions which he had been requested to present to their Lordships, because those documents involved many serious and complicated questions of law, which he felt his utter incompetency to deal with. At the same time, if the House allowed him, he would draw their Lordships' attention for a few minutes to some matters of detail; and he hoped he should, at all events, be able to satisfy their Lordships that the subject-matter of these petitions was one deserving of their consideration, as involving the general rights of subjects of the Crown. The documents had reference to the rights of the Crown to the land between high and low water-mark, round the whole kingdom, and not only to the nature of those rights themselves, but to the manner in which of late years it had been sought to enforce them. The two petitions were from different parties, and some of the allegations were different, but as they proceeded from the same locality, and were to some extent connected, it would be convenient that he should state their substance at the same time. The first was from Mr. Lewis, a gentleman who had considerable property on the coast of Carmarthenshire, and who was at one time the Member for the county; the other was from the same neighbourhood, from the Llanelly Railway and Dock Company, incorporated by Act of Parliament in 1828. It would first be necessary for him to state to their Lordships a few particulars connected with the locality to which these petitions referred. Mr. Lewis's property is on the side of an inlet from the British Channel, running nearly north and south, on the shores of which there is at low water a large expanse of sand uncovered by water. The land beyond the sand on both sides of the inlet consists of banks of mud, behind which, in some places, was a considerable extent on both sides of land which is occasionally flooded at high spring tides, but generally speaking partook of the character of salt marshes. The petitioner had retained possession of his property, partly consisting of salt marshes, on this inlet, undisturbed and undisputed, until 1845; he had exercised all the rights of ownership over it of which such property is capable, and had sunk a shaft in the salt marshes in order to work the coal which lay beneath, and this had been leased to a copper smelting company. Even so long ago as 1807 and 1812 these marshes had been expressly excluded from the enclosure Acts which applied to the neighbourhood, as the property of Mr. Lewis and his predecessors. It was under these circumstances that in 1845 Mr. Lewis found that an information had been filed against him, which recited that the sea shore so far inland as the tide flowed belonged to Her Majesty, and claimed for the Queen the property up to the highest point reached by the tide, including the shaft which had been sunk. Mr. Lewis lost no time in filing an answer to that information, and he availed himself of the valuable assistance of Mr. Bethell; but it was not until 1851 that the Master of the Rolls pronounced a decree directing that the Crown should proceed against other parties before Mr. Lewis, by a trial at bar. The cause of this was a claim on the part of Lord Cawdor to manorial rights. This claim after some time was compromised between Lord Cawdor and the Crown; who, having got rid of this opponent, proceeded once more against Mr. Lewis. He could not but express his regret that this compromise had taken place between Lord Cawdor and the Crown, for if Lord Cawdor had turned out to be entitled to manorial rights, of course these proceedings could not have been taken against Mr. Lewis. When the case next came on that gentleman laboured under two disadvantages. One was, that Mr. Bethell, who had in the first instance been his counsel, had now become Solicitor General; and his services being now required by the Crown, he argued against him, with the advantage of all the information which he had derived while he was on his side. The next disadvantage was, that in 1847 the South Wales Railway had obtained an Act for the construction of a line along the sea coast, on a line pointed out by the Admiralty, and the embankment of this had much improved the character and the value of the salt marshes. The Lord Chancellor ultimately decided that the landward boundary between the property of the Crown and the subject was the medium line of all the tides occurring in the course of nature throughout the year. This definition, he thought, left matters much where they were before. He was aware that it had been entrusted to a civil engineer of great eminence to lay down that medium line; but Mr. Rendel having unfortunately since died without having determined the boundary; another person had been appointed to perform the duty, the suit was still lis pendens, and Mr. Lewis was debarred from the free exercise and control of his own property. Now, it appeared to him that the judgment did not at all satisfactorily conclude the question. Besides, was it in the competency of the Crown to lay down a line which should at all times be the line of demarcation between the Crown and the landed proprietor? That seemed a very doubtful point, and one on which the course pursued was contrary to the authorities, both ancient and modern, on this subject. In Scrutton v. Brown, Mr. Justice Bayley laid it down—

“That the Crown by a grant of the sea shore could convey not that which at the time of the grant is between the high and low water-marks, but that which from time to time shall be between the two termini. Where the grantee has a freehold in that which the Crown grants, his freehold shifts as the sea recedes or encroaches.”

But if the doctrine was to be laid down that the medium line of all the tides of the year was to be the boundary between the Crown and the proprietor, it set aside the doctrine of the possibility of gain to the proprietor by accretion. And if the Crown could dispose of that which lay between him and low-water mark, it was possible for it to interpose another proprietor between him and the sea, and thus do him very serious injury. To return, however, to the case of the petitioner. While the matter was still under adjournment, a notice, dated August, 1856, was served on the tenants of a farm of Mr. Lewis, three or four miles up the inlet, stating that slag and rubbish had been deposited on the foreshore belonging to the Crown, and asking them if they were willing to take a lease of the foreshore. Mr. Lewis said that his tenants were bound to do nothing contrary to his interests; that he himself could not, while the question between him and the Crown was pending, do anything to recognise those rights on its part which he disputed. The Crown replied that in that case they should take what steps they thought fit without regarding his interests. What he now complained of was in the first instance the great delay that had taken place, and the great uncertainty to which he was subjected as to the rights which he had exercised without contest for so long a time. And in the second place he complained that while he denied the right of the Crown altogether, and claimed a right himself by prescription, he was compelled—having no interest in this question—to fight on the part of the public as to how far the right of the Crown, when they had a right to the foreshore, should go, and where the medium line should be drawn. The case of the Llanelly Dock and Railway Company was even, he thought, still stronger than that of Mr. Lewis. That company was authorized by an Act of Parliament which received the sanction of the Crown in 1828, to form a railway and dock. They consequently formed a dock, and had taken and held lands, expended money, executed works, and carried on the railway in conjunction with the docks for thirty years; and it was at the end of that period they received notice from the Woods and Forests stating that they had taken for the construction of their railway land the property of the Crown, between high and low water mark, and they must enter into a composition with the Crown or take a lease of their own works. In reply the Directors expressed their surprise and stated that there was no ground for the claim made. Some time after this another letter was received from the Woods and Forests, which, while abandoning the claim first made, they stated that Mr. Rendel was then engaged in making a fresh map of the shore, and that when that was finished the Company would be again communicated with. Here, then, were the Woods and Forests first setting up one map and then telling the Company that if they did not compromise the matter they would be proceeded against, and at a subsequent period admitting that their map could not be relied upon, but that when another map was completed the claim would be renewed. He ventured to call their Lordships' attention to this case, because it was clear that if a period of sixty years' prescription was required for the security of the subject against the Crown, notwithstanding an Act of Parliament, there was no one dock or harbour which had been made for the last sixty years, under an Act, and which might have had an indefinite amount of money expended upon it, which might not be liable to be taken by the Crown. This claim, which was, he believed, entirely of a novel character, and utterly unknown to the law of England, affected not one individual, but the whole country, and proprietors of land all round the country. No one disputed that, within certain limits, the Crown had the dominion between high and low water mark—what he did not believe was, that the Crown had such a right as it could lease, sell, or make the means of profitable transactions by way of lease, or by forcing compositions. He believed that the right in the Crown was one to be exercised for the public interests, for the protection of public property, and to prevent the sea coast—the great highway of the country—being monopolized by individual proprietors, or the public being debarred from the use of it. A great authority who wrote in the time of Queen Elizabeth (Callis), said—"Rex habet proprietatem, sed populus habet usum ibidem necessarium." Mr. Justice Bayley laid down that—

"Primâ facie the Lord of the Manor is entitled up to high water-mark; but between high and low water-mark, the ordinary high and low water-mark, the right is primâ facie in the Crown. The right of the Crown is not in general for any beneficial interest to the Crown itself, but for securing to the public certain privileges in the spot between high and low water-mark; and if any nuisance is committed on that spot, then the Crown has the power of proceeding to rectify such nuisance."

Woolrych commenting on this, said:—

"If the King were to make the seashores of the realm a source of private sale and profit, he would, according to what is said before by the Judges, be acting contrary to the trusts for which the ownership of the shore was vested in the Crown by the common law."

And yet the Crown is now applying this right in dozens and hundreds of cases, not for the benefit but to the injury of the public, and to the aggrandisement of the Crown property by compelling the adjacent proprietors to pay a sum by way of compromise, or to accept a lease under the Crown, paying a sum for it. This seemed making such a use of the Crown property as, by the authority he had just quoted, was contrary to the common law. There were two cases to which he wished to call their Lordships' attention, as illustrating the restrictions which the law imposed upon the exercise of this power by the Crown. In the Attorney General v. Burridge, it was laid down "that the Crown could grant by letters patent all the land between high and low water-mark, but subject to the public right of passage, and that the restriction of such right was a nuisance, and a matter of fact to be inquired into." In the second case buildings had been erected by the corporation of Portsmouth, between high and low water-mark, which were ordered to be abated by a decree, inasmuch as they intercepted the flux and reflux of the tide, and it was held to be no defence that the buildings were placed there by grant of the Crown by charter to the corporation. No general order could be allowed to prevail against the public rights. Therefore, according to the law, the Crown was entitled to certain rights on this portion of the soil, but only for useful public purposes, and for the prevention of encroachments; but, beyond that, the Crown had no rights. There were involved in these petitions two important points—first, as to the nature and extent of the rights of the Crown, whether they were absolute possessory rights, or mere fiduciary rights, to be exercised in trust for the benefit and protection of the public; and next, the manner in which the rights of the Crown had in fact been exercised. He could not see, even setting aside prescription and all rights founded on enjoyment for periods of a shorter duration than sixty years, how it could be contended that those rights could be valid against the provisions and powers of an Act of Parliament, sanctioned by the Crown itself. If this principle were admitted no dock or harbour in the kingdom would be safe. It followed almost as a matter of course that almost every wet dock must be made on that part of the Crown lands between high and low water-mark. It is the natural place for a dock; and therefore, every dock constructed within the last sixty years, even under Act of Parliament, would be liable to be seized if it infringed on the alleged rights of the Crown between high and low water-mark. He thought this could not be sanctioned by Parliament. It was plain that the mode in which individuals were called on one after another to uphold a public principle was most vexatious. Every individual who now submitted to aggression, or compromised the claim, or took a lease, strengthened the case against his neighbour, and the Crown might thus gradually acquire against the subject powers that it was never intended it should possess. The second case not only set aside the rights of the subject—it went the further length, that for sixty years the provisions of an Act of Parliament should be no security. He thought these were subjects well worthy the attention the House and of the Government. The petitioners prayed the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the rights of the Crown, and the manner in which they had been exercised. He did not intend to press that upon their Lordships at present, but he did hope that the Government would take some steps to quiet the apprehensions that prevailed from one end of the kingdom to the other with respect to the new and unheard-of claims of the Crown; and that they would set at rest matters which appeared to be involved in some doubt. It should be declared distinctly by Act of Parliament what was between the Crown and the subject; what were the rights of the Crown to land between high and low water-mark; and what was the extent to which those rights should go.

The Earl of Derby

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that many years ago, the attention of the Government was called to the encroachments taking place on the coast of Carmarthenshire, on that portion of the soil comprised between high and low water-mark. The opinion of the law officers of the Crown was taken on the point in 1839. In 1845 an information was filed against the petitioner and others, to assert the right of the Crown, and so matters continued for some time, until the verdict was found for the Crown against Lord Cawdor. Some of the persons against whom informations had been filed took leases from the Crown for the land they had occupied between high and low water-mark. And in 1855 the question between the Crown and Mr. Lewis was referred to Mr. Rendel, to decide as to what should be the high and the low water-mark on the property of that gentleman, according to the principle of the decision of the Lord Chancellor, Mr. Justice Maule, and Mr. Baron Alderson, that that line should be the medium of the tides of the whole year. The carrying out of this arrangement had been interrupted by the death of Mr. Rendel; but, in May last, Mr. Bidder—who had been named by Mr. Lewis as the person he wished to have as arbitrator—was named as his successor. The present position of the matter was this:—that Mr. Lewis did not deny the right of the Crown; on the contrary, he acquiesced in it, because the verdict in the case of Lord Cawdor, which involved the same question, was not appealed against. He had accepted an arbitration, not to decide on the rights of the Crown, but within what limits the Crown should exercise those rights.

THE EARL OF DERBY: That agreement was without prejudice to the right by prescription.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, the verdict to which he had referred was not subject to any exception, and had not been appealed against. Although a railway might be carried over a portion of the shore, the rights of the Crown remained the same as they were before. Therefore, as far as Mr. Lewis was concerned, there could be no ground whatever of complaint. The Government had never treated the party with harshness in seeking to enforce the claims of the Crown. As to the Llanelly Docks, although twenty years might have passed by, the rights of the Crown were not thereby given up. Surely it was the duty of the parties constructing the docks to ascertain, before doing so, that the title to the ground was a good one. He thought that the noble Earl opposite would be the last person to allow the opposite doctrine to prevail. The noble Earl said that there was no beneficial interest in the Crown. Now, how would the noble Earl like to have such an argument turned against his own claims to a portion of the shore near Liverpool. The right of the noble Earl to the foreshore was a grant from the Crown, and, of course, the Crown could give to the noble Earl, or to his ancestors, no rights that it did not itself possess. If, then, the Crown had no beneficial interest in the foreshore, the noble Earl could have no beneficial interest in the foreshore of Liverpool. If the claim of the Crown be unjust, and if it ought to be upset, he hoped that the noble Earl would be prepared to return the very considerable sum he had received from the Birkenhead Dock Company. The legal question he would leave to those who were more qualified than himself to speak upon it; but, after what he had said, he trusted that their Lordships did not suppose that those claims of the Crown were unfounded, or that the Government had used any harshness in enforcing them. The Government would have abandoned their duty if they did not enforce them.

LORD WYNFORD said, that it might be recollected that, last Session, he warned certain Scotch proprietors not to attempt to improve the docks and ports of Scotland before they had satisfied themselves that no demand of this kind could be made on them by the Crown. He had then in his eye, not only the subject matter of these petitions, but a number of other cases in which the department of Woods and Forests had cruelly pressed on proprietors, and there were numbers of instances in which the proprietors of land on the sea-shore, and on the banks of navigable rivers, were not able to deal with their property in consequence of the vexatious course taken by the Woods and Forests. He would not go further into the matter, but would merely say that he was surprised to hear the noble Lord say that a verdict had been given for the Crown in one case, when, in point of fact, the case was settled by a compromise. He was also surprised to hear that Mr. Lewis had submitted his claim to arbitration since Mr. Rendel's death; for it was stated in the petition presented that day, that no other arbitrator had been appointed. The property in question, to his knowledge, lay far above high-water mark.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the doctrine laid down that evening was rather startling; for the noble Earl, setting out on the assumption that the Crown had the right to the disputed shore, said that the question was whether it had been properly asserted; and he gave, as one reason why the right should not be asserted, that the Crown held the shore, not for its own benefit, but for the use of the public. It seemed strange to say that the Crown, which held the land for the use of the public, should not assert its right: for the more strenuously it asserted it, the more it would seek to preserve the land for the use of the public. If the Crown allowed property of this kind to be encroached on year after year, and did not claim it for the use of the public, the Crown deserted its duty, and, in fact, gave up what belonged to the public to the neighbouring proprietors. The noble Earl said that the assertion of these rights was inconsistent with the making of docks, and of those in this case especially; but, if the dock company had a title which was good against the Crown, why was it not set up in answer to the information? When he (the Lord Chancellor) was one of the law officers of the Crown, he, in conjunction with his noble Friend the Lord Chief Justice (then Attorney General), was consulted with regard to the rights of the Crown with respect to this question, and they gave what, of course, they considered a sound and correct opinion, which, however, was not acted on until the Government of Sir Robert Peel, when Sir Wm. Follett gave directions to have informations filed. What the cause of the delay was he did not know, but the trial did not come on for several years afterwards; but at length it was decided that the Crown had the right to the littus maris. The matter came before him (the Lord Chancellor) by way of appeal, to decide what the littus maris was. The civil law carried the doctrine very much further than was ever recognised by the law of England; and, the matter being one involving a question of common law, he obtained the assistance of Mr. Justice Maule and

Lord Wynford

Mr. Baron Alderson, who heard the case with him. It was most elaborately argued, and they came to the conclusion that the rights of the Crown were bounded by the middle line between the highest and lowest point to which the spring-tides reached. Then came the point, how was that line to be drawn? The matter came before him by petition, and it was arranged, with the consent of both parties, that an engineer should be named, who, with the decision of the court in his hand, should draw the required line; and Mr. Rendel was selected. If Mr. Rendel had been guilty of any delay, it was Mr. Lewis's fault, for not forcing him on; but no complaint was made of his proceedings. When Mr. Rendel died, it was necessary to appoint another arbitrator, and Mr. Bidder was appointed. With regard to Mr. Bidder's having been appointed with Mr. Lewis's approbation, he had in his hand a letter from Mr. Lewis's solicitor, in which he stated that he was willing to accept Mr. Bidder's arbitration. What had been the cause of the delay, he (the Lord Chancellor) did not know; but the matter stood thus:—that the Crown, on its own part, or rather on the part of the public, had asserted certain rights, in which it had been successful.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH said, that as regarded the proceedings of the Woods and Forests, there were many complaints of the vexatious manner in which this part of the business of the department was conducted. He knew of a case in which a disputed right of this kind had been suspended over a proprietor and his father for years and years, and no decision had been come to. It would be a desirable thing for the public, if the Woods and Forests were compelled to bring these matters to a speedy trial.

LORD CAMPBELL was understood to protest against the doctrine which had been laid down, and which was calculated to produce uncertainty where none existed, with regard to the rights of the Crown, which was unquestionably entitled to the soil of the sea-shore between high and low water-mark.

LORD BROUGHAM said, there was no doubt about the law; but there ought to be some limit between the rigorous and the capricious exercise of these rights of the Crown. This was not, however, a subject for legislation, as the rights of the Crown were undeniable; but the Crown could only deal with them so as to benefit the public.

LORD WENSLEYDALE agreed with his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack and his noble and learned Friend (Lord Brougham) that it would be entirely useless to legislate on this subject, as the law was perfectly clear. The sea-shore belonged to the Crown for the benefit of the public; but there was a difficulty in interpreting what was the foreshore, and the question came before the Lord Chancellor, who, with the assistance of two of the common law Judges, had laid down the proper line. There could be no doubt that the sea-shore was held by the Crown for the benefit of its subjects, and the Crown had a right to grant the land to any one it pleased, provided that the grant was not inconsistent with its rights.

Petitions read, and ordered to lie on the table.

House adjourned at Seven o'clock,
till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, July 6, 1857.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1<sup>o</sup> Militia Ballots Suspension; Metropolitan Police Stations, &c.; Insurance Companies; Mutual Companies.
2<sup>o</sup> Land Tax Commissioners' Names; Smoke Nuisance (Scotland) Abatement.

CAMBRIDGE BOROUGH ELECTION.

REPORT.

House informed, that the Committee had determined,—

That Andrew Stewart, Esquire, is duly elected a Burgess to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Cambridge.

And the said Determination was ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

ST. JOHN'S, CHESTER—QUESTION.

MR. SALISBURY said, he wished to ask the right hon. the Secretary of State for the Home Department if an Order in Council has been issued to close the graveyard attached to St. John's Church, in the city of Chester; the date of such order, and if the same has been enforced?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, such an Order had been issued, and he had no reason to believe that it would be modified.

RIVER DEE—QUESTION.

MR. SALISBURY said, he would now beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he will lay on the table of the House copies of all correspondence which has passed between the Admiralty, the authorities of the city of Chester, and other parties in the counties of Chester and Flint, since 1840, respecting the state of the river Dee?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he had no objection to lay on the table such parts of the correspondence as the hon. Member desired. That correspondence, however, had gone on for the last sixteen years, and it was undesirable to entail upon the country the cost of printing the whole of it.

CASTLE DITCH, CHESTER—QUESTION.

MR. SALISBURY said, he would also ask the hon. Under Secretary for War if a plot of land under lease from the principal officers of Her Majesty's Ordnance to Mr. James Martin, dated July 3, 1851, and known as "The Castle Ditch," in the city of Chester, is required by the authorities for building purposes, and the nature of the erections proposed to be put on such land.

SIR JOHN RAMSDEN said, there was no present intention on the part of the authorities to take a plot of land known as "The Castle Ditch," Chester, for building purposes.

STATUE OF RICHARD CŒUR DE LION. QUESTION.

MR. HANKEY said, he wished to ask the right hon. the Chief Commissioner of Works whether any decision has yet been made as to the spot where the statue of Richard Cœur de Lion, by Baron Marochetti, purchased by subscription, and presented to the nation in 1856, is to be erected.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, no decision had yet been arrived at, as to the exact spot where the statue should be placed; but Carlton Gardens had been suggested.

PETTY SESSIONS (IRELAND)—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE FORSTER said, he would beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether the Treasury has come to any decision as to the unappropriated annual balance of fines and penalties (Ireland) being applied in future in aid of salaries for petty sessions clerks; and if so, whether he is prepared to bring in a Bill this Session to provide for payment of petty sessions clerks by salary in place of fees, as at present?

MR. H. A. HERBERT said, it was his intention to bring in a Bill in, he hoped, a very few days, to provide for the payment of petty sessions clerks by salary in lieu of fees, and also that a Bill was in course of preparation for applying the unappropriated annual balance of fines and penalties (Ireland) in aid of such salaries.

THE "ONEIDA"—QUESTION.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, in reference to the statement of the First Lord of the Admiralty that the steamer Oneida had been condemned by the Government surveyor, under what circumstances the said vessel was employed in the conveyance of Her Majesty's mails from this country and Australia, notwithstanding such Report; and whether it be a fact that he has offered to the Royal West India Mail Company to extend for two years beyond the time now prescribed the subsidy of £270,000, which they already receive from Government, provided they consent to amalgamate with the European and Australian Mail Company, the owners of the said steamer Oneida, and undertake the Australian mail contract.

MR. WILSON, in reply, said, the Oneida was not employed for the purpose of conveying the regular mail to Australia. It no doubt carried a mail, but that mail was an ordinary transit one, which any other vessel might have carried. The circumstances to which his hon. Friend alluded were these:—The Oneida was one of the vessels offered by the European and Australian Company for the purpose of performing their contract. According to the rule of the Government, she was surveyed by the Admiralty surveyor at Southampton before she left this country. That survey took place on the 18th of October in last year, and the Oneida sailed on the 19th. On the 20th, the day afterwards, the surveyor reported to the Admiralty, and on the 21st the Admiralty made a Report to the Treasury; but of course it was then impossible to prevent the departure of the steamer. An intimation was, however, immediately made to the company that the Oneida would not be accepted under their contract for the performance of the service. Before she returned, as was known, the Oneida broke down; but, he must repeat, she had not been accepted by the Government. With reference to the other portion of the question, it had been already suggested to him that an arrangement, such as that stated by his hon. Friend, might be carried out; but the Government had come to no conclusion upon the matter, nor had a formal proposition been made on the subject. When such a proposal was submitted, it would, of course, be considered with a due regard to the interest of the public.

Sir George Forster

THE KRUGER COLLECTION—QUESTION.

MR. STIRLING said, he would beg to inquire of the hon. Secretary to the Treasury the name of the artist or amateur upon whose recommendation the collection of pictures formed by Herr Krüger were purchased for the National Gallery; and whether the purchase was effected with the knowledge and advice of the trustees of the National Gallery?

MR. WILSON said, that the purchase to which the hon. Gentleman had alluded had been made a few years ago, when, in point of fact, the trustees of the National Gallery were in a state of transition. It took place immediately after a Report from a Committee of the House of Commons, which practically put an end to the old constitution of the Board of Trustees, and before the new constitution was established. The purchase had not been made with the advice or even with the cognizance of the trustees as a body, but under the immediate advice, he believed, of Mr. Dyce. Sir Charles Eastlake saw one of the pictures which was sent home, but he was in no way responsible for the purchase either of that picture or of the collection; neither were the trustees of the National Gallery.

GUANO—QUESTION.

MR. BAXTER said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty why no vessel of war proceeded to Bird Island, in the Pacific, before December, 1856, although, as it appears from the printed papers, Mr. Miller, Her Majesty's Consul at Woahoo, had made known to the commanders of all Her Majesty's ships that touched at that port since August, 1854, and also to the Commander in Chief of Her Majesty's Naval Forces in the Pacific, the purport of Mr. Hammond's circular despatch of May, 1854, directing diligent search to be made for deposits of guano; and whether Bird Island has since been taken possession of by the United States?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that he could give no precise information upon the subject beyond that which was contained in the papers already before the House. He had no doubt, however, that the reason why no vessel had been sent to Bird Island was attributable to the demand upon our naval resources during the war.

PROPERTY-TAX AND POPULATION RETURNS.

RETURNS MOVED FOR.

MR. DISRAELI said, he rose to move an Address to the Crown for—

"Returns of the annual value of all Real Property rated under Schedule (A) of the Income Tax, for the year ended the 5th day of January, 1857, in each County or Parliamentary Division of a County in the United Kingdom, exclusive of the Real Property in each Parliamentary Borough, comprised within each such County or Division:

"Of the annual value of all Real Property, rated under Schedule (A) of the Income Tax, for the year ended the 5th day of April, 1857, in each Parliamentary Borough in each such County:

"Of the Population of each County or Parliamentary Division of a County, from the Census of 1851, not including the Population within any Parliamentary Borough in such County:

"And of the Population of each Parliamentary Borough within each County."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that it had not been the practice to grant Returns of this sort, on the ground that it was not considered desirable to divulge their contents. He had, however, no objection to make the present Return, inasmuch as it exclusively related to Schedule A; but if a similar Return should be moved for with respect to Schedule D, the Government would not consider themselves bound to agree to it.

MR. DISRAELI said, that the Returns for which he had moved related to real property, and bore upon the question of the franchise. He had no intention to move for similar Returns under Schedule D.

Motion agreed to.

NEW WRITS—MOTION.

SIR GEORGE GREY said that, in the absence of Viscount PALMERSTON, he rose to move the following Resolution:—

"That in all cases when the seat of any Member has been declared void by an Election Committee, on the ground of Bribery or Treating, no Motion for the issuing of a New Writ shall be made without two days' previous notice being given in the Votes."

He felt the full force of the observations which had been made by the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) on Friday last, and he thought, under the circumstances, that two days' notice, as now proposed, would be preferable to seven days' notice, as originally intended. Two days' notice would prevent surprise in moving for a new writ, while it would not have the effect referred to by the right hon. Gentleman, of practically disfranchising a constituency during the whole of a Session or recess.

MR. DISRAELI said, that it appeared to him that the Resolution, as now worded, was a just and expedient arrangement.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he was not at all surprised that the right hon. Gentleman opposite should cheerfully accede to the Motion proposed by the Government. On Friday he (Mr. T. Duncombe) had felt it his duty to propose the revival of a Resolution which was tantamount to a Standing Order of the last Parliament, it having been passed at the commencement of that Parliament at the instance of the noble Lord the Member for the City of London. He was sorry not to see the noble Lord now in his place, and indeed he thought the House ought not to dispose of this Resolution in the noble Lord's absence. It might be postponed for a week without any inconvenience. He protested against the course adopted by the Government, and thought it would be much better to adopt the Resolution in its original form, which required seven days' notice to be given of the Motion for the issue of a writ where a Member was unseated for bribery or corruption, and thus gave greater weight and solemnity to the proceeding. He had handed over his Resolution to the Government with the view of its being again proposed, certainly not with any expectation or belief that the Government was about to mutilate, and cripple, and fritter away that valuable Resolution in the way now proposed. The modification was proposed in consequence of something that had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman opposite, namely, that six weeks might elapse from the Report of a Committee to the issuing of the writ, in consequence of the evidence not being printed on which the House had to form an opinion. The seven days' notice was originally agreed on in order that the House might have the opportunity of judging whether the writ ought to be suspended at all. It should be remembered that now the evidence taken before Committees was always printed from day to day; and he had ascertained that in a case of this kind, after a Committee had sat six or seven days, or even a fortnight, the evidence of each day being ready in type, and merely requiring to be put together, three days longer would be quite sufficient for it to be printed for the use of the House generally. Therefore the objection that a month or six weeks might elapse, did not at all apply. The object of the Resolution of the last Parliament, passed in 1852, was to enable the House to ascertain whether it was necessary that a Commission should be issued on a joint address of both Houses to the Crown, under Lord John Russell's Act, to inquire on the spot into acts of bribery and corruption. In the previous Parliament, commencing in 1848, it was only necessary to give notice of a Motion for the issue of a writ, no time being specified. The greatest inconvenience arose from this. The question of issuing a writ was a question of privilege. An hon. Member had nothing to do but give notice that he would move the issue of a certain writ, if it had only been suspended for a day. It was not at all settled at what hour such a Motion should come on. The mover might bring it on at any hour of the night; he might take advantage of the absence of those who were expected to oppose it, or might bring it on the next night. It was in consequence of that, that the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, in the following Parliament, amended the Resolution by requiring seven days' notice; and the House agreed to it. That Resolution had worked well all through that Parliament. The writs for five places were suspended in consequence, and Commissions of Inquiry were issued upon the evidence laid before the House. He hoped the House would not consent to fritter away that valuable Resolution in the absence of the noble Lord. [Cries of "Order!"] He thought he was not out of order. He should move, as an Amendment, the original terms of the Order of last Parliament, namely, that seven days' notice should be given, instead of two, as was now proposed. He would only say that if this proposal was a specimen of the noble Lord's promised Reform Bill, it was a very bad omen for the future. He begged to move, as an Amendment, that seven days' notice should be given of any Motion for the issue of a writ.

Mr. T. Duncombe

Amendment proposed, "To leave out the word 'two' in order to insert the word 'seven' instead thereof."

MR. MILES said, it was not the case on Election Committees that the evidence was printed from day to day, though this was done on other Committees. Consequently there would be great difficulty in having the whole of the evidence struck off in a short time. But the real fact was, that any delay in the issue of a writ was only necessary to give sufficient time to enable the hon. Members who had sat on the Committee to be in the House, as on the statement of their opinions, and more particularly that of the Chairman, who always took voluminous notes, the House would be in a condition to settle whether, after the expiration of two days, the writ should issue. It would be in the option of the House, after that delay had taken place, either to delay the writ further, or to order it to issue. Of course, if it should appear to the House from the statement of the Chairman of a Committee that considerable bribery had taken place in any constituency, the House would exercise a sound discretion in delaying the issue of the writ until the whole of the evidence was before them. This it could do in two days, as well as if it were delayed for seven. He was decidedly in favour of the shorter time.

MR. DIVETT said, that as far as his experience had gone, he was decidedly in favour of the Amendment. He did not think that two days was by any means sufficient. He could not at all understand how this compromise had taken place between the Government and the right hon. Gentleman opposite. A feature had arisen at the last election which called for the very serious attention of the House; he meant the number of cases where extensive bribery was proved to have been committed, but without compromising hon. Members or their agents. It was incumbent upon the House, if it meant to put down bribery, to order a prosecution in every case of that sort. It would be a perfect disgrace if these Reports were allowed to pass without steps being taken by the House to secure a prosecution in every case where bribery was proved to have taken place, but without the cognizance of the Member or his agents, though of course hon. Members should not be held responsible for acts of which they were innocent. Unless this were done, it was a perfect farce to talk of putting down bribery or treating.

MR. HENLEY observed, that he thought the Government had come to a very fair decision. A very well-grounded jealousy had been expressed against the undue delay of a writ. As to prosecuting parties against whom bribery had been proved, the issuing of the writ had nothing to do with that. Of course no one would think of taking the step of moving that a prosecution for bribery should be instituted until they had the opportunity of reading the evidence. He thought two days would be quite long enough for the purpose proposed. It was no hardship to a constituency to have their writ delayed two days; but he thought a delay of seven days was unreasonable.

MR. SOTHERON-ESTCOURT said, the seven days' notice had been a Standing Order of the House for the last five years; it had fully and completely carried out its object, and it would be very unwise in the House to depart from the precedent without sufficient reason. In 1848 a Resolution was come to that no writ should be moved for without notice, no time being specified. In 1852, when many cases of bribery were reported, it was thought desirable to fix the notice at seven days. A Resolution to that effect was drawn up by Lord John Russell, and he had the honour of proposing it. He believed that it had never operated in any way disadvantageously, either to the House or the parties interested. For his own part, he could not understand why the Government should propose a notice of two days rather than three or any other number, and he thought the House would do wisely in adhering to that course which had been sanctioned by experience.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, it was a mistake to suppose that there had ever been a Standing Order on the subject; the Resolution in both cases was merely passed as a Sessional Order. The reason why two days was fixed on was that the writ might issue at the earliest possible period, provided, in the opinion of the House, there was no reason for delaying it further. As the House met at twelve o'clock on Wednesdays, it was necessary to require two days' notice, otherwise a writ might be moved on Wednesday morning, upon notice given late on the preceding night.

Question put, "That the word 'two' stand part of the Question."

The House divided :—Ayes 190; Noes 138: Majority 52.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

PROBATES AND LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION BILL—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. MALINS said, that he would repeat the statement he had made on the second reading, that he was not about to offer any opposition to the Bill, seeing that it was in accordance with the Report of the Chancery Commissioners. On the contrary, he should support it on one understanding—that was, that compensation should be made to those whose prospects in life would be ruined by the Bill, namely, the proctors. He should not, therefore, offer any opposition to the Speaker leaving the Chair; but he, and those acting with him, did so with the full understanding, that if the Government did not assent to the introduction of such clause as would effect the object he had in view, every opposition would be offered ultimately to the progress of the Bill.

MR. HADFIELD said, that he must deprecate the opposition of the proctors as unfair. The admission of the principle of compensation would involve an enormous sum, with the certainty, as far as could be ascertained, that the business of the parties would be immensely increased by the new Act. He protested, therefore, against the principle of compensation to a class of monopolists, who prevented justice being done to the country.

MR. W. N. HODGSON said, that he did not rise for the purpose of opposing the House going into Committee on this Bill, but to put a question to the Attorney General in connexion with the new system it was about to establish, for he doubted whether the present Bill would effect any improvements in the existing practice in reference to probates and letters of administration. That point could only be determined by a knowledge of the scale of fees which it was proposed to levy in the new district courts. He thought, therefore, that the House was entitled to the fullest possible information on the subject of those fees before going any further with the Bill, that it might be seen whether it would have the effect of making the probate of wills cheaper than formerly. Judging from what he had seen of the Bill, he was of opinion that, unless very material alterations were made in Committee, the proving of wills would not only be dearer than at present, but also less expeditious. Of late years there had been a feeling generally prevalent in favour of law being made as cheap and accessible as possible, and that feeling had been to some extent recognised both by that and the other House of Parliament; but that course had not been adopted in the present measure; for he doubted, if the measure passed into law, whether any economy would be found to result from it. For himself, he thought the present system was in the main much better adapted for the proving of wills than the Court of Probate about to be established. He should have thought the best course would have been to put an end to all the minor courts, and to establish a court in each diocese, with the power of proving wills to any amount. By this Bill, as it stood, an executor could only prove to the extent of £1,500 in any of the diocesan courts, so that where the estate was above that amount, probate would have to be taken out in London, which would be much less convenient than the proving a will in the diocese in which the testator died. He objected also to the proposed transfer of the contentious jurisdiction relating to wills to the Judges of the County Courts. He thought that a most objectionable clause, because the Judges had not been appointed to their present offices in consideration of their attainments in ecclesiastical, but of their attainments in common law; and why this new power should be given to them he was at a loss to conceive. He hoped, therefore, that clause would be modified in Committee. His opinion was, that where they had had a proper Judge of the diocesan courts in the country, very little, if any, complaint had been made against the present system of proving wills; and that the great odium which had been brought upon that system, arose from the enormous sinecures which had long existed in the London courts; but he did not think the present Bill would provide any remedy for this defect, or save any money to the country. He trusted that the hon. Gentleman the Attorney General would favour the House with the amount which the establishment of the new courts would cost the country, and the amount of fees which suitors would have to pay.

Mr. W. N. Hodgson

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, the House was going into Committee without any information whatever on the most material point of this important Bill. He (Sir H. Willoughby) had brought the question of compensation before the Attorney General on a former occasion, and the hon. Gentleman had stated that the House should have sufficient information on the subject. That information had not, however, been furnished. He (Sir H. Willoughby) wished, therefore, to know how many officers of the present courts were to receive compensation for their offices under the Bill? and how many Judges there were to be, and what was to be the cost? The enormous amount of compensation in this country exceeded the whole cost of the administration of the law in any country in the world. There were also twenty-one clauses in the Bill in red ink, and he should wish to know what was the meaning of that. He thought that the House of Commons, and not Her Majesty's Treasury, ought to settle the principle on which compensation should be granted, and that some information should be given on that point before going into Committee.

COLONEL SMYTH said, he begged to support what had fallen from the hon. Baronet (Sir H. Willoughby). He (Mr. Smyth) admitted the necessity of legislation on this subject; but unless the House received a pledge that the proctors were to receive a sufficient compensation, he thought that they would be justified in not allowing the Speaker to leave the Chair.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that whilst he recognised the strong feeling which existed in many quarters in favour of compensation for the proctors, he must observe that on the present occasion two or three hon. Gentlemen had spoken demanding additional compensation for this body, whilst another hon. Gentleman had deprecated any compensation whatever. Every description of compensation had been offered, and each scheme would far better be discussed in Committee. Any statement on his part would only lead to a desultory conversation. It was, then, not from want of courtesy, but merely to prevent a waste of time in a general discussion of the question of compensation, that he asked hon. Gentlemen to allow the Bill to pass into Committee on the general promise that, when they came to the particular clause of the Bill, the subject should receive the fullest consideration.

House in Committee.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2.

MR. COLLIER said, he rose to move to substitute in page 2, line 11, the words "Office of Probate" for "Court of Probate," with a view to further Amendments, the effect of which would be to give all the contentious business to the Superior Courts of Common Law. The business of the Ecclesiastical Courts was of two kinds—the common form and the contentious. The common form consisted of proof of wills with respect to which there was no dispute, and, as had been stated by the Lord Chancellor, might more properly be disposed of by a registrar than by a Judge. The contentious business included all the cases in which wills were disputed. The main questions arising in those cases were, whether the testator was sane, whether he was fit to make a will, whether he was under undue influence, was fraud practised, or was the will a forgery? This Bill did not give the determination of those questions to the new court, but provided that the new court should send them to the Superior Courts of Common Law. The Bill proposed to send a case before Court A, which was to send it to Court B, which Court B was to send it back to Court A. This principle he (Mr. Collier) contended was altogether a vicious one. To the question, what, then, would the new Judge have to do, the Lord Chancellor had supplied the answer—next to nothing. What he (Mr. Collier) proposed was, that as the common law courts were to have nine-tenths of the contentious business, they should also have the remaining tenth, and that consequently the whole of the contentious business should be transferred to the courts of common law, and that the non-contentious business should be done by a registrar under the direction of those courts. He would give the courts of common law powers to make orders, to frame issues, to cite parties, and to make persons parties to an issue, so that all questions in dispute might be settled. No one would deny that this was the cheapest plan, as it would save a court, and it was the simplest plan, because it did away with a jurisdiction by transferring the business to the ordinary tribunals of the country, as had been done in Scotland. There seemed to him to be only two objections—that the Judges of the Superior Courts of Common Law had not time to exercise this jurisdiction, and that they were not competent to do it. As to the first, the County Courts had greatly relieved the common law courts of business. On the Western Circuit the cause list used to contain upwards of 500 causes. Latterly it had not contained above fifty. Owing to the Common Law Procedure Act the number of rules granted by the Superior Courts in the course of a year, from being upwards of 30,000, had become less than 3,000. That showed the House the extent to which the business of the courts of common law had been affected by the County Courts and the simplification of procedure. Moreover, a Commission was now sitting for the purpose of inquiring whether the number of the common law Judges might not be diminished with benefit to the public. Under these circumstances it seemed difficult to contend that the Superior Courts of Common Law had not time to do the business which he proposed to transfer to them. The next question was, were they competent to it? Several of the common law Judges had from time to time been members of the Judicial Committee of Privy Council, which sat as a court of appeal from the Ecclesiastical Courts, and he had never heard it alleged that those Judges were incompetent to perform that portion of their duties. It seemed to him that there were only two alternatives before the Committee. They must either have no new court at all, or have an efficient one. The Bill proposed to establish an inefficient court. He would therefore submit his Amendment to the Committee transferring the business to the courts of common law; and if not successful in effecting that object, he would then endeavour to make the new court as efficient as possible, by proposing that it should have the power of summoning a jury, and not be compelled to send the issues which arose in the cases that came before it to another court to be tried.

MR. ATHERTON said, he hoped that his hon. and learned Friend would not proceed with the series of Amendments which he had propounded to the Committee. If his hon. and learned Friend had any hope of accomplishing the object which he had in view, he ought to have taken an opportunity of opposing the second reading of the Bill. The foundation upon which the measure rested was the establishment of a Court of Probate, presided over by a Judge. His hon. and learned Friend wished to dispense with the court and Judge, and to substitute a registrar and an office. So sweeping an alteration ought not to be proposed by way of amendment in Committee. He thought that his hon. and learned Friend underrated the amount of business which would have to be transacted by the new tribunal. At the same time he admitted that there might be ground for complaint upon that score; but his hon. and learned Friend had himself pointed out the appropriate remedy—to give the new Judge more to do. It would be a pity to constitute a Court of Probate, the Judge of which should be a mere transmitter of issues to the other courts; but he had some reason for believing that the Attorney General would, at the proper time, when they came to the 32nd clause, assent to a proposition to the effect that the Judge of the Court of Probate, instead of being compelled to send for trial in the courts of common law all issues of fact arising before him, should have the power himself to dispose of them. An additional amount of business might be thrown upon the new Judge by intrusting to him the duty of hearing and disposing of Motions for new trials. The Bill was not the best that could be desired, but it was a great improvement upon the existing law, and as such he would give it his support. He hoped, however, that it would contain some provision for compensation to those who were likely to be affected by it.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that as it was his misfortune to be unavoidably absent when the Bill was read a second time, he wished to take the present opportunity of making a few observations upon some of the principal points involved in the measure. He cordially and entirely approved most of the provisions of the Bill. Last Session he had the honour to submit to the House a measure which embraced, with few, small, and partial exceptions, the main improvements for which they were now indebted to the Government. They were all agreed in accepting that provision of the present Bill which at once and for ever put an end to the testamentary jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts. As the entire common form business was to be committed to the charge of local officers of long standing, and both the proving a will and granting of letters of administration were to be under the control of one court, he did not anticipate that the fees would be excessive; on the contrary, he thought they would be less than hitherto. He entirely approved all those clauses of the Bill, with some slight modifications, which gave the local business to the local registrars. Among the many other inestimable provisions of the Bill this stood pre-eminent, that officers who must have been entitled on every principle of justice to large compensation for loss of office, might be continued in office, and if they were they would, of course, not be entitled to any compensation. That part of the Bill which would give to the proposed court jurisdiction over real as well as personal estate with regard to the proving of wills was a great improvement, and would go far to remedy the grievance of which his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier) had complained, because it would certainly prevent the Judge from having scarcely any business to transact. The Judges of the Courts at Westminster Hall were undoubtedly the best qualified Judges in the land to administer the law under this Bill, and if the Government were prepared to inform the House that those eminent personages had sufficient leisure time to undertake that task, he should most willingly vote for the proposition of his hon. and learned Friend. But so far as he had communicated with the Judges, he must say that it was extremely doubtful whether their labours at Nisi Prius were not so great as to preclude the possibility of their undertaking any additional business. For several days there had been no less than six Nisi Prius Courts sitting in the metropolis, each court sitting several hours a day. If, however, the Government were satisfied that, without prejudice to their other duties the common law Judges could dispose of the business of the Probate Court, the expense of the new court might be saved. With respect to what had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Durham (Mr. Atherton), he had to remark, that if the contentious business was to be transferred to a common law court, it became important to consider how the business was to be conducted, and what jurisdiction was to be conferred on the new court. He had heard with great satisfaction what had fallen from the hon. and learned Member. The suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier) so nearly resembled the plan which he had himself ventured to propose in his Bill of last year, that he trusted the Government would adopt it. It was stated by the Lord Chancellor, and by his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, that the main object of the Bill was this—that the business of the court should be carried on and justice administered there upon common law principles. He felt bound, however, to point out that this could never be the case until the Bill was materially amended. In the first place, the fifth clause enacted that the Judge of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury should be the first Judge of the new tribunal. Now, he submitted that it was somewhat unusual to impose upon Parliament the responsibility of appointing the Judges; he apprehended that it was for the Ministers of the Crown to advise Her Majesty who should preside in Her Majesty's courts. He should therefore suggest the omission of this part of the clause, leaving the hands of the Government entirely free as to whom they might think fit to appoint. He should likewise suggest an Amendment upon another clause relating to the Judge. It was proposed that until the union of the Admiralty with the testamentary jurisdiction took place the Judge should receive a salary of £4,000 a year only, whereas the permanent and final salary was to be £5,000. Now, as it was essentially necessary that the Judge of this new court should be at least upon an equality in point of station, experience, learning, and ability with the Vice Chancellors and the Puisne Judges of the courts of common law, he saw no reason why he should not also receive the same salary. With regard to the rules and regulations for the conduct of business in the new court, the only further change necessary was that to which both his hon. and learned Friends who had just spoken had referred, and which would make this Bill exactly conformable to the measure introduced by him in the last Session. The duty of transacting the whole business of this court ought to be imposed upon the Judge. If he were competent—and no doubt he would be—there was no reason why he should be a mere minister in the office held by him, and should send issues to be tried by other courts; he ought to be enabled to try cases in the same way as other Judges in Westminster Hall. The result would then be, that while the common form business was left in other hands, and those best qualified for it, the contentious business of the country, with the exception of that portion of it intrusted to the County Courts, would be tried by the new tribunal in London, which would decide on all questions of law and of fact, with the aid of other Judges who might be called upon to render assistance. With the single exception of issues to be tried at the assizes, which he would have the same right to direct as the Vice Chancellor, the new Judge would thus have jurisdiction to determine all causes relating to wills in his own court. It had been observed that the new tribunal would have too little to do, at all events until the Admiralty was united with the testamentary jurisdiction. He had already suggested—and he doubted not that the suggestion would be adopted by the Government—the introduction of a clause enabling the Judge of this court, in case Her Majesty required his services, to sit as a member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. If, therefore, it should happen—though he apprehended no such thing—that at certain periods of the year the Judge should have too little to do, he would then be enabled to render assistance in the administration of justice upon the Judicial Committee, which sat, he believed, for some fifty or sixty days in the year, and would then have ample occupation. Under all the circumstances of the case, he hoped his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth would not deem it necessary upon that occasion to press his Amendment to a division.

Mr. Atherton

Mr. MALINS said, he should oppose the Amendment. His hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Collier) proposed to send all contentious business to courts of common law, leaving a registrar to deal with common forms. That Amendment raised a very important point, and he was surprised that his hon. and learned Friend had sat down without attempting to show how it was to be carried into effect. There were 25,000 wills and administrations in England every year, or nearly eighty a day. How, he asked, was that mass of business to be got through a court of common law? This Bill was mainly founded upon the Report of the Chancery Commissioners. And he (Mr. Malins) would remind the Committee, that they stated in their Report that the probates of wills and granting administrations were not mere subjects of registration; that they often involved delicate points, the neglect of which would be very prejudicial to the public interest; and they refused to recommend the transfer of this business to the Court of Chancery or to any court generally occupied by other matters, believing that it should be transacted by no court in which testamentary jurisdiction was not the primary occupation of the Judge. They also stated, that they carefully considered the question, but were of opinion that the machinery of the courts of common law was not adapted to the transaction of the testamentary jurisdiction of the country. Out of the 25,000 probates of administration taken out every year, there were not upon the average more than 100 contentious cases. How, then, were they to deal with the enormous quantity of common form business? His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier) said, "by means of a registrar;" but the Commissioners stated in their Report, that it was of the highest importance that the common form business should be controlled by a Judge eminently qualified by his knowledge of that branch of the business to decide, and to decide immediately, all questions which might arise. He apprehended that the Committee would be of opinion that the Report of the Commissioners ought to be adhered to, and that it would be out of the question to refer this business to the courts of common law. The question arose, however, whether it would not be better to give the Judge of the testamentary court the power of summoning a jury over which he might preside, instead of sending the contentious business to be tried by the common law courts, and this he thought was a question which deserved consideration. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Suffolk (Sir F. Kelly) had suggested that there would be a great increase of business in consequence of the court having jurisdiction over wills of real estate, which the Court of Probate had not hitherto had to deal with. It was very seldom indeed, however, that men made more than one will in order to dispose of the whole of their property—personal as well as real. In extraordinary cases, a person might wish to dispose of his real property so differently from his personal property, that he might make two wills; but the instances were very rare. He (Mr. Malins), in an experience of twenty years, did not remember more than five instances in which a will affected the real estate only. One will usually disposed of both personal and real property, and then it was necessary to be proved. The additional business brought to the court, therefore, in consequence of giving it jurisdiction over real estate, would not be appreciable. He would next say a few words with regard to the supposed occupation of the new Judge. If that functionary should be appointed a member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, ample provision would be made for the employment of any time he might have to spare in his own court; but the Committee need not be afraid that he would have much of that time; and in any case it would be better that he should be underworked than that he should be overwhelmed with business. He (Mr. Malins) had only further to observe that no new public charge would be incurred by the establishment of the proposed office, because the personage who would receive the appointment would be the Judge of the existing Prerogative Court.

Mr. Malins

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that the statement which he had made, and to which his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Malins) had referred, had merely a reference to the fact, that if there was a will for the personal property and a will for the real estate, the former only was proved at present in the Prerogative Court, but that the will in reference to the real estate should also be proved before the proposed new court, and that the court would by that means have an additional duty to discharge.

MR. BOWYER said, he entirely concurred in the principle of the Amendments proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth, because they tended to get rid of a most unscientific distinction of jurisdictions. Under our present system, there was what was called a testamentary jurisdiction; but the distinction between testamentary and other jurisdictions with regard to questions of property was a purely historical distinction, and was based upon no one principle of jurisprudence or policy. If a court were required to administer wills only, why should there not be a court of leases and a court of mortgages? He contended that the distinction was ridiculous, and that its absurdity was shown by the fact that, after all, there were many cases with regard to wills which could not be decided exclusively by the testamentary jurisdiction. With respect to the amount of occupation that would be provided for the Judge of the new court, it was avowed that he would not have enough to do if he had jurisdiction only over contentious cases. But with respect to the business in common form, he (Mr. Bowyer) wanted to know why a probate should be necessary for a will any more than for a deed. There ought to be a registry of wills and of deeds also; but probate he held to be an error which had resulted from the history of the Ecclesiastical Courts and from the separate jurisdiction in regard to wills. If a will were not disputed, why should probate be required? He knew a case in which, in consequence of the existing requirements of the law, much delay and needless expense had been incurred. A will, which was altogether undisputed, happened to have mentioned in one part a single executor only, and in another the word was written in the plural number. When the will was sent up to the Prerogative Court in London this discrepancy was discovered, and, though everybody concerned was perfectly satisfied with the will, the question went before the proctor, and then to the registrar. The attorney in the country had to come up to London several times, and a bill of £20 or £30 was run up, which, after a delay of two months, the parties had to pay, though the validity of the instrument was completely undisputed. Such a case was sufficient to demonstrate the absurdity of the proposed jurisdiction over undisputed wills. Understanding that the principle of the Amendment which had been moved by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth was, that the place where the common form business was to be transacted should be the office of a registrar, and not a court, while the contested business should go to the common law courts, he should give his support to it.

MR. ATHERTON observed, that he could not agree in the statement of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth, that the courts of common law had not at present sufficient business to employ them.

MR. COLLIER explained. He did not say that they had not sufficient to employ them, but that they would be able to transact the business he proposed to transfer to them.

MR. ATHERTON said, that the result of his experience was that, though, to the credit of the courts, a certain kind of business had diminished of late years in consequence of interference on the part of the Legislature—the scandalous business, he called it, such as that whereby a person who had put his name to a promissory note was enabled to force the holder of it to recur to costly litigation before he could recover—yet business of another kind had very much increased. Appeals had multiplied five or six fold, and a single case of appeal from the Queen's Bench must be heard by the staff of the other two courts. Business had, indeed, so much increased, that it was hardly possible to obtain a sufficient attendance of Judges for sittings in error and for the ordinary sittings out of term; and where one court used to sit for the disposal of cases before juries, two were now continually sitting for that purpose. Therefore, though he had formerly approved the proposition of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth, yet he had not approved it as an Amendment upon the present Bill, and it must be borne in mind that a statement of the business of the courts made two years ago was not a statement of the business in the present day.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he wished to suggest to the Government the justice and the expediency of allowing parties to prove wills over £1,500 before the local courts. It was just as easy to prove a will of £30,000 as a will of £300, and people in the country ought to have the option of having recourse to the cheaper and more expeditious mode of proceeding, instead of being obliged to come to London.

MR. AYRTON said, he hoped the important question involved in the Amendment would not be decided on the narrow issue of whether the Judges of the courts of common law were fully occupied or not. He conceived that the Bill was founded on the soundest principles of law reform in placing the jurisdiction with respect to common form business and contested wills in one single court, and not allowing it to be exercised by any Court at Westminster to which any suitor might choose to resort. It was at all times difficult to distinguish between ordinary and contentious proceedings, because questions might arise in respect to the former class of cases in which the opinion of the Judge would be required. There was an immense number of cases of what he might term an intermediate description, between those which usually came before the Court of Chancery and the ordinary Probate Court, and he was of opinion that they should be submitted to a court over which one Judge of great experience in such matters should preside. But if questions arose with reference to a will or wills, sanity or insanity, they should try the question by summoning a jury just in the manner in which issues were sent to be tried from the courts of equity at present. He could not conceive that there could be a greater error than to enunciate the doctrine that it was not consistent with the principles of English jurisprudence to set up distinct courts for the purpose of dealing with distinct classes of questions. On the contrary, they found the Queen's Bench dealing with a particular description of cases arising out of criminal law, the Court of Exchequer took cognizance of all revenue cases, and the Common Pleas had a distinct branch of jurisprudence intrusted to its jurisdiction. He thought, therefore, that the proper course was to remit questions relating to the validity of wills and the granting of administration to a separate and distinct tribunal, and he considered that, such a principle being admitted, the court so established should have complete and exclusive jurisdiction over the matters which came within its cognizance. He did not dispute that in the Colonies, where the community was much smaller, it might be necessary to have one court to take cognizance of all these matters; but he contended that in a large and highly civilized society, such as existed in Great Britain, the same advantage would be found from the division of labour in the administration of justice as was apparent in everything else.

MR. DUNLOP observed, that at the time of the Reformation all the Ecclesiastical Courts in Scotland were abolished, and a Central Court of Probate was established in Edinburgh, with provincial Commissioners. About thirty years ago these district Commissioners were merged in the sheriffs of counties, whose duties were somewhat analogous to those of County Court Judges in this country, and the jurisdiction of the Central Court of Probate was transferred to the Court of Session. He only wished to state that, under this arrangement, no difficulty had been experienced in dealing with the business relating to the administration of wills in Scotland, but he was unable to judge whether the business of the common law courts in this country would preclude their undertaking similar duties.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, it was his desire to speak as little as possible while the Bill was passing through Committee, but it would hardly be courteous to his hon. and learned Friend if he permitted his Amendment to pass without a few observations. The object of his hon. and learned Friend's Amendment was to commit the testamentary business of the country to the Superior Courts at Westminster Hall, where it would be transacted by the fifteen Judges. Hon. Members must, however, be perfectly aware that, in consequence of the peculiarities of the law relating to this subject, it was necessary that it should be administered by persons possessing great experience and a thorough knowledge of the mode in which the business had hitherto been transacted. With regard to the observations of the hon. Gentleman who last addressed the Committee, he probably had the law of Scotland in his mind, but the law of that country was very different in this respect to the laws of England. Many hon. Members were doubtless aware, that in Scotland every document, however informal, purporting to be a will of personal estate, might be at once admitted to confirmation, and that consequently little care or legal skill was required in receiving such instruments and giving them confirmation. In the first year of the reign of Her present Majesty a statute was passed which effected a great improvement in the previously existing law of England with reference to wills. That statute rendered it necessary that a great amount of care, and even of legal skill, should be applied to such instruments before they were admitted to probate. He had been surprised to hear an hon. and learned Friend of his express an opinion that the whole business of proving a will was really a work of supererogation. Hon. Gentlemen must remember that when a man died it was necessary to constitute a representative to distribute his estates, in order to prevent a scramble for the property. Who that representative should be was determined according to the tenor of the will itself if the testator left directions on that point; but if not, it must be determined by certain rules of practice. In a great variety of cases, no doubt, there was no contest, but as persons were permitted to make their own wills, instruments of the most irregular and imperfect character were constantly brought forward for proof. Those documents frequently contained obliterations, erasures, interlineations, and alterations; it was often difficult to ascertain whether such changes were intended to be final, or what was technically termed deliberative; and very close investigation of a large proportion of the 25,000 wills which were annually proved, was necessary in order to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion as to whether the requirements of the Statute of Wills had been complied with. The duty of making this investigation, which devolved upon the Judges, was most onerous and important, for, if a will which ultimately turned out not to satisfy the statute was admitted to probate, or if it should prove that a previous will was in existence, the consequences might be most calamitous. If probate was granted to the wrong will, the person constituted representative of the deceased might go to the Bank of England, or to any public company, and possess himself of stock or personal property to a large amount; and if such instrument should subsequently turn out to be invalid, the new representative might call upon the Bank or the company to pay a second time the sum which they had paid to the alleged representative of the testator. The business, therefore, of ascertaining what wills ought or ought not to be admitted to probate, when exercised with regard to the whole of this kingdom, required considerable time and care, and could only be duly performed by practised and experienced persons. He did not think it possible that such a duty could be discharged by the fifteen Judges. If it were thrown upon them it could only be performed in chambers; the consequence would probably be that one Judge would apply a rule to a particular set of cases, while the next day another Judge might lay down a precisely contrary regulation, and the most destructive discrepancies would thus arise. He considered, therefore, that the business ought to be committed to one court, where it would be governed by uniform rules. In addition to this he had just received a communication from the Lord Chief Justice, stating that it would be physically impossible for the common law Judges to undertake the discharge of this business, whether of the common form business merely or of the contentious jurisdiction. The Report just received from the Commission appointed to inquire into this subject, and which would be published in a few days, also showed that it would be impossible to add to the duties of the common law Judges without injuriously affecting the interests of the country. In order to get some notion of the amount of common form business, he had caused inquiry to be made, and he found that in two days during the ordinary business transacted in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, fourteen documents regarding wills were reserved for the personal examination of the Judge, in addition to the business which the Judge performed in court. The Committee would therefore see how much time must be devoted to the business of the court when the testamentary business, not of the province of Canterbury only, but of the whole country, was submitted to one Judge, more especially if the Judge were also to be the Judge of the Court of Marriage and Divorce. It would, at all events, be absolutely necessary to have a distinct tribunal, and a Judge of the highest order of mind to preside over it. His regret was that the powers to be given to this court were not larger than those proposed to be given by the Bill. It was thought desirable, however, to follow as closely as possible the recommendations contained in the Report of the Commissioners, but he concurred in the recommendations expressed by many of his hon. and learned Friends, that the Judge of the new court should have the power of deciding issues when they arose within the jurisdiction of his court, and when they might be conveniently tried before the Judge. It would probably happen that, instead of having issues sent to a jury, the parties would often be wise enough to request the Judge to try the cause, and himself discharge the functions of a jury. It was, in fact, impossible to comprehend all the various duties that the Judge might have to perform, and instead of being open to the imputation of having nothing to do, his apprehension rather was, that if the Judge of the Court of Probate also became Judge of the Court of Marriage and Divorce, his time would not be adequate to the discharge of all these duties. He proposed to give the Judge a power of trying all the issues that arose in his court, but if it were found that these issues could be more conveniently tried in the country, or if the time of the Judge were so occupied that he could not try them, he would have the power of sending them to a common law tribunal. As it was proposed that the Judge of the new court should sit in Westminster Hall, where he might have the assistance of the most competent members of the common law bar, there was no reason why the Judge should not try all the issues that came before him. He (the Attorney General) would not enter into the various questions which the Bill might give rise to, but he hoped to be able to give such explanations on each clause, as to satisfy the Committee that the Bill had been framed with care and caution.

Mr. Ayrton

MR. COLLIER said, he was gratified to find that the hon. and learned Member for West Suffolk (Sir F. Kelly) concurred with him in thinking that the courts of common law were the best possible tribunals for the exercise of this jurisdiction, and he hoped that at some future time the House might legislate in this direction. He did not share in the apprehension of the hon. and learned Attorney General, to the effect that the common law Judges could not deal with questions of this kind without giving rise to conflicting decisions. No one could doubt their ability to do so, and he thought that by arrangement among themselves they might so simplify the business of the courts that no inconvenience would result from giving them this additional jurisdiction. In the face, however, of the statement made by the Attorney General, that it was the opinion of the Lord Chief Justice of England that he could not deal satisfactorily with this excess of business, he would not press his Amendment. He would not allow his own peculiar views upon a particular point to stand in the way of the final settlement of this question, which was so devoutly desired by the country at large; and, therefore, as it was now determined there should be a Court of Probate, he would devote his attention to making that court as perfect as possible.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 3 and 4 were also agreed to.

Clause 5.

MR. M'MAHON said, the clause enacted that the Judge should be an advocate of ten years' or a barrister of fifteen years' standing. He did not see why the barrister should be of five years' longer standing than the advocate.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that the usual qualification for a Judge of the Superior Courts of Westminster was that he should be a barrister of fifteen years' standing, and for a Judge of the Ecclesiastical Courts that he should be an advocate of ten years' standing. The clause was, therefore, in strict conformity with usage. He wished to express his gratification at the speech of the Attorney General, as he thought the Committee very much indebted to the Lord Chancellor and to his hon. and learned Friend for having brought the Bill into such a shape as would, he thought, ensure its passing into a law during the present Session. He would suggest the omission of the proviso to this clause.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he was willing to omit the last three lines of the clause. It was possible that the right hon. Gentleman who was now Judge of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury might not desire to accept the new office of Judge of the Court of Probate. It would be a great good if he did, but the clause, as it stood, laid an imperative obligation upon him to be the first Judge of the Court of Probate.

Mr. Collier

SIR FITZROY KELLY observed, that the omission of the proviso would by no means preclude the Government, if they thought fit, from appointing the learned gentleman who now occupied the position of Judge of the Prerogative Court to a similar position in the new tribunal if he should be disposed to accept that office. He might be permitted to add that no person could be better entitled by his many eminent qualities and by his experience to such an appointment.

MR. MALINS said, he wished to express his entire concurrence in the last observation of his hon. and learned Friend, but at the same time he would observe that the effect of leaving out the proviso would be to remove that learned gentleman, because, on the passing of the Bill, the Prerogative Court would cease to exist altogether; the learned Judge would be out of office, and it would be entirely optional as to whether the Government would reappoint him. He thought that there ought to be a proviso in the Bill that the present Judge of the Prerogative Court should be the first Judge of the new Probate Court, providing he should be willing to accept such office.

MR. AYRTON urged upon the Committee the propriety of making the compensation which might be granted to the Judge of the Prerogative Court for the abolition of his present office of a conditional character. He did not see why such compensation should be granted to him if he were to decline to preside over the new court, the duties of which, from his previous experience, he must be peculiarly competent to discharge.

The Motion for the omission of the proviso, as well as the clause itself, was then agreed to.

Clause 6.

MR. W. N. HODGSON said, he wished to ask whether it was the intention of the Attorney General, before the Bill passed through Committee, to lay upon the table of the House the scale of fees to be established in the new court, of the salaries of its officers, and of the annual expenditure connected with its working?

MR. CHAIRMAN said, that as the clause did not relate to the payment of fees or salaries, that was not the fitting time to raise any discussion as to the pecuniary provisions of the Bill.

Clause agreed to; as were also Clauses 7 and 8.

Clause 9 (Transfer of the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court to the new Court of Probate).

MR. ADAMS said, he wished to ask the hon. and learned Attorney General whether he had considered the effect of this clause, and had finally made up his mind upon it. If so, it would be hopeless for him (Mr. Adams) to move any Amendment upon it. Still he must repeat the objection to the contemplated transfer, which he had urged upon the second reading of the Bill. The objection to it which he then entertained he still continued to hold. He could see no analogy between a jurisdiction which involved the decision of facts connected with disputed wills, and one which dealt exclusively with questions relating to shipping. The Judge of the Court of Admiralty, he might add, frequently found it expedient to call to his aid two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, in order that they might, by their more practical knowledge, throw light upon the cases which came before him, and he (Mr. Adams) could not help thinking that those cases could be still more satisfactorily dealt with by a jury of nautical men conversant with our trade and shipping than by the Judges of the Admiralty Court, even with the advantage which the assistance of those Elder Brethren afforded. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had remarked that the new Court of Probate would be rather over than under worked. Now, he (Mr. Adams) should, under those circumstances, venture to suggest that the Judges of the Superior Courts at Westminster—although they might not have sufficient time at their disposal to deal with the entire probate business of the country—would be enabled at least to discharge that portion of the duties of the new Court which it was proposed to transfer to it from the Court of Admiralty. Thus a better tribunal for the performance of those duties would be secured, while the Judge of the Probate Court, who it was said was likely to be overworked, would be relieved from some of the business which the Bill sought to place under his jurisdiction. He might also be allowed to remark in reference to another point that, while he by no means meant to argue in favour of the continuance of the Diocesan Courts as at present established, he was of opinion that the Bill should enable the registrars of those Courts to grant probate to any amount in the country districts in cases where there was no contention, instead of that amount being limited to £1,500. If that course were taken, the public would be saved the additional expense of resorting to a central tribunal in London, and the claim of the registrars themselves to compensation being disposed of to an extent corresponding with the business still left in their hands. Those points, but especially that to which he had first adverted, he ventured to press upon the notice of the Attorney General, and he trusted that by acceding to his views in the matter the hon. and learned Gentleman would add another claim to the character of a law reformer, to which he was so well entitled.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman need not be afraid that the excess of business would render the new Court of Probate unable to discharge its duties, for the business transacted by the Admiralty Judges was so insignificant that it scarcely deserved mentioning. He spoke of their ordinary business, because he admitted that in the late war their duties were considerably increased. In times of peace, however, it was so slight that he considered it was monstrous there should be a special court for its transaction.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the clause was only permissive, and did not in the smallest degree direct anything to be done. Neither did it point out the manner in which the functions of the two Courts should be discharged after the amalgamation had taken place. The amalgamation, indeed, could only be accomplished by an Act of Parliament, and he trusted a Bill for that purpose would be prepared and brought in during the next Session, when the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Boston (Mr. Adams) might avail himself of the opportunity of proposing any Amendments to it which he might think necessary. Undoubtedly, he (the Attorney General) had satisfied himself that there were some duties belonging to the Court of Admiralty and the proposed Court of Probate which would be best discharged by a single Judge; but when the present Bill had passed the office of Judge of the Court of Probate would assume quite a different character, for he would be then in reality a Judge of common law, aided in the discharge of his functions by a jury, and therefore in every respect a proper recipient of the office of the Judge of the Court of Admiralty whenever it might devolve upon him.

MR. ATHERTON said, he wished to correct an error into which the hon. Gentleman the Member for Lambeth had fallen with respect to the extent of the duties performed by the Judge of the Admiralty Court. It was well known to the profession that there was not a more active, painstaking, or intelligent Judge, in the country, than the right hon. Gentleman who at present filled that office, and yet the business which came before him was sufficient to employ him during a period in the year as long as that in which any Judge of any of the courts of law or equity was occupied, while the way in which the functions of his court were discharged was such as might well make it the envy of any other court in the kingdom. The Court of Admiralty had a peculiar jurisdiction—the jurisdiction in rem., which the courts of common law would find it difficult to administer. They had at present more business than they could discharge; and, if the Admiralty jurisdiction were transferred to them, it would be the last straw on the camel's back.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that when the present Judge was appointed, he (Mr. Williams) moved for a Return of the average number of days, and of the average number of hours in each day, on which his predecessor had sat for many years before his death, and his impression was that the number of days was twenty-one, and five hours each day.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, the hon. Gentleman should have included in the return the number of days which the Judge of the Admiralty Court sat in the Privy Council. He (Sir Fitzroy Kelly) did not in the least object to the present clause, and the less so as he learnt from the Attorney General that he contemplated future legislation before the proposed amalgamation could come into operation. When, however, the subject came again to be considered, he hoped the House would pause before it transferred the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty to a court of common law. It was true that suits of the same character were tried in both courts, but there were great and essential differences in their modes of proceeding. The Court of Admiralty possessed a jurisdiction in rem., by which justice was often more effectually done between the parties than in a court of common law, especially in cases where a foreigner was one of the litigating parties; and he hoped if the transfer took place it would be a complete one, so as to preserve intact, though under different auspices, that jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty by which, as at present constituted, it so admirably administered justice between man and man. In a case of collision tried in the common law courts, if it could be proved that the plaintiff was at all in fault, the verdict went for the defendant, but in the Court of Admiralty justice was done to both parties.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 10 (provides for the establishment of district registries).

SIR ERSKINE PERRY said, he rose to propose an Amendment, the object of which was to establish district courts, to be presided over by the County Court Judge in all County Court districts, except those of the metropolis. He said he had received many applications from people in the country deeply alive to the change in the law which this Bill would effect, and suggesting that the jurisdiction given by it to the County Courts should be a little more direct than the Bill proposed to make it. The Bill itself was founded on the Report of a Royal Commission, composed of Judges accustomed only to complicated cases, and when they made their Report, the question of giving jurisdiction to the County Courts was summarily disposed of by them, on the ground that those courts had then no machinery requisite for the purpose. It had been, however, since found expedient, that jurisdiction should, to a certain extent, be given to the County Courts. What he desired to introduce into the Bill was quite in accordance with the Report of the Commission. He did not wish to increase the jurisdiction of the County Court Judges, but what he proposed was to associate with those Judges a registrar in those matters in which they already had jurisdiction. At present in Devonshire, the county with which he was politically connected, there were ten local courts in which probate might be obtained, while the Bill before the Committee, as it was at present framed, would reduce that number to two, held in Exeter and Bodmin; and the result would be that in cases where the sum to be administered was under £200 the matter would be referred back to the County Court, and by cases being bandied about from one tribunal to another great expense and inconvenience would be incurred. What he proposed, therefore, to remedy that evil was that, instead of establishing a local registrar in each district, a registrar should be attached to each County Court circuit, who would be, not only an officer of the County Court, but also an officer of the central court in London, and who in any contentious case would be able to assist the Judge as regarded all matters of nicety. By the present Bill forty-one registrars would be appointed, and if his proposal were acceded to the number would only be increased to fifty-one. He hoped that the House would be induced to assent to his proposal, which he was convinced would be advantageous, both in point of economy and of convenience to the suitors, and which did not in any way infringe upon the principle of the old officers being transferred to positions under the new jurisdiction. He would, therefore, conclude by moving to leave out after "established" and insert "district courts to be presided over by the County Court Judge in all County Court districts except those of the metropolis (Nos. 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 47, and 48), and a public registry shall be attached to each court, the registrar whereof shall be under the control of the Court of Probate."

The Attorney General

MR. ATHERTON said, he would support the Amendment. It would be a great hardship to compel those, whom death had deprived of their friends, to undertake long and expensive journeys for the transaction of business which might be satisfactorily despatched by tribunals already established in their immediate neighbourhoods for the administration of justice among the poorer classes of the community. By one of the clauses of the Bill the "contentious" business under a given amount was to be transferred to the Judges of the County Courts, and it could not reasonably be contended, therefore, that the "common form" business could not be conveniently disposed of by the registrars attached to the same courts. If the Judges of the County Courts,—men with an exclusive common law training, who never came within scent of Doctors' Commons—were admitted to be competent to the despatch of the more difficult "contentious" business, he would like to know upon what ground it could be maintained that the officers next below them in education and professional attainments would not be as competent to the transaction of the merely formal "common form" business.

MR. COLLIER said, that the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Devonport (Sir E. Perry) raised a very important question. According to the Bill as it now stood the County Court districts were established for the purpose of exercising a contentious jurisdiction in the country, while another set of districts, which were substantially the diocesan districts, were established for the purpose of dealing with non-contentious business. He held it to be entirely wrong that there should be two sets of districts for the purpose of exercising a local jurisdiction. In the Bill of last year the diocesan districts were adopted as those which ought to exercise the local jurisdiction; but during the progress of the measure the County Court districts were substituted. He thought it extremely important that they should adhere to that Amendment. The diocesan districts were antiquated and inconvenient, whereas the County Court districts had been recently settled in accordance with the Report of a Commission which had made inquiries with respect to the position of towns, roads, railways, and other circumstances relating to the public convenience. In the event of the Attorney General agreeing to alter Schedule A, so as to put it in conformity with the arrangement of last year, by which the County Court districts were adopted, he would advise his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Devonport to withdraw his Amendment; otherwise, so strongly impressed was he with the desirability of adhering to the County Court districts for the local administration of justice, he would support the proposition of his hon. and learned Friend, suggesting a slight alteration in its terms.

MR. BECKETT DENISON said, he could not support the Amendment, as he preferred the clause as it stood at present. As one of the Members for Yorkshire, he would be content to see York inserted in the schedule as the central place for proving wills, no district being mentioned at all.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that some alteration might be necessary in the principal places mentioned in the schedule, but he could not listen for a moment to the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Devonport (Sir E. Perry). As far as the argument from convenience was concerned, he would remind the Committee, that the convenience of persons dwelling in the country was in a great measure determined by use and wont, and he could not see how it would be promoted by compelling them to go to different places for the purpose of proving wills from those to which they had been in the habit of resorting. In his opinion, it was highly desirable that the present Bill should be founded as far as possible upon the existing order of things. Accordingly, the districts had been so arranged as to preserve the office of the registrar wherever it now existed, and by that means he hoped not only to keep the business in the channels in which it had hitherto been accustomed to flow, but to prevent the necessity of awarding compensation in a large number of cases which would otherwise have to be submitted to the consideration of the House. The hon. and learned Member for Devonport, however, desired to abolish the diocesan districts, to take away the existing registrars, and impose upon the people in the country the necessity of travelling about with the County Court Judges. A County Court Judge went to a variety of places; his registrar accompanied him, and yet that officer, as far as he could understand the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Devonport, was to be the person who should receive the necessary papers for the proving of wills in common form where the personal estate did not exceed £1,500. The Bill proposed to put the business in the hands of experienced men, conversant with the duties which they would be called upon to perform. It also provided securities for the proper conduct of that business by requiring them to communicate with the Judge of the Probate Court in London, and he should regret to see it transferred to persons whose previous occupation had been altogether of a different kind, who had quite enough to do in their present offices, and who were itinerant with the Judges to whom they were attached. He was afraid that he did not clearly understand the Amendment. It proposed that the district court should be presided over by the County Court Judge. Was the County Court Judge to prove wills? Such was not the proposition of the hon. and learned Member, but if the registrar was to transact the business, what was meant by the words that the district court should be presided over by the County Court Judge? The Amendment would destroy the arrangement proposed to be made by this measure, and would introduce such confusion that the Bill would become discordant and inconsistent with itself.

The Attorney General

MR. COLLIER said, that all he contended for was, that the registrars should be attached to the County Courts, instead of the diocesan districts, and nothing he had heard from the hon. and learned Attorney General had tended to change his opinion. Still he thought that it would be more convenient to discuss that question upon the consideration of the schedule, and therefore he recommended his hon. and learned Friend to withdraw his Amendment for the present.

SIR ERSKINE PERRY said, in reply, that he was not surprised that the Attorney General should object to his Amendment; but he quite misunderstood its object, for he (Sir E. Perry) would never have proposed it had it been calculated to produce the effects which were attributed to it by the hon. and learned Gentleman. He never proposed that the registrar should travel about with the Judge of the County Court, or be the person for granting probate. The hon. and learned Gentleman also objected to his Amendment on the ground that, instead of attaching these registrars to diocesan districts, he proposed to attach them to the County Courts; but what he really suggested was to the effect that while the Attorney General proposed to appoint forty-one registrars, he (Sir E. Perry) proposed fifty-one, who should be located in the most central spot in their districts, and not travelling about with the Judge. The principle of his Amendment was, that justice be provided for the poor as near their own doors, and at as cheap a rate, as possible; and the best mode of fulfilling those objects would be by giving the jurisdiction to the County Court Judge, and having a registrar attached to the district of his court. He could scarcely, however, hope for sufficient support to push his Amendment, and, under the circumstances, he thought the best course he could adopt would be to withdraw it.

MR. CROSSLEY said, he would suggest that Wakefield instead of York should be taken as the seat of the chief registry for Yorkshire.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn, and clause agreed to; as was also Clause 11.

Clause 12.

MR. ROLT suggested the consolidation of the 12th and 13th clauses, so that there might be one general clause in reference to clerks and subordinate officers.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he must oppose the consolidation, on the ground of the disparity in the nature of the employment of the officers named in the two clauses.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 13 (Clerks and Officers in the Prerogative Court shall be transferred to like offices in the Court of Probate).

MR. DIVETT said, he begged to move as an Amendment, after the word "court" to insert "and all managing clerks who have been continuously employed in any diocesan court for fifteen years and upwards immediately before the passing of this Act."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that there was no class of persons for whom he felt greater sympathy than for the managing clerks and those who filled subordinate offices, but he did not think that this was a convenient time to deal with their case, which might—although he must not be considered as giving any pledge or promise—be considered in another part of the Bill. He was almost afraid that the words were sufficiently large to comprise the managing clerks of proctors who practised in these courts, and, of course, it would be impossible to accede to such a proposition. The clerks designated by the Amendment were persons filling what might be called, without offence to them, a species of menial capacity—they were the servants of persons themselves holding offices in the courts, whereas the clerks designated in the clause were of an entirely different character. Under that name they discharged duties assigned to them in the constitution of the court, and not under the direction of any masters.

MR. DIVETT said, he was only anxious that the persons who now discharged these duties should not be thrown aside and have other persons appointed in their places in the new court, and if the Attorney General would consent to take their case into consideration in another part of the Bill, he would not press his Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that there was no fear but that in the arrangement of the new districts those persons who had filled corresponding offices in the old system would be the first to be appointed to the new offices.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he had no doubt that these managing clerks would be maintained in their employments. The district registrars of course could not perform their duties without the assistance of clerks, and it could scarcely be supposed that they would not retain the persons who had been so useful in that position.

MR. ROLT hoped that this clause was meant to include those persons who discharged duties in the present courts not for themselves, but as the deputies of those whose offices were sinecures.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that these persons were undoubtedly included in the clause.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, it would be necessary to alter that part of this clause which gave power to the Judge of the new court to make these appointments. All these appointments must be made preparatory to the new court entering upon its duties; but the Judge of the new court in reality might not be in existence at the time. The old court must continue to discharge its functions until the very moment before the new court came into operation, and the present Judge might possibly decline to accept the office of Judge of the new court, so that at the time when it was absolutely necessary that these arrangements should be made, the functionary by whom alone they could be made according to the clause might not be in existence. He proposed, therefore, in the place of "the Judge," in line 14, to insert the words "the Lord Chancellor."

MR. HENLEY said, it was of great importance to the working of the new system that the Judge should have the fullest confidence in all the functionaries under him, and he hoped the Amendment, which had come upon them rather suddenly, would be well considered before it was finally adopted.

MR. ROLT observed, that he thought the Lord Chancellor, to whom, of course, every one would give credit for desiring to make the best appointments, could not possibly have the same means of judging as to the fitness of the persons to be appointed as the Judge of the court.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the Lord Chancellor would much prefer that the Judge should have the appointment of these officers, but it was utterly impossible, as he had already explained, so to arrange the machinery of the Bill. All these appointments must be made before the new Judge took office, but he could assure the Committee that the Lord Chancellor, as soon as the new Judge had been selected, would in every respect take the opinion and consult the wishes of that gentleman, whoever he might be.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill, as was also Clause 14.

Clause 15 (provides for appointment to offices and for fees).

MR. MALINS moved, as an Amendment, the omission of certain words, with the view of inserting others, to provide that the remuneration given to registrars and other officers should be by salary, instead of fees. It seemed to be an infringement of the principle now generally acted upon to introduce the principle of remuneration by fees into the Bill. The district registrars were to be persons who were to give their whole time to the discharge of this business, and therefore they ought to receive salaries.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he objected to the Amendment, which would have the effect of giving to a registrar who had a great deal to do, the same remuneration as one who had much less to do. He was desirous of securing the close personal attention of the officers to their duties, and the way to secure that was to pay them by fees proportioned to the duties they performed.

MR. ROEBUCK remarked, that he thought that, where a service was imposed upon a man for the benefit of the State, the State should pay him, and not the person who required the service.

MR. MALINS said, the County Court Judges were at first paid by fees, but this was found to be so objectionable that recourse was had to salaries. If they were to act on the principle that every man should be paid for what he did by fees, they would be led back to the system of paying the Lord Chancellor and other high functionaries in that way.

MR. HENLEY observed, that he was favourable to the principle of paying by salary, but in the present case he thought the Government had come to a wise conclusion, for it would be impossible at once to adopt the system under this Bill. After a year or two, when they had experience of the working of the measure, they might adopt the wiser principle of paying by salary, for by that time they would be in a position to fix a proper scale of salaries. But he thought that at present it would be too great a disturbance of the existing practice.

MR. ROEBUCK said, the work might be as hard in a small district as a large one, while the fees would be very different.

The Attorney General

He also wished to ask on what principle the fees were to be regulated.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that they would be regulated by the amount of the stamp and the length of the probate. He would observe, however, that, in the first place, the price of the stamp would be regulated by the amount of the estate, a less stamp being required for a small than for a large estate. In the next place, a small estate generally required but a short enumeration of items, whereas in a large estate there was ordinarily a multiplication of trusts, &c., so that the fees would in effect be regulated according to the amount of the property.

MR. BRISCOE could not see why the public should be called upon to pay for the registration of wills, and therefore hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 16 to 23 agreed to.

Clause 24. -

MR. WESTHEAD said, he wished to know whether surrogates who might be appointed Commissioners would have to take affidavits with respect to the probate of wills, which affidavits might be presented at the district courts?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he could not undertake to say that it might not become requisite, in making the rules and orders for the practice of the Court of Probate, in some way to alter the duties now performed by surrogates; but it would be the desire of those who framed those rules and orders to give those gentlemen, and the clerical surrogates more especially, as full a measure of remunerative employment as they now enjoyed.

MR. BARROW asked whether the Commissioners would have power of administering oaths to, and taking the affidavits of, persons for the purpose of taking out probate, without the necessity of the present expensive application for a special commission for the purpose.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, one of the objects of the clause was to prevent the necessity of those special commissions which were now directed by the Prerogative Court at considerable expense to the parties, and in general orders to be issued powers to that effect would be expressly given them.

MR. STEEL moved an Amendment, after "probate," to insert "provided that in every city, borough, and town throughout England containing not less than 5,000 inhabitants, the Judge shall appoint the registrar of the County Court of the district in which such city, borough, or town is situate, or some other fit and proper person within such city, borough, or town, to be such Commissioner or Commissioners." In the district with which he was connected, which was in the diocese of Carlisle, no surrogates had been appointed.

LORD HOTHAM said, that he was given to understand that there was considerable difference between the duties of the surrogates in the province of York and of those in the province of Canterbury. The duties of the surrogates north of the Trent were now nearly the same as those of proctors in the province of Canterbury. Their emoluments would, therefore, be diminished to a far greater extent by this Bill. What he wished to know was, whether in framing the orders to which the hon. and learned Attorney General had referred, special provision would be made for securing to the surrogates in the province of York the same amount of remunerative employment they now possessed.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he could not but admit the correctness of the distinction pointed out by the noble Lord, but he could not venture to say that under the general rules and orders the exceptional case of the surrogates of York would be treated in such a way as to leave the remuneration of those gentlemen as large as at present. He would suggest, however, that the peculiar position of those gentlemen would be better dealt with by a special clause, which could be brought forward at a subsequent period. With regard to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Carlisle (Mr. Steel), he (the Attorney General) thought it unnecessary, as in the clause now under discussion power was given to the Judge to appoint as surrogates such persons as he might think fit.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to; as also was Clause 25.

Clause 26 (regulating the Procedure of the Court).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he had to propose as an Amendment to the clause to leave out the word "procedure" in the first line, the words "all manner of procedure" in the sixteenth line, and then to omit the last four lines of the clause. His great object was to render the practice of the courts as expeditious, as simple, and as economical as possible. It was, however, deemed essential not to abrogate in toto the whole of the existing practice, as it would be difficult, in the first instance, to provide by the new rules and orders for every case of contention that might arise. His Amendments were framed to meet the contingency, and the clause would then stand thus—

"The practice of the Court of Probate shall, except where otherwise provided by this Act, or by the Rules or Orders to be from time to time made under this Act, be, so far as the circumstances of the case will admit, according to the present form and manner of the Prerogative Court."

SIR FITZROY KELLY was understood to accept the Amendment, and at the same time to express a decided conviction that the pleadings of the new court would be very much more simplified and more expeditious than those of the old court.

MR. BOWYER said, he would move to amend the clause by striking out the words "so far as the circumstances of the case will admit." He thought the effect of these words were loose and dangerous, and would place the whole practice of the court in the hands of the Judge.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL assured the hon. and learned Member that these words would have precisely the opposite effect. The probability was that a great number of cases would arise which could not be provided for except by recurrence to the old practice, especially as the Bill would bring into the court many cases of a character different from those which came before the Prerogative Court.

MR. BOWYER said, that the words would apply to all matters to be brought before the court. It would be easy to introduce words restricting the dispensing power to the new cases. With that view he would propose the insertion of the words, "In all matters which do not lie within the jurisdiction of the Prerogative Court."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he was utterly unable to understand the meaning of the hon. and learned Gentleman's Amendment.

MR. BOWYER: I shall not trouble the Committee by dividing, but I will just state what the effects of my Amendment would be. [Cries of "No!"]

MR. BOWYER's Amendment having been negatived, the Amendments proposed by the ATTORNEY GENERAL were agreed to.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 27 struck out.

Clauses 28 to 31 inclusive, agreed to.

Clauses 32 and 33 postponed.

Clause 34 (Appeal to the House of Lords).

MR. MALINS said, he would propose to insert the words "Judicial Committee of the Privy Council" in the place of the words "House of Lords." The former court had always given the greatest satisfaction to the public, while the House of Lords as a Court of Appeal was most expensive and dilatory, and although a very decided opinion had been pronounced against it by the House of Commons last year, nothing had yet been done for its improvement.

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 20, to leave out the words "House of Lords, in order to insert the words "Judicial Committee of Her Majesty's most honourable Privy Council,"—instead thereof.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he fully appreciated the great value of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council as a Court of Appeal; but there was a reason why it should not be had recourse to in the present instance. If the Bill became law it might happen that questions might arise in the common law courts either the same or of a cognate character with questions which arose before the Court of Probate. Then, the questions arising in the common law courts would be carried to the House of Lords, while those in the Court of Probate would, if the Amendment were agreed to, be carried to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. This would lead to considerable inconvenience. No doubt, it was most desirable that one great Court of Appeal should be established, but in the mean time he thought it was not desirable to make the new tribunal an exception with regard to the course of appeal from other courts. He might add that he was sure that any change in this respect would not be acceded to in another place, and he would deprecate any alteration which might lead to anything like a collision between the two Houses of Parliament, and which might thereby endanger the success of the Bill. For these reasons he trusted that the Committee would adhere to the clause as it stood.

MR. CAIRNS said, he hoped that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Wallingford would take the opinion of the Committee upon this Amendment. He (Mr. Cairns) thought that it was a matter of great regret that we had two Courts of Appeal in the last resort in this country; but, seeing that there were two such courts, and that they had now the advantage of a choice between them, surely they should select the best. The House of Lords had never yet had anything to do with the appellate jurisdiction in matters of probate. The Judicial Committee had performed its work to the satisfaction of everybody, and he objected to the jurisdiction being taken from it without some reason assigned. He did not see why any objection should be taken in another place to the proposed Amendment, inasmuch as the Bill had been introduced into the House of Lords by the Lord Chancellor with the appeal running to the Privy Council. Fortified, then, by the opinion of the Lord Chancellor, and by an experience of the advantage of appeals to the Privy Council, he should support the Amendment.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that no doubt the appeal at present lay from the Ecclesiastical Court to the Judicial Committee, but at present the Ecclesiastical Court dealt only with personalty, and it dealt with it in a peculiar manner, the procedure being analogous with the procedure of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. By the Bill, however, it was proposed that the powers of the Court of Probate should extend to wills of real estate, that the old form of procedure should be abolished, and the new court empowered to try issues of fact before a jury. Consequently all the incidents attendant upon the trial of issues on matters of fact in a common law court would arise in the Court of Probate, and in that state of things it must be apparent that the House of Lords would have an advantage over the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council as a Court of Appeal, because they could summon the common law Judges to their assistance, which the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council could not do. The Committee had decided to approximate the proceedings of the Court of Probate as much as possible to the proceedings of the common law courts, and he said, therefore, that they should allow the appeal to follow in the same direction.

MR. COLLIER said, that the question was simply this:—They had decided, in point of fact, upon the appointment of a sixteenth common law Judge; should the appeal from fifteen of them be to the House of Lords, and from the sixteenth to the Judicial Committee to the Privy Council? He apprehended that that would be an anomaly which the Committee would not sanction.

MR. BOWYER observed, that the Attorney General, who argued that, because the Court of Probate was to some extent assimilated to a common law court, therefore the appeal should go to the House of Lords, assisted by the Judges of the common law courts, seemed to forget that the Chief Justices of the common law courts and all the Judges of those courts who were Privy Councillors were not merely assistants, but actual members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. His broad objection to the clause as it stood was that, whereas there were always some Judges versed in ecclesiastical law sitting at the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, there was no Judge of that sort sitting in the House of Lords. The Judicial Committee, with few exceptions, had given the greatest satisfaction, while the House of Lords was one of the worst Courts of Appeal in the world. Two Sessions ago a Committee of the House of Lords themselves reported that the appellate jurisdiction of that House was in an unsatisfactory state, the attempt then made to alter it had failed, and yet nothing since had been done to improve it. Yet it was now proposed to send a new class of appeals to that tribunal. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, to which appeals now went from the testamentary courts, sat at all times of the year; and some of the most important cases came on in November and December. If the House of Lords were made the Court of Appeal, it would be shut up for six months, and there would thus be a denial of justice for half the year. They could not reckon on the attendance of many law Lords on appeals in the House of Lords. There was the Lord Chancellor, and Lord Wensleydale had been recently created a Peer for the purpose; but they could not reckon on the regular attendance of Lord St. Leonards and Lord Lyndhurst. In the Judicial Committee there were five Judges regularly attending, besides Sir John Dodson.

MR. ROLT said, that, speaking with some experience, he would venture to assert that the House of Lords was as able, excellent, and distinguished a tribunal for the final hearing of great and important causes as ever sat in any country. That had been its character down to the present time, and great and eminent men sitting in that House had imparted lustre to the administration of the law. He could not concur with the Members who decried it as a Court of Appeal, for nothing had occurred to cast discredit on it except some cases which had been tortured into the basis of an accusation. In reference to the particular question under consideration he conceived that there were inconveniences connected with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council as a Court of Appeal in reference to the time and mode of hearing causes. It was not always the same tribunal, for one day there might be four members of the Judicial Committee hearing causes, and the next there might be four different members, and sometimes a case was adjourned for two or three weeks. He did not make that statement for the purpose of establishing that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was inefficient, for he admitted that any great tribunal would be subject to inconveniences of that kind. In the House of Lords there was no great arrear, and he was not aware that appeals to the ultimate tribunal should be so encouraged as that that tribunal should hear in one week a cause decided only the week before. At present the House of Lords heard in one Session appeals brought forward in the preceding Session, and he did not see that they could desire greater expedition. With regard to the expense of appeals to the two tribunals of the Privy Council and the House of Lords, he was not aware that there was any difference, as the papers were printed in both. The Court of Probate being now constituted a court of record, the appeal was properly to the House of Lords; the cases taken before the Judicial Committee were properly those arising in the Colonies and in courts which were not courts of records. The matter had been fully considered by the Commission, and he hoped the Committee would adhere to the clause as it stood.

MR. HENLEY said, that as one of the Commissioners, he wished to state that the Commission came to the unanimous opinion that the questions arising under the Bill should go, in the way of appeal, to the House of Lords, in preference to the Privy Council. The main reason for that conclusion was this,—that now, for the first time, the landed property of the country was subject to probate. The new Court of Probate was to deal in the same way with real property as with personal property; and it was only fair, therefore, that there should still be an opportunity of appealing to the tribunal of last resort, which now dealt with questions affecting landed property. The Report of the Commissioners was unanimous on this point, and if the Committee went to a division, he must support the appeal as it now stood.

MR. MALINS said, his only object in making his proposal was, that the Committee might have an opportunity of selecting the best appellate tribunal. He did not see much weight in the argument that, because the Court of Probate was to have jurisdiction for the first time over landed property, the appeal as to landed property ought to continue to lie to the House of Lords. The simple question for the Court of Probate was one of will or no will; and the mode of executing a will, whether it dealt with real or with personal estate, was the same. If the question, for example, related to the capacity of the testator, why should not the same Court of Appeal that decided in a case of personal estate also decide in a case of real estate? The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Rolt), who lauded the House of Lords, was not a Member of Parliament last Session, when the House almost unanimously condemned that assembly as a Court of Appeal. After being put to the great delay and expense of approaching this much-vaunted tribunal of last resort, the suitor found it composed of only two Judges,—a state of things which, with every respect for the Lord Chancellor and Lord Wensleydale, was not, and could not be, satisfactory to the country. If this Court of Appeal was to be retained, why had not the Government taken steps to place it on a better footing? The most important appeals from the Lord Chancellor himself were heard by the Lord Chancellor assisted by one, or at most two, other Judges; whereas the Judicial Committee of Privy Council had always four or five of the most eminent Judges to decide on the questions which came before it, and consequently these anomalies could not exist. It was said that, as appeals from fifteen common law Judges now went to the House of Lords, there could be no reason why appeals from the sixteenth Judge about to be appointed should not go to the same tribunal. But the Judge of the Court of Probate was not to be a common law Judge; and therefore this argument entirely fell to the ground.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he thought nothing could be more unconstitutional, or more opposed to existing rules, than to confer this jurisdiction on the Judicial Committee; nor could anything be more impossible in practice. The Judicial Committee was only created at the expense of the ordinary tribunals of the country, some of which had to be shut up while it was exercising its functions as a Court of Appeal. The Court of Chancery, for example, had then to be closed, and they were also obliged to draw away one or two common law Judges from their other duties. The Judicial Committee, as at present constituted, was inadequate to the discharge of more than it now accomplished. It had not the power of entertaining a single appeal from any common law or equity court in Westminster Hall; and therefore, when they were about to create a court with a jurisdiction partaking both of common law and equity, it would be an anomalous proceeding to send its judgments to an appellate tribunal different from that to which the other courts were subject. They should adhere, then, to the existing rule, and not establish one that would lead to conflicting decisions. If the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords required amendment, let them amend it when they saw the prospect of their coming to anything like a unanimous conclusion on that subject. But, at all events, the Committee ought not to countenance the present proposal, which would utterly destroy this Bill, and would impose on the Judicial Committee of Privy Council a jurisdiction over a large class of cases which it could not possibly discharge.

Mr. Henley

MR. NAPIER said, that only last week, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Breugham, Lord Wensleydale, and Lord St. Leonards, assisted by the common law Judges, sat to hear appeals in the House of Lords, than which no more efficient or more dignified tribunal could be found in any country in the world. It was said that that House, last Session, almost unanimously condemned the appellate jurisdiction of the Upper Chamber. That was entirely contrary to his own impression of the feeling evinced by the House. Uniformity of decision on questions affecting the property of the country was indispensable, and to secure that object the House of Lords should be their tribunal of last resort.

MR. MALINS begged leave to withdraw his Amendment.

The Committee, however, would not allow it to be withdrawn.

Question put, "That the words 'House of Lords' stand part of the clause."

The Committee divided :—Ayes 271 ; Noes 27 : Majority 244.

On the Question that the clause be agreed to,

MR. MALINS said, he wished the Committee distinctly to understand that he greatly regretted they had had the trouble of dividing. He had been desirous of withdrawing his Amendment, and he thought it was not fair that the division should have been forced upon him under the circumstances.

Clause agreed to, as were the following Clauses to 39 inclusive.

Clause 40 (Probates and Administration may be granted in common form by the District Registrars in certain cases).

MR. WESTHEAD said, he rose to move the omission of the words after the word "affidavit" in line 30, and the insertion of the following words :—"and such probate or letters of administration shall have effect over the personal estate of the deceased in all parts of England accordingly." The object of his Amendment was to enable executors, or persons taking out letters of administration, to do so in the district court whatever the amount of personalty might be. It was stated that four-fifths of the wills proved in England related to amounts below £1,500, and the limitation proposed would be of great practical inconvenience, while he could not conceive what good reason there could be for debarring testators from obtaining probate of wills to any amount of personalty in the district courts.

Amendment proposed, in page 13, line 30, to leave out from the word "affidavit" to the end of the Clause, in order to insert the words "and such Probate or Letters of Administration shall have effect over the personal estate of the deceased in all parts of England accordingly,"—instead thereof.

MR. CAYLEY said, he should support the Amendment, and would appeal to the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), who was a member of the Commission, to explain upon what ground the limit of £1,500 was adopted. In many instances the machinery in one manufactory might be worth £1,500, and in another worth £2,000, and why should the executor of a man whose machinery was worth the former sum be enabled to take out letters of administration in York, while the executors of a person who possessed machinery worth £2,000 was obliged to come to London. The same observation would apply to household furniture, which in many cases was worth £2,000, £3,000, or £4,000, and in such instances probate could not be obtained in the district court, but the wills must be proved in London. Besides, he had another objection, which was founded on the centralizing nature of the Bill.

MR. HENLEY regretted, that he could not give a satisfactory answer to his hon. Friend's question, for he must honestly say that he was unable to assign any reason for the adoption of the limit of £1,500. He (Mr. Henley) divided in the Commission against the limit of £1,500, and he was in a minority of one. He must say, however, that persons whose opinions were entitled to much greater weight than his (Mr. Henley's) were strongly in favour of adopting a lower limit than £1,500, and in several of the Bills which had been introduced or shadowed out of late years, it was proposed that the powers of proving in country districts should be limited to a much lower sum than £1,500. For his own part, he would have been glad to see the limit extended to £2,000, or even higher; but, as some concession must be made when differences of opinion existed, he would rather have this measure with the limitation to £1,500 than run any risk of its defeat. If, however, those who had charge of the Bill would extend the limit, he believed it would be a boon to the country, for £1,500 would not cover the value of stock upon a great proportion of farms.

MR. MOWBRAY said, he would express a hope that the hon. and learned Attorney General would accede to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman, for the only object of the clause seemed to be to take business out of the hands of the proctors in the country, and transfer it to Doctors' Commons. As, however, the clause had reference to "common form" business only, there was necessity for the limit.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he would wish to ascertain from his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General what reason existed for fixing a limit at all. There was just as much necessity for the employment of officers possessing integrity and intelligence in the granting probates of wills in cases in which the sum involved did not exceed £100 as in those in which it reached £10,000. If, then, the same qualifications were required in the former as in the latter cases, why fix a limit? He saw no good reason why it should be done, while there were many strong arguments against the adoption of such a course. The tendency of the present day was to bring the law home to every man's door, in a cheap and efficient manner, and he should like to know why that which was a sound policy had been departed from in the present instance.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the point to which his hon. and learned Friend who had just sat down, as well as the hon. Member who had immediately preceded him, referred, was one which had been the subject of frequent deliberations upon the part of the Commission. That deliberation, he might add, had depended not so much upon the preconceived notions of the members of the Commission as upon the evidence of the very experienced solicitors, and other practitioners who had been examined before them, and all of whom had concurred in representing the great dangers which must attend the unlimited extension of the sum with respect to which probate should be granted in the country districts. He had not been aware that the point would have been pressed so much upon their attention that evening, but since the discussion with reference to it had arisen, he had looked over some passages of the Report of the Commissioners, as well as of the evidence which they had taken, and he found in the Report the following distinct expression of opinion upon the part of the Commissioners:—

“ We think it evident that protection would be best afforded the public by the establishment of a central court in London. The skill and vigilance which are required to guard against fraud and mistakes will be, we think, most certainly possessed by officers in London, under the immediate control of a Judge, to whom they will have an opportunity of applying in any emergency that may arise, and to whom they will be immediately responsible.”

Such was the opinion of the Commissioners, and he might remind the Committee that the practical working of the law as it stood, owing to the doctrine of bona notabilia, was to bring every cause in which the sum involved exceeded £500 or £600 within the jurisdiction of the Prerogative Court. Now, if probate were granted upon an imperfect will, or to the wrong parties, and an executor or administrator were appointed to take possession immediately of the estate of the testator, and it should be afterwards found that probate had been improperly granted, those persons who might have paid money under its operation would have to pay it over again. The question, therefore, was one in which bankers and public companies, as well as the community at large, were deeply concerned, and the Commissioners, taking these matters into consideration, had concurred in the expediency of a thorough and frequent examination of the documents produced being entered into before probate could with any degree of security be granted. One of the witnesses who had been examined before the Commission—he meant Mr. Trevor, of the Legacy Duty Office, a gentleman of great experience and intelligence—stated, in reply to a question which had been put to him, that, in his opinion, one tribunal for the proof of wills would be found more efficient than a great number, in consequence of the uniformity in dealing with those instruments which it would be calculated to produce. He had gone on to say, that since the passing of the Wills Act, he had known probates of wills to be granted in the diocesan courts in cases in which the document had been obliterated, and in which no inquiry had taken place, as to whether the obliteration had occurred before or after the completion of the will. Such was the nature of the proceedings which were sometimes observable in the diocesan courts as they stood, and he did not therefore think that the Committee would be warranted in assuming that each individual registrar would be competent to exercise over wills that same careful superintendence that would be exercised by the officers successively, through whose hands they must pass in the Court of Probate in London. He might also refer to the evidence of Mr. Shepherd, who had been examined before the Commission, and which went to establish the justice of the view which he had urged upon the Committee. The testimony of men of experience in such matters having then been opposed to the continuance of the power of granting probate to an unlimited extent in the case of the diocesan courts, the Commissioners had come to the conclusion that for the benefit of the country districts, liberty should be given the registrars of those courts to grant probates to some fixed amount, but that that liberty ought to be confined within very narrow limits. His right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) was quite right in stating, that several members of the Commission had been desirous to fix that limit at even a lower sum than £1,500, but it had not been deemed expedient to take that course; while he was of opinion that, as great critical nicety, great care, and a knowledge of law were required in dealing with wills, it was desirable that the district registrars should not be intrusted with the granting of probates in cases in which a larger amount was involved. Some limit must be taken, and, if he was not mistaken, the present limit had been fixed by his right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire, who had stated that, in his opinion, the farmers, whose interests would be affected, would rarely be found to possess bona notabilia exceeding the sum of £1,500. [Mr. HENLEY was understood to express his dissent.] He had understood the right hon. Gentleman to have said so, but, be that as it might, he felt perfectly confident that any hon. Gentleman who looked carefully into the evidence which had been taken before the Commissioners, and at their Report, would feel that they had acted wisely in adopting the course which they had pursued. He hoped, therefore, that the Committee would not consent to a proposition, the effect of which would be to subject wills involving large amounts of property to a comparatively insufficient examination.

Mr. Roebuck

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE said, the argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman sought to establish the expediency of a strict reliance being placed upon the evidence of the solicitors and other practitioners who had been examined before the Commission. Now, so far as he (Sir J. Trollope) recollected the evidence which had been adduced before that Commission, it had emanated from persons who were connected with the courts in London, and the whole tendency of whose testimony had been in favour of the system of centralization. His own experience went to prove that the business which had been brought under the consideration of the district courts had been most satisfactorily discharged, and he should wish to know from the hon. and learned Gentleman, whether property which did not exceed a sum of £1,500 was not of as much value to the person who possessed it as a larger sum would be to the person whom the hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to take it for granted would, if he were empowered to do so, seek for probate in the district courts. Now, everybody must be well aware that those who had a large amount of property at stake brought their business up to London. He should like, however, to know why the shopkeeper upon one side of the street, who had property involved only to the amount of £1,000 should be enabled to transact his business at a comparatively trifling expense in the district courts, while a farmer upon the other side, because he happened to possess some hundreds more, should be compelled to resort to the central court in London. He thought the reasoning of the hon. and learned Gentleman in support of this view upon the matter was of a character the most unsound. He objected to any limitation at all, and should, therefore, vote in favour of the Amendment.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he thought the statement of the hon. and learned Attorney General was an argument against the whole Bill, rather than in favour of this particular limitation. He seemed to fancy that there must be some essential difference between the will of a rich man and that of a poor man, and that he was now making an experiment in corpore vili. The hon. and learned Gentleman appeared to think that a testator dying, and leaving property worth only £1,500, was a person so poor and unworthy, that any inefficient officer might administer his estate—but that a man dying worth a greater amount of property required the exercise of a far higher amount of intelligence in the distribution of his effects. But as the hon. and learned Gentleman had talked of evidence, he (Mr. Roebuck) would ask the Committee to look how these matters were managed in America. There they had local courts of probate, which were regarded as great safeguards of the constitution, and appreciated by the whole population. He believed that to make the law local, and not central, would be to make it beloved by the people, and more efficient for the purposes for which it was instituted; and, as he wished to see law cheap, efficient, and brought home to every man's door, he would therefore support the Amendment.

MR. ROLT said, no doubt the estate of the poor man was entitled to as much protection as the estate of the rich, but a mistake committed in dealing with farming stock was more easily remedied than in dealing with funded property. In the former case, an erroneous probate might be recalled before the property was converted; but in the latter, a day, an hour even, might be sufficient to render the mistake irretrievable. Probate might be granted, through carelessness, mistake, or fraud; and, by virtue thereof, £100,000 in the funds might be transferred before the error could be corrected. It was that consideration, therefore, which had led the Committee to the conclusion that, in cases of larger amount, the granting of probate ought to rest with the more efficient and central court. As to the argument, that parties ought to be left to make their own selection, the object here was to prevent those having the choice who had no right to choose.

MR. ROEBUCK said, the hon. and learned Gentleman who last addressed the Committee assumed that all property under the value of £1,500 must necessarily be farming stock, and that all above that sum was money in the funds. He would ask the hon. and learned Gentleman whether a mistake committed in the granting of probate would not be quite as fatal where the money in the funds, which was the subject of it, was below £1,500, as it would be where the sum was £15,000? If they wanted integrity in the administration of an estate above the value of £1,500, he (Mr. Roebuck) contended they wanted it equally with respect to property below that amount. The hon. and learned Gentleman's argument, then, went for nothing.

Question put, "That the words 'and that the personal estate of the deceased' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 131; Noes 162: Majority 31.

MR. AYRTON said, after the decision which had just taken place, it seemed to him that, if probates were in any manner to be taken in the country, they must be sent to the central registrar to be checked. In that case the clause must be modified, and he therefore moved that the Chairman should report progress, in order to give time for further consideration.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the proposition now before the Committee was, that the following words be inserted:—"That such probate, or letter of administration, shall have effect over the personal estate of the deceased in all parts of England accordingly." The practical result of the introduction of these words would be this—that probate granted by the district registrar would extend to personal estate, whether in England, Scotland, or Ireland. One evil thing had been done already. [Laughter]. Hon. Gentlemen might laugh, and undoubtedly those who were desirous of destroying the Bill had cause to do so, but the proposition, if adopted, would utterly destroy the Bill, and it would be impossible to persevere with it. Unless the House should come to some better appreciation of the subject on bringing up the Report, it would be impossible to proceed with the measure. He could not consent to the introduction of the words, or anything fatal to the Bill. If the Motion for the introduction of the words was pressed, the sense of the Committee must be again taken upon them, and it was his determination to give the House the opportunity of deciding whether it would have the Bill at all, by expunging that unfortunate decision.

Mr. Rolt

Motion for reporting progress, being, by leave, withdrawn, the question was put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 141; Noes 139: Majority 2.

House resumed.

Committee report progress; to sit again on Thursday.

SUMMARY PROCEEDINGS BEFORE JUSTICES OF THE PEACE BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause 1 (Justices, on application of a party aggrieved, to state a case for the opinion of a Superior Court).

MR. HENLEY said, he wished to inquire who was to pay the costs of rearguing a case before the Superior Courts at Westminster. He did not think that justices of the peace were of themselves competent to frame cases to be argued before the Superior Courts. Moreover, he thought that the appeals under the Act would throw a great increase of business on the Superior Courts, with regard to which it had been already stated that evening, that they were sufficiently occupied.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that appeals would only take place in the exceptional cases in which difficult points of law were involved, and in which parties might think it worth while to dispute the legality of the decisions of magistrates; and the party appealing would be required to enter into a recognizance conditioned to pay all the costs consequent upon the appeal.

MR. HENLEY said, he would beg to remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that there were many cases in which the complainant would not take the matter before the Court of Queen's Bench.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL thought that it was not likely that there would arise a case in which the defendant would appeal, and the complainant would not think it worth his while to defend it.

MR. HARDY observed, he was anxious to know what the particular evils were which this clause was intended to remedy? The defect of this Bill was that they were bringing before the courts questions of law which might arise before the justices, and yet they did not provide the proper means for doing so. It appeared to him that no case was shown why this clause was necessary.

MR. NAPIER said, he would confess that the Bill, as far as it went, was a good Bill. The proceedings by certiorari were most circuitous and inconvenient. The magistrates who had the power of disposing of the questions before them, would be able to say whether there were any grounds for an appeal. Although the Bill did not meet the whole case, so far as it went it had his hearty consent. He hoped that it would be extended to Ireland.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, that he had considered this Bill carefully, and he so highly approved of it, that he was prepared to support the Amendment to extend it to Ireland. The Court of Quarter Sessions was admitted to be a bad tribunal for determining questions of law. The Bill, therefore, provided that such questions should be tried before a more competent court.

MR. HENLEY said, he did not think it fair that they should cast upon the justices, who were acting in the matter without any pay, the expense of taking those questions before a higher tribunal. It was a very harsh proceeding to impose such a burden upon the magistrate, who had not the slightest personal interest in the matter, and drag him up to town at an expense of some £10 or £20. The Bill did not provide the proper machinery for carrying out the appeal. He would suggest that the cases ought to go through the Home Office.

MR. MASSEY said, practically, there was not at present the means of reversing the decisions of a magistrate on a point of law. The right hon. Gentleman said it was hard to throw upon the magistrate the expense of referring these cases to a higher tribunal, but the party he thought most to be considered was the convicted or injured individuals. That appeared to him to be an inconvenience so unimportant compared with the interests of the party aggrieved by the magisterial decision, that he thought it was scarcely worthy to be taken into consideration. He did not believe that there was any danger of this remedy being abused. A certain amount of expense must be incurred by the party applying for an appeal, which he thought would be in itself a sufficient safeguard against any improper or vexatious proceedings in that direction.

MR. HENLEY said, that the Home Office were the natural protectors of the magistracy, and they had no right to put the latter to the expense of the proceedings on appeal. Let them carry the case up to the House of Lords if they liked, but they had no right to call upon them to pay the expenses of rearguing cases before another tribunal. If a magistrate was wrong either in fact or law, it would be equally a case of injustice to subject gentlemen who were working for nothing to this expense.

MR. NAPIER said, the right hon. Gentleman had misapprehended him. In most cases there were two parties to the question, and those two parties alone would be necessary to be represented before the court. It was for the magistrate to grant the appeal, but he was not bound to follow up the case and go to the expense of supporting his decision in a superior court.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that it was obvious that there was no provision to make both parties follow up the appeal, and if the magistrate refused to allow an appeal he would be liable to the imputation of being a shabby fellow who was afraid to allow an appeal because of the expense.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the same thing might be said of appeals from the Court of Quarter Session. It was his opinion that they could not give the magistrates a large increase of jurisdiction unless an appeal was allowed, nor did he think when one or two cases had been decided, that the appeals would be so numerous as was apprehended. He could mention a case in which a person had been convicted, and sent to prison for a trifling assault. It certainly seemed to him a case for an appeal, but no means were given to the prisoner to carry it out under the present law.

waited upon him, and represented to him that the monopoly which had for some years been established had had the effect of raising in a considerable degree the price of coal, and had prevented employers from procuring the services of workmen so efficient as they would be in a position to obtain if the market were unrestricted; they represented also that the protection was no longer necessary on the ground of morality. Having listened to the reasons which had been put forward by those deputations, he felt himself obliged to concur in the views which they had put forward; but he stated that previous legislation had had for its object the putting a stop to a state of things which all must agree in regarding as being of a very lamentable nature. He had thereupon been assured by the coalowners that they were perfectly willing to establish an office of their own for the registration of the men, and to enter into a written engagement that the coals of London should be whipped only by persons engaged at that office. That proposition of the coalowners the Board of Trade accepted, and he was bound to say that the agreement into which they had entered had been kept in the most exemplary manner on their part. They had established an office, in which a large proportion of the coalwhippers of London were engaged. Some, of course, were engaged by gas companies and private individuals under the old system; but so far as he could ascertain, out of the 1,200 men who were employed in the trade on the Thames 800 were registered at the office to which he referred, while 300 or 400 were engaged in the service of private individuals and of the gas companies. He, for one, would be extremely unwilling to revert to the former state of the law, and reimpose upon coalowners or shippers of coal obligations which were opposed to every sound principle of political economy.

LORD RAVENSWORTH regarded the measure as a special and exceptional piece of legislation. The proposal to refer the subject to a Select Committee was, no doubt, one likely to obtain supporters, but the Bill was one that was opposed to the principles of political economy, and would be subversive of that good feeling which ought always to exist between employer and employed. The public-house arrangement, of which the noble Lord opposite complained, arose from a state of things which had now ceased to exist. In former times the coalowner sold his coals to the shipowner, who shipped them, and sold them wherever he could find a market, and the result was that the shipowner was compelled to make arrangements with the owners of public-houses on the banks of the Thames or other rivers. That state of things had, however, been completely put an end to, and the coalowners were at present as much opposed to the public-house arrangement as any one else could be. The only cases which had been adduced in support of the Bill were entirely of an exceptional character, and he could not admit that instances of abuse furnished any ground for interfering between employer and employed in the mode proposed by this Bill.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, in reply to the suggestion that this was, in reality, not a public but a private Bill, he would observe that the Act which it proposed to continue (the 14 & 15 Vict.) was itself a continuance of a former measure, and that both these had been treated as public Bills or Acts. He thought that the House should grant the Select Committee, which was all that was now asked for, leaving open for future consideration whether they should pass the Bill itself. He thought it was a sufficient case in support of this Bill that they had a class of laborious men employed in a most toilsome business, to whom they had formerly given the protection of the Legislature, and who asked that that protection should still be continued to them to save them from the greatest evils to which men could be subjected; and he certainly did think that the House was bound to inquire into the case presented on their behalf. This measure would not interfere between employer and employed. It only protected the labour market from the tyranny which the possession of certain advantages on the spot gave to publicans and others, and which would, if the men are not protected, interfere with the freedom of the labour market.

EARL GRANVILLE was understood to contend that the arguments of the right rev. Prelate were wholly insufficient to induce the House to assent to the course suggested, and to urge their Lordships to reject the Motion for referring the Bill to a Select Committee.

LORD COLCHESTER supported the Motion for referring the question to a Select Committee.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he had expected to hear from some Member of the Government a distinct explanation of the manner in which the existing law had failed to satisfy just expectations, and why it should not be renewed. Instead of that, however, the President of the Board of Trade had dealt in mere generalities, and had not shown, in any way, how the old law damaged the interests either of the coal-owners or the coal-whippers. Upon the point of order—as to whether this was a private or a public Bill—he should like to have the opinion of the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees.

Lord Stanley of Alderley

LORD KINNAIRD said, that unless he had an assurance from the Government that they would grant a Select Committee to consider the whole subject, he would divide the House upon his Motion.

LORD REDESDALE said, he was inclined to think that the Bill was a public Bill. Former Bills on the same subject had passed as public Bills. There was certainly a clause in it which was a privilege clause—the 15th—inasmuch as it gave power to levy rates.

On Question, their Lordships divided:—Contents 31; Not-Contents 27: Majority 4.

Resolved in the affirmative; The Committee to be named on Thursday next.

CONTENTS.

Manchester, D.	Berners, L.
Newcastle, D.	Brodrick, L. ( V. Middleton. )
Norfolk, D.	Calthorpe, L.
Bath, M.	Colchester, L. [ Teller. ]
Exeter, M.	Congleton, L.
Amherst, E.	Monteagle of Brandon, L.
Belmore, E.	Moore, L. ( M. Drogheda. )
Malmesbury, E.	Oriel, L. ( V. Massereene. )
Pomfret, E.	Polwarth, L.
Powis, E.	Rossie, L. ( L. Kinnaird. )
Selkirk, E.	[ Teller. ]
Shaftesbury, E.	Silchester, L. ( E. Longford. )
Stanhope, E.	Somerhill, L. ( M. Clancricarde. )
Gordon, V. ( E. Aberdeen. )	Vaux of Harrowden, L.
Hutchinson, V. ( E. Donoughmore. )	Wynford, L.
Chichester, Bp.
Oxford, Bp.

NOT-CONTENTS.

Cranworth, L. ( L. Chancellor. )	Harrowby, E.
Cleveland, D.	Ilchester, E.
Breadalbane, M.	Spencer, E.
Lansdowne, M.	Vane, E.
Townshend, M.	Combermere, V.
Granville, E.	Dungannon, V.
	Hardinge, V.
	Sydney, V.

Aveland, L.	Panmure, L.
Belper, L.	Ponsonby, L. ( E. Bessborough. ) [ Teller. ]
Churchill, L.	Ravensworth, L.
Clandeboye, L. ( L. Dufferin and Claneboye. )	Stanley of Alderley, L.
Downes, L.	Sundridge, L. ( D. Argyll. )
Foley, L. [ Teller. ]	Wensleydale, L.
Lovel and Holland, L. ( E. Egmont. )

COUNTY COURTS.

RETURNS MOVED FOR.

LORD BROUGHAM rose to call their Lordships' attention to the very important subject of the administration of justice in the County Courts. It was highly satisfactory to find that the favour with which the public regarded these courts, instead of decreasing or even standing still, had very much increased. The number of complaints brought in had very greatly increased from 1852 to 1855. There were many defects, however, connected with these courts—for instance, the mode of paying the Judges was intolerable;—one Judge received a salary of one amount, and another of another; yet, notwithstanding the increased labours of the learned Judges in these courts, it was proposed in future to reduce all their salaries to the lower amount. It had been alleged by the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack, as a reason for this step, there were always far more applicants than were required to fill up a vacancy; but that was a very bad test; it was one that might be made applicable to the most important offices, even to the very highest in this country, and ought not to be urged in any case whatever as a reason for giving small remuneration. He must inform their Lordships that there was one point with regard to which he had received many representations even from those most friendly to these County Courts, and that was the great diversity which prevailed among the Judges as to the employment of deputies. Some of the learned Judges, to their infinite credit, performed the whole business themselves; others generally speaking performed the duties, but occasionally employed deputies; and there were others who employed them still more. Now, the return which he wished to move for was a return for the last twelve months of all the sittings of the courts, the number of days which each Judge sat, the number of days they sat by deputy, with the name and description of each deputy so employed. He must say he regretted that, while we were extending the duties and jurisdiction of these Judges, and while from a variety of causes the business they had to discharge was constantly on the increase, such a time should be taken not to extend, but to lessen the amount of their remuneration. The noble and learned Lord concluded by moving—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Return of the Number of Days that each Judge in every County Court in England and Wales, established under the 9th & 10th Vict. Cap. 95, has sat in Person, and the Number of Days he has acted by Deputy, with the Names and Description of the Deputy, for the Year 1855; distinguishing the Circuits and the Places in each Circuit in which the Courts were holden, and setting forth any other public Duty in consequence of which Leave of acting by Deputy was given.”

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he saw no objection to the production of the returns asked for by his noble and learned Friend. As to the appointment of deputies, the existing regulation by statute was that each County Court Judge should be entitled, with the sanction of the Lord Chancellor, to two months' holidays in the year; and the deputy whom he appointed to act in his absence must be a barrister of a certain prescribed standing, whose nomination was also approved by the Lord Chancellor. The two months' leave was not necessarily two consecutive months, that limitation being merely intended to define the whole time to be allowed a Judge within the year. County Court Judges, like all other official persons, required periodical relaxation from their duties, and he must say that they had evinced no disposition to shirk the heavy amount of work which had been cast upon them. The returns for which his noble and learned Friend moved would no doubt show how far illness, unavoidable accident, and other causes accounted for the absence of the Judges from their respective courts. He begged to add his testimony to that of his noble and learned Friend to the indefatigable manner in which these learned gentlemen applied themselves to their arduous labours. We had now had ten years' experience of the working of the county court system, and it was incumbent on the Government to take an early opportunity of revising the arrangements originally made for carrying out that system, with a view, if possible, to distribute the duties of these Judges more equally.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at Seven o'clock, to Thursday next, half-past Ten o'clock.

Lord Brougham

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, July 7, 1857.

MINUTE.] NEW MEMBER SWORN.—For Banff, Lachlan Duff Gordon, esq.

BURIAL ACTS AMENDMENT BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, there was always an inconvenience in discussing the principle of the Bill in Committee, but as this was one of the many Bills, the principle of which was not discussed until that period, he would take that opportunity of saying a few words with reference to it. The measure was intended materially to extend the operations of burial boards, and to place great additional powers of centralization in the hands of the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Its effect would be to suppress the voice of the ratepayers, at the same time that it would entail upon them very great expense. Nominally the Bill emanated from the Secretary of State; but it came before the House somewhat in masquerade. Looking at the previous Acts of the Board of Health, it appeared to him that this was one of the measures of that Board, for its provisions were characterized by the same degree of stringency that had marked those Acts. He was wont to regard with confidence the general departments of the State; but that one department had never, under any of the guises it had assumed—whether as a Commission or as a Board—commanded the respect and confidence of the country; and he thought there were many provisions in the Bill which might well be postponed, especially as there was another Bill before the House, the object of which was to suppress this Board altogether, and constitute a new authority in regard to matters of health. Had they not better wait, therefore, until that new authority was constituted? He was in hopes that if they had not greater talent, they would at least have more forbearance and common sense brought to bear upon the subject. There were many provisions in the Bill which were based upon an utter want of knowledge of facts, and the grievances which were felt throughout the country; and enormous expense would be incurred by the operations of boards of guardians, who might constitute themselves burial boards, and create burial-grounds, build chapels, and in fact involve the ratepayers in a variety of serious expenses. Besides, the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 79, already actually contained provisions for the burial of the poor sent to workhouses, and the enactments in the present Bill would only tend to aggravate the prejudices already existing against the Poor Law; and the reluctance of poor persons who were in distress to enter the union house, by not only separating them from their friends whilst living, but likewise when dead. So, also, with regard to lunatic asylums, he did not see why the provisions in the Act he had referred to would not be sufficient for the visitation of those institutions. In his opinion, also, the Bill carried the principle of centralization much too far. It was not at all well-considered, and authorized the Home Office to interfere in a thousand petty ways, to the great dissatisfaction of the country; indeed, it seemed to him as if the first object of the board was the removal of the supervision of the ratepayers.

MR. MASSEY said, the hon. Baronet was mistaken in supposing that any new principle with regard to burials was introduced by the Bill. Its object was simply to remedy some defects which long experience had proved to exist, and which had greatly retarded the successful operation of the present laws. The measure had not, as the hon. Baronet appeared to think, emanated from the Board of Health at all, but from that department of the Government which was entrusted with the administration of those laws. It had been compiled after careful consideration of the different representations and suggestions which had been made to the Home Office during the last three or four years, as to the actual practical difficulties experienced in administering these laws, and which, of course, had the best means of forming an opinion as to their defects. A great number of these suggestions and objections the Government did not think of sufficient importance to be the subject of legislation; and it was upon the consideration of a careful selection which had been made of the chief practical difficulties only, that the several clauses had been framed. The real object was, to facilitate and render easy the action of a very important law, which, up to this time, had been extremely successful, considering the obstructions which had impeded its progress. The law certainly was one of a stringent character, and was only excusable on the necessity of the case. It had been assented to, on the whole, with good sense and good feeling, and he believed that the practical effect of it had been greatly to promote and improve the sanitary condition of the country. The hon. Gentleman had referred to the Board of Health, as if this Bill had emanated from that not very popular department. He again assured him, however, that they had had nothing to do with its preparation any more than they had had anything to do with the administration of the Burial Act, which, in fact, was entirely in the hands of the Home Office. Indeed, in no case had the Board of Health been consulted in reference to the provisions of the Bill. It had been found better to avail themselves of existing organizations instead of creating new boards for every new set of circumstances that might arise; and the Bill enabled that to be done, but it was not intended that local boards should have power to tax the ratepayers without their consent. The power of taxation would only be conferred upon them on the representation of a certain proportion of the ratepayers to the Home Secretary, expressing a desire to that effect. The hon. Gentleman had referred to the authority given to boards of guardians to provide new burial-grounds. That clause was founded upon considerations of practical convenience. It had been repeatedly represented to the Home Office that small parishes in the neighbourhood of union workhouses had had their grave-yards inconveniently overcrowded by paupers, and that those burial-grounds had been subjected to the visits of the inspectors, who, finding that they had been prematurely filled, had ordered them to be closed. By this means the parishes had been subjected to the inconvenience and expense of providing new burial-grounds. It was thought, therefore, that in places where large union workhouses were established, the board of guardians should, if they thought fit—and the clause was not compulsory, but entirely permissive—provide a piece of ground for the interment of the inmates of the workhouse. He could assure the hon. Baronet, however, that it was by no means intended by the Bill to do violence to the feelings of the inmates or their friends. The whole principle of the Burial Act was, that the supervision of the Secretary of State should be exercised, and that supervision would not be extended by the Bill further than it went at present. He hoped the House would now go into Committee, as it was most important that the Bill should become law.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that what had fallen from the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Massey) had convinced him that important principles were involved in the Bill. He, therefore, wished to know if it was intended that a poor person who had died in a union-house should be buried in the workhouse burial-ground against his consent—at all events, against the consent of his friends. That was a most important point; and he hoped the Home Secretary would clearly explain what was the intention of the Government respecting it, because, if it were so intended, he should oppose the clause to the utmost of his power. The attempt to provide a separate burial-ground for paupers had been tried before, and had failed; and he trusted it would not succeed now. There was nothing which hurt the feelings of the poor more than being prevented from being buried among their kindred. He should be glad to know if the right hon. Gentleman would consent to the introduction of a proviso to the effect that where a wish had been expressed by the deceased person on the subject in his lifetime, or by his friends after his death, he should be buried in his own parish, and not in the workhouse burial-ground.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, he understood that the law at present enabled boards of guardians to provide burial-grounds for union-houses; he could not, therefore, see the object of inserting such a clause as this in the Bill.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that when they got into Committee, he hoped to show the hon. Baronet that the clause alluded to by him was not all of a penal character, but intended to meet those instances in which parish graveyards had been prematurely filled by the burial of the inmates of workhouses, and, in consequence, had been ordered to be closed by the public health inspectors, thereby involving the parish in considerable expense. The object of the clause, therefore, was to enable boards of guardians to establish cemeteries of their own, and which cemeteries were not provided under the existing law applicable to other cemeteries. These would contain a portion of consecrated as well as unconsecrated ground, in order that the burial of the paupers should be conducted there in the same way, and with the same regard for the feelings of the relatives as if it took place in their own parish ground. He would, however, confirm the statement of his hon. Friend (Mr. Massey) with regard to the object of the Bill—that it was not to give increased powers, but to give greater facilities for the working of Acts already in existence.

MR. KNIGHT contended, that the Bill did involve a new and a very objectionable principle. The first Burial Act was as thoroughly local as could be wished, but as Act after Act passed, the power of the Secretary of State increased and spread over the whole country. The regulations made were not such as he had a right to make, for out of nineteen regulations there were only four for which he had a direct authority. But whilst the Home Office was bringing in this Bill to place all burial-grounds and churchyards under the Secretary of State, the hon. Gentleman's own borough of Salford was getting a Bill passed through the House, which empowered the authorities of that borough to make regulations for themselves. So that all England was to be placed under the regulations of the Home Office with the single exception of Salford. A new principle was involved in the Bill, inasmuch as it enabled the Secretary of State, by his inspectors, to take in hand, with the exception mentioned, every churchyard in England. If regulations were wanted as to the burial of the dead, let the country parishes make them for themselves. Indeed, the country heartily desired that the Government would let it alone in this matter.

MR. H. BERKELEY: The present discussion showed how necessary it was that the Home Secretary should have very broad shoulders, and how difficult it was to please hon. Members on all occasions. He recollected very well, when the country was suffering from pestilence, that hon. Gentlemen were constantly attacking the Secretary for the time being, and asking him why he did not do this, and why he did not do that. In fact, all the malaria passing through the country was attributed to the want of precaution on the part of the Secretary of State; but the moment the pestilence ceased up they jumped, and declared that they were perfectly capable of governing themselves, and begged to be let alone to manage their own affairs. Now, the fault he (Mr. Berkeley) found with the Bill was, that it would not leave sufficient power in the Secretary of State. He hoped, therefore, the House would consent to go into Committee. He objected, however, to a proposed clause, giving power to bury four persons in one grave, which was called pit-burial.

MR. DILLWYN said, that in all cases where the Church was concerned, so long as there was a connection between the Church and the State in this country, so long it would be necessary to have the civil power to appeal to in order to protect the minority in different local districts against the encroachments of ecclesiastical authority. On that ground, and also because he thought that the Home Secretary had very discreetly exercised the powers already vested in him, he should vote for going into Committee on the Bill.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, that he rose to order, as these observations ought to have been made on the second reading, and now there was no Motion before the House but that of going into Committee. He hoped the Government would carry forward those clauses relating to the sanitary condition of the metropolis. The observations upon details of the Bill should be made in Committee. He trusted, however, that they would not sanction the system of pit-burials.

MR. BARROW observed, that he was of opinion that the principle of centralization was attempted to be carried too far by the Bill. It was a serious question whether the feelings of the country with regard to the manner in which burials should be conducted ought to be subjected to the despotic interference of any individual, however high his position in the Government, or however high his personal character might be. He thought, also, they were quite justified in discussing the principle of the Bill, as hon. Members could not be expected to stay in the House until a late hour to be present at the second reading.

House in Committee.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clause 3, line 16.

MR. KNIGHT moved, to leave out "upon the petition of not less than one-tenth of the inhabitants," as far as "relief of the poor," line 19, and insert "in case it appear to Her Majesty in Council, upon the petition of the Local Board of Health of any district established under the Public Health Act."

SIR GEORGE GREY assented to the Amendment.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 also agreed to.

Clause 5 (Boards of Guardians to create workhouse Burial-Grounds).

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, that if, in addition to the separate system in union-houses, there was a separate burial-ground, the only result would be to increase the prejudice and dislike already entertained on the part of the poor to enter those establishments. By a recent Act, the 18 & 19 Vict., c. 79, boards of guardians were empowered to enlarge existing burial-grounds and churchyards, and to agree with the local authorities, and make arrangements by which such burial-grounds should be made proper for the interment of the inmates of workhouses. That power, in his opinion, was quite sufficient for boards of guardians and visiting justices of lunatic asylums to possess. If the clause were enacted, its effect would be to create an enormous expense—in short, there was no knowing to what extent the works might be carried on. Great evil would arise to both ratepayers and paupers; and he should, therefore, move that the clause be struck out.

MR. BARROW remarked, that if the clause were retained, he trusted, at all events, that some provision would be inserted in it enabling the friends of the poor person deceased to require the body to be interred in the graveyard of his own parish.

MR. WALTER said, he thought that, where a churchyard was overcrowded, a simpler course than that proposed by the clause was to give power to enlarge it. Where that could not be done additional ground should be provided, equally accessible to the rich and the poor. He had a very strong feeling on the subject. He knew no case to which that text of Scripture which said, "the rich and poor meet together; the Lord is the maker of them all," should be so applicable as in that of churchyards. He wished to know what was the definition of "a pauper" according to this Bill. Was it meant to include those who received outdoor relief, as well as those who were inmates of a workhouse? There certainly could be nothing more monstrous than that a person receiving outdoor relief should, on his death, be subject to be buried in one of these new-fangled burial-grounds. It seemed to him (Mr. Walter) that the clause was unnecessary. He felt assured that it would be very hurtful to the feelings of the people of this country.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the clause was not compulsory; but as there was a strong feeling against it, he had no objection to its being struck out.

Clause struck out.

Clause 6 agreed to.

Clause 7 omitted.

Clauses 8 to 15 inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 16 (Orders in Council may be made for regulating Burial-Grounds, &c.).

MR. KNIGHT objected to the clause, which was the most objectionable one in the Bill. It proposed to make the orders of the Home Secretary more stringent, and entailed 10s. penalty for disobedience. The clause would also fix inspectors all over the country for all eternity. He should move, in page 6, Clause 16, line 30, to leave out from "it shall be lawful," as far as "seem proper," line 33.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the great object of the clause was to give the Secretary of State power to make regulations for burials in cemeteries, so that they might be conducted with some regard to decency. Complaints had been made, for instance, that in the Victoria Cemetery at the east end of the town public decency was outraged by burying a number of persons in one grave.

MR. AYRTON remarked, that no necessity had been shown for giving this power to the Secretary of State.

MR. BARROW thought the clause ought to provide that local bodies should have power to make their own regulations.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. LOCKE KING said, he would move, as a proviso, that no more than one body should be buried in any vault or grave in any cemetery or burial-ground within the metropolitan districts, except in a vault or grave purchased for the exclusive use of the family.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 8, to insert after the words "Burial-Ground," the words "Provided always, That no more than one body shall be buried in any vault or grave, in any cemetery or burial-ground within the Metropolitan District, except in a vault or grave purchased for the exclusive use of a family."

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he believed in the abstract, that only one body ought to be buried in a grave; but it would operate as a great hardship on the proprietors of many of the existing cemeteries who had private Acts of Parliament to put such a provision in force. It would be better, therefore, to leave the matter in the hands of the Home Secretary.

VISCOUNT EBRINGTON observed, he should support the Amendment, as he did not see that the existing cemetery companies had so conducted their affairs as to entitle them to any especial consideration on the part of this House.

MR. AYRTON said, he should oppose the Amendment. The powers vested in the Secretary of State would be quite sufficient for all purposes.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, that six persons had, up to this time, been placed in a grave without any public inconvenience, and he saw no necessity, therefore, for adopting the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Surrey.

MR. MASSEY said, the Secretary of State had no power at present over the cemeteries belonging to joint-stock companies, and it had been found that public decency had been grossly abused in several instances. It was stated that large pits were dug and bodies flung in, and scarcely covered with earth until the pit was filled with bodies. The object of the clause was to take away the power of doing this, which had been given to the cemetery companies; but inasmuch as the companies had the power now, he should propose that six bodies might be placed in one grave, provided the grave were opened and closed the same day. He confessed it was not without reluctance that he had agreed to that, but they ought not to drive principles too hard; and, considering the great variety of soils, and the pressure for burial accommodation in several parishes, he thought it might well be left in the hands of the Secretary of State, under the advice of the inspectors, to relax the rule when circumstances justified it. They could not deal with these companies in the same manner as they dealt with other burial-grounds. With regard to the Salford Bill he had nothing to do with it, but he saw the provisions of the Bill last night, and approved of them.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, if this clause were struck out, he should have no objection to the whole Bill being thrown out. A friend of his saw the bodies of sixty or seventy children thrown into one pit. The proprietors of the companies said they had a vested interest, but he did not think they should be listened to. They had been reaping a rich harvest in consequence of the closing of the other graveyards, and now they wished to keep up a revolting practice which was inimical to the public health, in order that they might continue to make great gains.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he had been spoken of as representing the Woking Cemetery. It was true he was a director of that company, and he would say of it that it only permitted one body to be buried in one grave. He thought pit-burials ought not to be allowed. They were alike an outrage to public decency and an injury to public health.

MR. CLAY said, he should support the clause as it stood.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT suggested that words should be inserted confining the power to cases where there was no burial board.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, it would be better to decide on the Amendment first, as on that depended the question whether they were to have any power at all.

MR. KNIGHT said, if the clause were confined to those commercial burial companies over which the burial boards had no control, he should have no objection.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 33; Noes 188: Majority 155.

MR. MASSEY moved the following Amendment to the Clause:—

"Provided also, That such regulations shall not prohibit the burial of any number of bodies, not exceeding six, in the same common grave on the same day in any of the Cemeteries mentioned in Schedule (B) of the Act 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85, or in any cemetery established in pursuance of any Act of Parliament, provided that every coffin so buried shall be separated from any other coffin by at least a foot of earth, and be buried at least four feet below the surface of the ground, and provided that such grave shall be filled in on the day of burial and never again opened until the remains of the bodies buried therein shall be completely decayed."

MR. MILES said, he regretted that the Government should have yielded to what he thought was not a very sanitary pressure by introducing the word "six" as the number of bodies which might be interred in the same grave. As the proviso stood originally, it had the word "four." He begged to propose, therefore, that "four" be inserted for "six."

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, to leave out the word "six," and insert the word "four," instead thereof.

MR. MASSEY admitted that experience showed that the system of burying one body in a grave was the best and most salutary one; but then it must not be forgotten that they had to deal with a number of cemeteries which had private Acts of their own, and were exempt from the Burial Acts.

MR. CLAY said, the reason why "six" had been inserted was, that many of the cemetery companies had made contracts with poor-law unions to bury six in one grave, and he did not think that that would be prejudicial to public health.

Question put, "That the word 'six' stand part of the proposed Amendment."

The Committee divided:—Ages 79; Noes 131: Majority 52.

Clause agreed to.

House resumed. Committee report progress; to sit again on Thursday at Twelve o'clock.

SCOTCH SALMON FISHERIES.

QUESTION.

MR. CAIRD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of the Treasury, whether any progress has been made since February, 1853, in obtaining a decision by the House of Lords of the case of "Gammell against the Crown;" and whether the advantage of the right of salmon fisheries on the whole seacoast of Scotland, therein involved, has for four years been lost to the public revenue by the postponement of the above case?

MR. WILSON said, the appeal in the case referred to was heard in the House of Lords in 1853. No decision was yet given, but the House of Lords had recently intimated that they desired that the case should be re-argued, though they had not yet appointed a day for the purpose. Of course it was not within the power of the officers of the Crown to hasten on these proceedings; they must wait until a day was fixed by the Lords to hear the case. As to the question, whether the revenue of the Crown would suffer a loss by this delay, that must depend entirely upon the conclusion at which the House of Lords arrived.

SURVEY OF TOWNS—QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO said, that before putting the question of which he had given notice to his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury, he would state, that when the survey of the rural districts was made on the six-inch scale, that of the towns was conducted on the scale of five feet to the mile; but when the six-inch scale was abandoned in the rural districts, a corresponding increase was made in the towns, which were thenceforward surveyed on the scale of ten feet. As the six-inch scale was now abandoned in the rural districts, he, therefore, wished to ask, upon what scale it is now intended to proceed with the survey of towns in Great Britain and Ireland?

MR. WILSON said, that when it was the practice to survey the counties on the six-inch scale, the survey of the towns was made on the scale of five feet to the mile. When the survey of the rural districts was extended to the scale of twenty-five inches, the survey of the towns was raised to the scale of ten feet to the mile. It had gone on to the present time, and was now proceeding on that scale. It was quite obvious that the surveys in progress must be completed on that scale. As to those not yet begun, the scale to be adopted would depend on what might be resolved on by that House. No alteration had been made in consequence of the Resolution come to the other night with regard to the Scotch survey.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY—QUESTION.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of the Treasury, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to remove the Royal Academy from that portion which it now occupies of the National Gallery in Trafalgar Square?

MR. WILSON replied, that the whole matter was at the present time undecided, because the Report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into it had not yet been received by the Government. He was not aware, however, of any intention existing at the present time to remove the Royal Academy from the building it now occupied. Certainly, no such decision had been come to.

THE ISTHMUS OF SUEZ CANAL. QUESTION.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he wished to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, whether Her Majesty's Government will use its influence with His Highness the Sultan in support of an application which has been made by the Viceroy of Egypt for the sanction of the Sublime Porte to the construction of a Ship Canal across the Isthmus of Suez, for which a concession has been granted by the Viceroy of Egypt to Monsieur Ferdinand de Lesseps, and which has received the approbation of the principal cities, ports, and commercial towns of the United Kingdom; and, if any objections be entertained by Her Majesty's Government to the undertaking, to state the grounds of such objection?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, Her

Majesty's Government certainly cannot undertake to use their influence with the Sultan to induce him to give permission for the construction of this canal, because for the last fifteen years Her Majesty's Government have used all the influence they possess at Constantinople and in Egypt to prevent that scheme from being carried into execution. It is an undertaking which, I believe, in point of commercial character, may be deemed to rank among the many bubble schemes that from time to time have been palmed upon gullible capitalists. I have been informed, on what I believe to be reliable authority, that it is physically impracticable, except at an expense which would be far too great to warrant any expectation of any returns. I believe, therefore, that those who embarked their money in any such undertaking (if my hon. Friend has any constituents who are likely to do so) would find themselves very grievously deceived by the result. However, that is not the ground upon which the Government have opposed the scheme. Private individuals are left to take care of their own interests, and if they embark in impracticable undertakings they must pay the penalty of so doing. But the scheme is founded in hostility to the interests of this country—opposed to the standing policy of England in regard to the connection of Egypt with Turkey—a policy which has been consecrated by the late war, and issue of that war—the Treaty of Paris. The obvious political tendency of the undertaking is to render more easy the separation of Egypt from Turkey. It is founded, also, on remote speculations with regard to easier access to our Indian possessions, which I need not more distinctly shadow forth, because they will be obvious to anybody who pays any attention to the subject. I can only express my surprise that M. Ferdinand de Lesseps should have reckoned so much on the credulity of English capitalists, as to think that by his progress through the different commercial towns in this country he should succeed in obtaining English money for the promotion of a scheme which is every way so adverse and hostile to British interests. That scheme was launched, I believe, about fifteen years ago, as a rival to the railway from Alexandria by Cairo to Suez, which, being infinitely more practicable and likely to be more useful, obtained the pre-eminence. M. de Lesseps is a very persevering gentleman, and may have great engineering skill at his command. At all events, he pursues his scheme very steadily, though I am disposed to think, that probably the object which he and some others of the promoters have in view will be accomplished, even if the whole of the undertaking should not be carried into execution. If my hon. friend the Member for Bristol and his friends will take my advice, they will have nothing to do with the scheme in question.

METROPOLITAN TURNPIKES. QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR said, he wished to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is the intention of the Government to take steps towards the appointment of Commissioners to inquire into the best method of removing the toll-bars now situated in the metropolis, pursuing the plan which was adopted in regard to those in the metropolis of Ireland and its vicinity.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that no doubt it would be very desirable to accomplish the object which his noble Friend had in view, and that it should therefore receive the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. He was not, however, prepared at present to state the method by which it would be best attained, but the Government would place themselves in communication with the trustees of the metropolitan turnpikes to see what measures would be necessary.

BRITISH MERCHANTS AT ULEABORG. QUESTION.

MR. ADAMS said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce any measure enabling them to grant compensation to British merchants whose property at Uleaborg, in the Gulf of Bothnia, was destroyed on the 2nd of June, 1854, by the boats of a squadron under the command of Admiral Plumridge.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that the proceedings in this matter must be regulated by the principle which he had stated to be an international principle when a question arose some time ago as to the losses sustained by British subjects at Greytown. He then stated the principle of international law to be that persons who were domiciled in a foreign country must abide by the fate of that country in peace and war, and that therefore no demand could properly be made upon the American Government for losses sustained by British subjects in Greytown in consequence of hostilities which took place between the United States and Granada. The same principle applied to the case to which the hon. Gentleman now referred. There were certain British subjects, and probably the subjects of other States, who were domiciled or had property in the Russian territory. Those persons must take the chance of the protection of the Russian Empire; and if by any circumstance the place where their property was situated became the scene of hostile operations no claim could possibly be set up by those persons, whatever country they might belong to, against the Government whose forces carried on the hostilities by which they had been made to suffer.

BENGAL MILITARY FUND. COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

VISCOUNT GODERICH said, that although it was not his intention to press the Motion which stood in his name for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the relations existing between the East India Company and the Bengal Military Fund, he thought it due to the officers of the Bengal army that he should state publicly the reasons for the course which he proposed to take, and in order that he might not infringe the rules of the House he should conclude his observations by moving, pro formâ, the Resolution of which he had given notice. The fund in question had been established among the officers of the Bengal branch of the Indian army to afford assistance to those officers under certain circumstances and to provide pensions for their widows and children, and it was supported partly by subscriptions from the officers themselves and partly by assistance which was afforded them in various ways by the East India Company. Certain differences had lately arisen between the managers and the Company with respect to the fund, and in consequence he had undertaken to bring the subject under the consideration of the House. In the course of last week, however, those gentlemen in this country who represented the fund called upon him and stated that, owing to the news which had arrived ten days ago from India, and to the unhappy condition of affairs in the Presidency of Bengal, they were most reluctant that any steps should be taken emanating from vate society. Now, I believe that this is the result of an influence emanating from the existence of a Lord Lieutenant in Ireland. I believe that the existence in Dublin of that functionary keeps apart all the elements of society in Ireland. It is a sort of negative electricity. Now, Sir, I would ask, in the first place, what is the expense caused by this tinsel monarch? My late friend Mr. Hume said, and, I believe, truly, that it took £100,000 a year to keep up that sham monarch. But that is not all. There is a divided responsibility. I would ask, how is Ireland governed now? First, there is the Home Secretary, a Cabinet Minister; next, there is the Lord Lieutenant, who is not a Cabinet Minister, but a Viceroy; and then there is the Secretary for Ireland, who has a seat in this House. All these three persons are really the governors of Ireland, but not one of them is in connection with the other, and nobody is responsible for anything done. I say that this is a great mischief. The Lord Lieutenant is a mere sham. He goes to Ireland, and what does he do? There are certain functions of government that belong to the Imperial Government of the country, and which ought to be discharged at the seat of empire. Now, the Imperial Government ought to be here. I know I am saying that which to Irish ears is grating and harsh, but recollect that we have before our eyes the example of a country united with England under far different circumstances from those in which Ireland was united—namely, Scotland. Now, Dublin is at present no further from London than Edinburgh, but at the time when Scotland was united with England, Edinburgh was in reality three weeks' journey from London, and then no Viceroy was placed in Scotland. See the change effected by the electric telegraph and the railways—Dublin is brought within eleven or twelve hours' communication with London. Compare that with the three weeks' journey to Edinburgh when Scotland was made an integral part of England. Let not, then, any Irish Gentleman suppose that I mean anything offensive. What I mean is that Ireland should be part of England—really a part, and I think I may appeal to my own political career to show that I do not want to impose on Ireland anything which England does not bear. I want an equal law for Irishmen and Englishmen. I do not want the distinction of Irishmen to exist. Cork ought to be like York. There ought to be no difference between the great county of York and the great county of Cork, except that one is somewhat more distant from London than the other; but to tell me that there is any difficulty in governing Ireland in consequence of its distance, is to tell me that our forefathers were unable to govern Scotland. Now, is that true? Has not the union of Scotland with England been of the greatest benefit to both countries, and more especially to the former country? Depended upon it—however painful it may be to Irish Gentlemen to hear such an opinion—the union of Ireland and England would be attended with the utmost benefit to Ireland. The history of this country, so far as Ireland is concerned, up to within a very few years, I am willing to admit, has been a disgrace to England. Cruelty, usurpation, despotism, as regards Ireland, have marked every step of English dominion; but, since we have had a Reformed Parliament, only two really offensive Acts applying to Ireland have been passed. I opposed both those Acts. The one was the Irish Coercion Act; the other was the Ecclesiastical Titles Act. Nobody opposed the latter measure more strenuously than I did. I think mine was the first voice raised against the proposal, and if there be any mischief arising from that Act, I think its consequences will defend Ireland from any repetition of such a measure. What have we seen within a few days past? We have seen a right rev. Prelate of the Catholic Church of Ireland claiming the title of Archbishop of Tuam, and you have not dared to put in force the Act of Parliament you were foolish enough to pass. He boldly asserted that he was Archbishop of Tuam. Now, if any offence can be committed under the Act, this is one. Is there any man bold enough—is there any man insane enough—to endeavour to enforce that Act against the right rev. Prelate? I perceive, by the working of the face of my hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner), that he does not like this. I take it to be one of the strongest proofs of the truth of what I assert, that although the right rev. Prelate has called himself Archbishop of Tuam, even my hon. Friend, who entertains such strong feelings on the subject, does not dare to put in operation the provisions of the Act. I say, then, that Ireland is safe, and that no intervention of this kind will be repeated. Now, what injury, or what insult, I ask, can possibly arise to Ireland from the abolition of the office of Lord Lieutenant? I have been threatened with opposition by my hon. Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Grogan), and I can understand why he opposes my proposal. He represents Dublin. He represents the milliners; and I can understand that those ladies will be very strongly opposed to any proposal which will abolish the sham of the Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland. There is, however, something I cannot understand, and that is, why my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Yarmouth (Mr. M'Cullagh) intends to move "the previous question" upon my proposition. Now, what is "the previous question?" It is, in fact, saying, "I agree in what you say, but the time at which you propound your doctrine is unpropitious." That is the real meaning of "the previous question;" but I ask this House—I ask right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench—is the present an unpropitious time for bringing this question under the consideration of Parliament? Is not Ireland quiet? Is there not peace throughout the whole of that country? Are not all the various classes of Ireland in a prosperous condition? I venture to say that if, at any time you could propound with safety a change in the Government of Ireland, it is at the present moment, and I am therefore astonished at the course which my hon. and learned Friend intends to adopt. I could understand a bold, persistent denial of the value of the change which I propose: I should not have much regard for the intellect of the man who ventured such denial, but still I should understand it. I cannot, however, understand an hon. Gentleman who says, "I admit the truth of your proposition, but I think you bring it forward at an unpropitious period." Unpropitious! Why, is the present time as unpropitious as 1850? I have in my hand a curious document relative to the proposal made in 1850 by the noble Member for the City of London—who, I am afraid, is not present—then Prime Minister, for abolishing the office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and establishing a fourth Secretaryship of State. I have here the names of the Members of the present Government who voted in 1850 for the Bill of the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell), and I will read them for the satisfaction and edification of the House. I will take them in alphabetical order. They are,—Mr. M. T. Baines, the Hon. E. P. Bouverie, Lord E. Bruce, the Hon. W. F. Cowper, Viscount Duncan, Sir G. Grey,

Mr. Roebuck

Mr. W. G. Hayter, Mr. H. A. Herbert, Mr. E. Horsman, Mr. R. Keating, Mr. H. Labouchere, Mr. G. C. Lewis (now Sir G. C. Lewis), Mr. W. Monsell, Lord Mulgrave, Mr. B. Osborne, Lord A. Paget, the Hon. E. H. Stanley (now Lord Stanley of Alderley), the Hon. C. Villiers, Mr. J. Wilson, the Right Hon. Sir C. Wood. There are now living six Gentlemen who have been Secretaries to the Lord Lieutenants of Ireland. Four of those hon. Gentlemen are Irishmen, and all six voted for the abolition of the office of Lord Lieutenant. They were the Right Hon. H. Labouchere, Sir J. Young, Mr. Horsman, Mr. H. A. Herbert, Lord Naas, and Sir W. Somerville. Of course, the noble Lord the Member for the City of London being at that time Prime Minister, must have brought in the Bill to which I refer, with the approbation of his Cabinet; and among the Members of the Cabinet, who must be regarded as persons acquiescing in, agreeing to, and approving of the measures of the noble Lord, I find the Right Hon. Sir F. Baring, the noble Lord himself, Lord Clarendon, and lastly, the name of Viscount Palmerston. It so happens that the last noble Lord did not vote upon the question, but still I have a right to assume that he approved the proceedings of his chief. I cannot suppose he would withhold his vote for the purpose of saying subsequently that he did not approve the measure; neither can I suppose it possible that any of the hon. Gentlemen who now grace the Treasury bench will so far forget themselves and their former votes as to oppose my proposition. I cannot imagine that they will so far forget what is due to their position as Members of the Government, as Members of this House, as representatives of the people, as honest men, as to forego and forswear their words, and to vote against me on this occasion, even upon the pretence of the "previous question." Mine is a plain and simple proposition. It is to do away with the Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland; it is an appeal to the House to make Ireland really a part of the great kingdom to which she belongs, and to abolish the last badge of conquest; for recollect that Ireland was not united to England in the same manner as Scotland. Scotland had never been conquered; she stood upright before us, and met us on equal terms; she was united as a kingdom over which we never pretended to exercise real control. That was not the case with

Ireland. Unhappily for her—unhappily for ourselves—we conquered Ireland; we introduced into that country a system of rule that was a disgrace to England; but, happily for Ireland, and happily for this country, we have outgrown the mischief and the misery of conquest. We are now a united people; and I ask this House to do away with the last badge of slavery which we imposed upon Ireland; to abolish the Lord Lieutenantcy of that country, and to make her what she ought to be—a fractional part of the great kingdom to which she belongs. The thing must be so plain and clear to the intellect of every man, that I therefore move without hesitation, “That, in the opinion of this House, the office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland ought to be abolished.”

MR. HADFIELD seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That, in the opinion of this House, the Office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland ought to be abolished.”

MR. TORRENS M'CULLAGH said, he felt considerable difficulty in following his hon. and learned Friend. He had ventured to anticipate from him a greater variety of argument in support of the Motion which he had laid before the House; but, whether from dulness on his part, or from some other cause which he was not able to fathom, he had listened to the speech of his hon. and learned Friend without learning on what ground he asked the House to affirm his Motion. The hon. Member for Sheffield proposed to abolish the Lord Lieutenantcy because the government of Ireland was carried on so successfully under the system which now existed, and which, according to him, had rendered the country so prosperous that it had nothing to complain of. That was one of the strangest logical reasons he had ever heard of for the abolition of a particular system of government. It was so odd, indeed, that he should not attempt to answer it. His objections to the Motion were twofold. In the first place, he did not think that this was the proper moment for dealing with the question, whatever its intrinsic merits might be. He did not think, with the greatest possible deference to his hon. and learned Friend, whose ability he admitted, whose earnestness he respected, and whose high courage in vindicating his opinions he admired, that he could introduce a Bill at that period of the Session, and carry it through both Houses of Parliament. He also took the liberty of telling the hon. Member for Sheffield that neither he nor any independent Member of the House was the proper person to propose such a change. It might well tax the energies of any Government, and when brought forward at all it should form the subject of a Government measure. His hon. and learned Friend, therefore, was not the man to lead them to unsettle everything that now existed, and that without even attempting to describe what he would substitute for that which he proposed to sweep away. The notice originally given upon this subject by the hon. Member for Sheffield was conceived, he must be permitted to say, in a much wiser and more statesmanlike spirit than that on which they were that night called upon to vote. By the terms of the Motion as first proposed the House would have been asked to affirm the proposition, not that a separate department for Irish affairs ought to be abolished, but the wholly different and opposite proposition—namely, that it had become expedient to commute the antiquated office of Viceroy into an additional Secretaryship of State. The one proposal would have preserved and improved the Irish department of administration, the other would abolish it altogether. He (Mr. M'Cullagh) had told his learned Friend that he was quite prepared to vote for the original proposal, but that he must oppose him if he determined upon altering its scope and tenour so essentially as he had unfortunately done. In 1850, they had had before them a plan for the future government of Ireland. The Bill consisted of two parts. It would be in the recollection of many Members of the House that great emphasis had been laid by both sides of the House on the fact, that the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, when he asked the House to affirm the principle of the Bill, proposed to substitute for the Lord Lieutenant a fourth Secretary of State, and the first reading of the Bill was consented to with that explicit understanding. He well recollected having formed one of a deputation which waited on the noble Lord before the second reading of the Bill, for the purpose of getting an assurance that he would not depart from the terms of the Bill, and that the equivocal wording of the 16th clause, “If Her Majesty should so please to appoint,” should be made more explicit and clear. They called on the noble Lord to get an assurance that a distinct department for Ireland should, under all circumstances, be maintained, and that he would not consent to go on with the Bill if it were so altered in Committee as to carry the abolition of the Lord Lieutenancy, leaving Ireland without any substitute. They failed in getting that assurance: upon which the present Lord Fermoy, Mr. Sharman Crawford, the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Napier), and his colleague, all of whom had abstained from voting on the first reading, found themselves compelled to vote against the second reading. But that was a plan which, if carried out, would have been intelligible, because it proposed that the Lord Lieutenant should give place to an additional Secretary of State. He would not disguise his opinion, however unpopular it might be in Ireland, that he thought it would be a great improvement in the government of Ireland if the sham of royalty were taken away, and the business part of the government of Ireland left untouched, if all the useful part were retained and the useless part removed. He had, therefore, given his vote with great reluctance on that occasion against the second reading. He differed with his hon. and learned Friend in thinking that the business of Ireland could be tumbled, as easily as he seemed to suppose, into the basket of the Home Office. His hon. and learned Friend was under some delusion in thinking that the Home Office could successfully deal with the additional business which would be cast upon it. His humble opinion was, that the experiment would be a total failure. He rested that opinion not on any vague or unsupported impression of his own. What were the words which were used by the Prime Minister of the day, in 1850, when he brought in the Bill? The noble Lord the Member for the City of London said on that occasion—

Mr. Roebuck

“I have always been of opinion that Ireland is a great loser by not having a Minister in the Cabinet to explain the interests of that country, and to enforce the course which he might recommend. I do not believe that the Home Secretary could efficiently discharge the additional duties which would be thrown upon him if the two offices were united.”

And he added these memorable words:—

“I believe it would be better upon the whole to keep the Lord Lieutenancy, with all the disadvantages I have stated, than to attempt to throw this immense mass of business into an office already sufficiently, if not overloaded, with business of the State.”

That was also the opinion of Mr. Shiel, who, though he voted for the second reading, used the characteristic phrase,

VOL. CXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

“Ireland and her business won't fit into the Home Office.” Taking literally all that the hon. and learned Gentleman said about Ireland being an indistinguishable part of England, some hon. Gentlemen might ask what is the difference in the nature of the duties which the Lord Lieutenant and the Irish Secretary have to perform and those discharged by the Home Secretary. Were hon. Gentlemen aware of the result of the course of business in this House in respect of the legislation of the two countries? The hon. Member for Sheffield spoke as if with a map in his hand, in which he drew lines and parallels, and ignored all distinction between England and Ireland. He said he had no ill-will to Ireland, that he wished to see Irish counties the same as English counties, and Irish parishes the same as English parishes. Did his hon. and learned Friend ever look into the index of his own copy of the statutes? Did he know that since 1850 there were no less than 120 Acts of Parliament passed which applied exclusively to Ireland, and many of these on the most important subjects of legislation? Therefore, there was this difficulty in the way of identity of administration, that into whatsoever hands they confided the administration of the law, that individual must at the same time have his attention engaged by two different codes, which he was sorry to say were irreconcilable and even repugnant in many respects. If this were so, it became no question of the good humour of a few Dublin tradesmen, but of imperial legislation, which involved the most important principles that must every day be grappled with in their whole length and breadth. The question could, therefore, never be settled by a mere Resolution of this kind, or any such shorthand mode of legislation as his hon. and learned Friend proposed. He begged to call the attention of the House to some illustrations of this view. Were hon. Gentlemen aware that the whole criminal administration in Ireland was not only different from, but rested on opposite principles to the administration of criminal law in England? There were no voluntary prosecutions in Ireland. All was conducted at the public expense. It was different in England. There was the Court of Quarter Sessions in Ireland, which was presided over by a paid functionary appointed and removable by the Crown. In England it was not so. In Ireland there was an organized and most efficient system of stipendiary magistrates,

Would English gentlemen and magistrates be content to have the same system carried out in England? [An hon. MEMBER: God forbid!] He claimed the vote of that hon. Gentleman on the ground that the two systems were not only different, but repugnant. He was not arguing now which was the best system; but he asked any man whether he knew, or whether he knew any man who knew, how to assimilate the two systems? Again, they had in Ireland a system of primary instruction, complete in itself, very popular, and of long standing. The vital principle of that system was mixed, or as it might perhaps more properly be called—neutral education. In England they had an entirely different system—a sectarian one. How were these to be reconciled? In England, questions on the subject of education were laid before the President of the Council; in Ireland they were referred to the Lord Lieutenant. If the whole business of Ireland were transferred to the Home Office, they might have the Secretary of State, for that department asked two questions on the same evening with respect to neutral and sectarian education, and obliged to answer them in a manner diametrically opposite. Did they wish to place the repugnance between the two systems in still greater contrast by making the same man, in the same place, on the same night, answer for both? There were other very important differences between the law of the two countries. The right hon. Baronet who sat below him (Sir J. Graham) had last year been a Member of the Committee to which the Bills for regulating the equity jurisdiction in Ireland were referred; in them was involved the question of the permanency of the Encumbered Estates Court in Ireland. No doubt the evidence was taken with the utmost care, but the members of the Committee differed widely on many matters. The second Resolution of the Committee declared that it was essential to the wants of Ireland that the power of granting an indefeasible title to land sold under that Court should be perpetuated. Several members of the Committee voted against that Resolution; amongst them were the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham), the right hon. the Member for Oxford, the right hon. the Member for Coventry, and the hon. Member for Enniskillen. He (Mr. M'Cullagh) could not believe they did so from any repugnance on their part to the principle of granting an indefeasible title to land; but they shrank from recommending the House to adopt a principle with regard to Ireland which they could not see their way to carry out in England. These Gentlemen had advocated as consistently as any Members of the House the principle of identity of policy, and they must have opposed the Resolution, not from any objection to its principle, but because they could not hope to extend that principle to the other country. There were many other illustrations which he could give. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield had told them Ireland was a part of England. Had he forgotten what took place last year, when a very pale water-colour copy of an Irish measure was introduced to the House—they had Whigs and Tories voting in the same lobby, and protesting as to the purity of their intentions to save the country, by rejecting the imposition of a constabulary force? Would any hon. Gentleman rise in the House and say that it was possible to govern Ireland without the aid of the 12,000 men in green? And yet when it was sought to transfer a very modified copy of the force into this country, the Bill was not allowed to pass until greatly mutilated. It was unfortunately too true that fifty-seven years after the completion of the Union they were still without identity of legislation. So long as their legislation was unassimilated, they must keep a separate department for the administration of Ireland. It was by no means necessary it should be the Lord Lieutenancy; and, for his part, he did not care how soon that obsolete office was swept away, provided they were prepared to deal with the whole question—how is Ireland to be permanently governed? He must, however, oppose this attempt of the hon. and learned Gentleman, when he sought with his flying battery to knock down the clock-tower of Dublin Castle. He admitted people did not look up to it quite so much as they used, and he cared not how soon they removed it, if it could be done without injury to the stability and usefulness of the remaining portions of the structure. He must tell the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield he knew more of the working of the Irish department than he did. He had observed it for many years. He believed there was as much intrigue and jobbery, for those who were disposed to intrigue and jobbery, on this side of the water as on the other, and they were very much mistaken if they hoped to abolish original sin by removing the office to this side of the Channel. The true means to abolish jobbery was to make every department responsible to the House by its head. How could they expect to make the Home Secretary responsible for the Government of Ireland, when the twenty-four hours of the day would not be sufficient for him to get through the business that would be cast upon him? If the present system was a gewgaw and a sham, let the hon. Gentleman give some practical substitute, and suggest an office which would be responsible for all its acts. He trusted that before many months he would have an opportunity of testing the sincerity of those hon. Gentlemen who were so loud in their cheers whenever identity of legislation was spoken of. They had been told by the first Minister of the Crown that at no distant day the representation of the people would undergo revision. Without attempting to scan the intentions of the Government with regard to the exact measure, he would ask the House whether, on this question, it was not now high time, fifty-seven years after the legislative union, to put an end to separate legislation? Would they have separate Bills or one Reform Bill for the United Kingdom? Were they prepared to give all equal rights? They had already given equality of taxation by the extension of the income tax to Ireland; and were they prepared to give a pledge to Ireland that it should be followed up by equality of franchises. Instead of three Bills for England, Scotland, and Ireland, would they bring in one Bill for the three countries, and so make a step towards realising the dream of Mr. Pitt, of a united legislation. If that were done, the picture drawn by the hon. and learned Gentleman might be prophetic. He did not think it necessary to say another word on this subject. He would merely state in defence of the exact Motion of which he had given notice, on the eve of very important changes, he did not think it unreasonable or unseemly to ask the House to suspend its decision until they saw what steps were likely to be taken towards unity of legislation. He had intended to move the adjournment of the discussion for twelve months, but he was informed that that was not in accordance with the usage of the House, and if he had moved the adjournment for six months, it would have been decidedly hostile, so he adopted the only course open to him. The objections which he now urged against this Resolution were the same as had been put forward in 1850 in another place, by one of the greatest men that ever lived, and with such force as to induce the Government to give up their Bill. He would remind the House that since then three successive administrations had not moved in the matter; and with regard to his economical Friends who sat near him, and who were the firmest supporters of this Resolution, if their consciences had allowed them to go on ever since 1850, voting £40,000 a year for what they called a mummery—it was rather hard that at the end of a Session they should seek to disturb and censure an imaginative and suspicious people by rolling up institutions like a foot-ball, and flinging them on the floor of the House for a night's amusement. It was not pretended the hon. and learned Gentleman was prepared to bring in a Bill, or that the Government would do so. If they told the people of Ireland that they were prepared to brand with ignominy existing institutions, how could they expect that people to display any profound respect for institutions so branded? He would not further trouble the House, but begged, according to notice, to move the previous question.

Mr. Torrens M'Cullagh

MR. GROGAN said, he begged to thank the hon. and learned Gentleman for the able and telling answer he had given to the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, which rendered it unnecessary for him (Mr. Grogan) to trespass at any length upon the time of the House. He should observe, however, that he could not agree with him in the conclusion at which he had arrived, believing that, instead of postponing the determination of the question till some future period, he ought, upon his own showing, to have met the proposition with a direct negative. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. M'Cullagh), however, had in a very skilful manner recapitulated the main arguments adduced upon former occasions against the abolition of the office of Lord Lieutenant in Ireland, and had done particularly good service by alluding to the strongly-expressed opinion of the Duke of Wellington, whose statements he (Mr. Grogan) begged to recommend to the consideration of any hon. Member who might be disposed to support the Motion before the House. It was impossible that any man could condemn such a project in stronger terms than those employed by the Duke of Wellington. It was important to remark that the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield had submitted an abstract proposition for the abolition of an office which, under one name or another, had existed for centuries in Ireland, without advancing one argument in its favour, further than what might be comprised in such epithets as "sham," "tinsel," and the like. There could be no doubt that in legislating for the two countries Parliament had always drawn a broad distinction between England and Ireland, and yet, in the face of the fact that the latter was governed by laws peculiar to itself, the hon. and learned Gentleman had not given the slightest indication of the mode in which he would attempt to provide a substitute for the local administration which he proposed to abolish. Upon a question of such vital importance to the whole of Ireland, but especially to the inhabitants of Dublin, whose interests would be injuriously affected by the abolition of the office of Lord Lieutenant, the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield ought to have paused before he submitted a proposal which could only have the effect of disturbing and irritating the minds of the Irish people, without leading to any practical result whatever. Supposing the House were to adopt the proposition of the hon. and learned Gentleman, there must be some officer on the spot who would be able to discharge the functions which the Lord Lieutenant now performed, and the question immediately arose who was that officer to be. Was it to be the Lord Chancellor, or the Lord Mayor of Dublin, the Commander of the Forces, or the Chief Secretary? If the last-named Gentleman were chosen, he must necessarily be absent during six months of the year from the seat of his Government, attending to his Parliamentary duties; and how during that time was the administration of Ireland to be carried on? The truth was that the proposition of the hon. and learned Gentleman was utterly impracticable. He had certainly mentioned a number of hon. Gentlemen who had filled the office of Chief Secretary as well as other public men who coincided in his views on that question, but he (Mr. Grogan) could cite the opinions of equally distinguished statesmen to show that the project had been condemned in the strongest terms by nearly all the principal authorities connected with the Irish Government. Mr. Goulburn, the late Earl of Ellesmere, and Sir Robert Peel, who had all been Chief Secretaries, united in opposing the abolition of the office of Lord Lieutenant, supporting their opinion by the most cogent and convincing arguments.

Mr. Grogan

Earl St. Germans, then Lord Elliot, in 1844, when the subject was brought before the House, in opposing its abolition, stated that there were many criminal cases in which questions of appeal were constantly being urged upon the attention of the Lord Lieutenant, and he asked what were the relatives of those interested in such appeals to do if there were no authority in Ireland to appeal to? Mr. O'Connell, also Sir John Newport, and, indeed, every distinguished Irishman, with any pretensions to patriotism or statesmanship, urged the necessity of continuing the office until, at all events, some approach were made towards uniformity of legislation for the two countries. [Mr. ROEBUCK: Hear, hear!] The hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to share in that opinion; but he would remind the hon. and learned Member that all attempts to introduce a perfect equality between the two countries met in that House with a strenuous and successful resistance. A few years ago, when Ireland was reduced to a state of the deepest suffering, it was declared that she had no claim to relief from England, and that she should herself provide for the maintenance of her own poor. He admitted that he appeared before them as the special representative of Dublin, but it should be remembered that it was impossible to pass any measure calculated to inflict injury upon the city of Dublin without at the same time inflicting injury upon the interests of the whole country. At the time of the Union a very large portion of the nobility and wealthy gentry of Ireland resided in Dublin, but since that period nearly all those persons had disappeared from that city, and had become absorbed in this vast metropolis. At the period of the Union there resided in Dublin 1 duke, 3 marquesses, 41 earls, 21 viscounts, 19 barons, 4 archbishops, and 12 bishops, whose annual incomes, expended exclusively in Dublin, amounted to £2,000,000. In 1831 there resided in Dublin, 2 archbishops, 3 bishops, 5 earls, and 3 barons, whose annual incomes, expended there, amounted to £96,000. In 1850 there were resident in Dublin only 1 archbishop, 1 duke (occasionally), 1 earl, 1 baron, exclusively of the law barons, and the entire sum expended annually by them in the city did not exceed £20,000. If, during the last fifty-seven years, so vast an injury had been inflicted upon Dublin by the withdrawal of most of its wealthy inhabitants, surely such a proposition as that put forth by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield ought to be backed by stronger arguments than empty phrases about "tinsel Royalty." The absorbing attractions of the imperial metropolis had so increased the evil of absenteeism, that had always prevailed to some extent in Ireland, as to result in the state of things which now prevailed. The only attraction left for Dublin was the Lord Lieutenant, and it was not the small outlay of the money voted by Parliament for the maintenance of the Viceregal Court that rendered it important to uphold that office, but because it was the means of inducing country gentlemen and their families to visit the city, in order to pay their respects to the representative of their Sovereign. If the office of Lord Lieutenant should be abolished, some other office must be created to perform the duties, and if the idea of another Secretary of State was entertained, the objections urged against it in 1850 by Sir Robert Peel still remained in full force. It was true that that eminent statesman did not oppose the introduction of the Bill, but he expressly stated that he left the responsibility of it to the Government. He (Mr. Grogan) objected to the Motion as uncalled for, as distasteful to the citizens of Dublin and to the people of Ireland, and he hoped the House would not assent to the Resolution of the hon. and learned Gentleman, as no reason had been shown for it on the ground of State necessity. If any attempt was to be made to assimilate Ireland with England, it should commence with other matters, and if an exceptional system of legislation was to continue he could not see upon what ground the House could be called upon to adopt the proposition which was now submitted to it.

MR. WHITESIDE said, if the notice of Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman had stated that the terms upon which Ireland should be governed ought to be similar to those upon which England was governed, and, pursuing that principle, had gone on to declare that it was desirable that inquiries should be made as to the best mode of carrying out that object, he would have voted for it, because he was compelled by a respect for truth to admit that the Government of Ireland was very inefficiently conducted; but he did not believe that the isolated Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman would effect the object which he, no doubt, desired to gain. There were about forty Acts of Parliament imposing duties of an important nature upon the Lord Lieutenant, and an office, which has existed for six centuries, and is so greatly mixed up with the general government of the country, could not be abolished without previous careful inquiry as to whom those immense powers should be transferred, and in what way they should be exercised. That, as it struck him, was a fatal objection to the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman in its present form. He could not, however, conscientiously say, that he was so great an enthusiast as he was in his younger days, for the maintenance of the Lord Lieutenancy; and, therefore, if he heard an intelligible plan proposed by the Government for the abolition of the office—a plan which would not, like so many other measures of Irish legislation, make matters ten times worse than they were before—he would be prepared to give it his most careful consideration. The argument used in favour of the Motion was, that it was to assimilate Ireland with this country, but what was being done at the present moment? He (Mr. Whiteside) had had to complain a few nights ago that a different statute law was sought to be imposed upon Ireland from that which was passed for England, and on that very day they had on the notice paper a Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill for Ireland which was quite different from the law upon the same subject, which was acted upon in this country. As long as those who styled themselves Liberal Members sanctioned that provincial system of legislation for Ireland, it would be difficult for the hon. and learned Gentleman to carry out the Imperial principle for which he contended. Ireland was at present tranquil, but not contented. He (Mr. Whiteside) was a Protestant and a Conservative, but he must say, that were Ireland as far removed from England as Canada was, the system of government that was now adopted would soon be blown to pieces as easily as a house of cards. This country had to govern 6,000,000 of people in Ireland. He had seen Ireland governed by three estimable persons, no doubt, Lord Carlisle, the right hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman), and a colonel of engineers. Did hon. Members suppose that, if Irishmen had the power to resist it, they would endure a system of government under which three gentlemen, however respectable, were appointed to administer the affairs of a country with which no one of the three persons named were connected by property, birth, or education? Were they to be told that that was a system which they ought to admire? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud was beyond all doubt a man of character and honour, and had done in Ireland no act which a gentleman need be ashamed to acknowledge; but the right hon. Gentleman must excuse him for saying that, in his part of Ireland the people hardly knew by whom the office of Chief Secretary was filled. As to the supposition, at all events, that the influence of the right hon. Gentleman or of the noble Lord at the head of the Government would enable them to carry an election in Ulster, it was one which it was perfectly ridiculous to entertain. The whole county representation of Ulster was, with one exception, on those (the Opposition) benches, and yet their very existence seemed to be altogether ignored by the Government. They did not, however, address to them any complaints, because they knew that their complaints would receive no attention; but, if he were to give expression to a complaint upon their behalf, he would say that the local Government of Ireland was opposed to nine-tenths of the industry, the intelligence, and the intellect of its people. Well, what were they, of whose feelings and opinions he was the representative, to do? They could not agitate. To do so would be against their principles. He would, however, inform the noble Lord what course they were prepared to take, and he was sure that he would be obliged for the information. They meant, if they could, to obtain through the good sense of the people, such an influence in point of numbers in that House as would enable Ireland, whether through the medium of a Lord Lieutenantcy or without its aid, to be governed as she ought to be. As matters at present stood, there was scarcely a question of national importance with reference to which, as far as he could see, the Executive in Ireland possessed any power worthy of the name. The noble Lord at the head of the Government was aware that the representatives of that country were obliged to visit him occasionally: and why? Because there was no one connected with the Executive in Ireland with whom he was acquainted, from whom satisfactory information on matters of national interest and importance could be obtained. When, therefore, the question of placing the administration of the affairs of Ireland in the hands of a responsible Minister was raised in a proper form, he should be disposed to give to any such proposition a candid and impartial consideration. They who talked so loudly of the expediency of assimilating Ireland with England in all respects had been endeavouring, during the last three years, to bring about a more rapid means of communication between the two countries, and even in that simple attempt they had failed. The Circumlocution Office here, with its writing backward and forward upon the subject, had not accomplished in a period of three years that which his late friend Mr. Hartley, director of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Packet Company, would have effected in a single week. Such was the system to which Ireland was subjected; but it was the intention of those of whose interests he was the advocate, to return to Parliament, if possible, a class of men such as those who sat upon his side of the House—men who had the welfare of their country at heart, and who had no jobs to perpetrate—[a laugh]. The noble Lord smiled, but if he knew anything of Ireland—a country which I dare say he had not visited for a long time—he would feel how unstatesmanlike it was to continue a system which excludes from all power in their own country the people who have made the northern province of the island so prosperous. When Mr. Buchanan, the President of the United States, was in this country, he had had the pleasure of meeting him, and had ascertained from him that he derived his origin from the same part of the world as himself. Now, those whose interests he was upholding could turn out fifty men as good as Mr. Buchanan; yet that gentleman was esteemed to have capacity sufficient to govern a great empire, while his (Mr. Whiteside's) countrymen were scarcely deemed competent to furnish an Under Secretary. Such was the system by which Ireland was ruled. He did not wish to complain of it, but the Motion which the hon. and learned Gentleman had brought under the notice of the House compelled him to speak the truth. He had no desire to raise the question of nationality against nationality, because his own attachments, political and religious, as well as the feelings of those whom he represented, were with England. They would never be found backward, when it became necessary to fight against any of our present allies. He made that statement deliberately; but while he and they entertained those sentiments, let no man suppose that the Irish had not strong feelings of nationality, and were not fully alive to the viciousness of that principle in accordance with which Ireland was governed. Let nobody imagine that they were anxious to encourage a system of jobbing or of misrule, or any of those other systems which the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Sheffield has been pleased to denounce. The principle, from the adoption of which they had of late received the highest satisfaction, and which they approved, was that which the noble Lord the Member for the West Riding (Viscount Goderich) sought to carry into effect—he meant the principle of competition for the public service. That was a principle which had conferred a great benefit upon the middle classes. All he asked for was, a clear stage and no favour. If the Roman Catholics could then beat them, he, for one, should not object. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Sheffield has spoken of promotion here and there, but he (Mr. Whiteside) would not enter further into that question than to say, that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department would, he felt assured, have hesitated long before he would make in England such appointments as many of those which had been boldly made in the sister country. [Cries of "Name, name."] It could be of no use to mention names, because to do so would not be to argue the question before the House. It might be urged that it was but natural that the ties of party should exist, and that appointments should be conferred in accordance with that principle. Granted; but the noble Lord at the head of the Government must excuse him if he called things by their right names, and denominated the persons referred to not as a party, for the noble Lord has no party in Ireland, but by the more appropriate appellation of "clique." The noble Lord might very properly say, "we ought to support those by whom we are supported." Very fair, and he might add that neither he, nor those whose cause he espoused, had any personal dislike to the noble Lord, who had, or was supposed to have, some Irish blood in his veins; and he could assure him, that they were rather pleased, from that reason, to find him made First Minister of England. But then came the question, upon what conditions did the noble Lord obtain the support to which he had alluded? He should answer that question by stating, that not all the patronage which the noble Lord had it in his power to bestow could induce him, or those whom he represented, to enter into coalitions of whose object they could not approve. Let the noble Lord govern Ireland as he governed England; they asked for nothing more. If the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Sheffield were to bring forward his Motion avowedly with that object, and then proposed an inquiry to ascertain, whether it would not be better to exchange the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland for a responsible, influential Minister, representing Ireland in the Cabinet, he would promise to give the question an impartial and dispassionate consideration, and if he were convinced by the arguments of the hon. and learned Gentleman, he would at once admit that he was not so deeply enamoured of the office of Lord Lieutenant, nor did he think the inhabitants of the north of Ireland were so zealous in its behalf, as to render him quite sure that he should very strenuously oppose its abolition. He could not, however, give his support to a Motion which had been brought forward in the abrupt manner in which that of the hon. and learned Gentleman had been submitted to their notice.

Mr. Whiteside

SIR WILLIAM SOMERVILLE said, he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman who proposed the Motion had ample reason to be satisfied with the course which the debate had taken; for, with the exception of the hon. and learned Member for the City of Dublin, not one hon. Gentleman who had spoken had said anything in favour of maintaining the Lord Lieutenancy. It was his intention to vote for the Motion; and, having been for a considerable period connected with the Government of Ireland, he hoped he should be allowed to trespass on the attention of the House for a short time, while he stated his reasons for pursuing that course. The Motion was one of considerable importance, inasmuch as it sought to effect the abolition of an ancient and time-honoured office, which had extended its ramifications through the legislation of the country, and which should not be lightly thrown overboard. All that the learned Gentleman, however, asked them to do was, to come to a decision as to whether that office should or should not be continued, and if the House decided in the negative, then it would become the duty of the Executive to take into consideration the means by which that decision was to be carried into effect. This was not the first time that the question of the abolition of the Lord Lieutenantcy of Ireland had been brought under the consideration of that House. At a period when he had the honour of holding a subordinate position in the Government of Ireland, the noble Lord the Member for the City of London introduced a Bill for the purpose of effecting that object; and he (Sir W. Somerville) had seen nothing, and heard nothing since, which had in any degree altered the opinions which he then expressed on the subject. He regretted very much that the noble Lord was not then in his place, and still more did he regret the cause of his absence; but he was happy to be able to say that he knew what were the opinions of the noble Lord in reference to the Motion before the House. He knew that if the Government opposed the Motion, it would not have been the noble Lord's wish unduly to hurry or press it, and that he would, therefore, have abstained from voting on that occasion. But he also knew that the noble Lord's opinions as to the desirableness of abolishing the office had undergone no change. He knew it to be his opinion that the conciliatory measures which had of late years been adopted towards Ireland, the fact that the distance between the two countries was no longer an element in the question, and the advantages which were afforded by direct intercourse between Ireland and Whitehall, constituted overwhelming reasons why the vice-royalty should no longer be maintained. This question might be considered in three or four points of view. In the first place, it might be considered in a financial point of view; but it would be beneath the dignity of that House to decide such a question with reference to finance. The saving of £5,000 or £10,000, or even £500,000 a year, was as nothing compared with the consideration in what manner Imperial interests, as well as the interests of Ireland, might be best promoted. The question was one which did not regard Ireland alone, and he did not wish to deal with it as if it did. On the contrary, looking at it as it affected the Imperial interests, he was decidedly of opinion that they would gain immensely through the Executive Government being carried on entirely in this country. It was the custom with many to declaim against centralization, but he thought centralization was not in all cases an evil. The present system of Government in Ireland was a roundabout and unsatisfactory system. The Lord Lieutenant was charged with the Executive Government of Ireland, but, though charged with it, he did not in reality administer it; he was obliged to refer to the Secretary of State in this country for instructions. The Secretary of State was invested with the chief power over affairs in Ireland; but then matters peculiarly affecting the Government of Ireland were referred by him to the Lord Lieutenant. Then there was the Chief Secretary for Ireland sitting in that House, as the organ of Government with regard to such affairs, but who was also the Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant. He might here observe, that the device which had been resorted to for the purpose of meeting the anomaly in that case, namely, that of placing the Irish Secretary in the Cabinet, did not in reality cure the evil; for, when Parliament was not sitting, the Chief Secretary retired to Ireland, and being no longer associated with his colleagues in giving directions to the Lord Lieutenant, became his subordinate. In his opinion, Irish as well as Imperial interests would gain by the abolition of the Lord Lieutenantcy. He wished to see Ireland possessing the advantage of having a Minister of the Crown charged with the duty of ascertaining her wants, promoting her interests, and securing for her just claims, proper, fair, and immediate consideration. Ireland would, in his opinion, be a great gainer by such a change. She did not want a double Executive; the two Executives, clashing together so as to weaken each other, and lead to unsatisfactory results. There was not, in the whole world, an office so anomalous in its nature as that of the Lord Lieutenant. The Lord Lieutenant was not like a Colonial Governor, with a distinct territory to govern; he was not like an ambassador living at a foreign court, because he was, in fact, deputed to govern a portion of the United Kingdom. He was not, in truth, a Viceroy—because he was deprived of that consideration and those immunities which ought always to attach to such an office. The hon. and learned Member for the City of Dublin (Mr. Grogan) had cited the opinions of different Chief Secretaries for Ireland as to the mischievous consequences which would have arisen at different periods, had the office of Lord Lieutenant been previously abolished. He (Sir W. Somerville) did not understand the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield

Sir William Somerville

to contend that the office was one which ought never to have been maintained; what he understood him to say was, that the time had now arrived when it might be safely and beneficially dispensed with. That, at all events, was the opinion of several Chief Secretaries who had given their attention to the subject. The state of things in Ireland was very different now from what it was formerly. Prior to the Union, the office of Lord Lieutenant was an office of great power and responsibility; it continued so for many years, even after that event; but, from the time of the passing of the Catholic Emancipation Act and the Reform Bill, it became less and less important in a political point of view, while, as regarded the social aspect of the office, the Viceroy could hardly be said to represent the Queen, when he was deprived of the immunities and considerations which were due to his position. The Lord Lieutenant was abused, vilified, and blamed, as if he had the power of a Minister in this country. Was that a proper position for the Viceroy of the Queen? He had been struck more than once by observing, when a change of Government had recently taken place, the residence of the new Viceroy was deserted by one portion of Her Majesty's subjects, while there was a rush of another portion to his levée, as much to mark disapproval of the acts of his predecessor as to manifest approval of such acts as were expected from himself. If the Lord Lieutenant belonged to one party, he was distrusted by the other; if he endeavoured to hold, and succeeded in holding, a middle course, he was perhaps distrusted by both. He maintained that this was a state of things which was mischievous, not merely to the empire in general, but to Ireland in particular; it was a state of things which ought not to be allowed to continue—a state of things which, instead of allaying the spirit of party, tended to encourage and foster it. He had touched on the question of centralization. He had heard an apprehension expressed that, if the Lord Lieutenant were abolished, the abolition of the Irish courts would follow. In what respect, he asked, did the case of Ireland differ from that of Scotland? If the courts of law in Scotland had been maintained so long after the union of Scotland and England, was there any reason to suppose that if, fifty-seven years after the union of Ireland and England, they got rid of the office of Lord Lieutenant—an office of no power, but involving divided responsibility—was it to be believed for a moment that such an act as that would lead to the breaking-up of the Irish courts, and the transfer of all their business to this country? No one, he thought, could deliberately consider that part of the question without being led to the conclusion that the fears which had been expressed were groundless. The hon. and learned Member for Dublin (Mr. Grogan) had especially, and very naturally, taken the part of the city which he represented, and had remarked that the abolition of the Lord Lieutenantcy would be detrimental to the interests of Dublin, and therefore detrimental to the interests of Ireland. What would be detrimental to the interests of Dublin would perhaps, to a certain extent, be so to those of Ireland; but he had a strong conviction that the abolition of the Viceroyalty would not injure either. It had been said that a number of individuals in Ireland who now went to Dublin for the purpose of attending the court, would, if the Lord Lieutenantcy were abolished, remove from Ireland, and settle in England. Now, he felt convinced that the abolition of such an anomaly as the Lord Lieutenant must take place some day—that, in short, it would not be continued very long, and he confessed he should like to see the names of those Irish gentlemen who were likely to be influenced in that manner by such an event. The absenteeism of Ireland had been caused more by the imperfect nature of the communications between the two countries than by anything else. In proportion as the means of communication had been improved, absenteeism had declined; and he would venture to say that, if his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury would come to an agreement with the railway and the steam-packet companies, for the purpose of improving the communications between the two countries as far as possible, he would thereby have done more towards doing away with absenteeism in Ireland, and inducing inhabitants of this country to settle in Ireland, or pay it occasional visits, than had been done by all the Lord Lieutenants that had ruled over the country. He remembered that when the noble Lord the Member for the City of London brought forward his Bill for the abolition of the Lord Lieutenantcy, he announced that it was the gracious intention of Her Majesty to visit Ireland occasionally, should the Bill pass, and to hold levées there. Of course, if that gracious intention were carried into effect, it would go far to remove the objection to which he had just referred; and he certainly could not understand why the minor constellations of Dublin Castle should be imagined to have produced a greater effect than might be expected when the brilliant rays of the royal luminary had taken their place. The removal of the Irish Viceroyalty, instead of denationalizing the country, would, in his opinion, unprovincialize it. Ireland would be just such a nation as she now is, but more imperial in character, though no English nobleman was reigning in Dublin Castle. He believed, with the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, that the existence of the Viceroyalty was a badge of inferiority, and thinking that its abolition would promote the interests of the empire, and of Ireland, and would not even injure the City of Dublin—that it would tend to allay party feeling, and to unite all parties more and more in one common bond of unity, and under one Imperial Government—he should, in accordance with the course which he pursued in 1850, record his vote in favour of the Motion.

MR. VANCE said, that though he was the representative of that city which, as the seat of Government and the residence of the Lord Lieutenant, would be most affected by this Motion, nothing would induce him to stand up for the mere interest of one individual city if he were not satisfied that the abolition of the Irish Viceroyalty would be fatal to the interests and degrading to the political condition of the whole country. He therefore felt it his duty to give the Motion the most direct negative in his power. The hon. and learned Gentleman, without possessing any familiar acquaintance with Ireland on the subject of the Motion, came forward to abolish an office which had existed from 1178—an office which in times of trouble had been the very best instrument for suppressing revolt, which during peace fostered the arts and sciences and encouraged commerce, and the holder of which was able to mediate in many of the unfortunate differences which existed in Ireland, and by a splendid hospitality to bring together men of all creeds and opinions, and thus cement together the good feeling of the various classes of the community at large. The hon. and learned Gentleman was wrong in his statement that the Attorney and Solicitor Generals of the late and the present Administration were never brought together at the Castle; he himself had seen them there in social intercourse, thus proving the ameliorating and softening influence of the institution. The hon. and learned Gentleman, however, seemed to fancy that the mantle of the late Mr. Hume had fallen upon his shoulders. That Gentleman, in 1823, was the first person to propose the abolition of the Lord Lieutenantcy, and the reason he gave was that the Lord Lieutenant was a high Tory, permitting nobody, as far as he was concerned, to hold office, except Protestants and persons of his own political views. Well, very much the reverse of all this was the case at present. In 1830 Mr. Hume again brought forward the subject, but then he did not venture to demand the abolition of the office, but contented himself with asking for a Committee to inquire into the better government of Ireland, and the complaint then was that the Lord Lieutenant was in the habit of bringing over a great number of English dependents, and putting them into the high offices of State. Now, no complaint of that sort could be made at present; Irishmen, he believed, shared fairly in the distribution of offices of trust. In 1844 Mr. Hume stated that the existence of a Tory Lord Lieutenant in Ireland was an incentive to the agitation for the repeal of the Union. Now there was no agitation, though he was not altogether sure that there might not be if the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman were successful. On the next occasion when this subject was discussed it was introduced by the noble Lord (Lord John Russell), who, however, stated distinctly that, unless the Administration of the day thought the time had come when this office should be abolished, it ought never to be abolished by any amateur legislation. At that time, as stated by the right hon. Baronet (Sir W. Somerville), there was a strong political feeling in Ireland, and the Lord Lieutenant's levées, as in the case of the Marquess of Normanby, were not frequented by those who differed from him politically. Irishmen, however, were growing a great deal wiser; at the present day there was no distinction whatever as to the gentlemen who attended the levées; men of all opinions and persuasions were there; he himself (Mr. Vance), though he might be called something of a high Tory, had been a constant attendant at the Castle levées, and had shared in the present Lord Lieutenant's munificent hospitality. The right

Sir William Somerville

hon. Baronet had observed that Her Majesty might visit Dublin and hold levées there, but he thought that any one who considered the matter must perceive that the fitful stimulus thus imparted to the inhabitants of this city by visits of that kind, occurring at intervals of two or three years, would be rather detrimental than otherwise, on account of the reaction which would follow. As regarded the statement that economy would be affected by the measure proposed, he believed it would bring about no saving whatever. There must be a central authority in Ireland, and this must exist in the form of a Secretary of State, who would hold the peculiar views of the Administration to which he belonged, and would be looked upon with a suspicion and dislike which the Lord Lieutenant at present by no means encountered. In 1850, Sir Robert Peel said if the Viceregal Court were withdrawn the city of Dublin would have a claim for equitable and liberal compensation. Was the House prepared to give pecuniary or other compensation for the withdrawal now proposed? On the same occasion, Sir Robert Peel, who, having been Secretary for Ireland, and having spent much of his youth in that country, was well acquainted with its condition, stated that the withdrawal of the Lord Lieutenant would undoubtedly increase absenteeism. The nobility who would flock over to attend Her Majesty's Court would make a much longer stay in London than would be agreeable to their tenantry or to the citizens of Dublin. In addition to this, almost all the noblemen who had held the high position of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had declared that it was undesirable, inexpedient, and would be most injurious to both countries to abolish that office. This opinion had recently been expressed by Lord Eglinton, Lord St. Germans, and the Earl of Carlisle; and it was not to be supposed that high-minded noblemen would entertain such views merely because they had themselves for a short time held that high position. In order to ascertain what would be the effect of the withdrawal from the city of Dublin he wrote to one of the leading house-agents of that city, and in reply his correspondent said—

"I am clearly of opinion that such an event would be most detrimental and most fatal to the value of house property in Dublin and its vicinity. At present it is the custom of the landed gentry to spend several months of the winter and spring annually at Dublin to meet their friends and to introduce their daughters. They return then to their country seats, and in the summer and autumn they come up for some months to Kingstown, or some other of our attractive watering places near Dublin. If the Viceregal Court were abolished the many important advantages attending these habits would be lost, not only to Dublin, but to Ireland, for the result would be, that generally all such persons would hereafter make their visits to London, and then to Brighton and Paris, and in all probability would thus be led to become general absentees."

The accommodation at Her Majesty's Court was already insufficient even for the English people, and it would be unfair to subject Irish ladies to the torture which their sisters in England had lately had to endure. He could assure the House that the withdrawal of the Court would be considered an additional stamp of degradation upon Ireland. They had already in the Parliament House a monument of the national degradation and disgrace. Let them not add another in the deserted courts and state rooms of the Castle of Dublin. Although Dublin was not to Ireland altogether what Paris was to France, it yet exercised a considerable influence over the Irish people. The adoption of this Motion would lead to the greatest dissatisfaction and the greatest exasperation, and would do as much as could be accomplished by any other measure to revive the agitation which was now happily quelled, but which existed to so great an extent only a few years ago.

MR. BAGWELL had thought that the reforms of the great reformer of the day, the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, would have consisted of something more than he now proposed. A very clumsy workman indeed could pull down a house, but it required an architect to build it up. The hon. and learned Gentleman had, in his own mind, pulled down what he called this fictitious Court, but he had not proposed to put anything in its place. The question must be argued more systematically and be supported on much stronger and more statesmanlike grounds than those given by the hon. and learned Gentleman; and as an Irishman, who had all that he possessed in Ireland, he (Mr. Bagwell) must see something more than pulling down before he gave a vote for the destruction of the system under which Ireland had been governed for so many years. At the same time it was a national question, but looking at the public interest, he would ask the hon. and learned Gentleman and the House whether it was right to introduce a measure of reform which had not been called for by the people? There had been no movement in favour of the abolition of this system of Government in Ireland, nor had there been any demand for it on the part even of Irish Members. The Irishmen who had supported the Motion were unable to obtain seats in their native country, and had spoken, not as Irishmen, but as Englishmen. Unless the people of Ireland made a movement in this direction it was not competent for Parliament, looking to the country as its guide, to legislate upon this question. He would also remind the House of the great increase of friendly feelings towards England which now prevailed in the sister island, and ask whether they would alter a system which had produced so beneficial a result. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield had referred to the Act of Union as the measure of an Irish, and, as if to give additional sting to the remark, of a Protestant Parliament. He believed that owing to the corruption which prevailed the Union was necessary, but considering the means by which it was carried, and the way in which the Irish people were at that time swindled out of their rights, he must protest against an Act of the Irish Parliament being brought forward in support of this Motion. On the contrary, that the real wishes of the people of Ireland were not attended to on that occasion was a strong reason why they should be consulted on this. It was said that there was a great deal of intrigue at Dublin, and no doubt that was true; but would any one tell him that there would be less intrigue in Downing Street than at Dublin Castle? The House ought to consider this question with reference to the feelings—prejudices, if they would—of the people of Ireland, and it would be time enough, when the people called for the abolition of the Lord Lieutenancy, for the Government to interfere and to bring forward a comprehensive measure on the subject. If such a measure would, in his opinion, produce the good government of Ireland, he would support it. At present, however, Ireland was a distinct country, and until it became more amalgamated with England no such measure could be carried into effect.

MR. MAGUIRE : Sir, I altogether repudiate the maudlin sentimentalities of those hon. Gentlemen who are ready to weep over the abolition of the Lord Lieutenancy, but who have no tears for the lost liberties of their country—of those who were indifferent when the Parliament House of their native land was converted into a bank, but who shriek with horror at the picture of the Castle of Dublin shorn of its mimic splendour—of those who, when the mass of the Irish nation struggled to restore the plundered Legislature of their country, were the foremost in their resistance to that appeal in behalf of national liberty, but who are now for the retention of a sham royalty and a mock court. As an Irishman, I protest against the tone in which this subject has been treated by those gentlemen who specially represent the city of Dublin, but who affect to speak the voice of Ireland. I give them every credit for their zeal; but I am unwilling that a subject, by no means of vital importance to the well-being of the country, should be swollen, by exaggeration, into one of gigantic magnitude. The question of retaining or abolishing the office of Lord Lieutenant is one which Irishmen may afford to approach in an impartial spirit, and without enthusiasm on one side or the other. For my part, I must admit that my own feelings have undergone a total change with respect to the retention of this office; but that change has been forced upon me by a thorough conviction of its utter worthlessness for really practical purposes of Government and administration. The exaggerations of the hon. Members for Dublin might be safely tested by the calm, able, and instructive speech of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Canterbury, who understood the question thoroughly, and who has shown to the House how utterly helpless and powerless the Irish Viceroy is, and how little he can accomplish for the benefit of the country over which he affects to rule. I confess I listened to that speech with the greatest interest, and I am not ashamed to acknowledge it has made a profound impression upon my mind. The two hon. Gentlemen who represent the millinery interest of Dublin have, no doubt, conscientiously and faithfully discharged their duty to the “shamocracy” of that city; but they have indulged in exaggerations such as no self-respecting Irishman can for a moment sanction. One of those hon. Members has described the Lord Lieutenants as the patrons of arts and sciences, and the promoters of the commerce of Ireland. Why, in what parts of Ireland does commerce flourish? Is it in Dublin, or is it in Belfast, or Cork? Does Dublin monopolise the commerce and the industry of Ireland? What, I ask, has the Lord Lieutenant ever done to promote the commerce or to stimulate the industry of Ireland. There was no Lord Lieutenant in Belfast; and where was there more enterprise, more industry, and greater self-reliance? How does Cork get on, or how does Limerick exist, considering that these cities are only rarely blessed with the presence of that exalted official, whose loss we are assured would be attended with national ruin? Thank God, I say, there is no Lord Lieutenant in Belfast; and I feel delighted that there is not one in Cork. In those northern and southern cities they get on very well without his aid. Without the sunshine of his countenance their manufactures, their trade, and their commerce prosper; nor are they one whit less intelligent or independent because they rarely see the face of a Lord Lieutenant. They want neither an Eglinton nor a Carlisle to render them industrious, enterprising and self-respecting; and the hon. Gentleman who thus expressed himself can only be excused on the ground of excess of zeal, when he tells this House—when he tells Irishmen, who know that the office is a mockery and a sham—that the Lord Lieutenant has promoted the trade or the commerce of Ireland. The junior Member for Dublin eclipses his hon. Colleague in his lamentations and in his exaggerations. Not only does he attribute the peace and tranquillity of the country to the existence of this office, but he goes so far as to assert that the prosperity of Ireland is owing to the holder of that office. To attribute the peace and tranquillity of Ireland to the existence of the Viceroyalty is, at the best, an immense exaggeration; but I do not hesitate to say that to attribute to the Viceroy the prosperity of that country is downright blasphemy. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] I repeat this most deliberately. The prosperity of Ireland is not owing to any human creature, but to that Great Being who presides over the destinies of mankind. He it is who has blessed their harvests. He it is who has given them abundance. It is that Great Being who has removed a load of misery from the hearths and the homes of the people of Ireland. I deny that the Irish Viceroy has in any way contributed to bring about that happy change, which, as an Irishman, I gladly recognize, and which, as a Christian man, I attribute to the mercy of God alone. I contend, then, that the attempt to trace these blessings to the influence of a mock sceptre and sham court, is downright, palpable blasphemy. Now, while I deny that the Lord Lieutenant has done all those wonderful things for Ireland which the hon. Members for Dublin would have the House believe, I freely admit that the Government are much indebted to the present Viceroy; for that noble Lord has done his very best to render himself popular. He has actually mastered all the national dances; and such is the extent of his acquirements in this graceful art, that I verily believe he is equal to any achievement, from the dash and splendour of Sir Roger de Coverley to the intricate mysteries of the double shuffle. I am sure the noble Viceroy has made himself master of these dances out of respect to a dance-loving nation, and in order to place himself upon a good footing with all classes of the people. Lord Carlisle has also proved himself a most eloquent eulogist of Irish bulls; and I would say he has done more to indicate the points and perfections of the national pig, and to render his hearers enamoured of the beauty of that animal, than any Viceroy who has blessed the country with his presence. Moreover, he has ever spoken in the most graceful and propitiatory manner of the national traits of character, and makes the people in love with themselves. To the Government he has done service still more immediate—in a political way; for not even the celebrated Coppock himself is a better electioneerer than Lord Carlisle. The noble Lord, so far as it is possible for a human being, even a Lord Lieutenant, to be so, was omnipresent during the late general elections. He might be said to be everywhere, in borough and in county. Nothing was too great for his genius, nothing too minute for his power of detail. There was not a borough in Ireland—especially a small borough—where he had not a finger in the pie. I admit, candidly, that the noble Lord is an admirable electioneerer; but what real benefit he has ever conferred, or is ever likely to confer, on Ireland, has, in my mind, yet to be discovered. I have myself gone to the Castle—not to bow and scrape before sham Majesty—but upon public business. And on those occasions the Lord Lieutenant of the day has been obliged to admit, practically, the mockery of which he was the embodiment. It is evident to every one who goes on real business to the Castle, that the Viceroy has no power, no authority—that he is a kind of political post-office—an electric wire through which a message to other departments might be sent—in fact, a mere vehicle for conveyance—nothing more. “X am not of the Cabinet, I must consult the Cabinet," is the only intelligible answer that he can give on any question of public importance. In the same way the Irish Secretary in this House—or rather the Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant—if anything be asked of him, or any representation be made to him, is obliged to confess, practically at least, that he, too, is a mockery, or scarcely anything better. He cannot venture to express an opinion of his own; all he can do is to promise to consult his superiors. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that, in place of this mockery and this sham, that there must be a responsible authority—an official who will be placed on a level with the other Members of the Cabinet—a Minister to whom Irishmen may represent the wants of their country, and by whom something like authority can be exercised. At present, there is no responsible authority, and no Minister of real power; and so long as some arrangement is not come to, by which a reality is substituted for a mockery, Ireland will continue to be in that degraded and anomalous position to which the hon. Members for Dublin apprehend she will fall if her precious Lord Lieutenant be withdrawn from her capital. It has been said, that if the Viceroyalty be abolished, the courts of law will follow. The two things are totally distinct from each other. I do not care how soon the Viceroyalty is abolished, provided that a proper substitute is found for it; but I would resist, by every means in my power, the removal of the courts of law; and it has been distinctly shown in this debate, that the marked diversity of the laws of the two countries makes it utterly impossible that the law courts of England and Ireland could be amalgamated. But it was said that Dublin would be ruined by the withdrawal of the Lord Lieutenant. I certainly did at one time lend myself to the idea that Dublin would be injured by the abolition of the office; but I have given the question more consideration since then, and now I hold a different opinion. No doubt, the extinction of this mock court, with all its empty, idle pageantry, might inflict a blow upon that bastard aristocracy, that wretched assumption of gentility, so utterly at variance with honourable industry and sturdy independence, which has been generated in Dublin by this miserable abortion of a court. The fact is, there is more real independence in any little town in Ireland than in Dublin. The influence of the Castle is most injurious to the country generally; but in no respect is its evil influence more seriously felt, than in the demoralization of Dublin society. In no city in the world is there more pretence and vanity. In too many instances, it is wretched ostentation and glitter outside doors, and hard, miserly pinching within doors. The country gentleman of £700 or £800 a year was not contented unless he had his daughters presented at the Castle. Accordingly, he came up to Dublin, hired a house—perhaps from that patriotic house-agent who so pathetically appeals on behalf of his imperilled country—enters into the vulgar rivalry so common in that city; and, in order to keep pace with the ambitious barrister, and the more aspiring attorney, he has to screw his miserable tenants, whom he rack-rents or drives to America; and, in the end, this deluded gentleman finds himself embarrassed and a pauper—having sacrificed his all to bask in the smiles of an Eglinton or a Carlisle. Yes, such is too often the result of this miserable jostling and striving, this contemptible bowing and scraping before a mock Majesty, in a mock court. There are those who question the wisdom of sacrificing time and means to enjoy the splendours of a real court; but it does surprise me to witness the eagerness with which rational human beings rush to participation in an absurd farce, even though a dancing Viceroy plays the principal part in the entertainment. I believe this institution leads the public of Dublin to folly and extravagance, and tends to render the pursuit of humble honest industry less respectable than it is in other places. I also believe that it has a corrupting tendency—that it makes men who should alone depend on their exertions for their success in life, servile and sycophantic, and that it interferes with that spirit of self-respect and self-reliance which it is of the highest value to encourage in Ireland. Its effect on the bar is most prejudicial; and, indeed, I do not know any class who are served by its existence. After what I have said, I may be asked, how am I to vote? Notwithstanding the expression of my strong opinion, I do not intend to vote for the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield. [Laughter.] I am quite aware that this declaration is not a strict logical deduction from my speech, and the laughter of hon. Gentlemen does not in any way take me by surprise. I do not support the original Motion for the reasons given by the hon.

Mr. Bagwell

Mr. Maguire

Gentleman who has moved the previous question, and for the same reasons which will actuate the majority of those who are about to vote against the original Motion. [Cries of "No, no!"] I do not believe that there are ten Gentlemen in this House who are in favour of the retention of the office of Lord Lieutenant. [Cries of "Oh!"] Are there twenty, then? There are certainly not more who, if the question were put as a plain aye or no, would vote aye on the merits. I vote against the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield on a strictly intelligible ground — because he only proposes to abolish the office, and does not propose an equivalent. Indeed, the hon. and learned Member is not in a position to offer an equivalent. The Government alone are in that position; and until some definite substantial proposition, or plan, is laid before Parliament, and by those who have the authority and the power to carry it into effect, I cannot vote for any such Motion as that now proposed. The hon. Member for Dublin (Mr. Vance) has endeavoured to represent this as a great national question; but that hon. Gentleman has done more to prove it a purely local one, than any other speaker in the debate. Here, he says, is an attempt to inflict a great national wrong; but what does he ask? compensation for Dublin — not compensation for bereaved Cork, or for heart-stricken Belfast, but only for widowed Dublin, about to lose her Carlisle. When a definite plan for the settlement of this question is brought forward, I shall, to speak in official language, be prepared to give it my "best consideration;" and if it propose a change which I believe will be practically useful, I shall not hesitate to support it, and thus run the risk of all those terrible consequences which the excited imaginations of the hon. Members for Dublin suggest — the destruction of Irish nationality and the extinction of the Irish race, which are to flow, as a necessary consequence, from the withdrawal of this miserable sham, a mock court and a mock king. It has been said now, as on a former occasion, that the abolition of the Viceroyalty would keep the Irish gentry from Dublin; but the answer given in 1850 to this objection by the noble Lord the Member for London, was, that it would be better for many of them if they remained on their estates, and spent their money at home; and I must confess I am old-fashioned enough to agree in this opinion. The hon. Member for Dublin bewails the loss of the resident gentry, and of the money which they spent in the capital. But what does he prove? That the Dukes, and Marquesses, and Earls, are annually diminished in number, even though the Viceroy still remains to Dublin. It is true, that Dublin catches an occasional gleam from the coronet of Ireland's only Duke; but the rest of the once-resident nobility are gone, and none are now left but a baron and a bishop. But if the withdrawal of the Viceroy, and the extinction of his splendid court, and the loss of those "gay and festive scenes" so admirably described by the hon. Member for Dublin, are to drive all those great people from Dublin, how is it, I ask, that the Viceroy, and the Court, and the splendid balls of the Castle, do not keep them there, now that all these exist in undiminished splendour and magnificence? I am, Sir, quite prepared, when the right time comes, and the right plan is proposed, to vote for the extinction of a piece of idle and senseless pageantry, which is injurious and not beneficial to Ireland; but on the present occasion I feel bound to vote for the previous question.

MR. HORSMAN said, he should not have taken any part in the debate had it not been for the statement which had been made by the hon. Member for Enniskillen (Mr. Whiteside) in the course of his speech. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that the present Lord Lieutenant had made appointments of such a character that the Secretary for the Home Department would not, out of regard to his own reputation, be a party to them. Such a statement he could not, consistently with his sense of what was due to the Lord Lieutenant, allow to pass by without remark. Now, as the hon. and learned Gentleman vanished in that rhetorical flash, he (Mr. Horsman) must recur to the statement so made, and show how unfounded it was, which he was able to do from circumstances which had come to his own knowledge from the instructions he had received from the Lord Lieutenant. The hon. and learned Gentleman said, in the first instance, that the Protestant party in Ireland felt extremely dissatisfied with those appointments, and it was not difficult to recognize in this an old charge, which had often been made in the press and elsewhere, but never in that House, that the patronage of the present Irish Government was bestowed almost exclusively on Roman Catholics. That charge was totally unfounded. The majority of the appointments made by the present Lord Lieutenant, during the time that he had the honour of holding the position of Chief Secretary, whether in point of number, influence, dignity, or emolument, had been bestowed on Protestants. Should the hon. and learned Member repeat his charge he should be prepared to move for returns of all the appointments made by the Lord Lieutenant, which would completely establish the truth of the answer which he had just given to it. He was, however, unwilling to move for such a return unless forced to do so, as he did not wish to require persons to enter into a statement of their religious tenets. The hon. and learned Gentleman also said, that he did not complain of these appointments, because, of course, it was usual for every Government to bestow its patronage on its own supporters. Undoubtedly, it had usually been the practice for Governments to give their patronage, in the first instance, to their own supporters; but Lord Carlisle, when he became Lord Lieutenant, established a new system, and laid down a rule that the personal qualities and services of the candidate should be the first claim, and political influence the second; and he could say sincerely that during the two years he had held office he was not aware of a single instance in which that rule had been departed from. Constantly, when recommendations were sent to him by political friends, he had communicated that rule to them, and not in one single instance had he found that any objection had been made to it. Although, during those two years the recommendations of political friends were probably more disregarded than at any other period, nevertheless he had never had a single disagreeable word with any friend on the question of patronage, either by word of mouth or by letter. The appointments of all others in the gift of the Lord Lieutenant which were most valued, and for which there was most competition, were those of assistant barristers. Two of these fell vacant in his time. In both cases the Lord Lieutenant desired to be furnished with a list of four gentlemen who, from their personal and professional qualities, were thought best fitted for the office. That was done, and he selected the one first on each list, appointing gentlemen who had not even been candidates and to whom the appointment was matter of great surprise. No sooner were the selections made than gentlemen who had been candidates, and their friends expressed their approval of them, and stated that, had they known who were likely to be appointed, they would never have presented themselves as candidates at all; and further, they desired him to convey to the Lord Lieutenant their opinion that the best moral effect would be produced by so discriminating and judicious a distribution of patronage. He did not give this testimony for himself only. When he succeeded to the office of Chief Secretary for Ireland he had an interview with his predecessor, who gave him an assurance that a great deal of misrepresentation existed as to the feeling in Ireland on the subject of patronage; that though it was commonly rumoured Irish Members were difficult to deal with in the matter of patronage, he would find it very different when he came to have actual dealings with them. And so he must say he found it. There could be no doubt that in old days the Castle influence had been used for purposes of corruption in Ireland; but it was not for this country to reproach the Irish people on that ground. England had been the criminal—Ireland the victim. For centuries we oppressed them and assailed alike their freedom and their faith. We surrounded them with a network of corruption, and though individuals fell before the system, yet the moral fidelity of the nation remained untouched. They won their freedom, they stood true to their religion, and now we could not but respect them as furnishing the only example in history of a people who, after centuries of oppression, had emerged from it with the spirit and virtues of freemen. He thought the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield in referring, as he did, to the improved condition of Ireland fell into an error in giving too glowing a picture of its present prosperity, and in not distinguishing sufficiently between that which was permanent and lasting and that which might possibly be uncertain and temporary. Ireland had unquestionably made incredible progress of late years, and there was every reason to hope and believe that she would not again revert to her former pitiable condition, but at the same time they should remember how sudden and recent that improvement had been. Ten years had not elapsed since the condition of Ireland was an embarrassment and a mystery to every statesman, and when the wisest regarded her present with anxiety and her future almost with despair. Within that period she had seen a famine and a rebellion; and the very prostration in which she was then left, opened the first ray of hope for the future. Since then she had been blessed with good seasons, but although her agricultural prosperity had been unexampled still they could not forget that her population was dependent almost wholly on agriculture, and in a great measure on the potato for their subsistence, and that should a succession of bad seasons occur, or the potato crop again fail, we might find that the present prosperity was concealing many evils which there had not been time to eradicate, and that the condition of Ireland might once more become a source of trial and embarrassment. He did not wish the House, therefore, to be led away by the idea that because there was a prosperous calm now the people of Ireland would be able, like the people of England and Scotland, to weather a period of agricultural and commercial difficulty or financial embarrassment. Ireland was just beginning to find her feet after a long period of disease and suffering, and it was their duty to watch over her as a convalescent not yet beyond the danger of a relapse. They must be careful of any step they took in legislating for that country. Eight years was but a short space in the life of any nation. His hon. and learned Friend who brought forward the Motion treated it in one respect as a question of economy; the hon. Members for Dublin (Mr. Grogan and Mr. Vance) as a question of centralization, and the hon. and learned Member for Enniskillen (Mr. Whiteside), as was his wont, treated it as a personal and party question. Like the hon. Gentleman who spoke last, he (Mr. Horsman) should treat it as a question to be looked at from an Irish point of view. The question was, whether the Executive in Ireland was conducive to good government and the wellbeing of the Irish people, and, believing that the moral progress of Ireland had been even more striking than its material progress, he should feel it his duty to defer to the views of the Irish people on that point. There was, he believed, no undue prejudice in Ireland in favour of the Lord-Lieutenancy, but he was not sure that there was not among the English people a great deal of prejudice with regard to Irish character and feelings. He had always recollected the Bill of 1850, as well as the general concurrence which it met with from that House, and he had expected that, on the part of the Irish people, there would have been considerable difference of opinion on the subject now, preponderating, however, against the course taken by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield. The result of his own experience and observation, however, was that such was not the case. In conversing with gentlemen of all classes in Ireland—with judges, lawyers, country gentlemen, and officials dependent on the Castle—on the subject of good government for Ireland—he found that every one of them in the first instance raised this question of the Lord Lieutenancy, and that their opinions generally took the line which had been followed on different sides of the House that night, namely, that of very highly praising the Lord Lieutenant, and then suggesting the abolition of the office. But at the same time he did not think they would have voted for the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, and that on the ground stated by several Irish Members—in which he fully sympathized—that it was one thing to destroy and another to reconstruct, and those who swept away should also be prepared for the duty of replacement. There existed very serious apprehensions lest with the abolition of the office of Lord Lieutenant there might be swept away things of greater value. An hon. Member spoke, for example, of the removal of the law courts from Ireland. In England the whole tendency of recent legislation had been to make law cheap by bringing it home to every man's door; but while this was the popular principle in England, would any one for a moment think of dealing out such a different measure of justice to Ireland as to shut up her law courts, throw her statutes into the Liffey, compel all suitors to make a pilgrimage to London, and the solicitors of Dublin to dance year after year in this metropolis, in consequence, perhaps, of the postponement of suits, the costs of which had swelled up to a ruinous amount? Justice would in such a case be so dear as to cause a virtual denial of it altogether to the Irish people, and thus the removal of the Irish courts would become an intolerable oppression. But the question was also naturally raised as to what form of government could be substituted for that of the Lord Lieutenancy. In 1850, the proposal of the Government was to establish a fourth Secretary of State. Great objections were urged to that course then, but since that time a fourth Secretary of State had been appointed for another purpose, and now it would be necessary, if that plan were followed out, to have a fifth Secretary, a multiplication which might be liable to many objections. He could not say that the objections urged by the two hon. Members for Dublin were strongly entertained in that city, nor did he think the provinces would very much lament the removal of the Lord Lieutenancy. He did not think that the people of Cork or Belfast would feel the removal of the Lord Lieutenancy from Ireland any more than the cutlers of Sheffield would feel the abolition of the Lord Mayor's Show in London. He had been reminded of the vote he gave on this subject in 1850; and he must say that there was no change of circumstances of great importance which made that inexpedient now which appeared expedient then. If, therefore, he thought that his hon. and learned Friend and the Government were at direct issue on this point, he should feel perplexed as to his vote; for, while unwilling to fetter his own action as to the future, it would be most painful to him to find himself at variance with a Government from which in this very office he had received so much kindness and consideration; but it seemed to him that it was hardly possible for the Government to adopt that night the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend, because the Motion simply condemned the office of Lord Lieutenant. With the carrying of that Resolution the responsibility of his hon. and learned Friend ceased, but with the adoption of it the responsibility of the Government began; and unless they could see their way as to what was to be substituted for the existing arrangement, it would be unwise and unworthy in them to adopt a Resolution to which they did not yet see how they were to give effect. It seemed to him to be a question which must be settled by public opinion, and by the opinion of Parliament, and of that House especially; and the obvious indications of opinion given on all sides of the House could not be lost on the Government. His hon. and learned Friend who moved the previous question made a speech, which proved that he ought to have gone the length, not only of supporting the Motion for the abolition of the office of Lord Lieutenant, but also of proposing the appointment of another Secretary of State. When his hon. and learned Friend stated that the Resolution would produce no practical effect, he seemed to have quite forgotten that if the House came to the Resolution that the office of Lord Lieutenant should cease, it would probably take care, should the office nevertheless be maintained, not to pay the expense when the Votes in Supply came under consideration. On the whole, he thought that the House would probably be disposed to act in accordance with the opinion of the Government, very wisely and properly declared by his noble Friend, that any large measures of Reform should not be proceeded with this Session, and he thought this was one of the questions which might safely be remitted for further consideration, and with respect to which the intentions of the Government might be known on a future occasion. Agreeing with what had been stated by his right hon. Friend behind him (Sir W. Somerville), he should be extremely reluctant to press the Government to any final declaration of opinion on the present occasion, and to force them to pledge themselves to any abrupt termination of this office, however anomalous it might be supposed to be. During the next six months the question might be considered by the Government, and he was satisfied that in the meantime, under the administration of the present Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, acting in concert with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. H. Herbert), whose appointment to the office of Irish Secretary had been hailed with satisfaction by all his countrymen, the improvement which had taken place in Ireland would go on, and be very much assisted by the wisdom, justice, and impartiality of the present Government.

Mr. Horsman

Mr. Horsman

MR. P. O'BRIEN said, he could not but strongly condemn the tone of ridicule in which the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire) had spoken of the office of Viceroy. At the time of the Union a contract had been entered into by which the Lord Lieutenancy was to be kept up, and no reasons had been assigned to-night why that contract should be annulled. Besides, it was a matter in which the feelings of the Irish people themselves ought to be listened to. He denied that the abolition of the office would put an end to "jobbery." If the office were abolished, that jobbery, which was now to some extent controlled, would be perpetrated in London without any control at all. The hon. Member for Dungarvan spoke of a sham court. The hon. Member had been mayor of Cork, and he (Mr. O'Brien) ventured to assert that few men would exhibit more nervousness when presented to Her Majesty. Was Mrs. Jenkins, the drysalter's wife, of London, to be presented at Court without remark, and the presentations at Dublin Castle to be called a sham? He was surprised to hear a sneer in this direction from the emphatic Member for Dungarvan. It was gratifying, however, to reflect that, as far as Ireland was concerned, the hon. and democratic Member for Dungarvan was the only advocate of the abolition of the office.

MR. BLAKE said, that though disposed to agree on general principles with the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire), he must regret the slighting remarks made by that hon. Member with regard to the nobleman who so well filled the office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. He knew from communications he had with that nobleman, as a magistrate, that nothing gave him greater pleasure than to improve the condition of Ireland, and especially of the labouring population. Few towns in Ireland had been more benefited from the exertions of the Earl of Carlisle, than the one he had the honour to represent (Waterford).

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, there is no denying the importance of the question which the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield has brought under the consideration of the House. It is one with respect to which, however, those who entertain opposite opinions might equally vote for the Motion of the hon. Gentleman who has moved the previous question; because my hon. and learned Friend who made the original Motion has thrown down on the floor of the House an abstract Resolution, which, if it were adopted by the House, ought to be followed up by some practical measure for carrying the Resolution into effect. But my hon. and learned Friend leaves to others the task of finishing that which he wishes to begin; and, without suggesting any arrangement whatever by which the Government of Ireland is to be carried on, simply proposes, towards the conclusion of the Session, a Resolution, the effect of which is to condemn the existing state of things—to render that state of things inefficient for the purposes of government during a long course of time, while he abstains even from hinting at the arrangement he would substitute for it. Now, I think that is a very inconvenient mode of dealing with a great and important question of this nature. It is very well for hon. Gentlemen to propose abstract

Resolutions, and to leave it to the Government—if the House should affirm such Resolutions—to devise means for carrying them into effect; but I conceive that that is not the manner in which grave questions of this kind ought to be treated in the discussions of Parliament. I think, if any hon. Gentleman has satisfied his own mind that the Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland ought to cease, he is bound, when he makes such a proposition to the House, to suggest for its consideration, and point out to the Government, such an arrangement as he thinks calculated to supply the place of the system which he asks the House immediately, and by a single Resolution, to condemn. With regard to the question itself, I am bound to say that it is one which is surrounded with great difficulties. It is quite true, that in 1850 the Government of the day not only proposed the abolition of the office of Lord Lieutenant, but at the same time suggested a plan for the administration of the affairs of Ireland upon the cessation of that office. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Roebuck) mentioned the names of the Members of the Government who voted on that occasion. He also mentioned the names of those who must be supposed to have concurred in the measure, and among them he mentioned mine. I do not know at this moment how it happened that I was not present at the division; but, undoubtedly, as a Member of the Government, I concurred with my colleagues in the measure which was then submitted to the House. Difficulties arose, however, with regard to the system which was proposed as a substitute for the Lord Lieutenancy, and those difficulties were so serious that the measure was dropped, and a similar proposition has not since been submitted to Parliament. I confess that I, for one, am not prepared at the present moment to propose any arrangement which would be satisfactory, as a substitute for the Lord Lieutenancy. Treating this merely as an abstract proposition, it must be confessed that, in the present relations of the two countries, it is difficult to argue that a separate establishment, like that of the Lord Lieutenant, is necessary for the conduct of affairs in Ireland. It is, Sir, I say, difficult to maintain that the continuance of that office is essential to the prosperity of Ireland, or even to the good government of that country. At the same time it must be confessed, that many local advantages result from having in Dublin an authority with whom residents in Ireland can communicate personally, to whom they can state face to face their wants or wishes, and by communication with whom a great number of local questions which it would be difficult and tedious to arrange by correspondence may be settled without subjecting the persons interested to the inconvenience of coming over from Dublin to London. The question is, therefore, far from being so simple as the hon. and learned Gentleman seems to imagine, when he proposes by a single Vote of the House to cut short all the difficulties of the case. It is needless, however, to say that, even if the Government had determined upon any arrangement which they deemed satisfactory as a substitute for the existing system, it would be utterly impossible to expect them to submit their plan to Parliament at this period of the Session. I am sure, upon reflection, my hon. and learned Friend will feel that it would not be conducive to the interests of the public service that the House should, at this moment, condemn by its vote an existing institution which, as has been well observed, has been maintained for a long period, and should leave that institution under the censure and condemnation of Parliament, without any definite idea being even suggested by the mover of the Resolution as to the system upon which the affairs of Ireland are to be in future conducted, and the functions of that institution supplied. I shall, therefore, certainly vote for the previous question, and I think those hon. Gentlemen who agree with the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, that in the abstract the office of Lord Lieutenant may be dispensed with, as well as those who deem it essential to the interests of Ireland to maintain that office, may with equal propriety vote for the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Yarmouth (Mr. M'Cullagh), because there cannot be a doubt that the Resolution of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield is one which, at the present moment, it is inexpedient to affirm, as leading to no practical object. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Roebuck) said, that those who voted for the previous question would admit their acquiescence in the Motion, with regard to which the previous question is proposed. I beg leave to differ from the hon. and learned Gentleman on that point. Those who vote for the previous question declare, in effect, their opinion that, for whatever reasons, it is not expedient that the House should, at this moment, come to a decision upon the Resolution which has been submitted to it. Those, therefore, who vote for the previous question give no opinion, and imply no opinion, upon the subject on which the previous question is moved, but they simply declare that the Resolution is one which it is not desirable that Parliament should assent to at the present time. I am glad that my right hon. Friend the late Secretary for Ireland has done justice to Lord Carlisle, whose conduct in the administration of his Government has, I think, been most unfairly represented in the course of this debate. I am convinced that no man who ever filled the office of Lord Lieutenant entered upon it with a more sincere desire than was entertained by Lord Carlisle to conduct the administration in the manner most conducive to the interests of Ireland and most congenial with the feelings of Irishmen. I venture to say, there never was a man who more completely carried his heart into the performance of his duties than Lord Carlisle, and I think every one acquainted with the present state of Ireland will admit that his intentions have been fully appreciated by the Irish people. Indeed, I believe I may say, there never was a Lord Lieutenant who possessed more fully than does Lord Carlisle the confidence and affection of the people over whose affairs he presides. In the administration of the patronage with which he is invested, he has been actuated by no motive whatever, except that of public duty and the desire of promoting the general interests of Ireland; and I think if the prosperity, the tranquillity, and the good feeling of the country can be assumed as evidences of the merits of the person by whom the Government is conducted, we have ample testimony that Lord Carlisle's administration of the affairs of Ireland has been most successful. It is unnecessary for me, from the ground I have taken, to go into a detailed examination of the arguments which have been urged either in favour of, or in opposition to the abolition of the office of Lord Lieutenant. I have already stated, that in the abstract I think it would be difficult à priori to maintain that the continuance of such an office is absolutely necessary. On the other hand, I think it is evident from what has passed in the course of this debate, that there would be great difficulty in providing a satisfactory substitute for that office; and I shall, therefore, vote for the previous question.

Viscount Palmerston

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I hope the House will allow one who is neither an Irish Member nor has been an Irish Secretary to take some slight part in this debate; and that one who is an English Member and who holds no official position may be permitted to offer a few brief remarks upon the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield. That Motion is unquestionably one of no ordinary character. It proposes to make a very important alteration in the administration of Ireland; and I think we ought to have placed before us very precisely and distinctly the reasons which, in the opinion of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and of those who agree with him, render such an alteration not only expedient, but necessary and instant. I do not consider that any such reasons have been placed before us. The charges brought against the office of Lord Lieutenant are of a very general character, and are not such as—even were they true—would in my opinion justify immediate and precipitate legislation. So far as I can collect from the course of this debate, the charges against the office of Lord Lieutenant may be ranged under two heads. In the first place it is said that the office is of a deceptive character—that it is, as it has been repeatedly styled by one hon. Gentleman in the course of his speech, “a sham”—a word, the English of which I doubt, and the Parliamentary use of which I shall always deprecate. The reasons that have been advanced to show that the office is “a sham” have not brought conviction to my mind. Some traits have been referred to which perhaps prove that to a certain extent it is a ceremony and a pageant; but is the House prepared to terminate all ceremonies and to put an end to all pageants? Some of the objections which have been made to the office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland would apply to almost all the high offices of State, and if it were not something like blasphemy to say so, to use the expression of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire), I am not sure that they would not apply to the monarchy itself. Indeed, if you come to analyze all the arrangements and forms that surround the fulfilment of office, I am not clear that the highest offices in this House might not be open to the charge of being what the hon. and learned Gentleman styles “a sham.” You might analyze the fulfilment of public duties, and prove that an unknown clerk in a public office could fulfil, and does fulfil, perhaps all these functions which attract so much public attention and obtain so much public confidence. You might reduce Government to a much more simple and rude form than it is at present. But having done all this—having destroyed all sentiment and all responsibility—some day or other an awful crash might occur, and then you would discover that all the time you were simplifying the forms of Government you had been in point of fact but destroying all the sources of authority. But I might observe in passing that the very speakers who tell us that this office is “a sham”—that it is a perfectly idle and inefficient form of government—tell us at the same time that it meddles with everything, that there is nothing which it does not do in Ireland, that there is nobody whom it does not correct and control, and that all the elections which recently took place in that part of the kingdom were more or less influenced by the very power which is said to be absolutely inefficient. But the second charge brought against the office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland is not only that it is “a sham,” but—I beg pardon of the House for a moment, I cannot recall to my recollection at this instant the second charge that was preferred against the office. What I want, however, to impress on the House is, that we are called on to make a very great change in the administration of the affairs of Ireland, while we have no case placed before us for so doing. I do not mean to say that this form of administration is the one best adapted to the state of affairs in that part of the kingdom, or that it is best calculated to deal with all the circumstances which it has to control, and with which it has to contend. I do not agree with the noble Lord that it is an anomaly to have a different administration in Ireland from what you have in England, inasmuch as the circumstances of the two countries are the same, because I cannot admit the circumstances of the two countries are the same. But, passing from that view, I say it is absolutely necessary that we should have a clear case put before us before we sanction a change in the character of the administration of Ireland, and therefore that nothing but a feeling of general discontent acting upon the Government would justify the House, particularly at this moment, in entering upon the consideration of this question. In 1850 we had this question fairly brought before us, and I would appeal to any hon. Gentleman who remembers the circumstances under which it was then debated, whether the substitute that was offered us did not really sink under the repeated discussion which it underwent in this House? There was no indisposition on the part of the House to sanction the principle which has been supported by the hon. and learned Gentleman to-night; but when we had to consider the substitute that was placed before us by the Government, I would ask any hon. Gentleman who was then a Member of the House whether he will not bear witness that, night after night—for our debates were very much prolonged—it was not the inevitable result of our discussion that the substitute of the Government was generally considered as totally unsatisfactory? Well, no one can now say that there is anything in the circumstances of Ireland which requires such a discussion or necessitates such a change at the present moment. No one will deny, probably, that at no previous period was the state of Ireland more tranquil or more satisfactory than at present. I am not anxious to prove that it is to the existence of the office of Lord Lieutenant that that tranquillity is attributable; but that it is coincident with its existence none will deny, and that that tranquillity exists none will dispute. I may ask, therefore, on what grounds the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Sheffield now comes forward to effect so considerable a change in the mode of administration in Ireland? And now, by the way, I recollect the other objection which was urged against the office of Lord Lieutenant. That objection was, not only that the institution was “a sham,” but that it was corrupt. That is the second head of accusation against this office. But what proof have we had before us of this corruption? I do not think that in our debates at this moment, we ought to go into the ancient history of Ireland, or that we ought to discuss the character of the office at the time of the Union or before the Union, but we may speak of the action and influence of this office as we know it in our own times and in our own experience. Now, Sir, I will take the last twenty years during which I have had experience of this House and of public affairs; and I would ask what evidence have we before us that the exercise of authority by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland has been intriguing or corrupt? That men may have been managed, and that political results may have been achieved, as they will always be achieved, by the action of a free Government, who will dispute—who is there that ought to object? But I want to know, has there been more intrigue, more corruption, more management of men, or more improper influence through the exercise of the patronage of Ireland during the last twenty years than there has been in England? Let us meet this question fairly. It has been said of Belgium that it has always been the battle-field of Europe, and it may be said of Ireland that it has always been the battle-field of parties. There have been accusations and counter-accusations from both side of the House about the exercise of patronage. Sometimes we are told that a particular Lord Lieutenant has given all his patronage to the Protestants, and that another has distributed it among the Roman Catholics. But we must remember that this is a country of parties; that it has occurred during the last twenty years that Gentlemen of the Roman Catholic religion have generally been followers of one party in the State and Protestants of the other, and that the distribution of patronage has followed the arrangement of parties. Now, however, when we live in calmer times, and can consider these things in a more tranquil spirit, no one attributes that distribution of patronage, by whatever party it is exercised, to corruption or improper influence of any kind, but rather to the natural influence of party spirit in the country in which that patronage is exercised. Take the last ten years—take the time that has elapsed since the last discussion of this subject in this House and some little time previously—and take the last three Lord Lieutenants of Ireland, noblemen who hold different opinions. But first let me say, that we are asked to put an end to the office by which Ireland is administered at this moment. We are asked to put an end to it on two grounds,—first, because it is a mockery, which ground has in no way been substantiated, because every argument that has been used against the Lord Lieutenant would tell equally against the governor of a colony. You might prove, for instance, that the Governor of any colony was not a monarch, or, on the same ground, that the Governor General of India at the present moment was "a sham." Again, you are asked to put an end to this office of Lord Lieutenant because it is corrupt in its influence. But the House cannot have failed to notice that in no single instance has it been alleged that its exercise has been corrupt. Well, then, to revert to the last three noblemen who have held the office, you have first Lord Clarendon, the present Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. He exercised his office of Lord Lieutenant in a time of considerable trouble and excitement, and I do not suppose that any one will pretend to say that his exercise of the office was "a mockery" or "a sham." But, whatever may be the differences of opinion as to his Government of Ireland, there is no doubt that Her Majesty considered his services of so signal a character that She bestowed on him the highest honour which the Crown has at its disposal. Then we come to my noble Friend Lord Eglinton, whose viceroyalty was not of great duration, but it was of such a character that he lives in the hearts and recollections of the people whose interests he laboured to promote and whose affairs he administered. Now, we are told that Lord Carlisle is a dancer, and that he knows the difference between a bull and a pig. Sir, I had the honour of a seat in this House for ten years, when Lord Carlisle sat here, not only as a Minister of State, but also as Secretary of a Lord Lieutenant, and let me remind the House that those were not ordinary times. This House then reckoned among its Members probably a greater number of celebrated men than it ever contained at any other time. At other times there may indeed have been individual examples of higher intellectual powers, but a greater number of great men never flourished than during those ten years. Lord Morpeth met them upon equal terms. Lord Morpeth took a great part in our greatest debates. Lord Morpeth was a man remarkable by his knowledge, his accomplishments, and his commanding eloquence. Lord Morpeth was the man, who, as Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, was that responsible Minister for Ireland of whom we have heard so much, and those hon. Gentlemen pay no compliment to the House of Commons, where he filled so considerable a space, when they say that, having come to Ireland, it is found out that Lord Morpeth is only a dancer, and only able to decide between the merits of bulls and pigs. The last three Lord Lieutenants were three considerable men who occupied a considerable space in the public eye, and exercised considerable influence on public opinion, and that leads us to the real point before us. We are not here contending about the forms of Government, for, after all, Government greatly depends on the character of individuals. When we are talking about sham monarchs and intrigues and corruptions in the Castle of Dublin, the question is, whether that has not been the machinery by which, through some means or other, we have placed in authority in Ireland as chief administrators men of considerable eminence and experience. I do not mean to say that you may not allege reasons why a change should occur. I have not heard those reasons. I have heard nothing but vague and common-place charges made against the office. I am not at all prepared to say that you may not devise a more rational and more precise mode of administration; but I recollect that one of the most experienced Members of this House, then Prime Minister of the country, aided by the wisdom and knowledge of a Cabinet, did bring forward a scheme, and that scheme did not stand before the discussion of the House of Commons favourable to it, and therefore I think we ought to proceed with caution when the hon. and learned Member comes and asks us to sanction by our votes a general Resolution like the present. I think that the alternative which is offered is the alternative which we ought to adopt. I do not think that, under any circumstances, we should be justified in voting for the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, unless what I may call the enormities of the office were so obvious, unless the public discontent was so overwhelming, and Ministers at the same time were so negligent, that the House ought to come forward and call upon the Government to offer some remedy for existing and acknowledged evils. That is not our case, and therefore I do not see what course we can take, except avoid giving any decision on the question which is before us, beyond saying, which by voting the previous question we do say, that we do not think this a convenient moment to discuss the subject. I understand that to be the real interpretation of voting for the previous question, for I protest against the new interpretation of the hon. and learned Gentleman, that by voting for the previous question we acknowledge the principle of what is before us. That I think to be quite a gratuitous interpretation of our vote. Under general circumstances it would be more convenient that the question should be fairly met and discussed, that we should come to a vote aye or no upon the merits of the Resolution of the hon. and learned Gentleman. But I do not see how we can do that unless we are prepared, or rather unless the Government is prepared, if we agree to the Motion, to bring forward some practical substitute for the administration of Ireland. They are not prepared; there is no public necessity at present; and therefore I think we take a prudent course if, by voting for the Amendment, we express our opinion that it is not convenient at the present time to discuss the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman. In voting for the previous question I beg for myself to state that I do not in any way admit the principle which the hon. and learned Gentleman wishes us to adopt, but that I reserve to myself the right, at the proper moment, to offer upon that subject a mature and unshackled opinion.

Mr. Disraeli

Mr. CONOLLY said that, having borne a part in the discussion which took place with reference to this question some years ago, when by the Government of the day it was brought in a regular form before Parliament, and he voted for the abolition of the Lord Lieutenantcy, he might be allowed to state that he had completely changed his opinion under the influence of the powerful words addressed to the other House of Parliament by the late Duke of Wellington. It was due to himself and to that distinguished Assembly that he should record the reasons why he was about to give a different vote. The Motion was totally unauthorized by the circumstances of the case. Ireland, even in the present very much ameliorated condition of the country, did require the presence of a first-class officer of the Executive. There was no such officer in England or Scotland; but the condition of Ireland was peculiar, and, being peculiar, did require the distinct and direct interference of the Executive. He did not speak his own sentiments, but the sentiments of one much more worthy than he was—those of the late Duke of Wellington. Gentlemen who had just come into the House thought this a subject of diversion; but if they had ever had an opportunity of judging of the sagacity of that great man, they would hardly be disposed to treat it with unseemly mockery. He lived in the vicinity of Dublin, and knew as well as any one the advantages of a more independent state of society which would result from the abolition of the Lord Lieutenantcy. But the evils which would accrue were vast, and such as he could not contemplate without awe and apprehension, whereas the benefits were partial and few. He had no hesitation, upon these grounds, in giving his vote directly against the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

Mr. Disraeli

Mr. ROEBUCK said: The hon. Gentleman has stated that I have brought forward this Motion in an unusual and unprecedented manner. But I had no other course to pursue. When Sir Robert Peel was asked what he would do in a particular conjuncture, he said, "I will tell you when I am called in." It is enough for me as a private Member to point out the defect, and I only call upon the House, not to legislate, but to express an opinion upon an existing institution. I ask you to say whether you think that institution is a good or a bad one. I have not presumed to offer an equivalent, because I have not been "called in." I think the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman) is perfectly correct, that if the House were to agree with me our functions for the present would end, and those of the Government would begin. They are the governing body of the country at the present moment, and if this House declares that any institution is faulty, they, by their position, are called upon to propound a remedy, or to say that they are unequal to the task. Now, Sir, the noble Lord at the head of the Government says that for the House to declare at this period of the Session that the Lord Lieutenantcy of Ireland ought to be abolished would be an incorrect mode of proceeding, because we should attach to that office the stigma of a Parliamentary division against it, at the same time leaving it to stand without a substitute. But I would ask the noble Lord whether in 1850 there was not a Parliamentary division against the Lord Lieutenantcy to which he was a party, and whether he did not leave it from time to time with that stigma attached to it, doing nothing to sweep it away? Surely, as a responsible Minister, he ought to have considered what would be the effect of the proposition which was then approved by the House, and yet he persuaded us to go to a division against the Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland, though unable to bring forward anything in its place. I am not in a condition to do that. I only call upon the House to say whether they think the Lord Lieutenancy is a good office or not, and then I leave the question, intending to fix upon the Administration the responsibility of providing a remedy. Now, Sir, let me go one step forward. It is stated that the Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland is so important an office, that I ought to have intimated distinctly my grounds of objection to it before I asked this House to divide against it. I think, Sir, it is not my habit to enlarge very much upon questions debated in this House. I always endeavour to be as concise as possible; but I imagine that I advanced very cogent arguments in a short space of time against the office of Lord Lieutenant. First, I objected to it as an unnecessary expense. I did not dwell upon that point, but I mentioned it as one item. I said, also, that Ireland was without a responsible Government in consequence of the existence of the Lord Lieutenancy. I said there were three persons concerned in the Irish Government the Home Secretary, the Lord Lieutenant, and the Chief Secretary, and that between the three there was no responsible Governor in Ireland. I objected to the continuance of that anomaly. I said, "Do away with the Lord Lieutenant; appoint, if you please, a real Governor for Ireland, and, above all, make him responsible to this House." It was not for me to enter into any long enumeration of evils after that statement. Moreover, Sir, I followed a very good example—that of the noble Lord the Member for London. I followed him as far as a private Member could follow a Prime Minister. He proposed, first, the abolition of the office of the Lord Lieutenant, and, secondly, the substitution of something else in its place. I, as a private Member, was not in a condition to propose to this House anything like a scheme of Government; but I was in a condition—it was, indeed, part of my duty—to submit to the House faults which I believed to exist in the administration of Ireland. I pointed out those defects, and I left it to the House to determine upon them. Let me ask the House to consider for a moment what they are about to determine. By the aid of science—by the railroad and the electric telegraph—we have brought Dublin within eleven hours of London, and I say compare Ireland at the present day with what Scotland was in the reign of Queen Anne, when the Union was formed with England. At that time to travel from London to Edinburgh took three weeks or a month. Did Lord Somers then ask the House of Commons to appoint anything like a Viceroy for Scotland? Did he not distinctly put his authority against such a thing! In the reign of Queen Anne, when it took three weeks or a month to go from London to Scotland—a country governed by laws very different from those of England—a country in which not only the law, but the administration of the law was peculiar—nobody thought it requisite to establish a Viceroy at Edinburgh. I ask you, then, now that you are within eleven hours of Dublin—now that Ireland ought to be considered by proximity, as well as by race, manners, and law, the same as England—why will you maintain a Viceroy in that country? You have established a Viceroy in Ireland because you conquered Ireland. But Ireland is no longer to be regarded as a conquered country. She is an integral part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. You do not want a Lord Lieutenant there, but the law. It has been said that we are about to remove from them the law courts. I say that is not a true objection. It is not fairly brought forward. It is mentioned for the purpose of frightening unthinking people. It is not honest, and no one can believe it. Who can believe that this House intended in 1850 to bring the Irish law courts to England? If we did not intend to do that in 1850—and Lord J. Russell, in moving for leave to bring in the Bill, distinctly stated that there was no such intention—the fear must be chimerical now. Why, the aim of all our recent legislation has been to bring the law to the door of every man—to make it local. You have spread County Courts all over England, and have thereby done away in a great measure with the jurisdiction of Westminster Hall. Can the generation that has done that be supposed to be so mad or so inconsistent as to desire to bring the law courts from Ireland and establish them in England? No man in his senses can dream of such a thing. I believe it is—to use a word which, curiously enough, now sounds harshly in the ears of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks—"a sham." Now, Sir, I want to know what the Lord Lieutenant does. I have seen Irish Gentlemen get up and talk of the Lord Lieutenant until they seemed to weep at the very idea of losing him. But I want to know what he really does. If any hon. Gentleman upon the Treasury Bench could enlighten me upon that point I should be very thankful to him. I know the Lord Lieutenant is part of a pageant which has this evening fallen under the special patronage of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks; but that pageant is worse than useless—it is mischievous. Can the Lord Lieutenant do anything? No. Go and consult him. Does he consider and determine like the Governor General of India? No such thing. He tells you that he will consult his superior, that he will send to England, that he is not a Cabinet Minister, that he has not the power to do anything, but that he will give you an answer by-and-by. For that, and that only, you have a Lord Lieutenant in Ireland. He may, it is true, extend his patronage to a race, hold a levée, or give a ball to the people of Dublin, but he has in reality no more to do with the Government of Ireland than the groom who waits upon him. Again, Sir, it has been said that during this debate certain harsh words have been used respecting individuals. I do not think that accusation can be made against me. I said nothing about any individual. I confined my observations to the broad and general grounds upon which I based my Motion, and made no allusion whatever to particular persons. Sir, I know that upon the present occasion I shall be in a small—ay, a miserable—minority; but that does not at all surprise me. In 1850, Lord J. Russell, then Prime Minister, “gave the office,” and he was followed into the lobby by a large majority of this House, including many hon. Gentlemen whom I now see on the Treasury Bench. In 1857, Lord Palmerston is Prime Minister; he, too, in sporting phrase, will “give the office,” and will be followed into the lobby by all the hon. Gentlemen upon the Treasury Bench, and by many on the opposite side of the House. That does not surprise me. I have been too long a Member of this House to wonder at any change that I see in it. I must say, however, that a greater change than this I never saw, for if in 1850 it was a matter of policy to do away with the Lord Lieutenantcy, in 1857 it is still more so, because at the former period there was danger in every step that you took about Ireland, whereas now Ireland is quiet, and the Reform may be effected with perfect safety. But, Sir, I have been told—and the statement does not astonish me—that where there is doubt, difficulty, and danger, we must not move an inch because there is doubt, difficulty, and danger; and that when there is perfect peace—when there is no doubt, no difficulty, no danger—we must not propose a remedy for any existing evil because all is quiet. All is now quiet in Ireland, and I suppose that, however just, however politic, however consonant to the views of hon. Members, my proposition will be rejected by a large majority.

Mr. Roebuck

Whereupon previous Question put, “That that Question be now put.”

The House divided:—Ayes, 115; Noes 266: Majority, 151.

List of the AYES.

Adair, H. E.	Finlay, A. S.
Adderley, C. B.	Forster, C.
Adeane, H. J.	Gaskell, J. M.
Alcock, T.	Gilpin, C.
Anderson, Sir J.	Glyn, G. G.
Archdall, Capt. M.	Goderich, Visct.
Ayrton, A. S.	Griffith, C. D.
Baillie, H. J.	Hackblock, W.
Barnard, T.	Hanbury, R.
Baxter, W. E.	Harris, J. D.
Beaumont, W. B.	Henniker, Lord
Berkeley, F. W. F.	Hodgson, K. D.
Biggs, J.	Jackson, W.
Black, A.	Johnstone, J. J. H.
Blackburn, P.	Jones, D.
Brocklehurst, J.	Kershaw, J.
Bruce, H. A.	King, hon. P. J. L.
Butler, C. S.	Kinglake, A. W.
Byng, hon. G.	Kingscote, R. N. F.
Caird, J.	Kinnaird, hon. A. F.
Cairns, H. M'C.	Langston, J. H.
Cavendish, Lord	Lennox, Lord A. F.
Cheetham, J.	Lindsay, W. S.
Cholmeley, Sir M. J.	Locke, Jos.
Clay, J.	M'Clintock, J.
Cobbett, J. M.	Melgund, Visct.
Collins, T.	Moffatt, G.
Colville, C. R.	Morris, D.
Coningham, W.	Nicoll, D.
Cox, W.	Paget, C.
Craufurd, E. H. J.	Pakenham, Col.
Crawford, R. W.	Pease, H.
Crook, J.	Pechell, Sir G. B.
Crossley, F.	Philips, R. N.
Dalglish, R.	Pilkington, J.
Davie, Sir H. R. F.	Portman, hon. W. H. B.
Davison, R.	Repton, G. W. J.
Denison, hon. W. H. F.	Robartes, T. J. A.
Dillwyn, L. L.	Roupell, W.
Dunbar, Sir W.	Salisbury, E. G.
Duncombe, hon. A.	Selater, G.
Dunlop, A. M.	Sheridan, R. B.
Ellice, E. (St. Andrew's)	Sheridan, H. B.
Elton, Sir A. H.	Smith, J. B.
Evans, T. W.	Somerville, rt. hn. Sir W.
Ewart, W.	Stafford, A.
Ewart, J. C.	Stanley, Lord
Fergus, J.	Stapleton, J.
Ferguson, Col.	Stirling, W.
Ferguson, Sir R.	Sturt, H. G.

Talbot, C. R. M.
Thorneley, T.
Tollemache, hon. F. J.
Tomline, G.
Trelawny, Sir J. S.
Vane, Lord H.
Warburton, G. D.
Watkin, E. W.
Watkins, Col. L.

Whitbread, S.
White, J.
Williams, W.
Willyams, E. W. B.
Wise, J. A.
Woods, H.
TELLERS.
Roebuck, J. A.
Hadfield, G.

List of the NOES.

Adams, W. H.	Coote, Sir C. H.
Akroyd, E.	Cowan, C.
Annesley, hon. H.	Cubitt, Mr. Ald.
Antrobus, E.	Dashwood, Sir G. H.
Bagwell, J.	Deasy, R.
Baines, rt. hon. M. T.	De Vere, S. E.
Ball, E.	Disraeli, rt. hon. B.
Baring, T.	Dodson, J. G.
Baring, T. G.	Du Cane, C.
Bernard, T. T.	Dundas, F.
Bernard, hon. W. S.	Dunne, M.
Bathurst, A. A.	Du Pre, C. G.
Beach, W. W. B.	East, Sir J. B.
Beale, S.	Egerton, W. T.
Beamish, F. B.	Ellis, hon. L. A.
Beecroft, G. S.	Elphinstone, Sir J.
Bennet, P.	Ennis, J.
Bethell, Sir R.	Esmonde, J.
Blake, J.	Fagan, W.
Blakemore, T. W. B.	Farnham, E. B.
Boldero, Col.	Farquhar, Sir M.
Booth, Sir R. G.	FitzGerald, rt. hon. J. D.
Botfield, B.	FitzRoy, rt. hon. H.
Bouverie, rt. hon. E. P.	Fitzwilliam, hn. C. W. W.
Bouverie, hon. P. P.	Fitzwilliam, hon. G. W.
Bowyer, G.	Foljambe, F. J. S.
Brady, J.	Forde, Col.
Bramley-Moore, J.	Forster, Sir G.
Bramston, T. W.	Foster, W. O.
Brand, hon. H.	Fortescue, hon. F. D.
Briscoe, J. I.	Fortescue, C. S.
Bruce, Lord E.	Fraser, Sir W. A.
Bruce, Major C.	Freestun, Col.
Buchanan, W.	Gard, R. S.
Buckley, Gen.	Garnett, W. J.
Bulkeley, Sir R.	Gifford, Earl of
Buller, J. W.	Gilpin, Col.
Bunbury, W. B. M'C.	Glyn, G. C.
Burrell, Sir C. M.	Gordon, L. D.
Bury, Visct.	Greenall, G.
Butt, I.	Gregson, S.
Buxton, C.	Grenfell, C. P.
Buxton, Sir E. N.	Grenfell, C. W.
Calcraft, J. H.	Greville, Col. F.
Campbell, R. J. R.	Gray, Capt.
Castlerosse, Visct.	Grey, rt. hon. Sir G.
Cavendish, hon. C. C.	Grey, R. W.
Cavendish, hon. G.	Grogan, E.
Cayley, E. S.	Grosvenor, Earl
Child, S.	Gurdon, B.
Clark, J. J.	Gurney, S.
Clifford, C. C.	Hall, rt. hon. Sir B.
Clinton, Lord R.	Hamilton, G. A.
Clive, hon. R. W.	Hamilton, J. H.
Codrington, Sir W.	Hanmer, Sir J.
Codrington, Gen.	Harcourt, G. G.
Cogan, W. H. F.	Hassard, M.
Colebrooke, Sir T. E.	Hatchell, J.
Conyngham, Lord F.	Hay, Lord J.
Conolly, T.	Heard, J. I.
Cooper, E. J.	Henchy, D. O'C.
Cowper, rt. hon. W. F.	Henley, rt. hon. J. W.

Herbert, H. A.
Hill, Lord E.
Hodgson, W. N.
Hopwood, J. T.
Horsfall, T. B.
Howard, hon. C. W. G.
Howard, Lord E.
Hudson, G.
Ingham, R.
Ingram, H.
Jervoise, Sir J. C.
Johnstone, hon. H. B.
Johnstone, Sir J.
Jolliffe, Sir W. G. H.
Jolliffe, H. H.
Keating, Sir H. S.
Kendall, N.
Ker, R.
King, E. B.
Kirk, W.
Knatchbull, W. F.
Knatchbull-Hugessen, E.
Labouchere, rt. hon. H.
Langton, W. G.
Langton, H. G.
Laurie, J.
Legh, G. C.
Lennox, Lord H. G.
Levinge, Sir R.
Lewis, rt. hon. Sir G. C.
Liddell, hon. H. G.
Lockhart, A. E.
Long, W.
Lowe, rt. hon. R.
Luce, T.
Macarthy, A.
Macartney, G.
Macaulay, K.
Mackie, J.
McCullagh, W. T.
Magan, W. H.
Maguire, J. F.
Malins, R.
Mangles, C. E.
Manners, Lord J.
Marsh, M. H.
Martin, C. W.
Martin, P. W.
Massey, W. N.
Matheson, A.
Miller, T. J.
Mills, A.
Mitchell, T. A.
Moody, C. A.
Morgan, O.
Mostyn, hn. T. E. M. L.
Mowbray, J. R.
Napier, Sir C.
Nisbet, R. P.
Noel, hon. G. J.
Norreys, Sir D. J.
Norris, J. T.
North, Col.
O'Brien, P.
O'Brien, Sir T.
O'Connell, Capt. D.
O'Donoghoe, The O'Flaherty, A.
Ossulston, Lord
Owen, Sir J.
Packer, C. W.
Packington, rt. hon. Sir J.
Palk, L.

Palmer, R. W.
Palmerston, Visct.
Peel, Sir R.
Peel, Gen.
Pevensey, Visct.
Philipps, J. H.
Potter, Sir J.
Price, W. P.
Pryse, E. L.
Pugh, D.
Puller, C. W.
Ramsden, Sir J. W.
Ramsay, Sir A.
Raynham, Visct.
Rebow, J. G.
Ricardo, O.
Ridley, G.
Robertson, P. F.
Rolt, J.
Russell, F. W.
Rust, J.
Sandon, Visct.
Schneider, H. W.
Seymer, H. D.
Smith, rt. hon. R. V.
Smith, Sir F.
Smollett, A.
Somers, J. P.
Somerset, Col.
Spooner, R.
Stanhope, J. B.
Stephenson, R.
Stuart, Lord J.
Stuart, Col.
Sturt, C. N.
Sullivan, M.
Sykes, Col. W. H.
Tancred, H. W.
Taylor, Col.
Taylor, S. W.
Thompson, Gen.
Thornhill, W. P.
Tottenham, C.
Townsend, J.
Traill, G.
Trefusis, hon. C. H. R.
Trollope, rt. hon. Sir J.
Trueman, C.
Turner, J. A.
Vance, J.
Vansittart, G. H.
Vansittart, W.
Verner, Sir W.
Villiers, rt. hon. C. P.
Waldron, L.
Warro, J. A.
Welby, W. E.
Western, S.
Westhead, J. P. B.
Wickham, H. W.
Williams, Col.
Willoughby, J. P.
Willson, A.
Wilson, J.
Wingfield, R. B.
Wood, rt. hon. Sir C.
Wrightson, W. B.
Wynn, Col.
Wynne, W. W. E.
TELLERS.
Hayter, rt. hon. W. G.
Mulgrave, Earl of

STEAMERS IN THE NAVY.

RETURNS MOVED FOR.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he rose to move for returns relating to the reserved steamers and the steamers in commission at the various ports. He understood that the First Lord of the Admiralty intended to oppose his Motion on the ground that it would furnish to foreign Powers information which it would be wiser to keep from them. There was nothing, however, in the returns for which he asked that anybody who went down to Portsmouth, Plymouth, and other stations might not easily pick up, while the information was not known to the House of Commons; and therefore such a plea for withholding these particulars was wholly idle and fallacious. The only information given to the House respecting the Navy was comprised in the Estimates; and whether the money they voted was judiciously spent they had not the proper materials submitted to them for judging. Non-professional Gentlemen who looked at the Navy List would fancy that we had a respectable fleet, but in reality we had no fleet whatever for the defence of this country. The ships stationed at Sheerness, Chatham, Portsmouth, and Devonport, were wholly unfit for service, and were not manned at all, and there was not a screw line-of-battle ship among them. The few ships that we had on the home station ought at least to be efficient. With regard to our steamers we had several very bad vessels which were originally cut down; and out of the whole force in England we had not a single ship that, according to the notions of the present day, ought to be kept in commission. The Wellington was a fine three-decker of the old style of shipbuilding, and the Formidable was in the same position; but as for the rest they were only fit to be broken up. Instead of having our worst ships stationed here in time of peace we ought to have our best. The expense of keeping a good ship in commission was not more than that of a bad one. At present the Navy was entirely denuded of men, although a short time ago the First Lord of the Admiralty told the House that the Navy was so popular that he could not get rid of the men, and that when they were paid off they entered again immediately. Yet, an order having been sent down that the continuous service men who were entitled to their discharge after ten years' service might have their discharge at once if they thought proper, not less than 1,500 men at Portsmouth claimed the privilege, and asked for their discharge. He was also told that all the first class boys, who had been trained with great care, and were getting useful, were offered their discharge as well as the apprentice boys, and that every one of them also took their discharge. He did not blame the Admiralty for this, but he was sure that if the House of Commons were asked for men for manning the Navy they would be happy to vote them to-morrow. A pamphlet on the state of the Navy had been published within the last few days, which was well worthy the attention of the House and the Government. At present the state of the Navy was worse than when the late war broke out. In the autumn of 1853 we had a small though efficient squadron of reserve, and we had more ships ready for sea than we had at present. He did hope that the Government would take some energetic steps to preserve us from the danger which at present menaced us from the small force both of men and ships in the home ports. He put it to the House whether we were in a proper position. He admitted that on the foreign stations we had a respectable force; but we had not at home a sufficient force, nor could we get one for a long period, if any accident rendered a fleet necessary. The First Lord of the Admiralty, on moving the Navy Estimates, stated that this country had only forty-two steam line-of-battle ships, while France had forty, and he added that France, having 90,000 men available for that purpose, could man her fleet, while we could not. There were no ships in England from which to draught the men required to man a fleet, and it would be impossible to find them suddenly. He would, however, give the Government due credit for their management of the Coast Volunteers and the value of this source of supply. Instead of sending out screw ships to foreign stations he would recommend the Admiralty to send out sailing ships; for if it were found necessary to recall them they could not come home with the same rapidity as screw vessels. It appeared from a recent debate in another place that all the troops going to India were to be sent out in sailing vessels, and one noble Lord stated that sailing vessels would convey them faster than steamers. If so, why were we building screw steamers at an enormous expense? No doubt, there were delays in calling at the Cape and coaling, but if the screw vessels took the same course as the sailing vessels, and used their coals in a calm, there seemed no doubt that they would make quicker voyages. The Government, in sending sailing vessels to foreign stations, should also remember that if we were at war it would be a great advantage to an enemy to carry his steam force to our Colonies, when he would there have to encounter only sailing vessels. Where would the First Lord get men in case of war, if our ports were blockaded, and our sailing vessels abroad were not able to get home? He blamed the Ministry for not asking for more men. He found by the Estimates that the number of our naval force amounted, in the present year, to 52,153 men; but, from that number, 5,700—the amount of those engaged in the coast-guard service—must be deducted; so that the number of effective men, including the marines, was not above 46,453. That he regarded as an insufficient force; and he must, therefore, urge upon the Government the expediency of taking active steps to remedy a state of things which he could not look upon in any other light than as dangerous to the safety of the country. Ships were like fortifications, and he would admit that it was impossible to find finer ships than some of those they had at present; but ships alone did not compose a navy, for they became utterly useless if they were not properly manned with well-skilled seamen; and, seeing that other countries were busily engaged in drilling their seamen and manœuvring their fleets, he contended it was high time for the right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Admiralty to do something to place the navy of England upon an equally advantageous footing.

MR. BENTINCK seconded the Motion. He said the House and the country ought to feel themselves very much obliged to the hon. and gallant Admiral for directing their attention to the subject. As far as he (Mr. Bentinck) could judge, our navy, in its present state, could not be considered as efficient, even according to the details of the service which had upon a former occasion been furnished by the right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Admiralty himself. Those details distinctly proved that our naval force was not now sufficient to meet the requirements of the country in case a war should unexpectedly break out. He could but lament the apathy which existed in that House on the subject of the defences of the country. He trusted the earnest attention of the Government would, therefore, be directed to the subject, and must say he was astonished to find that, while money was night after night voted for comparatively insignificant purposes in that House, the Estimates for the Navy were sought to be cut down to the lowest possible amount. After the speech of the hon. and gallant Admiral, he thought the right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Admiralty was bound to show that the naval strength of the country was amply sufficient to meet the event of a sudden emergency.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That there be laid before this House a Return of the names and rates of the reserved Steamers at each port, their horse power, whether high or low pressure, screw or paddle, number of officers, men, and boys, engineers and stokers employed to take care of them, and how many were ready for Commission on the 1st day of June 1857:

"And, similar Return of the Steamers in Commission at the various ports, with their crews, how many coastguard men are borne on their books, the number of coast volunteers enrolled, and how many have been called out and drilled."

SIR CHARLES WOOD, who was very indistinctly heard, was understood to say, that he scarcely deemed it expedient to follow the hon. and gallant Admiral and the hon. Member for Norfolk into a discussion with respect to the general state of our naval force, upon a Motion such as that before the House, especially when he took into consideration the circumstance that when he had, a short time since, moved the Naval Estimates, he had entered largely into detail in connection with the subject. He had, upon that occasion, stated that he thought the number of men which he asked the House to sanction would be found to be sufficient, and he did not think that anything had since occurred in reference to our relations with foreign countries which rendered it expedient that that number should be increased. The number of seamen and boys which had been voted for the service was 33,000, while the number of marines was 15,000, making a total of 48,000 effective men, and not 46,453, as the hon. and gallant Admiral had observed. That number was exclusive of the coast-guard, which amounted to 5,700 men, and taking all the circumstances of our position into account, he saw no good reason why the country should be put to the expense of maintaining a larger force. We had, it was true, this year, no home squadron or squadrons of evolution, but that was owing, as he had before stated, to the fact that we were engaged in hostilities with China. The Government had not deemed it desirable, in the absence of a large portion of our fleet in that quarter, to ask Parliament for money to constitute a home squadron, bearing in mind that, when those hostilities were at an end, the fleet would return, and constitute a squadron of that nature, without the necessity of having recourse to any additional expenditure for the purpose. He might also remind the House that we now possessed a larger naval force than had ever yet been voted by Parliament in a time of general peace. If a war should unexpectedly break out, he believed that the country possessed a fleet quite able to cope with any force which was likely to be brought against it. The Government were the best judges of the chances of war, and it certainly was not desirable in time of peace, and with no prospect of a conflict, to keep up such a naval or military establishment as it might be expedient to maintain if the country were on the eve of war. He found in certain correspondence which took place in the reign of Louis XV., a maxim laid down which was well worthy of attention. It was, Do anything but go to war with England: keep her in a state of alarm, so that she may think it necessary to keep up an enormous army and navy, and that will exhaust the resources of any country. That maxim involved a caution worthy of being attended to. He would assure the House that if the Government thought it necessary to increase the number of men they would at once come down to it; and he was sure that no British House of Commons would ever refuse to vote the number of men which the Government might deem necessary in case of emergency for the safety of the country. He was glad that the hon. and gallant Admiral had spoken in terms of praise of the system which had been established with regard to the Coast Volunteers, because he believed that that system tended to provide a good reserve of seamen. With regard to the returns moved for by the hon. and gallant Admiral, he could only say that whatever information any foreign Government might derive, with regard to the force of this country, from private sources, it was a universal rule not to publish any official statement upon the subject, and, therefore, he felt it to be his duty to oppose the Motion.

MR. LINDSAY observed, that he thought that so far from any danger resulting from foreign powers being made acquainted with the number of ships which this country had at her disposal, it would be a great safeguard, because he believed that such a list would be shown as would make any power think twice before venturing to come into collision with them. He did not believe, however, that there were a sufficient number of ships in commission at present to defend the shores of the country.

Sir Charles Wood

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE remarked, that he entirely disagreed with all the observations of the hon. and gallant Admiral. He thought our ships were sufficiently numerous, and that they were in an efficient state for the protection of the country. He denied that the late Government had built ships without bottoms, that could neither fight nor run. He for one did not wish to see ships run away, and, as for fighting, the hon. and gallant Admiral had given them little chance of doing that when he had a fleet under his command.

GENERAL THOMPSON said, he could not hear the subject of manning the navy discussed, without suggesting that more use might be made of the corps of Marines; and in excuse for speaking in the presence of "great admirals" and sea kings, he would note that he had himself risen to the rank of mate of the watch and prize-master, and therefore knew a sailor from a marine. The service of the Marines was very popular in the country; in proof of which, they had their choice of recruits, and consequently the finest men to be anywhere seen. The prestige of the British Navy extended to the inhabitants of the interior, and men who had no chance of engaging as seamen, entered into the Marines. This opened an almost unlimited power of adding to the men for naval service, provided the Marines were trained, as they might be, for the object in view; and it implied no necessary increase of either men or money, for a battalion of Marines was as capable of service in a garrison as a battalion of infantry. If there should ever be a drawn naval battle in the Mediterranean, the Baltic, or the Channel, and both parties, after having perhaps a third of their men disabled, fell back on their depôts to see which could refit for sea the soonest, what possible reinforcement could be so prompt and effectual as finding a battalion of Marines at Malta, Corfu, and Gibraltar, or at Sheerness, Portsmouth, and Plymouth, provided these men were trained for such an emergency? And what would be the training an admiral in such circumstances would desire? Clearly that they should be Marine Artillery. Why should not the Marines be Marine Artillery? At present the navy had a certain number of Marines per gun, and they were trained to work the guns. Would any admiral, in the emergency described, object to having their number doubled? While on this subject he would suggest that there were many passed midshipmen, who, seeing no prospect of obtaining the rank of lieutenant in the navy, would be glad to accept the rank of ensign in the Marines; and he would leave it to any sea-officer to say, how superior the services of an officer of this kind would be, for instance in boats on a boarding-party, to those of a boy who had not his sea legs, and must be helped on board instead of helping anybody else. In some of this he saw matter of useful consideration.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he thought they had got beyond the range laid down by the hon. and gallant Admiral. The great question to which they ought to confine their attention was to get men—of ships they had sufficient. They were now carrying on war, and it was clear it would be impossible to recall men from China if they were suddenly wanted. He could not but characterise as reckless the way men had been discharged from the navy, and the way in which fine ships had been put out of commission, and worthless sailing vessels sent out in their place. It would now be difficult to recover those men for the country if any untoward circumstances should arise to require them. The order of the Admiralty to give continuous-service men their discharge had had the effect, in the case of the Orion in the Gulf of Mexico, of obliging the captain to grant the discharge of men who had been guilty of insubordination, by coming to the quarter-deck and demanding it in a body.

MR. HANKEY said, he rose to move the adjournment of the House, in consequence of the length of time hon. Members had been kept in attendance.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

SIR CHARLES WOOD hoped his hon. Friend would not press his Motion until the subject then before the House had been disposed of.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER then replied, but was almost inaudible. He said that an hon. and gallant Member had used words which were ungentlemanlike and dishonourable in reference to him. The fact was that he had copied the number of the men in the navy from the Estimates.

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE said, he rose to order, and to call the attention of the Speaker to these unparliamentary expressions.

MR. SPEAKER: The use of those words by the hon. and gallant Admiral certainly escaped my notice; but I cannot doubt that his attention having been directed to them he will withdraw those expressions, which are, as the hon. and gallant Admiral must know, quite unparliamentary.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER: The House must remember that I received very severe provocation. The hon. and gallant Member reflected on my conduct when commanding in the Baltic, and said I had given the fleet no opportunity of fighting, whereas he must have known perfectly well that it was impossible. If the House is of opinion that I ought to withdraw these expressions I will do so.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn; Question put and negatived.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, there had been a mistake. He thought Mr. Speaker had been putting the Motion for adjournment.

MR. HANKEY said, he should again press his Motion for adjournment.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House do now adjourn."

The House divided:—Ayes 140; Noes 54: Majority 86.

House adjourned at a Quarter before One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, July 8, 1857.

MINUTE.] PUBLIC BILL.—3<sup>o</sup> Turnpike Trusts Abolition (Ireland).

THAMES CONSERVANCY BILL.
CHANGED FROM THAMES AND MEDWAY CONSERVANCY [BY ORDER].

THIRD READING.

(Queen's Consent, and on behalf of the Duchies of Cornwall and Lancaster, signified).

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Bill be now read the third time."

GENERAL CODRINGTON rose to oppose the Bill. This he said was perhaps an unusual course to adopt, but he did so because he knew it was the opinion of his late father, Sir Edward Codrington expressed in strong terms to the First Lord of the Admiralty, to the effect that the navigation of the river Thames and of all tidal rivers was liable to be seriously damaged by embankments, wharfs, and piers thrown into them by irresponsible persons. An examination of the details of this Bill had convinced him that, although it was introduced as a private measure, it was, nevertheless, one of the greatest possible public importance. It was a compromise of a long standing suit between the City and the Government as to which party had a legal claim to the foreshores of the river. By it the conservancy of the river was handed over to a body called the conservators of the river Thames, the majority of which consisted of members of the Corporation, and the minority of nominees of the Government. It proposed to give them power to embank it and to project wharfs, and to receive rents from them; the conditions being that two-thirds of the revenues should be retained by the Board ostensibly for the object of improving the navigation of the river; and that the other should be handed over to the Government, for what object the Bill did not state. Such a body, he thought, was scarcely responsible to that House, and he did not see how the House could have any control over their management of the navigation of the river. He was not aware of the opinion entertained by the Board of Admiralty with respect to the Bill, but he had seen a report issued by the Board of Trade which condemned in very strong terms the proposed appointment of conservators of the river. The Board of Trade in that report referred to an opinion expressed by a Committee which had sat upon the subject, to the effect that the management of the navigation of the river should not be intrusted to the city Corporation, because its members had not the requisite technical knowledge. The Board of Trade then referred to the scheme proposed by that Committee for the conservancy of the river, and added that this Bill failed on two important points to carry that scheme into effect. By the present Bill the civic element would consist of the Lord Mayor, two aldermen, and four members of the Common Council, forming a majority, while the minority would be composed of two Members of the Trinity House, two members nominated by the Board of Admiralty, and one by the Board of Trade. So that in any question affecting the rights and interests of the public in the navigation of the river the power of the Board would rest entirely with the Corporation. That was a main point, and he thought that the Government had given up to what was practically an irresponsible body, a very important trust. There were many other objectionable features in the Bill. It laid down no principle as to the future system of maintaining the banks of the river, and with the exception of a clause which required the consent of the Admiralty to anything which impeded the navigation of the river, nothing was said as to the system on which wharfs were to be established, and it would therefore be open to the city Corporation to authorize the construction of as many wharfs as they please upon the embankments. He thought a Bill of this kind should not have been introduced as a private Bill, of which hon. Members generally remained ignorant of the details;—it should have been brought in as a public Bill liable to public discussion and public objection. Having expressed a hope that the subject would be fully discussed, he moved that the Bill be read a third time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

MR. AYRTON said, he fully concurred in the opinion of the hon. and gallant general, and could not understand on what principle a measure which would deal with the whole of the commerce of the port of London had been introduced as a private Bill, and therefore hoped that before the discussion proceeded further the right hon. Gentleman in the chair would say whether it had been properly introduced as a private Bill.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE wished to observe, before the hon. Gentleman's question was answered, that this, which professed to be a merely private Bill, would interfere with the rights of no less than four or five counties.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member having done me the favour of mentioning to me last night the doubt which he had on this point, I have given to it the best attention that I could. The Bill was introduced in the last, and has been revived in the present Parliament. The notices have been given in due form, and the Standing Orders have been proved to have been complied with. The Conservators of the river are the promoters of the Bill, and although it is perfectly true that great public interests are involved in it, there have been many other cases in which Bills, dealing in a similar manner with public interests, have been allowed to be introduced as private Bills. I believe that, according to Parliamentary practice, this Bill, however largely it involves the public interests, has been properly brought into the House as a private Bill.

MR. ALDERMAN CUBITT said, that the origin of the Bill was this—About fourteen years ago a great deal of objection was made to the unsightliness of the banks of the river Thames between Westminster and Greenwich, and several schemes were suggested for beautifying both sides of the river. One of the Admiralty engineers and two other eminent engineers devoted a great deal of attention to the subject, and finally they agreed upon a plan, which was submitted to the Corporation of the city of London. The Corporation, who were interested in the property of the bed and soil of the river, desired to have certain indentations along each side of the river filled up, and they proposed to empower the parties who owned property near those recesses to fill them up upon terms to be agreed upon. The Solicitor of the Woods and Forests thought that that course was an invasion of the rights of the Crown, and he instituted a suit against the Corporation, in which the Crown claimed the property of the bed and soil of the river. That suit was prosecuted for several years in the law courts as several ineffectual attempts had been made to settle the dispute; but at length a compromise was entered into, which this Bill would carry into effect. The City had conceded to the Crown the right to deal with the shores and bed of the river, and had entered into an engagement to hand over to the Crown one third of the revenue derived from land appropriated as wharfs; the Corporation had no selfish objects to serve—all they desired was to discharge efficiently one of their public duties. He had been connected with the city for several years, and he could conscientiously say that the Corporation had not the slightest pecuniary or selfish interest in the matter.

SIR DE LACY EVANS thought that the candid declaration of the worthy Alderman was entitled to considerable weight. He understood that one or two clauses with reference to a new tax on steamers plying above bridge had been omitted. If that were so, a great deal of his objection to the Bill had been removed. Nevertheless, he must regard the Bill as a species of rather retrograde legislation. Every corporation in the kingdom but that of the city of London had been reformed. The moderate reform proposed by the Government a year or two ago was still opposed by the city Corporation. The House ought to recollect that that Corporation was instituted at a time when the commerce of London was insignificant in comparison with its present gigantic proportions. Liverpool, about 100 years ago, was little more than a village, but its port was now only second to that of London in respect of commercial importance; and as the Corporation of Liverpool had been reformed to meet the existing state of things, so ought that of London. The city of London was in ancient times the capital of the kingdom, but now London proper had a population of 160,000, while that of the metropolis was about 2,500,000. That was a further reason for reforming the Corporation. He concurred with the hon. and gallant General in thinking that one of the principal objections to this Bill was that it proposed to constitute a Board the greater part of whose members would not be qualified to deal with the matters intrusted to them. He entertained the highest respect for the members of the Common Council, but their pursuits and habits were wholly unconnected with navigation. And yet, if this Bill passed, they would always have the power of outvoting the Government on questions affecting the navigation of the Thames. In fact, they would be less responsible than heretofore for the proper navigation of the river, because if any complaint were hereafter made on that subject they would no doubt excuse themselves by saying that the Government was equally responsible with them. Under these circumstances, if the hon. and gallant General should insist on a division, he should be obliged to vote with him; but he recommended the hon. and gallant General to pursue a different course—namely, that of endeavouring to alter the composition of the Conservancy Board.

MR. HENLEY assumed that the hon. and gallant General had not read the whole of the Report on which he had based his opposition to the Bill, because he had spoken of it as if it were the Report of a Committee of that House, whereas—[General CODRINGTON: I meant to say that it was the Report of a Commission.]—the question had been investigated not by a Committee, but by Commissioners, and that made a material difference. The House would recollect that those Commissioners were appointed to make a thorough inquiry with respect to the Corporation of London, in order to ascertain to what extent that sort of reform which had been applied to other corporations might be applied to it. So far as he was informed, the Commissioners did not make any inquiry as to the property of the Corporation, and it was important to bear that in mind, because the Report of the Board of Trade on this Bill, oddly enough, began by merely saying that the object of the Bill was to put an end to a suit now, or lately, pending between the Crown and the Corporation as to property claimed by the Corporation. But the fact was that that suit had been at that very time ended by an actual agreement entered into with the Corporation, in pursuance of a Treasury Minute, by which that suit, which had been going on for twelve or thirteen years, was compromised. It would have been a more correct description to have said that the object of this Bill was to carry into effect that agreement. But what he complained of was that in all the reasoning of that Report, from beginning to end, the Board of Trade wholly ignored that the City had a right to make any claim in this matter, and dealt with the Bill as if the agreement were a white sheet of paper. And that was not all; for in page 3 of their Report they dragged in another quotation from the Report of the Commissioners, for the purpose of making it appear that the suit was still pending; so that any one who had not read the two Reports with care—and especially any one who spoke of the Commissioners as if they were a Committee of that House—must suppose that the suit, instead of being settled, was still going on. For what other purpose but that of misleading could an extract from a Report of the Commissioners, bearing date 1854, have been put in so prominent a part of the Report made by the Board of Trade with respect to this Bill? Moreover, the Board of Trade dragged in coal duties, metage, and wine duties, and a great many other things, which might be all very well if this were a Bill for the reform of the city Corporation. It seemed to him that, as this Bill would settle a greatly litigated point between the Crown and the Corporation, it would facilitate rather than impede a general arrangement for the reform of the Corporation of the city. The Report of the Board of Trade was an attack upon the Treasury Minute by which the compromise was agreed to. Every line of that Report was directed, not so much against the Bill as against the Treasury Minute, because the Bill, even with respect to that which had been so much objected to—namely, the constitution of the Board of Conservancy, did no more than carry out to the letter the compromise contained in the Treasury Minute. Counting by noses, no doubt the Corporation had the majority in the Board of Conservancy proposed to be established; but he thought the weight of the minority, and the influence of public opinion, might be relied on to override any undue preponderance on the other side. He had another objection, however, to the new Board, for he must say that the proposed Board, composed as it was of nominees of the Corporation and of the Crown, with two members designated by the Trinity House, did seem to him to be independently constituted. It was said that the Bill would affect private rights, and no doubt it would do so; but full and ample notice was always given in the case of private Bills, and if any private rights were invaded this ought to have been pointed out at the proper time, when the Bill was in Committee. All he could say on this point was that he happened to be the owner of some water-side property on the Thames, and he did not feel himself aggrieved by this measure. It was rather unusual, after a Bill had gone through the ordeal of a Committee, to start such objections as had been taken now upon the present stage, and he should, under all the circumstances, certainly support the third reading.

Mr. Henley

Mr. AYRTON said, the reason the Bill had not been opposed on the second reading was, that, being a private Bill, the attention of hon. Members had not been called to it in the way it would have been had it been a public Bill. He could not see that the Bill had been introduced for the purpose of carrying out the arrangement entered into between the Corporation and the Crown. He had read the agreement as recited in the Bill, and there was not a single passage in it which in any way referred to the constitution of the Board of Conservancy; in fact, the Bill did not appear to have any connection with or sequence from the agreement entered into between the Corporation and the Crown, which would hold good whether this Bill passed or not. It stated that, in order to conclude the suit then pending, the rights of the Crown were to be surrendered to the Corporation of London as conservators of the Thames; and it then provided that certain accounts were to be rendered by the Corporation to the Crown; but he could not find a single word in it which had any bearing upon the Bill, or which related to the conservancy of the river, or anticipated that any change was to be made in the governing body, the Corporation of London. The question, then—the Bill having been now brought to their notice for the first time—if it was expedient that such a measure as this should be passed, seriously affecting, as it did, the great interests which were involved in the commerce of the City of London. If the Bill had been referred to a Committee, not of five—regarding it merely as a question relating to the interests of the Corporation—but of fifteen Members of that House, representing all interests concerned, and they had approved of it, he should have willingly bowed to their decision; but, as it was, until the principle involved in the measure had received the deliberate attention and decision of the House, he felt that he was fairly entitled to dissent from it. The position of the Corporation of London in reference to the commerce of the Thames, was far different now from what it was when the conservancy of the river was vested in their hands. As long as the trade and commerce of London were confined between the Tower on the one hand and Fleet Ditch on the other, it was right that the conservancy of the river should be vested in the hands of the Corporation; but that was now no longer the case, and he contended that they must proceed either upon the system suggested in the Report of the Commission, namely, that the management of the river should be vested in members of the Government, directly responsible to this House, or else in those who were most intimately connected with the commerce of London, and might be presumed to be the most competent to manage their own affairs, and look after their own interests. He admitted the principle that the Corporation should be adequately represented in the Conservancy Board, and he was quite willing that the chief of the Board should be the Lord Mayor; but he contended that there should also be some elements in the Board to represent the interests of the great docks and other establishments where the principal part of the commerce of the metropolis was carried on. He (Mr. Ayrton) had therefore no alternative but to support the Motion of the hon. and gallant General, the effect of which would be to refer the Bill to another Session. The wharf owners and the dock companies had the deepest interest in the conservancy of the river, and no Board, therefore, which they did not form part of could be satisfactory. He hoped, therefore, the House would refuse its consent to the third reading; and that, by deferring it to next Session, they would give opportunity to its promoters to make the measure more consistent with the commercial interests of the City of London.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER observed, that two objections had been taken to the third reading of this Bill—one to the form of proceeding, and another to the contents of the measure itself. It was said, in the first place, that this ought to have been a public, and not a private Bill; and next that the Constitution of the Court of Conservancy was objectionable. Now, with reference to the first objection, he would observe that, according to precedent, Bills of Conservancy had been always treated as private Bills; and that there was now a private Bill for the Conservancy of the Mersey, which had been referred to a Select Committee, over which his right hon. Friend Sir James Graham had with great ability presided. The House should remember that many securities existed in the case of private which did not exist in that of public Bills. Looking to the vast number of most important Acts now under the consideration of the House, it was not very likely that if a Bill of 166 clauses relating to the conservancy of the Thames had been brought in as a public measure it would have been very carefully debated across the table of this House; whereas, being introduced as a private Bill, notices were required, it went before the Examiners, interested parties were served with notices, and had an opportunity of being heard by counsel before a Select Committee, witnesses could be examined, and Reports of public Departments were made for the information of the Committee. It seemed to him, therefore, that there were more effectual securities for the due consideration of a Bill of this sort as a private than as a public measure. He could not, therefore, concede that there was any force in the objection that opportunity had not been given to the opponents of the Bill. Ample opportunity had been afforded to its adversaries if they had chosen to avail themselves of it; but they had not done so, and it was very inconvenient now to bring forward objections and ask the House to reject this Bill. This was not a usual course to take with regard to private Bills, and he trusted the House would not pursue it, except upon much stronger grounds than had yet been stated. But then it was said—"Why has the Government thrown overboard the Report of the Board of Trade?" In reply to this he might ask why that Report took such little notice of the suit pending between the Corporation and the Government, and the agreement come to between them. This Bill took its rise exclusively in the wish to settle a long pending suit between the City and the Crown with regard to the bed and shores of the Thames. As to the conservancy itself, no dispute had existed. It was vested, as had been admitted on the part of the Crown, in the City of London; but the dispute was as to whether that conservancy involved the title to the bed and shores of the river. Now, if this Bill were rejected, the result would be that the whole power respecting the conservancy would revert to the City. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets had said that all the House would do by accepting the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for Greenwich would be to postpone the Bill till next Session. That was not the case; by adopting the Amendment, hon. Members would not postpone, but would absolutely reject the measure, which if introduced next year must be proceeded with de novo. In his opinion, the settlement—for he did not call it a compromise—proposed with regard to the suit pending between the Crown and the City was a perfectly fair one. The City had conceded the principle contended for by the Crown; and though under the settlement the Crown would be entitled to the whole revenue arising from the banks and shores of the river, yet knowing the difficulty of providing an adequate fund for maintaining the conservancy of the river, the Government had reserved only one third of that revenue for themselves. The only remaining question was that respecting the constitution of the Conservancy Board. It might be said that it would be better if the majority of the members were nominated by the Crown, instead of by the City. Something, however, was due to existing rights. At present, the whole power connected with the conservancy of the Thames was vested in the City. The Corporation, practically, had found the funds to carry it out, and there was a large debt upon those funds, a great part of which they had already liquidated. Under these circumstances it seemed to him that the arrangement embodied in this Bill was a perfectly fair one. Of the members of the Board he thought he might say, ponderandi, non numerandi sunt; though the nominees of the Government and the Trinity House would be in a minority, yet, representing public opinion and possessing the power of appealing through the Government to this House, their influence at the Board could not be reckoned by a mere arithmetical calculation. He would say, however, that this constitution of the Board of Conservancy was adopted with a view to the public interest and that of the port of London generally, and not with a view to mere sectional and city interests. He would repeat, therefore, what he had stated on a former occasion—namely, that if upon experience it should be found that the City abused their powers for partial objects, it would then become the duty of the representatives of the Government to bring the matter under their consideration, and if he held office he should consider himself bound to revise the arrangement, and submit to this House a new constitution of the Board. He would remind hon. Gentlemen that if the Bill were rejected the effect would be to throw back the conservancy of the river upon the old system, than which nothing could be more unsatisfactory—for some years past the conservancy of the river had been practically neglected, owing to the disputes which had sprung up, and it was a matter of urgent public importance that this long litigated question should be brought to an issue. He hoped, therefore, that the House would not take the unusual course of rejecting this Bill upon its third reading after a Select Committee had reported in its favour.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY was told that there existed a Report which very materially affected the present question. The Bill embodied a compromise between the Crown and the Corporation, but third parties were concerned, whose rights had been entirely lost sight of. He referred to the landed gentry and corporations throughout England, and to their interest in the foreshore which was materially affected by this measure. He suggested that the Bill should be postponed until those interested were made aware of its real effect.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER was not aware of the existence of the Report to which the hon. Baronet had alluded; but if he would refer to this Bill he would see that the agreement between the Land Revenue-office and the City was set out at length, and that it merely referred to this particular suit. What the Attorney-General held was that the bed and shores of the Thames were vested in the Crown, while the City claimed them as conservators of the river.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he was perfectly aware of the consequences of the Vote he was about to give, and should record it against the third reading of this Bill. He could very well understand that as between the Crown and the Corporation as litigants the arrangement made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was advantageous to the former; but there were third parties of far more importance than either—namely, the public and the owners of property on both sides of the river, whose interests his right hon. Friend had unguardedly overlooked. He admitted that since the Bill was last before the House the measure had certainly been rendered less objectionable. At that time there was a clause giving to this body of Conservators a direct power of taxing all steamers plying above bridge, between Putney and Teddington. This power was now withdrawn, and the Bill, therefore, to that extent had been improved. Still, however, very large taxing powers remained. There were the power of licensing landowners to make docks and wharfs; a power of taking tolls for and leasing new piers and landing-places; and also for making, altering, and removing piers and landing-places—all most important powers, and all yielding to this conservancy fund a large and, probably, an increasing revenue. It was not for him to defend the Board of Trade from the adverse comments of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but he did think that that Board had faithfully discharged its duties in laying before the Committee on this Bill the information they had afforded.

The question now was really narrowed to this issue:—On the whole, is the proposed Conservancy Board well constituted? On this point he should like to hear a distinct answer to the question whether it was part of the arrangement between the Government and the Corporation when they compounded the suit that this composition of the Conservancy Board should be a fixed principle. If this were a part of the bargain entered into, he objected to it so strongly that he should certainly incur the risk of voting against the third reading of this Bill. One of two things would happen upon the present rejection of the measure,—either it would be brought forward next Session, and this standing majority on the part of the Corporation in the Conservancy Board would not be proposed; or, if the measure were not then reintroduced, the whole matter would remain in abeyance until the general subject of the reform of the City Corporation was undertaken on the responsibility of the Government, and whenever that time came he was confident the conservancy of the Thames would not be placed in such a body as was now suggested. There was, he thought, great force in the argument that a body so nominated was practically irresponsible. For himself, he preferred an elected body; but if there was to be a nominated body he could conceive nothing more incongruous than a double system of adverse nomination by a close body like the Corporation on the one side and partial nomination by the Executive Government on the other. He was at a loss to conceive on what principle the House at this time of day should affirm that the best conservancy for the most important port of England, and for that river on which they prided themselves, should be vested in the Lord Mayor, two Aldermen, and four Common Councilmen of the City of London. What was the peculiar aptitude of that body to administer affairs of such immense magnitude? He spoke with all respect of the Lord Mayor and of the ponderosity and weight which his presence at the Board might be supposed to exercise. But the Corporation were to have both weight and numbers too. He supposed that in the composition of the Board it would be considered, that like turtle soup, the more fat that was put into it the better; while as regarded the tax-payers the principle would be adopted which was pursued in the manufacture of lime punch, in which squeezing was the great necessity. He feared under this Bill that the tax-payers would be squeezed unmercifully and excessively. On the whole he believed that the Board of Conservancy would be an irresponsible body. It would be even less responsible than the Corporation was at present; and being fully aware of the effect of the vote which he was about to give he should record it with great pleasure against the third reading of the Bill.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the agreement between the Commissioners of Woods and the Corporation was, that the settlement should be framed on the principle of the Bill of 1847, which had been adopted by the Government.

SIR JAMES DUKE had hoped that the alterations which had been made in the Bill since the second reading would have conciliated the support of those hon. Members who had previously signified their intention of opposing it. He had been acquainted with the river Thames for forty years, and when he first knew it coasting vessels paid tonnage dues of 4d. and 2d. a ton, but now the only tonnage dues imposed were on first, second, and third class vessels  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. a ton, and on the fourth and fifth class vessels  $\frac{3}{4}$ d. a ton. The Bill had been submitted clause by clause to the proper department of the Government, and every suggestion which had been made by the authorities of that department had been adopted. He contended that there were among the members of the Corporation several gentlemen as well qualified to perform the duties of conservators of the river as any men who could be nominated, and, although practically the Corporation would have a majority on the Board of Conservancy, it was not likely that they would unite to carry out corporate objects to the detriment of the public interests. The Corporation had set apart a large sum out of their revenues for the improvement of the metropolis, and he was satisfied that they would be prepared, in their character of conservators, to lend a helping hand to the improvement of the river Thames, with which they had been long connected, and from which he admitted they had received great advantages. He trusted that the House would sanction the third reading of the Bill, and he was satisfied if they did so that the Corporation of London would prove to the country and to Parliament that their only desire was to promote the interests of the public and to improve the navigation of the river. With respect to introducing the measure as a private Bill, he observed that the forms of the House had been complied with in that respect, and he reminded hon. Members that only on the previous day a precisely similar measure, affecting the navigation of the river Clyde, had passed as a private Bill without a word of opposition being made to it. He therefore did not think that any objection should be raised to this Bill because of the form in which it had been introduced.

Sir James Graham

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 172; Noes 78: Majority 94.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 3<sup>o</sup>, and passed. [New Title.]

EXPENSES OF THE PERSIAN AND CHINESE WAR—ESTIMATE.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER presented Estimates to the amount of £500,000 towards the reimbursement to the East India Company of a moiety of the extraordinary expenses of the expedition to Persia (by command); also an Estimate to the amount of £500,000 for naval and military operations in China (by command), and moved that the said Estimates be referred to the Committee of Supply. The right hon. Gentleman also gave notice that in the course of the present month he should move a Resolution in Committee of Ways and Means with the view of founding upon it a Bill for continuing the present duties upon tea and sugar as fixed by the Act of last Session for two years from the 1st of April next.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Estimates be referred to the Committee of Supply."

MR. ROEBUCK said, he could not allow this opportunity to pass without protesting against what appeared to him to be a most unconstitutional transaction. A war had been declared, an expedition had been undertaken, a peace had been made, and the first intimation which the House of Commons received of the whole transaction was that a Bill was to be paid. He thought that the House would abdicate its functions, and that it would not deserve to be called the House of Commons of England if it did not mark with its reprobation such proceedings as he had described. In the whole history of the House of Commons, from 1640 down to the present hour, such a thing had never happened. It had been reserved for a Liberal Government, and for the present Prime Minister of England, to throw that slur and stigma upon the House of Commons, and if the House of Commons submitted to it, it would show that the noble Lord had a better appreciation of them than he (Mr. Roebuck) had.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that he had understood, in answer to a question which he had addressed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the grant to be moved for the Persian war was £265,000. He wished to know whether the £500,000 now named in the Estimate was to be in addition to that £265,000, or whether the smaller sum were included in the greater. He had understood, also, that the Indian Government were to bear half the expenses, and he wanted to know, therefore, whether £1,000,000 would cover the whole expenses of the Persian war?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that it would be unusual and inconvenient for the House to enter into a premature discussion upon the Estimates being laid upon the table. He had merely laid the Estimates on the table at this time as a matter of convenience, and he would only state, in answer to the question of the hon. Baronet, that when he stated that the amount to be asked this Session would be £260,000, it was early in the Session, before the termination of the war, before the signature of the treaty of peace, and upon the best data to which he then had access. The sum which he now stated was inclusive of, and not additional to, that sum. It would be the entire demand to be made upon the House this Session, and it would replace the advances made by the India Company.

MR. SCOTT said, that by the peculiar form of the expression used by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, limiting his observations to the present Session, he would seem to infer that there was a further sum to be demanded in respect of this war upon a future occasion. When the right hon. Gentleman said that it was not usual to raise a discussion upon laying Estimates upon the table, he (Mr. Scott) must observe, that nothing could be more unusual than the course which the right hon. Gentleman himself had adopted with regard to this question. As the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield had truly said, the first intimation of the affair which had been given to the House was, that there would be £260,000 to be paid, and that intimation was given to them after the war had been concluded, without any information having been afforded to the country that such a thing had been undertaken. Was not that somewhat unusual? The right hon. Gentleman complained that any one should call attention to the subject, because he had simply doubled the sum which he first stated that the country would be called upon to pay; and then he had guarded his answer to the hon. Baronet in such a manner, as to imply that even double the sum was but an instalment, and that in another Session the country would be asked for some unknown amount for this unknown war. He wished distinctly to be informed, whether this £500,000 was the whole charge which the country would be called upon to pay for the Persian war. He thought that the course which had been pursued with regard to the whole affair indicated more forcibly than anything that had before occurred, the servile condition of the House of Commons.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that he did not ask the House now to agree to any Vote. He had merely presented the Estimate, and had moved that it be referred to the Committee of Supply, which was the proper place for the consideration of the Estimate. When the Government asked the Committee to agree to a Vote upon the subject, they would give a full statement of the case, which would involve, among other things, an answer to the question of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down.

MR. BUCHANAN rose, and was about to address the House, when—

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON rose to order. Wednesdays were, by the rules of the House, devoted to the Orders of the Day, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, no doubt, not anticipating any discussion, had interfered with the regular Orders of the Day by making a Motion upon a most important subject, which was extremely likely to lead to a discussion, that Motion, moreover, being made without the slightest notice whatever, without being placed on the business paper, and when no one had the least reason to suppose that the question of the expenses of the war with Persia would be likely to come on. He begged to call the attention of the Speaker to the circumstances under which this Motion had been made, and he submitted that the proceeding had been in error ab initio.

Under all the circumstances, he should move that the debate be adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the debate be now adjourned."

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had taken no course in this matter which was not perfectly usual and regular. On presenting the Estimates he had made a merely formal Motion, which it was neither customary nor necessary to give any notice of. It was a Motion which never gave rise to any debate, and the only thing which had been unusual in the present case was, that on a merely formal Motion being made, a debate had arisen.

MR. BUCHANAN again rose, and was about to speak, but—

SIR JAMES GRAHAM rose to speak to the point of order. The opinion of Mr. Speaker had been asked on it by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich, and he (Sir J. Graham) was about to suggest what he thought would have made this proceeding perfectly regular on a Wednesday. He agreed that it was unusual, on presenting an Estimate and moving that it be referred to the Committee of Supply, that a debate should arise, and he suggested that if the Estimate had been presented at any period after a quarter to six o'clock, the proceeding would have been perfectly regular. No debate, according to the rules of the House, could then have arisen. The Motion would have been taken as a Motion of course, and the irregularity into which they had now fallen would have been avoided. But certainly it was open, he imagined, to any Member to raise a debate on the Motion to refer so large an Estimate of expenditure to the Committee of Supply, presented under circumstances so unusual as those on which comment had been made by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield. He did not think, therefore, that the Government could be surprised if a debate should arise under such circumstances, and it appeared to him to be almost challenging discussion to present the Estimate at a time when it was open to debate. Under the present circumstances, he thought that the proper course would be to agree to the Motion of the right hon. Member for Droitwich, in order that the House might proceed with the Orders of the Day.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that his right hon. Friend who had just sat down had implied that the course which had been taken by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was unusual. Now he (Sir G. Grey) believed it to be the universal practice of every Chancellor of the Exchequer, before the House proceeded to the ordinary business of the day, to present the Estimates which were intended to be considered afterwards in the Committee of Supply. The time for doing that was not, he contended, a late hour of the evening, or just before the adjournment of the House; but the period selected was always before the House proceeded to the proper business of the day. They had now been discussing for two hours a private Bill, which took precedence of all other business, and immediately that discussion ended, his right hon. Friend presented the Estimates. He believed that the course which had been taken was perfectly in accordance with precedent, both with respect to presenting the Estimates and moving that they be referred to the Committee of Supply, because, unless they were so referred, the Committee could take no cognizance of them. [SIR J. GRAHAM: On a Wednesday?] Yes; on any day. During the twenty-five years that he had been in Parliament, he never remembered a discussion taking place upon the presentation of an Estimate, and upon the making of the necessary Motion to give the Committee of Supply cognizance of the Estimate.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that he had intended to present these Estimates on the previous evening, and that he had brought them down to the House for that purpose at the usual time, intending to lay them on the table before the business commenced. He mentioned his intention at the time to Mr. Speaker, and went down to the bar, expecting that he should be called. Mr. Speaker, however, did not see him, and therefore his name was not called, otherwise the Estimates would have been presented then. He might add, that he was not aware of any reason why the Estimates should not be presented on a Wednesday as well as on any other day.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer intimated his intention to present these Estimates yesterday, but not seeing him at the bar of the House before the commencement of public business yesterday, he omitted to call the name of the right hon. Gentleman. He believed it had been the universal practice, when a Minister appeared at the bar with an Estimate, that on his name being called by the Speaker he should be permitted to present the Estimate to the House; and the Motion that the Estimate be referred to a Committee of Supply had been considered as a Motion of course. Therefore he himself should have considered that what was new, if not irregular, on the present occasion rather was that a Motion so generally received as a Motion of course should have been turned into a Motion raising a debate. It was for the House to decide whether there was anything in this proceeding which interfered with the regular course of the business; but nothing struck him as being irregular in the Motion made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. BUCHANAN proceeded, amid cries of "Order!" to call attention to the commercial inconvenience arising from constant alterations of the dates when certain duties on tea and sugar were to take effect—

SIR FRANCIS BARING rose to order. Mr. Speaker had already pronounced his opinion on one point of order, but a discussion on a notice of Motion given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer with respect to the tea and sugar duties would be even more irregular than the conversation which had just taken place.

SIR GEORGE GREY trusted that the Motion for the adjournment of the debate would not now be pressed.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM thought the Motion for the adjournment might be withdrawn, after what had fallen from Mr. Speaker and the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clauses 1 to 8 agreed to, with Amendments.

On Clause 9,

MR. BOWYER proposed to add the following proviso to the clause:—

"Provided, however, that the regulations of every such industrial school shall provide that a book shall be kept by the managers, in which the religious denomination or church to which every child admitted to such school, or the parents or the father of such child shall belong shall be entered; and that every minister or clergyman officiating in any chapel or other place of worship duly licensed according to law in the parish within which such industrial school shall be situated shall have free access to such book, and also to every child who shall appear by such book to belong to the religious denomination or church of which such minister is a teacher."

MR. ADDERLEY thought that he had altered the Bill so as to make it satisfactory to every Roman Catholic, not only in the House, but out of the House. He felt convinced that the clause proposed would be destructive of these institutions throughout the country. The best way to avoid the risk of proselytism was to allow free scope to persons of all denominations to provide schools for themselves.

MR. GREGORY said, that the question now was not one of proselytism, but whether the ministers of religion to which the child belonged should have access to the school, in order to give him religious instruction. At the same time, he admitted that the proviso was liable to some objection.

MR. NEWDEGATE said that the words allowed not only inspection but interference.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the manager of the schools might not be willing to receive the child coupled with such a condition.

MR. BOWYER admitted the force of the objection of the right hon. Gentleman. Motion withdrawn.

Clause agreed to, as were also Clauses 10, 11, and 12.

Clause 13 (Child not to be detained when fifteen years old).

MR. BARROW proposed, as an Amendment, to leave out the word "fifteen," and to insert instead the word "twelve." He thought that if children were kept at the schools beyond the age of twelve years, they would not be rendered active and muscular and fit to earn their livelihood in future life. It was important for the physical development of the children that they should be released from school at twelve years of age, when the education for labour ought to begin; and if these children were kept at school after that age it would be for the purpose of giving them an intellectual and scientific education. Thus they would, by the aid of the State, obtain an unfair advantage over the honest children of industrious parents.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 23, to leave out the word "fifteen," and insert the word "twelve," instead thereof.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON trusted the Committee would adhere to the clause as it stood, for it was most desirable that the power of detaining the children in the schools beyond the age of twelve years should exist. This power might not be always acted upon, but it ought to be whenever their detention was essential to their reformation. There were at least two Acts on the Statute-book defining the age up to which childhood should be considered to extend—namely, the Poor-law Act and the Juvenile Offenders Act, and in both the period of sixteen years was taken as the age to which childhood extended.

SIR GEORGE GREY thought that this Amendment ought to have been proposed at an earlier stage. The second clause, which had been adopted, provided that the word "child" should include any boy or girl above the age of five and under the age of fourteen, and the Amendment now proposed would be altogether inconsistent with that definition of the word "child."

MR. LIDDELL supported the clause. It should be remembered that those would be industrial schools, and that children would receive in them an industrial training.

VISCOUNT GODERICH had always feared that the effect of a measure of this nature would be to encourage idle and worthless parents to send their children into the streets to commit acts of vagrancy, in order that they might obtain admission to industrial schools; but he thought that many of the benefits which would result from the present Bill would counterbalance what he regarded as its defects. He would, however, vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Nottinghamshire (Mr. Barrow), because he could not doubt that in most districts of this country work could be found for children twelve years of age. He considered, therefore, that children ought not to be forcibly detained in these industrial schools up to the age of fifteen years.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE said, the adoption of the Amendment would entirely change the object of the Bill, by restricting its application to children below the age of twelve years.

VISCOUNT EBRINGTON considered that some discretion should be left to the managers of industrial schools with regard to the disposal of the children committed to their charge. He did not think it advisable that the inmates of such schools should be educated in any trades or professions which would enable them to compete at an advantage with the children of honest and industrious labourers, who were unable to educate their children for the highly-skilled and better paid description of labour. Moreover, if they were taught trades above those which were paid at the lowest rates, it would be an inducement to parents to watch over their children with less care, if they were placed in a better position if they went astray than if they had not gone astray. He would apply the same principle as was applied to the education of pauper children.

MR. AKROYD said, the Bill provided for children who had no previous education at all. It was founded not on philanthropic principles, but on the instinct of self-preservation of society. If those children were to be reformed, they should get some industrial training.

MR. BARROW said, that in his opinion, if a boy near twelve was brought before a magistrate, some other place than an industrial school was better fitted for him.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he thought it would be a most cruel proceeding to declare that at the age of twelve years the unfortunate children who were the inmates of these industrial schools should be driven from the only homes where they could seek refuge. He approved the provision of the second clause, that children might be committed to these schools up to the age of fourteen years; for, although they could not be compulsorily detained beyond the age of fifteen, those children who entered the schools at the age of fourteen would receive a year's training, which it was to be hoped would prove advantageous to them in after life. The way to guard against the abuse of parents neglecting their children that they might get into these schools was, to make the parents pay for their children, as much as they would cost at home.

MR. BARROW said, that on the bringing up of the Report he would be prepared to move that the word "twelve" should be substituted for the word "fourteen" in the second clause. The object of his Amendment was, not that children should be turned out of the schools at twelve years, but that they should not be detained against their own wills and their parents, after that age.

MR. RIDLEY said, under the Bill a child might be separated from its parents for eight years; he thought that rather too long a period, and would therefore support the Amendment.

MR. SPOONER said, he saw no reason why the Committee should adopt the Amendment. As the clause stood, it would merely provide that children who had no one to take care of them might be detained in the school up to the age of fifteen. It was surely not desirable that a child who had nobody whatever to look after him should necessarily be discharged from one of those establishments immediately on his attaining his twelfth year.

Sir John Pakington

Mr. BOWYER remarked, these institutions were called industrial schools, but they had as yet got no information as to what branches of industry were to be taught in them; the education ought to be such as would fit the children for such employments as were most general in the districts from which they came. A child in the mining districts, for instance, ought to be taught mining in these schools—if they taught him shoe-making he would not be able to earn his living as a miner. The Bill involved a principle entirely new to the law of England, and it drew no distinction between a child who had committed one slight offence and the habitual vagrant, and shut them up in a prison-house for years.

Mr. E. BALL said, that the hon. and learned Member spoke as if they were going to take children whose parents were able to keep them, and dragging them away from the fond care and comfort of home to shut them up in what he called a prison-house. The reverse was the fact, they were going to take children that were lost, and were living in a state of vagabondage. It was not a punishment, but an act of mercy.

Mr. BAGWELL said, the managers of industrial schools were placed to a certain extent in loco parentis, and therefore considerable confidence should be reposed in them. He did not think they ought to be required to turn children out of the schools when they arrived at the age of twelve years, and he hoped, therefore, the Committee would agree to the clause as it stood.

Mr. PAGET opposed the Amendment, observing that, as the industrial schools would be to a great extent dependent upon subscriptions, it was not probable that children would be detained in them for a longer time than was thought absolutely necessary. It was true that when children arrived at the age of twelve years a certain value attached to their labour; and he might observe that he had found employment for several boys of that age among the farmers of his district three days a week, the alternate days being spent by them at school. This plan had been attended with very beneficial effects in the case of boys of somewhat indifferent character.

Mr. ADAMS preferred the period of fifteen years, provided by the clause, to the period of twelve years, proposed by the Amendment. Considerable experience in the administration of criminal justice satisfied him that the most dangerous period in the lives of young persons was that between the ages of twelve and fifteen, when they were so near the adult period of life that they became the companions of older and frequently of ill-disposed persons. He thought, therefore, it was most unadvisable to facilitate the discharge of children from these schools until they were fifteen years of age.

Question put, "That the word 'fifteen' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 169; Noes 59: Majority 110.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 14, (On application of manager, the parent may be summoned and ordered to pay according to his ability).

Mr. BARROW proposed an Amendment limiting the period during which the parents should be called upon to pay for their children to twelve years instead of fifteen. In many cases the child would be able at that age to contribute to the support of the family, and it was bad enough to deprive the parents of such contributions without obliging them to pay for its support. In many cases the parents were not to blame for the child's misconduct, and they ought not to be subject to fine and imprisonment unless they could in some way be connected with that misconduct.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 32, to leave out the word "fifteen" and insert the word "twelve" instead thereof.

Mr. NEWDEGATE reminded the hon. Member (Mr. Barrow) that, by clauses 11 and 12, the magistrates—if satisfied that suitable employment could be found for a child—had the power to order his discharge from an industrial school before the expiration of the time for which he had been sent there.

Mr. KENDALL said, he apprehended the moment this clause was passed into a law, there would be a number of kind-hearted persons who would seek to fix no small part of our social evils entirely on those runaway boys, who would consequently be hunted from one end of England to the other; and, in that crusade, they would doubtless have the sympathy and assistance of the police. He submitted that if, under this Bill, they chose to take a man's child into one of these industrial schools, and to mulct his earnings—at a time, it might be, when he was already sufficiently pinched—to the extent of 3s. a week for that child's maintenance and education, such a man would become soured, and should such compulsion become at all common, it would give rise to a good deal of unpleasant feeling among the industrious classes.

MR. WALTER said, he thought the Amendment proposed by his hon. Friend the Member for South Nottinghamshire (Mr. Barrow) was a reasonable one, and, although he voted against his hon. Friend on the last division, he should support him on the present occasion. After the education and training which a child would receive in any of these industrial schools, he should be able to earn something by the time he was twelve years of age; and he, therefore, submitted that it would be unreasonable to call on the parent of such a child to contribute to his maintenance after he had attained that age. The only difficulty likely to arise from the proposition of his hon. Friend would be in cases where a child was not committed to an industrial school until after he had attained the age of twelve. Such instances, however, would probably not be numerous in comparison with the ordinary run of cases. The great majority of children sent to those institutions would, no doubt, be committed long before they had attained that age, while some would go there at a very tender age; and therefore he did not think that any practical hardship would arise to the managers of those schools by exonerating a parent from contributing to the maintenance and education of his child after it had attained the age of twelve years.

MR. A. MILLS said, he thought this was a vital clause in the Bill, and that the proposed modification of it was not desirable. It did not appear to him that there was any good ground for apprehending hardship to parents from the operation of the clause as it stood. He contended that the refusal of parents to contribute to the maintenance of their children in these schools, when they had the ability to pay, was a difficulty which the Legislature was bound to meet. There were instances within his own experience, of parents in the receipt of 30s. a week, who scornfully refused to contribute a single sixpence towards keeping their children at school. He should, therefore, support the clause in its integrity.

Mr. Kendall

MR. BRISCOE supported the Amendment. He reminded the Committee that a boy, at the age of fifteen, might receive a commission in the army, and contended that a person ceased to be a child long before that age, and ought to be in a position, when there was a necessity for it, to earn something towards his own livelihood, and to assist his parents.

MR. MILES said, that the criminal law had declared, in repeated instances, that childhood extended up to the age of sixteen; and, that being the case, it would be absurd to declare, as would be done by the adoption of this Amendment, that a boy of thirteen was capable of maintaining himself. He did not consider that any injury would be inflicted upon the parents of such children when they repeatedly saw, in the reports of cases before the police magistrates, parents earning from 40s. to 50s. a week refusing to contribute a farthing towards the maintenance of their children. He thought that, considering the law already recognised the age of childhood as extending to sixteen, that they should not emancipate the parents from their responsibility of supporting and providing for their children under that age.

MR. MASSEY said, this question had been substantially decided by the vote at which the Committee had just arrived, and it would be manifestly inconsistent, after having determined that no child should be detained in any industrial school beyond the age of fifteen, to say that the liability of his parent to contribute to his maintenance in such school should cease after he had attained the age of twelve. Why such liability should cease at that age was to him (Mr. Massey) perfectly incomprehensible. The principle of legislation in this matter was, that sufficient time should be allowed to operate upon a child in an institution of this kind, and those best acquainted with the subject urged that two years was the shortest possible period necessary for that purpose. He hoped the House would not stultify itself by agreeing to the proposal.

MR. PEASE said, he thought it a great hardship, not only on the children themselves but on the parents and other children, that the children in these industrial schools should be detained in them for a period of three years after they had attained an age when they might be expected to assist in the maintenance of themselves and the family remaining at home. He begged to remind the Committee that cases might happen in which not one only, but three or four members of a family might be placed in institutions of this kind; and, he asked, who then would be left to assist in supporting the rest of the family at home? He had many and strong objections to this Bill, but he was opposed to this clause in particular, and would therefore support the Amendment before the Committee.

Question put, "That the word 'fifteen' stand part of the clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 161; Noes 78: Majority 83.

LORD EDWARD HOWARD took exception to words in the clause by which, over and above the 3s. a week which a parent was to contribute to the maintenance of his child in an industrial school, he was to be charged with the payment of other "expenses incurred respecting the child, and also the expenses of conveying the child to school." He objected to that part of the clause, because the expenses mentioned in it were unlimited, and because the payment of them would press heavily upon the poorer classes.

MR. ADDERLEY assented to the omission of the words objected to by the noble Lord, and the words were expunged accordingly.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill; clauses 15, 16, and 17 agreed to.

Clause 18, Penalty not exceeding £5 on persons who shall induce children to abscond or remain away from school.

MR. BRISCOE complained of the provision as being unnecessarily severe. A single justice ought not to be empowered to inflict so heavy a penalty.

MR. ADAMS thought magistrates might fairly be vested with a discretion on such a point.

MR. BARROW condemned the wording of the clause as singularly vague and loose, and as worse than the wildest of judge-made law.

MR. ADDERLEY said, it had been drawn up by Sidney Turner, a very high authority on such questions.

MR. BOWYER said, that three hours had already been occupied in Committee on this Bill, and it was now time to adjourn the discussion. There were various other Bills on the paper, the second of which was the Tenant Right Bill; and as many hon. Members were anxious to hear the statements which they expected would be made on that measure, he begged to move that the Chairman now report progress.

MR. ADDERLEY appealed to the House against this Motion as being an indirect attempt to defeat a measure of which the hon. and learned Gentleman had not the courage openly to move the rejection.

MR. GREGORY hoped his hon. and learned Friend would not persist in his intention. As regarded the Irish Tenant Right Bill, he believed that the proposer of it intended to make a short statement preparatory to withdrawing it.

Motion for reporting progress withdrawn.

MR. COX thought it very hard that poor parents should be liable to a fine of £5 merely for inducing their child to remain at home, and moved that the maximum penalty be 40s.

Ultimately this Amendment was withdrawn; and Mr. ADDERLEY subsequently undertook to embody it in the Bill before the bringing up of the Report.

Clause agreed to, as were the remaining clauses.

MR. ADDERLEY then proposed the insertion of the following clause, in lieu of clause 5, (children taken into custody for vagrancy may be sent to school while inquiries are made.)

"When any child is taken into custody on a charge of vagrancy, under any local or general Act, the justices, on receiving satisfactory proof in support of such charge, may, if the parent of the child cannot at once be found, and provided there be any certified industrial school, the managers of which are willing to receive him, order the child to be sent to such industrial school for any period not exceeding one week, and shall direct due inquiries to be made, and notice to be given to the parent or guardian of the child, if any can be found, or to the persons with whom the child is or was last known to have been residing, the circumstances under which the child has been taken into custody, and that the matter will be inquired into at the time and place mentioned in the notice."

MR. PALK thought this clause was a great improvement on the former one, and felt greatly indebted to the hon. Member for his efforts to conciliate the opponents of the Bill.

Clause agreed to.

MR. ADDERLEY moved the substitution of the following for Clause 7—

“ The justices may forthwith, if the parent be found, or, otherwise, at the time and place mentioned in the aforesaid notice, make full inquiry into the matter; and may, if they think fit, discharge the child altogether, or deliver him up to his parents, on their giving an assurance in writing that they will be responsible for the good behaviour of the child, for any period not exceeding twelve months; and, in default of such assurance being given, may, by writing under their hands and seals, order the child to be detained for such period as they think necessary for his education in any certified industrial school, the managers of which are willing to take charge of him; provided, however, if within the county where the child was taken into custody, or any adjoining county, there shall be any certified industrial school conducted on the principles of the religious persuasion to which the parent of the child in the opinion of the justices shall belong, and the managers of which school shall be willing to receive him, such child shall be sent to such last mentioned school and not to any other. If the child, after such assurance as aforesaid being given, be brought up again on a similar charge, within the period for which the parent has become responsible for his good behaviour, the justices may inflict a fine upon the parent, not exceeding forty shillings, should it be proved, to the satisfaction of the justices, that the last mentioned act of vagrancy has taken place through the neglect of the parent.”

This clause, he said, he proposed in order to meet the objection of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire. That right hon. Gentleman objected to the security which was previously required from parents; all that was now provided for was the requiring a written form of assurance from parents that they would endeavour to secure the good behaviour of the child for twelve months, and if, through their negligence, he was again brought back, they were to be subject to a penalty of 40s.

MR. BARROW thought that prima facie evidence of vagrancy might be sufficient in the first instance to justify the remand of a child; but before he was committed to custody for a long period a formal conviction would be indispensable.

MR. ADDERLEY deemed it one of the principal merits of the clause that it avoided the necessity for a conviction, and only required that “satisfactory proof of the charge” should be given to the justices. At the suggestion of the Home Secretary he had adopted the words of an analogous provision in the Summary Jurisdiction Act.

MR. BOWYER objected on constitutional grounds to the wording of the clause. They ought not to call upon a parent to enter into any species of recognizance for the good conduct of his child until it had been legally convicted of some offence. Unless they insisted on such a formality they would have no safeguard against an arbitrary exercise of power by magistrates. The hon. and learned Gentleman then moved the insertion of words limiting the operation of the clause to cases in which there had been a previous conviction.

MR. BARROW objected to the infliction of a sentence of confinement upon the child, together with a liability for its maintenance on the part of the parent, until a formal adjudication, capable of being appealed against, had taken place.

MR. MASSEY concurred with the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Bowyer) that a conviction was a necessary preliminary to calling on the parent to give an assurance for the good behaviour of his child. Without an adjudication by the magistrates at this stage of the case the whole proceedings would be irregular and anomalous.

MR. PALK reminded the Committee that the Bill was not a penal one, but was intended to provide for the education and care of destitute and vagrant children. The Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk would alter the whole scope and tenour of the measure.

MR. COBBETT, while respecting the benevolent object of its author, could not help viewing the Bill as a very imprudent one. It was open to very grave objections, which only grew upon them as they proceeded with its discussion. He, therefore, begged to give the hon. Member for Staffordshire full notice that on the order for the third reading he meant to move the rejection of the measure. He would suggest that the Bill, after passing through Committee, should be reprinted, and an opportunity given for full consideration.

MR. MILES quite agreed that before the parents were called upon for recognizances there should be an adjudication.

MR. RIDLEY thought that the penal element had been admitted into the Bill to such an extent that its nature had been altered and rendered very objectionable.

MR. STAPLETON said, the Bill created an entirely new offence. Parents guilty of no offence might be ordered to make a money payment, and on non-payment be sent to gaol as criminals. Such a provision was without parallel in the whole statute law of England. It might be a man's misfortune to have a truant child. It was not the parent but the child who was to be convicted, and upon that the parent was to be punished. He objected to this multiplication of offences.

MR. MASSEY said, the offence of vagrancy was known to the law, and punishable by law, but before the parent could be held to recognizances the child must be convicted.

MR. ADDERLEY objected to the general principle of the Bill being discussed in Committee.

MR. COX, on the part of those who objected to the principle of the Bill, said he desired to alter the Bill as far as possible in accordance with their views.

MR. ADDERLEY: I assent to the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. COX said, his objection went further. The parents were to give recognizances for the good behaviour of the child. That was unreasonable. The Bill, in truth, was a Bill of pains and penalties. It was a Bill to extend the period of imprisonment for vagrancy. The clause allowed imprisonment for such period as the justice thought necessary. He should move that it be added "not exceeding six months."

MR. ADDERLEY assented to the Amendment.

MR. MILES objected to the Amendment. It really involved this—that there should be no detention in a reformatory beyond six months.

MR. MASSEY said, the hon. Member appeared to misunderstand the object of the Bill, which was simply to substitute detention in an industrial establishment for detention in a gaol. The Amendment, if carried, would frustrate the intentions of the Bill.

Amendment negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

MR. ADDERLEY proposed the following new clause, which was agreed to—

"If the child, after such assurance as aforesaid being given, be brought up again on a similar charge within the period for which the parent has become responsible for his good behaviour, the justices may inflict a fine upon the parent not exceeding 40s., should it be proved to the satisfaction of the justices that the last-mentioned act of vagrancy has taken place through the neglect of the parent."

VISCOUNT GODERICH proposed the following clause, which was also agreed to—

"The time during which any child shall be lodged in any certified industrial school under this Act shall, for all the purposes of the Act of the 9th and 10th years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chap. 66, and of every Act incorporated therewith, be excluded in the computation of the time therein mentioned."

MR. GREGORY moved, after Clause 8, the insertion of the following clause—

"1. And be it enacted, That no order of the manager or managers of such Industrial Schools, nor any bye-law, shall compel any inmate of any such school to attend or be present at any religious service which may be celebrated in a mode contrary to the religious principles of such inmate, nor shall authorize the education of any child in such school in any religious creed other than that professed by the parents or surviving parent of such child.

"2. Provided also, that it shall be lawful for any officiating minister of the religious persuasion of any inmate of such Industrial School, officiating within the parish in which such Industrial School shall be situated, at certain fixed hours of the day, which shall be fixed by the managers for the purpose, to visit such schools for the purpose of affording religious assistance to such inmate, and also for the purpose of instructing such inmate in the principles of his religion."

The clause, the hon. Member said, was copied from the new Poor Law Act. He had altered the clause in phraseology, requiring the managers of the schools to keep a book describing the religious persuasion of the child or his parents, and to permit teachers of that persuasion to have access to these schools.

MR. RIDLEY complained that he had been unable to hear the clause read. From what he gathered of its import he considered it to be highly objectionable and should therefore oppose it.

MR. HENLEY observed that many of the children to whom this Bill would apply had no religion at all, and was it intended that they should have no religious teaching?

MR. MASSEY thought that if a child stated he belonged to no particular religion he would be put down as a member of the Established Church. He thought the clause was one which required more consideration than time would allow upon this occasion, and would suggest that it should be withdrawn for the present and be brought up on the Report.

MR. GREGORY expressed his willingness to accede to that recommendation.

Clause withdrawn.

House resumed.

Committee report progress; to sit again To-morrow.

OXFORD CITY ELECTION—REPORT.

House informed, that the Committee had determined—

That Charles Neate, esquire, is not duly elected a Citizen to serve in this present Parliament for the City of Oxford.

That the last Election for the said City, so far as regards the Return of the said Charles Neate, esquire, is a void Election.

And the said Determinations were ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

House further informed, that the Committee had agreed to the following Resolutions—

That Charles Neate, esquire, was, by his Agents, guilty of bribery at the last Election for the City of Oxford.

That it was proved before the Committee, that during the said Election 198 persons were employed by the Committee of the said Charles Neate, esquire, as poll-clerks and messengers, 152 of whom voted for the said Charles Neate, esquire, and who subsequently received from the Agents of the said Charles Neate, esquire, payment in sums varying from £1 to 2s. 6d.

That these sums were paid under the pretence of remuneration for services as messengers and runners during the Election, and although it was not proved before the Committee that these payments to the voters were the primary motive in deciding their votes, yet it appeared to the Committee that, in many of the cases, no adequate services or work were in reality performed.

That it was proved to the Committee that the aforesaid acts of bribery were committed without the knowledge and consent of the said Charles Neate, esquire.

That it was proved to the Committee that there was treating to some extent at the last Election for the said City; but it was not proved to have taken place by the order or authority of the said Charles Neate, esquire, or his Agents.

That the Committee do not think it right to recommend that the issue of a new Writ for the said City of Oxford shall be suspended.

Report to lie on the Table.

Minutes of Evidence taken before the Committee to be laid before this House.

MAIDSTONE ELECTION—REPORT.

House informed, that the Committee had determined—

That Alexander James Beresford Beresford Hope, esquire, and Captain Edward Scott, are duly elected Burgesses to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Maidstone.

And the said determination was ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

House adjourned at two minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, July 9, 1857.

MINUTES.] Took the Oaths.—Several Lords.

PUBLIC BILLS.—1<sup>a</sup> Prisoners Removal; Turnpike Trusts Abolition (Ireland).

2<sup>a</sup> Crowded Dwellings Prevention; Transfer of Real Estate.

SALE OF OBSCENE BOOKS, &c., PREVENTION BILL.

AMENDMENT REPORTED.

LORD CAMPBELL said, that, in bringing up the Report, he hoped their Lordships would allow him to make a few observations on this subject. Since he last addressed them he had received information of a most appalling nature, with regard to the sale of these publications; but many of the communications were such that, for decency sake, he would not dwell upon them. But he held in his hand a volume which would give their Lordships a notion of what was going forward. It was a translation of one of the novels of Dumas the younger, on which the opera of La Traviata was founded, and it was called The Lady of the Camellias. It gave a description of the white camellia and the red camellia, in a manner which trenched upon modesty, and which he could not state. He did not wish to create a category of offences in which this book might be included, although it certainly was of a polluting character. It was only from the force of public opinion and of an improved taste that the circulation of such works could be put a stop to; but he was glad to inform their Lordships that there was a Society for the Encouragement of Pure Literature, of which his noble Friend the Duke of Argyll was president. He was shocked to think that there should be so much circulation for works like the one in his hand—The Lady of the Camellias. In this work the lady described her red camellias and her white camellias; but he would not shock their Lordships by going further. He had heard on good authority that the book was sold at all the railway stations. In it were thirty-two pages of book advertisements, embracing about 100 publications, most of which were of a very abominable description indeed. He referred to a particular portion of the novel in question as a specimen of the mode in which it overstepped the bounds of modesty and propriety. His Lordship then referred to another work of a character still worse than the former. He would not mention the name of this book, as that, no doubt, would be highly gratifying to the publisher, and would promote its sale. But whenever the work had been brought before a jury, which had been done on several occasions, there had been no hesitation felt by the juries in declaring that its obscenity was such as ought to be punished. He believed there were as many as a hundred of these filthy publications for sale in Holywell Street, many of which were of a most disgusting character. In the advertisement of one of these works it was stated to be "illustrated with numerous coloured engravings" and added, "This work has had many imitators, but no rivals. It may be said that for beauty of description it stands without a rival." Formerly this work was sold at the price of one guinea, but it was now published at 3s. 6d. In Holywell Street there were many shops of the same description as that which published the books of which he had been speaking. He thought that the issue of such publications should be made a misdemeanour. What was the remedy for all this, and how was the evidence to be procured? He suggested that there should be a power given, on complaint being made, to institute a search in places supposed to be depôts for these publications, and if found they should be carried away and destroyed. A more stringent measure might have been introduced, but he would not ask their Lordships to do more than pass this Bill with its single operative clause, which was to allow, on complaint being made by a party who believed that works of this nature were kept for the purpose of sale, a warrant to be granted for a constable to go with such assistance as might be necessary and accompanied by the party making the complaint, and if these indecent publications were found that they might be carried away and burnt or otherwise destroyed. He thought it should be left to the Judge to say what was and what was not an obscene publication.

LORD WENSLEYDALE entirely agreed with his noble and learned Friend in the Amendment proposed, but he thought, in the absence of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Lyndhurst), that further discussion of the Bill should be postponed until Monday, when that noble and learned Lord would be in his place.

Amendment reported (according to order), and Bill to be read 3<sup>a</sup> on Monday next.

COALWHIPPERS BILL.

Order for naming the Select Committee, under Standing Order No. 175 having been read,

LORD KINNAIRD moved that the order be discharged, stating at the same time that it was his intention to-morrow to move that the petition of the coalwhippers be referred to a Select Committee.

LORD RAVENSWORTH said, that since the noble Lord purposed not to proceed with his original Motion he should not object, after the decision at which the House had arrived a few evenings before, to have the petition in question referred to a Select Committee. He should, on the contrary, do everything in his power to facilitate the inquiry before that Committee, and should be prepared to show that the evils of which the noble Lord complained could be obviated by means much less objectionable than those which he had provided in his Bill.

The order was then discharged.

TRANSFER OF REAL ESTATE BILL.

PRESENTED. READ 1<sup>a</sup>.

LORD BROUGHAM reminded their Lordships that last Friday he had adverted to the experience of a steward of a manor during thirty years, as showing the infinite advantage that would be derived from a cheap, easy, and expeditious mode of conveyance, accompanied, as it must be to be effectual, with a proper system of registration, and it appeared to him (Lord Brougham) that it would by no means be impossible to extend that advantage from copyhold, and to make it general for all real estate. He was sure it would be a great relief to the people that land would thereby be no longer unmarketable, and that it would be greatly increased in value. The Committee that sat to inquire into the burdens on land had reported that one of the greatest of these burdens was the great expense and difficulty, and oftentimes uncertainty, of title attending the transfer of land. He admitted that it was a difficult subject, yet, in redemption of the pledge which he had given, he had prepared a Bill to amend the law touching the conveyance of estate, and for effecting a convenient system of registration. Perhaps his noble Friend on the woolsack would think that he ought to rest satisfied with the Report of the Commission and the prospect held out by his noble and learned Friend of a Bill on the subject; but he would adopt the course he had chosen to follow on the subject of the patent law, and would lay his Bill at once on the table with the hope that an Act on this subject might at length pass into law. The noble and learned Lord then presented a Bill touching the Transfer of Real Estate, and for the Registration of Titles thereof.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the public and their Lordships were greatly indebted to his noble and learned Friend for introducing this Bill, upon which, as his noble Friend had not explained it in detail, he would not enter upon any observations. Even if the Bill did not become law it would, at all events, be considered before next Session in conjunction with the Bill suggested by the Commissioners, with a view to carrying these suggestions into effect.

Bill read 1<sup>a</sup>.

House adjourned at a Quarter to Six o'Clock till to Morrow, Half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, July 9, 1857.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1<sup>o</sup> Dulwich College; Public Works (Ireland); Edinburgh, Canon-gate, and Montrose Annuity Tax Abolition.
2<sup>o</sup> Lunatics (Scotland); Court of Session (Scotland); Metropolitan Police Stations, &c.
3<sup>o</sup> Registration of Long Leases (Scotland).

REFORMATORY SCHOOLS BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made and Question proposed,
“That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

MR. ALCOCK said that, on the second reading of this Bill there was no opportunity given of discussing the principle of it, and after a few words on that occasion the Bill passed that stage. He would take this opportunity of stating his opinion upon the provisions of the measure. His great objection to the principle of the Bill was, that it was compulsory, and he felt strongly that from the moment the House created compulsory powers, they would destroy voluntary efforts in favour of education. He was surprised the supporters of the Bill did not study the effects of a similar measure in the county of Middlesex. Three years ago an Act had been passed, enabling the magistrates of Middlesex to do that which was now sought to be effected throughout the country; but not a single step had been taken to put that Act into operation. The reason was, that the magistrates could not agree as to what should be done, and no persons were as yet agreed as to what should be done, with their criminals. It was evident that this question was in a state of transition as was apparent from what took place on the discussion of the matter in the other House. Lord Brougham, Lord Carnarvon, and others, who discussed the question a few days ago in the other House, admitted the difficulties of the subject; and, therefore, they very wisely came to no decision with regard to it. The plan proposed would impose a great burden on the country. In the case of the county of Surrey, what would be the effect on the rates? The number of criminals in the year would be about 600, or 1,800 in three years, not calculating the recommitments. The average expense of maintaining the children in the establishment at Redhill, and for repairs was last year £27 6s. 5d. per head, and he might therefore fairly assume, that the average expense of maintaining the juvenile criminals now detained in the prisons of the county of Surrey would be £25 per head at the least, or £45,000 on the whole, which was as much as the whole of the county rates of Surrey. Thus, by this single Bill, they ran the risk of doubling the rates in the county of Surrey. Then the building would cost at least £100,000 for the whole number of criminals, in addition to the £45,000 a year, which would be a permanent charge on the county. If such was the expense in Surrey, what would be the expense for the whole country? Now, the population of Surrey was 700,000, and of the United Kingdom 28,000,000. So that Surrey being one-fortieth part of the United Kingdom, the entire cost for the maintenance of all the reformatory schools throughout the kingdom—supposing the measure were eventually extended to Ireland—would be not less than £1,800,000 per annum. It was said that the maintenance and repairs would be paid from the Consolidated Fund. But what matter was it to the counties, whether they paid this in the shape of an indirect tax through the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or directly, by means of a county rate? In either case, the expense would have to come out of the pockets of the ratepayers? He would also ask, if the measure were good for England, why it should not also be applied to Ireland and Scotland. He believed what he stated was perfectly true, and hoped the House would pause before they passed the Bill. He now moved that the Bill be committed that day three months.

Lord Brougham

MR. HANBURY said, he would second the Motion, believing that the Bill was quite unnecessary, and therefore inexpedient. Since the passing of the Juvenile Offenders Act of 1854, thirty-six reformatories had been certified, and twenty-eight founded by voluntary efforts, with the assistance of the State, and the sum given to these institutions rose to a very large amount. In fact, the State had already given ample encouragement to private promoters to come forward and establish these schools. He further objected to the measure, that in the event of its becoming law, it would place those institutions under four different kinds of control. First, the Home Office would send an inspector to see that the money granted by the State was properly applied. Next, the Council of Education would send their inspector to see that their money was properly applied. Then the justices of the peace who had the control of the money raised by county rate, would, of course, have some voice in the matter. And when all this had taken place, he should like to know what amount of control would be left to the private promoters and supporters of these institutions. He believed that the measure would discourage all voluntary effort, and that in consequence a great blow would be inflicted on the cause of reformatory schools in this country. On the whole, he was disposed to think that, though the State should have the power of punishing criminals, their reformation had better be placed in the hands of private individuals than of public departments. He did not believe that the ragged schools would have been so well attended, if the expense was borne by the rates. He was afraid that, if the reformation of their criminals was thrown entirely on the State, these institutions would become mere off-shoots of the gaols. As regarded the county rates, he could appeal to all the country Members to justify him in asserting that they were high enough already.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee," instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that he was anxious to clear the ground for discussing this Bill before the debate proceeded any further. Most of the observations of his hon. Friend (Mr. Alcock) really had no reference to the Bill on the table, but rather to the Bill of last year; and in fact, after having listened to them most attentively, he apprehended that his hon. Friend could not have read the Bill before him. The Bill of last Session had been withdrawn in deference to representations which had been made to him by the friends of reformatory schools. The present Bill was introduced instead, and was not a compulsory Bill at all. It would not compel the magistrates to impose one farthing upon the rates for these reformatories, nor would it compel the managers of them to receive aid from county or borough rates. His hon. Friend was also mistaken in the version he had given of the proceedings in the House of Lords in reference to Lord Carnarvon's Bill. That Bill was opposed by his noble Friend Lord Granville, and its consideration was only adjourned at the instance of Lord Brougham, and other Members of that House, who expressed themselves favourable to its provisions, because they knew that the present Bill was to be discussed here, and would, in all probability, go up to them in a few days. If, then, his hon. Friend carried his Amendment, the result would be to defeat the intentions of those noble Lords who pressed the adjournment of Lord Carnarvon's Bill, in order to wait until this Bill came before them. The observations which his hon. Friend had made, proved that he had not much faith in the discretion of his brother magistrates for the county of Surrey. The alarm also, which he expressed respecting the matter of expense was, in his opinion, entirely unfounded. The magistrates were already intrusted with very extensive powers with regard to gaols and lunatic asylums, and there was no reason for supposing that they would not exercise the powers to be given to them by this Bill as discreetly as they exercised their present powers. The object was to have less criminals in the country in future, and when it was said that the Bill was not necessary, he had only to say that there were several districts which had no institutions for the reformation of young criminals. He had received earnest representations from populous districts, requesting him to provide for the extension of these institutions. And he thought that no vain fear of interfering with voluntary efforts should prevent them from doing so. At the suggestion of the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) and with the view of rendering it unnecessary in all cases to establish separate institutions for every county or borough, he had given notice of a clause for enabling the magistrates of a county or borough to make arrangements with any reformatory institution to receive from their county or borough a certain number of children to be agreed on in consideration of periodical payments. Thus, the necessity of entailing a large expense on the ratepayers for the establishment of separate institutions would be avoided. As the Bill had been read a second time, and the morning sitting was limited, he hoped the House would allow it to go into Committee, when his hon. Friends would have full opportunity of discussing and considering the clauses one by one.

MR. BRISCOE felt great regret in opposing any measure brought in by the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary, but as he had for many years of his life paid great attention to this subject, he felt bound to oppose this Bill, on the ground that it would throw a heavy burden on the ratepayers of counties who were already sufficiently taxed. He believed that a compulsory rate would destroy the efforts now made in support of reformatory schools, and that these schools would never be so efficient when under the charge of the State as when conducted by those whose hearts were enlisted in the cause. The best friends of these schools remonstrated against the Bill—[Sir G. GREY: The last Bill.] No doubt the former Bill was of a more objectionable character, but this was not a good Bill. He had attended a great many meetings in West Surrey, by all of which he was requested to oppose this Bill. There were fifty-five certified reformatory schools in existence, thirty-five in England and twenty in Scotland. He believed the result of the Bill would be to destroy the voluntary efforts of individuals. The Government already contributed 7s. per head towards the support of these schools, and had acted with great wisdom in so doing. That ought to be nearly enough in itself to support these schools. If they went on in this way to burden the counties, the country would be soon saddled with a new national debt. He believed these schools could be properly conducted only by those who had their hearts in the business, and not by magistrates or the representatives of magistrates, and that if the Bill passed, the schools would be converted into juvenile prisons.

SIR EDWARD KERRISON said, he should support the Bill. A system of reformation should, in his opinion, form part of the treatment of juvenile criminals, under the guidance of persons who felt an interest in the matter. The time had arrived, indeed, when the reformatory system should be made of general application throughout the country. It should not, however, be left entirely in the discretion of the managers of reformatory schools to receive or reject children, but it should be in the power of any chairman of quarter sessions, or any Judge, without reference to the managers, to send boys committed by them to these schools. Unless a measure were passed, empowering justices to provide fit and proper places as reformatories, they would continue to have small schools in different parts of the country, but they would be altogether inadequate to the wants of the country; and he thought this Bill would have the effect of providing proper buildings on eligible sites for the purposes of these schools. The hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Alcock) had greatly exaggerated the expense the Bill would occasion, when he stated the probable cost of maintaining a reformatory in that county would amount to £45,000 a year. He (Sir E. Kerrison) lived in a county, the population of which was about half that of Surrey; and he believed that for an annual expenditure of £2,000, they would be able to maintain a reformatory amply sufficient for the accommodation of the juvenile criminals of that county. It was not reasonable to rely upon voluntary effort alone for the support of these establishments. The offences being committed against the ratepayers, the ratepayers should maintain them. He wanted to see voluntary contributions given in aid of emigration, and the placing boys out—to such schools, for example, as those which the hon. Member for Staffordshire (Mr. Adderley) proposed to establish—the preventive schools and ragged schools. So far as the power to be vested in the justices was concerned, he did not agree with those who thought that they would abuse that power.

Sir George Grey

MR. HACKBLOCK said, he could not support the Motion for the rejection of the Bill. He would admit that the financial objection was formidable, but there were higher considerations than money involved in the present question. He had been present at meetings in the county of Surrey, at which resolutions were passed in favour of the present measure, and he was entirely in support of it himself, and begged to tender his best thanks to the Government for bringing it forward.

MR. BUXTON remarked that he had studied the Bill closely, and it struck him with much force that the measure was utterly needless. He had himself some connection with a reformatory, and he must say that he saw no reason why persons who took an interest in such institutions should not be called upon to subscribe for their support. He was glad to have some assistance from the Government; but it appeared to him that it was unnecessary to supersede voluntary effort altogether, and that Government, instead of superseding, should only supplement the exertions of private individuals. He was persuaded that the reformatory movement was advancing with sufficient rapidity, and that if they had the patience to wait a few years, the demand for those institutions would be abundantly supplied. If this Bill passed, there would be meetings in town halls, attended by the lord lieutenant of the county and the bishop of the diocese, at which resolutions would be passed in favour of large reformatories to be established under it, but the effect would be to transfer the management of reformatories from those whose hearts and heads were enlisted in the work to those who felt no interest at all in the matter. No doubt the measure would do a great deal of good, but it would work one certain evil, for it would be the death of all private enterprise. Besides, he did not like adding to the burdens already borne by the ratepayers; he shrank, indeed, from searching out more burdens than those which at present rested upon their unlucky shoulders. And his objection to the measure was the greater when he recollected the ratepayers would have no voice whatever in the expenditure of the money, for the magistrates were to meet together, and were to tax the ratepayers. The Bill was opposed to the principle that the people should tax themselves.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, that he regretted that the debate had been continued so long, as he believed that the observations which had been made might very well have been withheld until the Bill was in Committee, and he should not have risen but for the determined spirit in which the two knights for the county of Surrey had buckled on their armour against the Bill. They had said that the Bill would impose a great additional burden on the ratepayers; but if it were true that the effect of this measure was to increase expenditure, then they were totally wrong in what they were doing, and had been doing for some time past. He believed, however, the effect of the measure would be to diminish crime, and therefore ultimately to diminish expense. It was true that they were in a transition state, but he trusted they were on the way towards a better state of things. It was not, however, by leaving the present state of things in existence that they could ever arrive at a more perfect condition of things. On the contrary, the longer the remedy was delayed, the greater would be the extent of the evil they would have to contend with. With regard to the objection that the Bill would destroy voluntary exertions, he denied that experience justified that objection. The institution of Redhill, which was a model institution, had been referred to as an institution supported by voluntary efforts. Redhill received something like £6,000 or £7,000 from the State, and only £800 a year from voluntary exertions. Some of the most ardent friends of the reformatory movement were in favour of the measure, which he thought would give an impulse to, but by no means destroy, voluntary exertions. He thought that the magistrates, composing as they did the practical upper classes of the country, would start these institutions efficiently, and voluntary aid would flow in freely and naturally. Thus they would combine two most desirable objects — namely, a fair assistance from the Government, and at the same time all the zeal and interest which could be supplied by voluntary effort.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he belonged to a county in which, as yet, no reformatory had been established, but he should prefer to remain in their present state than have an institution which was entirely in the hands of the State, because he believed it would fail, and, by so doing, check the efforts of those who might be disposed voluntarily to devote themselves to the reformation of children. The reformatory movement was one of the most important and interesting which had taken place in this country for many years. But as the value of reformatory institutions very much depended on the mode in which they were conducted, he should oppose the present Bill. He did not think the time was yet come for proposing such a Bill. He was not disposed to take Redhill as a model. In Redhill there were forty criminals placed under one superintendent. That was too large a number. The best reformatory he ever saw was in Hamburg, and there were only thirteen criminals under the superintendent there. Time should be given to the friends of the reformatory schools to carry out the system to greater perfection.

MR. BECKETT DENISON said, he gave the Bill his most cordial support. He had studied the subject for many years, and he was quite sure that, if well handled, this would be one of the most important and valuable measures that Parliament had ever passed. He therefore hoped that the House, without further discussion, would proceed to the consideration of its clauses in Committee.

MR. GARNETT said, he would admit that the Bill was very different from the one introduced last Session, but there was this vital question involved in it—namely, whether it was wise to leave the beaten track which the reformatory system had hitherto taken, that of combining voluntary contributions with Government aid, or whether they should adopt the system of establishing schools by means of county rates. That, and that only, was the real question at issue. Referring to the history of reformatories, he was satisfied that the system had worked well upon the whole, and that it was unnecessary to disturb it and adopt another. It had neither failed, nor had it disappointed the expectations of its friends; so far from that, he believed it had exceeded those expectations in every instance.

MR. BAINES observed, that he thought the House should remember that the question before them was not upon any clause of the Bill, but whether the House should go into Committee. He apprehended the discussion had gone upon the first clause of the Bill, upon which he should be prepared to give an opinion at the proper time. He would beg the House to observe the clauses at the end of the Bill. The effect of them would be to give greater power over the parents of offending children. The law at present was not strong enough. There was another useful clause in the Bill to give county justices the power of entering into contracts with the proprietors of these institutions for the purpose of accommodating a certain number of children. If the Amendment were carried, it would extinguish the Bill altogether. And, as to many of the clauses no objection whatever could be entertained, he trusted the hon. Member for Surrey would withdraw his Amendment, and limit himself to an opposition in Committee to such of the clauses as he objected to.

MR. BARROW said, the Bill was introduced with the express object of establishing reformatory schools by means of a compulsory contribution from the county rates; and he had the greatest possible objection to attaching that character to these institutions. But strongly as he felt upon the financial part of the question, he felt still more strongly upon this—that it would interfere in an injurious manner with existing institutions, which he believed would prove most beneficial by being left in the hands of those whose hearts and souls were so much enlisted in the matter as to induce them to put their hands into their own pockets, and not into the pockets of other people. He was sorry, however, that the exertions of those parties had been greatly retarded in many districts by the expectation of some compulsory measure of this sort. He should be glad to hear from the Government, therefore, that the compulsory portion of the Bill was to be abandoned.

MR. PEASE said, that he considered it a privilege to assist in the reformation of domestic institutions. He considered, however, that none but voluntary efforts would succeed in reforming the criminal portion of the population; and therefore, as an humble aliquot part of the representation of Great Britain, and no rider of hobbies, or associate of hon. Gentlemen who were, he should vote for the Amendment, because he believed the Bill was not calculated to promote the social good of the community.

MR. GILPIN said, where voluntarism was pure voluntarism, there was no principle so efficacious in promoting its object, whether social or religious. But the question of pure voluntarism in this matter had been settled long since by the fact, that the reformatories already established generally received support from the Government. He held that it was necessary to draw a distinction between the reformation of juvenile offenders and the education of those who were not offenders, or who, from the circumstances in which they were placed, were almost certain to become offenders against the laws. As to the expenses likely to be incurred, it appeared to him that in the end there would be a balance in favour of the ratepayers. That this was a good Bill he did not believe; but that it could be amended he did believe, and therefore he should vote for going into Committee.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 168; Noes 37: Majority 131.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

House in Committee.

Clause 1 (Justices of a County or Council of Borough Sessions may grant money in aid of Reformatory Schools).

MR. LIDDELL said, he thought that the Bill would interfere with the internal arrangements of the reformatory schools. He was also of opinion that the ratepayers would not submit to a compulsory rate of 7s. or 8s. for each inmate of a reformatory.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY was so much opposed to throwing on the magistrates the odium of imposing this rate on the ratepayers of the counties, that he should oppose the clause altogether. He had no objection to reformatories, and to their receiving aid from the State; but this Bill imposed a tax on a particular class of property.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN observed, that some time ago the Prime Minister made something as like a promise as ever he did in his life—that he would bring in a Bill for the establishment of financial boards. When that measure was passed, he would not object, perhaps, to this Bill; but at present he would support the Motion for the rejection of the clause, as it would tend to increase the burden of the ratepayers which was already too heavy, and thus bring reformatories into bad odour.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he hoped the Committee would not reject the clause on the ground mentioned by the hon. Gentleman behind him; for if the object were really one of public importance, and that it was so was generally admitted, they ought not to negative the measure simply because county financial boards were not established, and the ratepayers were not represented under the system by which the county rate was at present administered. He also begged to remind the Committee that it was at the instance of the friends of the reformatory schools that the Government increased the allowance to them from 5s. to 7s. per head.

MR. BECKETT DENISON entreated the Committee not to reject the Bill, which he considered to be absolutely indispensable in the present circumstances of the country.

MR. BENNET said, he admired the exertions of individuals, and approved of reformatory schools supported by voluntary contributions. He could not consent to allow his constituents to have the county rates (at present very burthensome) charged with additional rate for the purpose.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 149; Noes 51; Majority 98.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Clause 3.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY wished to know if the justices were to have power to grant money without limit?

SIR GEORGE GREY: No limit was fixed by the Bill; of course the amount must vary according to the size of the institution, and would be wholly in the discretion of the magistrates.

Clause agreed to; as were also Clauses 4 and 5.

Clause 6.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY proposed to substitute 2s. 6d. for 5s. as the amount which a parent should be compelled to contribute towards the maintenance of his child in a reformatory.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that this was not a new enactment. It was taken from other Acts which were now in existence.

MR. BARROW denied the right of society to compel a father, who had no complicity in the crime of his child, to pay for the support of his child in one of these reformatories.

SIR EDWARD KERRISON observed that the magistrates had a discretionary power in the matter.

Clause agreed to; as were also the remaining clauses.

The House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Tuesday next, and to be printed.

BURY ELECTION—REPORT.

House informed, that the Committee had determined—

That Robert Needham Philips, esquire, is duly elected a Burgess to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Bury.

And the said Determination was ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

MAYO ELECTION COMMITTEE.

REPORT.

MR. SCHOLEFIELD reported from the Select Committee appointed to try and determine the matter of the Petition of George Gore Ouseley Higgins, complaining of an undue Election and Return for the County of Mayo; That two Letters addressed to Colonel Higgins, and duly verified, had been produced before the Committee, alleging that one of the witnesses, John M'Laughlin, examined before the said Committee, had been maltreated; and another witness, John Gannon, had been so seriously injured by a mob, led on by one John Sheridan, that his life is in danger, such maltreatment and injury having been inflicted upon them in consequence of evidence given before the said Committee: The Committee have therefore instructed him to report the circumstances to the House, in order that the House may take such steps as may seem to the House to be proper and necessary.

MR. WALPOLE: Before proceeding to the orders of the day, I wish for a moment to call the attention of the House to the Report which has just been presented by the Chairman of the Election Committee of the county of Mayo. I understand from that Report that evidence has been produced before the Committee to the effect that two letters have been addressed to Colonel Higgins, stating that one of the witnesses, named John M'Laughlin, who was examined before the Committee, had been severely beaten, and that another witness, named John Gannon, had been so seriously maltreated by a mob, led on by one John Sheridan, that his life was in danger. The Report states that this maltreatment was represented to have been inflicted in consequence of the evidence which the witnesses in question gave before the Committee. As the Report is drawn that appears to be the allegation; but no particular proof of the maltreatment has been produced at present before the Committee. I think, however, that the House having had its attention called to the facts, should not leave the matter where it is without some inquiry on the subject, and probably under the circumstances, the best course that I can adopt is to obtain information from the Attorney General for Ireland as to whether any intelligence has reached him with reference to these proceedings, and if it have, whether he has taken, or is prepared to take, any steps in consequence of such intelligence.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD: In answer to the question of the right hon. Gentleman, I should state, for the information of the House, that, having in the course of the day heard of the production of the letters referred to before the Committee upstairs, my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland communicated at once by telegraph to the Under-Secretary at Dublin, and that he received a message in reply, stating that an outrage such as that described in the letters had been committed, and that two persons had been beaten severely; but the cause of the beating did not appear. It seems that the local authorities had acted immediately on the occurrence of the violence, the stipendiary magistrate on the spot having arrested nine persons charged with being participators in the outrage, and that those nine persons are now in custody. As I was expected to be in Dublin to-morrow the papers have been left there, awaiting my consideration, and I hope to be in Dublin to-morrow morning. It appears that the assizes for the county of Mayo commence this day week, and I apprehend that there will be no difficulty in placing those persons on their trial at the approaching assizes, and, if guilty, of bringing them speedily to justice, and I need not state that the penalty which the law inflicts for such an offence is very severe indeed. In the meantime I think that the interposition of the House would be productive of great inconvenience, by interfering with the regular course of the administration of justice. Besides, we have at present no evidence with which we can deal—it is a mere allegation contained in the letters—and the offence, so far as this House is concerned, would be, not the outrage on the individuals, but the fact that that outrage was committed in consequence of the evidence which they gave before a Committee. That would be a somewhat difficult subject to inquire into at the Bar of the House, and possibly we should be able to arrive at no satisfactory conclusion. In the meantime the law is strong enough to reach cases of this description, and to punish those who commit such outrages, and I will take care, if these persons be guilty, that the law shall be put speedily in force.

Ordered that the Report do lie upon the Table.

LUNATICS (SCOTLAND) BILL.
SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. BAXTER said, he did not rise to prolong the discussion on this Bill, as enough had already been said to cause no pleasant feelings in the minds of those who were conscious of a dereliction of duty as regarded the insane poor of Scotland. It was for the House, by a bold and vigorous measure, to apply a remedy to those evils which all acknowledged to exist, and which no one desired to see any longer perpetuated. He hoped, therefore, that there would be no objection made to the second reading, because he thought that no candid and impartial man could have read the Report of the Commissioners, and the evidence on which it was founded, without coming to the conclusion that legislation was absolutely necessary, and that there was no time for delay. He greatly regretted that any portion of the people of Scotland, in their dread of centralization or of increased taxation, should have shown an inclination to treat lightly the evils which had been exposed by the Commissioners; but, while he admitted, on the one hand, the evils that prevailed, and the existence of a small party in Scotland who were disposed to pass them lightly by, he contended that the great majority of the educated and influential classes had evinced every disposition to deal justly and humanely with the poorest and most to be pitied portion of our fellow-creatures. He feared that there existed in this country a serious misapprehension as to the true state of the case, and that it was supposed that the people of Scotland had altogether neglected the proper treatment of the insane poor. He assured the House that this was not the fact, and in proof of his statement he would refer to the Report of the Commissioners themselves, in which they stated that they had reason to believe that there was no country in proportion to its population which had done so much voluntarily for this class of sufferers as Scotland; and, although it might be said that she contrasted unfavourably with other civilized States in having no national institutions for the reception of the insane poor, yet that in respect to voluntary efforts she was entitled to honourable distinction. He wished to speak with all possible respect of the Commissioners who had drawn up the Report, because he thought that they had performed their duty faithfully, impartially, and thoroughly; but he could not shut his eyes to the fact that in their very natural and proper anxiety to bring to light the abuses which prevailed they had not been sufficiently liberal in their commendation of the admirable chartered asylums of Scotland. What was really wanted in Scotland was an increase of the large public asylums. He held it to be utterly impossible to remedy the present state of things without erecting all over the country a very great number of large public asylums; and to do that was, he understood, the main object of the Bill. Whatever might be the case in other parts of Scotland, in that part of the country with which he was connected the evils to which the attention of the House was called were utterly unknown. In Forfarshire there existed two large and admirably conducted asylums. He should be glad, however, to see a clause introduced into the Bill prohibiting the confinement of pauper lunatics in any private asylum whatever, where a sufficient number of public establishments were open. He also was pleased to find that the Bill did not propose to interfere with the management of existing asylums otherwise than by supervision of their accounts; for they were already most admirably managed. He would further express a hope that the Lord Advocate would abandon the proposed temporary Lunacy Board, and place the inspection of lunatics at once, instead of at five years hence, under the Secretary for the Home Department, and this change would be attended with the advantage that there would then be a responsible Minister in that House to answer any inquiries which it might be necessary to make respecting the state of lunatics in Scotland. Believing the state of things in Scotland in connection with the treatment of lunatics required remedy, and agreeing in the general principles of the present Bill, he was anxious to see it pass into law in the present Session, but he did not believe that that would be the case, unless the learned Lord deferred to public opinion in the matter he had just mentioned, for boards, besides being cumbrous and ineffective in general, were especially unpopular in Scotland.

Mr. CUMMING BRUCE said, he should be glad to see a remedy applied to the evils brought under the notice of the House by the Report of the Commissioners, but perhaps he would be found to differ in opinion with many Scotch Members, as to the most likely means of permanently and usefully remedying them. He regretted that he had been unable to attend the former discussion on the subject of the Bill in that House, or the meeting of Scotch Members which had been convened by the Lord Advocate for its primary consideration; but he would beg English and Irish Members not to consider themselves dispensed from the necessity of attending to Scotch measures, because they were told that the Scotch Members had assembled together in a private meeting, and given their sanction to them. He, for one, saw no ground for creating a new Board in reference to this subject. He entirely concurred in the remarks of the hon. Member, but he also believed that the Commission had allowed itself to be carried away by exaggerated statements; nevertheless, whatever case their Report might make against private houses, it was, as regards the public asylums, highly favourable to Scotland. In some parts of Scotland, the asylums built and supported by voluntary contributions were amply sufficient, and it behoved Scotch Members to see that the country was not saddled with unnecessary expenses. There was no doubt that, in some instances, the Commissioners had exaggerated the existing evil, having taken the number of insane poor, not from the Poor Law Board, but from the reports of constables, and having collected together all sorts of stories from different parts of the country. By the present Bill a new Board was to be appointed, and the Board of Supervision was entirely passed by. Why was that done? He believed that the Board of Supervision had not neglected its duty, for, from the first, it had uniformly, and year after year, called the attention of the Government to the deficiencies in its power. It was, then, the duty of the Government to have given it increased power. In 1852 the attention of the Lord Advocate, who held office under Lord

Mr. Baxter

Derby's Administration, was called to the condition of the lunatic poor in Scotland, and he addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Scotch Poor Law Board, requesting to be informed of his views as to the existing evils, and the remedies which he thought it desirable to adopt. He (Mr. Bruce) regretted that, on a former occasion, the hon. Member for St. Andrews (Mr. E. Ellice) had thought it necessary to make some very severe and unjust charges against the distinguished Chairman of the Board of Supervision in Scotland (Sir J. M'Neill), to whom, in his opinion, the country was under great obligation for the manner in which he had discharged his difficult and important duties. He (Mr. Bruce) did not think it possible that so voluminous a Bill as that now before the House, containing no fewer than one hundred clauses, could receive adequate consideration during the present Session; but powers might, without difficulty, be conferred upon the Board of Supervision, which would enable them to provide for the satisfactory administration of the law. He believed that, if two inspectors were appointed, who, if it were thought desirable, might report directly to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, much would be done towards remedying the evils which were now complained of. In reply to the application of Lord Derby's Lord Advocate, the late Secretary to the Board of Supervision said, that it was almost impossible to put an intelligible construction upon many portions of the existing statutes relating to lunatics, and that the codification or embodiment of the law in one Act of Parliament would be a great advantage. The Secretary further stated that the condition of pauper lunatics had, undoubtedly, been much ameliorated during the last ten years, since the Poor Law Act had been in operation; that, during the inquiry which took place in 1844, many cases of a most painful nature were brought to light, such as the chaining of lunatics to trees, or their confinement in a sort of cage; but that measures had since been taken by the Board of Supervision to prevent such proceedings, and to provide for the due administration of the law. Half-yearly returns, containing the names of persons chargeable as pauper lunatics, accompanied by medical certificates, were now required by the Board of Supervision from every parish, and when lunatics were placed in asylums, the jurisdiction, as well as the responsibility, passed to the sheriffs. He (Mr. Bruce) quite agreed in the observations contained in that communication, and he thought that all that was required for the immediate improvement of the law relating to lunatics in Scotland was, to see that additional and efficient inspectors and more ample accommodation were provided. He considered that it would be impossible to pass this Bill in a satisfactory form during the present Session, and if it was hurried through the House, it would be found necessary at a future time to propose another measure for its amendment.

MR. DRUMMOND said, as reference had been made by his hon. Friend the Member for Elginshire (Mr. C. Bruce) to a meeting of Scotch Members held on Friday last, to consider the provisions of this Bill, he would take the liberty of telling his hon. Friend and the House that meetings of Scotch Members were not always beneficial even to the interests of Scotland; for he remembered Lord Rutherford telling him that it was by a meeting of Scotch Members that his Bill, which was a very excellent one, was entirely destroyed, and that after that, he found it utterly hopeless to attempt to carry it through the House. The hon. Gentleman would leave everything to the care of these Poor Inspectors. Why, these inspectors were the main cause of all the mischief that had occurred, and it was the frauds they had committed on the poor that had rendered legislation on this subject necessary. But then, it was said, the Board of Supervision was popular in Scotland. Popular with whom? Why, popular with the "lairds"—popular with the ratepayers, and men like the doctor who had been referred to, and who was afraid to tell the truth, for fear he should incur the censure of the ratepayers. They were totally incompetent to perform the functions assigned to them, and it was suspected that those were the same gentlemen who opposed Lord Rutherford, and who had prevented anything being done for the last ten years. Now, some hon. Members objected to the proposed Lunacy Board for Scotland. He was not standing up for any board at all. He contended they would never have the care and treatment of lunatics in Scotland properly regulated except through the instrumentality of experienced Lunacy Commissioners, such as we had in this part of the kingdom. But he would say, let there be any sort of machinery rather than that things should go on as they did now. The impression created throughout the country by the Report of the Scotch Lunacy Commission, as lately brought under the notice of that House, might be a short-lived one. He suspected there were not many persons who had read that Report. Be that as it might, he would say—"Strike when the iron is hot." Let them not be deluded into deferring this measure to another year. There was no man in that House, or in Scotland, who dared to vindicate the things which were stated in that document. So long as there was not some person whose special duty it was to inquire into those things—so long as these lunatics were left in the hands of the Sheriffs alone—there would never be a remedy applied, and therefore it was absolutely necessary to have some machinery organized with the view to a remedy. It was not, however, for machinery that he contended, but that something should be done for the immediate and permanent protection of these poor and ill-treated people. Letters had recently been sent to him from Scotland on this subject, written on the part of the poor, which gave it a very melancholy aspect. He said the treatment of the poor in Scotland was scandalous. [An ironical "Hear, hear!"] Yes, he repeated, it was scandalous, and he warned the House against being led away by the cant that they were breaking down the spirit of the poor, by saying that they should support themselves. Support themselves! It was a perfect mockery. It is bad enough in England, but it is ten times worse there; and he should like to see another Commission sent down to Scotland to see how the poor fared there, just as a Commission had been sent to see how the unfortunate lunatics were treated.

MR. HOPE JOHNSTONE was understood to say, that he perfectly agreed with the hon. Member for West Surrey, that it was not desirable that this measure should be postponed till next Session, as he doubted whether the House would be able then to entertain it. He had risen, however, for the purpose of stating that, in the part of Scotland (Dumfriesshire) which he represented, the only real objection felt to the provisions of the Bill of the Lord Advocate had reference to the constitution of the Board of Commissioners in Lunacy. The leading men in that part of the country who had given their attention to this subject would be perfectly satisfied with the most stringent inspection, and they wished to see the most complete publicity. They desired to see the proposed inspectors appointed; but, at the same time, to hold direct communication with the Secretary of State; and if a change of that kind were made in the Bill, he believed it would meet with general approval. The county with which he was connected was fortunate enough to possess an asylum conducted on the most admirable principles, which afforded very excellent accommodation, so far as it went, for pauper lunatics; and he was authorized to state that the trustees of that institution, at the suggestion of a benevolent lady, who took much interest in ameliorating the condition of this unfortunate class of persons, had passed a resolution by which accommodation for upwards of 200 additional pauper lunatics would be provided. He should like to see the Bill amended so far as to allow such asylums to receive pauper lunatics at a rate of charge not exceeding a given limit to be fixed by the Bill; and he thought, also, that it was only a matter of justice to exempt them from parochial and county rates.

COLONEL SYKES said, he must complain that a vast deal of odium had been thrown on the Board of Supervision for acts of omission and inefficiency over which the able man at the head of that board had no control, and for which he was not responsible. That, however, appeared now to be the usual fate of the most distinguished public servants both at home and abroad. He would remind the House that the Board of Supervision had annually reported to Parliament and pointed out defects which called for a remedy. But that board had no power to act. It rested entirely with the Secretary of State, or the sheriffs of counties, to carry out the recommendations which were made by the board from time to time. That a state of things existed as regarded pauper lunatics which demanded a remedy there could be little doubt; but the duty of applying that remedy, he repeated, devolved on the sheriffs of counties throughout Scotland and the Secretary of State, and not on the Board of Supervision. He had no hesitation in saying that there was throughout the whole of Scotland an earnest desire that the unhappy people afflicted with lunacy should have the greatest amount of care bestowed on them, and for that purpose they were ready to consent to any measure, which was not inconsistent with the principle of self-government in local matters. The city he represented had one of the best asylums in the country, and the authorities connected with it invited inspection; but what they did not want was the interference which would disgust those who were voluntarily giving their money and their time to the care and relief of the unhappy inmates of the asylum. Again, the asylum at Perth was managed with all the care of a private family, and had been productive of the happiest results. He held in his hand a newspaper called Excelsior, which was got up by the so-called mad people there, and in which were several papers translated from German and French into English; and he assured the House that he saw fewer indications of madness in that little sheet than were occasionally to be seen in newspapers with which the community was daily familiar. He took exception to the board contemplated by the Bill; but if the counties were compelled to build asylums in which pauper lunatics could be located, and if the inspection of them could be made by persons sent directly from the Lunacy Commissioners in London, or from the Secretary of State for the Home Department, he should give it his hearty concurrence.

Mr. Hope Johnstone

MR. WHITBREAD said, he wished to know whether the Lord Advocate was ready to proceed for penalties against any of the parties who had been guilty of the enormities reported by the Commissioners. The case to which he desired more particularly to call attention, was that of the establishment at Hill-lane House, near Greenock. On the day on which the Commissioners visited it there were seventy-one inmates. Most of them were pauper lunatics, paying £22 a year each; but some were of the better class, paying from £40 to £50. The gross receipts were from £1,500 to £2,000 a year. It appeared that the Commissioners had reported against a prosecution in this case because there was no power to mitigate the penalties; but he did not think a penalty of £200 at all too great for the crimes and atrocities which had been committed at that house. The true way to effect a revolution in the treatment of pauper lunatics was to touch the pockets of those who lived by them; and if a few of these persons were prosecuted it would show that the House and the Government were in earnest on the subject.

MR. F. DUNDAS was understood to deny the truth of the case mentioned in the Report, respecting the removal of a female pauper lunatic from Kirkwall to Edinburgh.

MR. F. ELLICE (St. Andrews) said, he regretted that hon. Members had not noticed the facts upon which he had made his statement. He would not say that the Report was accurate in all its details; but he believed it might be taken as a fair average of the state of things which existed in Scotland. There might be some exaggerations and misstatements; but, on the other hand, there were many cases that never came before the Commissioners, and consequently never appeared in their Report at all. He would not enter into the particular statements; but he would say this much, that while there had been the greatest improvement on the part of the Government, the inefficiency of the system of inspection was abundantly proved. He complained very much that whilst the letter which had been read, stating that great atrocities existed before the Poor Law, but that since the passing of the Poor Law they had ceased, was being written—at the very time when that letter was being penned—two of the worst cases, that of the man who was chained to his bed for thirty years with a two-foot chain, and that of the two women who were confined in cages under very revolting circumstances, were still in existence unaltered. The House of Commons never dreamt of what the state of things really was. Some hon. Members thought the Bill was hard upon individuals. He was ready to admit the eminent services of the gentleman who presided over the Board of Supervision, but the fact was, that the inspection of the poor was more than one individual could undertake. When there was a board consisting of one paid and of several unpaid officers, the whole duty always fell upon the paid officer. The superintendence of the pauper lunatics of Scotland demanded continuous care; it was a continuous charge, and he did not understand that any member of the board attended it continuously. The laches of the board was no doubt to be attributed to its constitution; but the duty of any official who found himself overworked was to state the circumstance to the Government, and consequently he could not acquit the head of the board for not having written to the Government, and said he would no longer be responsible for duties which he had not the means to perform. He dissented from the suggestion of the hon. Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes) to have inspectors come to Scotland from the Lunacy Board in London. It would be centralization with a vengeance, and most distasteful to the people of Scotland. At the same time he was aware of the objections to a new board in Edinburgh, and he had come to the conclusion that all the evils might be remedied without having recourse to it. The three great objects of legislation were—first, the establishment of proper asylums in which pauper lunatics could be kept; secondly, proper inspection, not only of those asylums, but of every place in which lunatics were confined; thirdly, power in the Board of Supervision, under certain circumstances, of exempting pauper lunatics from confinement in asylums—a power which he thought should be reserved—and some guarantee by way of inquiries from time to time that such exemptions did not lead to abuse. He intended to leave the whole responsibility with regard to the details of the Bill upon the Government. Discussion of the details would be perfectly useless, and would hazard, in point of time, the passing of the measure. He thought it was of the utmost possible importance that there should be legislation upon the subject, and that an Act should be passed in the present Session. He thought that no inconvenience would result from passing the Bill now, and if from experience they found that amendments were necessary, a measure for that purpose could be introduced next year. In the meantime a new system would be inaugurated, and a basis laid upon which action could be taken immediately. The point upon which he felt the greatest anxiety was that relating to the appointment of inspectors. He was bound to say that the Bill had been greatly improved in that respect, but it still provided for the permanency of the central board in a way which he could not approve. He disliked centralization, about which the people were so justly jealous, and could not see what they wanted with a board in Edinburgh to interfere, beyond simple inspection, with the different local authorities, who were charged by the Bill with the duty of carrying out its provisions. All that was required and desirable was to lay down what the law should be, to say what the counties should do, and then to take care that the Act was properly enforced. There should be two general inspectors—he did not like the name of Commissioners —with no power beyond an absolute right of inspection at all times and under any circumstances, but with the imperative obligation of visiting every place in which lunatics were confined. If they found that the law was not carried into effect in these asylums, they should be empowered to call upon the local authorities to discharge the duty incumbent upon them, and, in the event of the latter refusing to do so within a reasonable time, they should be bound then to make a representation to the Secretary of State, under whose authority and sanction, but subject to any explanation which the local authorities might have to give, legal proceedings might be taken, if necessary, against the offending parties. A provision of that kind would, he thought, prevent undue interference with the local authorities, and protect the central board against that jealousy which it might otherwise excite throughout the country. Again, there must necessarily, in the first instance, be a good deal of negotiation and correspondence with the different counties in Scotland relative to the erection of asylums, and he thought it would be desirable to have, in addition to two paid general inspectors, three unpaid members of the central board for the purpose of carrying out the preliminary arrangements. These three members, he thought, should be gentlemen in whom the people of Scotland generally had confidence, and should continue to act for the first five years the Act was in operation, after which period their functions were to lapse. In this respect, also, the Bill had been greatly improved, and he was not unwilling to take it as it now stood. Another matter to which he wished to direct the attention of the House was the combination of counties. He thought that, instead of having the counties divided into districts, as proposed by the Bill, the principle of the Poor Law Act ought to be adopted. Let every county be told that it would be required to provide a certain amount of accommodation for its pauper lunatics, either by building an asylum for itself, or, if it thought fit, entering into a voluntary combination with other counties for the purpose of erecting an institution for their joint use. That would be much better than taking counties and placing them arbitrarily in districts, for the county authorities would be much better judges than any other persons which plan would best suit their particular case, and could easily ascertain whether they could come to any arrangement. He thought, also, that there should be some power of detaching parts of counties and annexing them, for the purposes of the Act, to other counties. Some of the islands belonging to the counties of Inverness and Ross, owing to their communication with the south by sea, would find it more convenient to send their lunatics to Greenock or Glasgow than to their own district asylums. He likewise hoped that some provision would be inserted in the Bill with respect to medical men, whose position as connected with pauper lunatics, and, indeed, pauperism generally, called loudly for the interference of the Legislature. At the time that the Corn Laws were repealed, when it was supposed that that measure would be injurious to the proprietors of land in Scotland, Sir Robert Peel made a grant from the Consolidated Fund of £10,000 a year towards the payment of medical officers. Under these circumstances, he thought that the Government, seeing the arduous duties they had to perform, and that the working of the measure depended on them above all others, ought to fix a minimum allowance, below which the parishes should not be allowed to go. But there was one very important question which he must again repeat, and to the consideration of which he urged the Government. What was to be done—and done instantly—to alleviate the condition of the pauper lunatics? His hon. Friend had most justly called the attention of the Lord Advocate to the necessity of proceeding against those keepers of asylums who had, in contravention of the law, ill-treated and neglected the wretched creatures entrusted to their charge. He trusted that the hon. and learned Lord would consider the propriety of making some examples which would be a terror to the rest. He wanted to know, also, what was to be done now with that vast mass of lunatics who came under the superintendence of the sheriffs and the poor law authorities—those who were confined in workhouses and allowed to mix with the other pauper inmates, those who were permitted to run wild in their parishes, and those idiot women who—he was sorry to say—were rapidly increasing the population by the birth of idiot children. He wanted to know what was to be done with these poor creatures till the new asylums could be built. If the Board of Supervision were instructed to insist upon decent allowances being given for the maintenance of these pauper lunatics, he had no doubt that the state of things described in the Report of the Commissioners would soon pass away, because, after all, the question was merely one of pounds, shillings, and pence. In the case of outdoor lunatics nothing more was required than the enforcement of the existing law, and he believed that, had it not been for the negligence of the sheriffs and the Board of Supervision, nine-tenths of all the evils denounced by the Commissioners might have been prevented. As far as the Bill itself went, not only did he give it his support, but he felt grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for introducing it, as, subject to the Amendments of which notice had been given, he thought it would be useful; and, although the present Bill was not and could not be perfect, yet there would be ample opportunity next Session to pass a more complete measure. Before sitting down, he wished to make a statement for the satisfaction of the Sheriff of Orkney, who had felt himself aggrieved by a certain statement which had been made upon the Commissioners' Report. The case he had referred to was that of a female pauper lunatic removed from Orkney to Edinburgh, and who, upon her arrival at the latter place, was found to have all her ribs on one side broken, her backbone hurt, and altogether so severely injured as to endanger her life. The woman made a declaration that the injuries had been inflicted by the gaoler of Kirkwell Prison. There was no doubt that the woman had been grievously ill-treated somewhere, but it appeared from inquiries instituted by the Sheriff of Orkney that she was mistaken in attributing them to the gaoler at Kirkwall, who was represented to be a humane man, and not at all likely to behave so brutally. The poor woman had, therefore, been mistaken as to the place where she was ill-treated, but the fact remained that she had been ill-used somewhere, and therefore the deduction from that case remained unaltered — namely, that there did exist at present gross neglect in the supervision of pauper lunatics in Scotland.

Mr. E. Ellice

Mr. BLACKBURN observed, that he thought that the beginning and the end of the speech made by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down showed how necessary it was that they should obtain a statement from the Board of Supervision, founded upon an examination into the accuracy of the Reports of the Commissioners. In point of fact, it might turn out all a mistake that any individual whatever did the injury to the poor woman. An inquiry, he believed, had been made, and the Board of Supervision had shown themselves most anxious to investigate every case which had been brought before them by the Commissioners. No sooner had the Report been made, than the Board set about making inquiries into the truth of the statements it contained, and as far as they had been able to ascertain, those statements were even more erroneous than they had expected to find them. Out of four cases which had been brought before the Commission, it turned out that two of the parties were not lunatics at all, and immediate steps were taken to relieve the two others. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department would have no objection to lay before the House the correspondence which had been had with the Board of Supervision upon the subject. He had consented to produce the correspondence with the sheriffs, and this would show, in some degree, how many mistakes had been made. It was rather dangerous to legislate upon insufficient information, but at the same time he believed, with every Scotchman, that it was necessary that something should be done, and that at all events asylums should be built. Above all, he thought that there should be a proper inspection of existing asylums, especially of private asylums, and that the whole system should be very sharply looked after. The blame had hitherto been put upon the stinginess of Scotchmen; but what was the fact? A very large number of lunatic wards had been built in the poorhouses, because there was no power to build asylums. There were now three times as many lunatic patients confined in wards as there were in 1847. If public asylums were built, well and good; but if not, they should encourage the construction of those lunatic wards. With respect to the Bill itself, he agreed with every Scotch Member that there was no use for a permanent board. An unpaid Commission and a temporary board might work; but if they endeavoured to coerce the people by centralisation, they would do little other than raise a feeling of opposition against them in the counties, in regard to things which might be much better settled among themselves. His hon. Friend the Member for Elgin (Mr. C. Bruce) had been misunderstood, as he did not object to asylums being built, but merely to the board as proposed in the Bill, and it seemed to be unanimous on the part of the Scotch Members that there should be merely powers of inspection. If the right hon. Gentleman (the Lord Advocate) would carry out the Amendments of which he had given notice, he (Mr. Blackburn) should not object to the second reading.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he wished to explain the reasons why the correspondence with the Board of Supervision had not been laid before the House. A few days since he received from that Board a Report which it was his intention at once to have laid upon the table of the House, but upon looking over the statement he found some passages which according to the rules of the House, he conceived would prevent its being laid upon the table. He submitted the matter to the highest authority (Mr. Speaker), who at once confirmed his doubts, and therefore he (Sir G. Grey) returned the document with an intimation that upon an amended statement being sent he would be glad to lay it before the House. The reason for sending back the statement was that it contained distinct references to the debate which took place in the House upon the presentation of the Commissioners' Report. He would admit that that statement might show the Commissioners of Lunacy to have been in some instances in error, which was not unnatural, considering the extensive and complicated nature of their duties; but at the same time he did not at all intend to admit that the general statements in their Report had been so impugned as to render legislation unnecessary or to diminish the necessity for immediate action. Upon this ground he was gratified to find there was to be no opposition to the second reading of this Bill, the explanation of the details of which he should leave to the Lord Advocate, simply remarking that in his opinion a central board would be necessary in the first instance, at least, to set the machinery in motion. He could not agree that the present evil could be removed without some compulsory power to require the erection of asylums. That power had been found to be necessary in England, and was equally necessary in Scotland. He agreed that counties should be permitted to combine to build asylums, and, indeed, great care ought to be taken that they should not be multiplied too much. The great object of the Bill, however, was to provide sufficient accommodation for the unfortunate class to whom it referred. Before sitting down he felt it due to Sir J. M'Neill, the President of the Board of Supervision, to express his concurrence in the observations of the hon. Member for Elginshire (Mr. C. Bruce) respecting that gentleman, with whom he (Sir G. Grey) had had frequent communications, especially during the period of the distress in the Highlands, and from that intercourse he had been led to form the highest opinion of Sir J. M'Neill's humanity, and of the zealous manner in which he discharged his important duties.

Mr. Blackburn

Mr. W. EWART said, he thought that, with an efficient system of inspection, the Local Boards might do all the duties that were necessary, without the intervention of any intermediate central board whatever. He trusted that the learned Lord would attend to the suggestions which had been made with that view; but as it was impossible to deny the necessity of the measure now before the House, he would vote for the second reading, but at the same time he hoped that as much encouragement would be given for local management as was consistent with the working of the machinery of the Bill.

Mr. DUNLOP said, he wished to express the great gratification which he felt at seeing something like a remedy proposed for those painful and harrowing evils which were so discreditable to Scotland in connection with the treatment of pauper lunatics. He had the highest confidence in the Commissioners, and no supposed inaccuracy in this Report should for a moment be made to stand in the way of legislation. Even if all persons had done their duty, it was impossible but that cruelty and ill-treatment must have taken place when they considered the way in which pauper lunatics were treated. There were about 4,500 pauper lunatics in Scotland. Of these only 1,500 could be provided for in public asylums; the remaining 3,000 had either been placed in poor-houses, which were not at all adapted to the purpose, or they were left in the hands of strangers, without any security against harsh treatment, or they were sent to licensed houses, in which profit was the great object. There was no care, superintendence, or inspection—nothing in short to prevent such evils as had actually arisen. Personally he would have preferred a system of efficient inspection without the establishment of any central board, but there might be good reasons why, for the present at least, that board should be appointed, and he would not give it any opposition. He rejoiced that another Session was not likely to pass over without something being done to remove what was at once a national calamity and a national crime from Scotland.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that it would not be necessary for him to say more than two or three words in reply, as they were substantially unanimous upon this question. Even on points where a difference of opinion was expressed it would be found to be more in words than in substance. The hon. Member for Elginshire (Mr. Bruce) was under a mistake in his estimate of the particular clause to which he referred. The evils to be remedied were substantially two—the want of sufficient accommodation and the want of sufficient inspection, and by providing a remedy for these two wants, they would substantially lay the basis for a proper administration of the lunacy law. It having been admitted that these things were necessary, the question was how these objects were to be attained. Various suggestions had been made for that purpose. It was, in the first place, suggested that the duties to be discharged under the Bill should be intrusted to the English Board, with two Scotch Members, but if he had proposed such a thing it would naturally have occasioned much difficulty in Scotland, and, in point of fact, on consultation with the English Board, he had found that it would be impossible to work the system on that principle. Then they were told that they should have connected the business with the Board of Supervision; but when that was proposed in 1849, Sir John M'Neill himself stated that he would not undertake it; and had such a course been taken it would have made little difference, for they must have had additional paid Commissioners, with a paid secretary. This, therefore, was a mere question of words, and not of substance. If the Board of Supervision could have undertaken the duty he should have been most glad to charge them with it, but in the face of Sir John M'Neil's declaration, he could not do so. The third proposition was that the Home Secretary, with the aid of inspectors, should do the duties of the Board. If the machinery of the system were once set agoing, that perhaps might be sufficient; but at the beginning of a new state of things like this the Secretary of State would be utterly powerless. It appeared to him that for the first five years at least it would be better to carry on the system with one or two paid members and paid inspectors than to put it under the management of the Home Secretary, who would be compelled to take advice from the Lord Advocate or other unacknowledged authority in carrying out the provisions of the Act. One or two questions had been asked relative to the Report of the Commission. All he had to say was that a copy of the Report had been sent to every sheriff in Scotland; and when answers were returned from those sheriffs then they would be able to judge of both sides. With regard to the Orkney case, he had sent for the papers relating to it, and had made every inquiry to get at the truth of the matter. It turned out that the unfortunate woman had gone into the hospital in Edinburgh with her ribs broken, that he had been unable to discover the slightest trace of any violence being exercised towards her by those who had charge of her from the time of her leaving Orkney to the time of her arrival at Edinburgh. She was removed in a state of complete mania, and no doubt in that state she met with the severe injuries which had been described, but whether by any undue roughness on the part of her attendants he had not been able to inform himself. He did not think it desirable to go back two years and institute a suit for penalties when there was so much more important work to be done. The Bill could not be called hasty legislation, for it was very much needed, and he hoped the House would consent to give it a second reading.

MR. E. ELLICE (St. Andrews).—What is to be done with the pauper lunatics in the meantime?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: Of course, until there were places to send them to they could not be sent anywhere. The hon. Gentleman had suggested that their allowances should be increased, but that could only be done by the Board of Supervision. He had sat frequently on this Board, and he knew that three or four hours a week were occupied in considering applications for increased allowances. No part of the duty of the Board was discharged more ably than this. There was an idea that the allowances generally were a great deal too low, but he should be very sorry to commit himself to that opinion. The habits and condition of the lower orders in Scotland were matters which must be taken into consideration, to the clause immediately under discussion he was desirous of making two or three Amendments in it. Since the clause was framed, Parliament had made a material alteration in the terms of penal servitude. The shortest of those terms, at the time when this Bill was originally drawn, was seven years. It had now been reduced to three years. He had deemed it expedient to introduce this species of punishment into a measure of this kind, and yet he had felt that seven years would probably be too severe a term for such a class of delinquents. In the French and American codes, the punishment was limited to two or three years' imprisonment. The Committee would agree with him that it was desirable to retain the punishment of penal servitude, and he proposed to alter the clause as follows:—

"To be kept in penal servitude for the term of three years, or to suffer such other punishment by fine or imprisonment for not more than two years, with or without hard labour, as the court shall award."

The maximum term of penal servitude would thus be three years, but there would be some minor offences which would be punishable by fine, some other offences which would be punishable by simple imprisonment not exceeding two years, and in the worst cases there might be the addition of hard labour.

MR. G. HADFIELD observed, that he still thought the clause too severe, and hoped the case of honest trustees would have the consideration of the Government.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 10. (Nothing in the Bill shall exempt any person from answering any questions in any court, but that no evidence given by such person shall be admissible against him in any prosecution under the Act).

MR. BUTT said, he had a strong objection to this clause as an infringement of the principle of law that no man was bound to criminate himself. An innocent trustee might be subject to an accusation under this Act, and it was most improper to expose a person to a species of legal inquisition or torture to extort a confession and self-crimination. Nor did the proviso altogether remove his objection, because, although a person's answer was not to be admissible in evidence against him, it might supply the links of evidence that might convict him in a court of law. At a future stage of the Bill he should take the sense of the House on this clause.

MR. AYRTON said, he also would support the objection to the clause. It was an ancient principle of English law that a party should not be compelled to criminate himself. Even in the exceptional cases in which such disclosures were required it was carefully provided that the party should not be subject to prosecution. This would be the first statute which wholly departed from this old established principle of law.

The Attorney General

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the clause in question was absolutely essential, and its omission would render the Bill nugatory; for, otherwise, if a Bill were brought in Equity, any fraudulent trustee might protect himself from discovery on the plea of liability to criminal prosecution; he would have nothing to do but to say, "I might be brought within the provisions of the Fraudulent Trustees' Act, and I will close my mouth and will not say one word." In the Banker's Act, under which Paul and Strahan were convicted, it was attempted to raise such an exemption, but, happily, without success. The effect of the clause was simply to preserve the civil remedy. The principle of common law was simply that a confession of a party should not be used in a criminal proceeding.

MR. BUTT said, the principle of law was quite the reverse. There was no objection to the use of a confession, but the objection was to the extortion of it; and every day's experience attested that this was the principle of our law, for any witness could protect himself from answering a question on the score of self-crimination. Now this clause broke in upon that principle, and would enable parties to subject a trustee to inquisition, by which to extort admissions which might ground a criminal prosecution. Could the Attorney General cite any statute which was a precedent for such a provision?

MR. BAINES maintained that the clause was calculated in no degree to introduce a new principle into our legislation. It was quite true that, in accordance with the rules of the common law, a man who happened to be called as a witness in a court of justice, in a case of burglary, for instance, was not bound to give an answer which might afterwards be used as evidence to convict him of participation in the offence. Now, the clause under discussion, on the other hand, provided that no person should be entitled to refuse to answer any question in a civil proceeding in a court of equity, and his hon. and learned Friend (the Attorney General) had very properly introduced that provision into the Bill, because, if he had not done so, parties would constantly decline to give the necessary information to the Court of Chancery, upon the plea that to do so would necessarily involve a liability to conviction upon a criminal prosecution. But, while his hon. and learned Friend had taken that course, he had furnished an ample safeguard against any dangerous consequences which might be supposed to result from its adoption, inasmuch as the clause set forth that no answer given by a person in a suit in equity should be admissible against him in any proceeding under the Act.

Mr. MALINS said, that he concurred in the interpretation which had been put upon the clause by the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, and that in order to facilitate the ends of justice it was highly expedient the clause should be retained in the Bill. In illustration of his meaning he might state that he had been the day before engaged in a case in which, after the death of his two co-trustees, the surviving trustee had appropriated trust money to the amount of £1,500 to his own use. When the case came before a court of equity he had been asked if he had done so, and he had in answer admitted the appropriation, thus saving the court all further trouble in proving the offence. If, then, the clause under discussion were omitted from the Bill, the administration of justice, instead of being facilitated, would be impeded under its operation. Moreover, the present clause, while it preserved the civil remedy, provided that the disclosures obtained in the civil suit should not be used in a criminal procedure.

Mr. BUTT said, he must renew his protest against the principle involved in the clause, on the ground that what to-day was only an experiment might to-morrow become a dangerous precedent.

Mr. COLLIER said, the rule of law was that a man was protected from answering a question, the answer to which would be evidence against him in a criminal prosecution; this clause, however, provided that the admission should not be evidence in a criminal prosecution.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 11.

Mr. CAIRNS said, he wished to direct the attention of the Committee to the case of a trustee who wilfully or through neglect had misappropriated the money committed to his charge, and had been called upon by the parties interested in the matter to make good the deficiency which his violation of trust had occasioned. Now, in that case the trustee might, through his own exertions or those of his friends, be enabled to replace the money; but then there was a rule of law which set forth that in the case in which to compromise any transaction might be an indictable offence, such compromise was itself invalid, and the party was not entitled to the benefit of it. Let him suppose, for instance, that a trustee wilfully misappropriated a sum of £1,000 in violation of the provisions of the Bill under their notice. It might be that he was willing to restore the money, or to compromise by a promise of future payment upon security. Now, the object of the Bill was to protect persons beneficially interested in trust property, and any provision which tended to invalidate such a compromise would be injurious rather than advantageous to them, and he therefore proposed to add to the clause the words—

"And nothing in this Act contained shall affect or prejudice any agreement entered into or security given by any trustee, having for its object the restoration or repayment of any trust property misappropriated."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that if he were convinced of the necessity of such a proviso he should prefer one more specifically expressed and accurately worded. Inasmuch, however, as he did not see the necessity for such a proviso, and as the words, if introduced, would be perfectly innocuous, he should not object to their insertion in the clause.

Words inserted; clause agreed to.

Clause 12.

Mr. CAIRNS said, he proposed to amend this clause, so that it should stand as follows:—

"No proceeding or prosecution for any offence included in the first section of this Act shall be commenced or carried on otherwise than in the manner hereinafter mentioned (that is to say)—
1. If in any civil proceeding against a trustee, or if in any proceeding under the bankruptcy of any person being a trustee, it shall appear to the Court or Judge before whom such proceeding shall be pending that there is reasonable and probable cause for a criminal prosecution against such trustee under this Act, it shall be lawful for such Court or Judge to make an order sanctioning such prosecution. 2. Such order sanctioning a prosecution may be made at any stage of the proceeding pending before such Court or Judge, and may be obtained upon motion or petition in a summary way. 3. If the Court or Judge, on an application being made to sanction such prosecution, shall be of opinion that the trustee should be held to bail until either such sanction shall be refused or until a warrant for the arrest of such trustee shall be issued in due course of law, it shall be lawful for the Court or Judge to direct a writ or writs of ne exeat regno to issue against the trustee, marked for such sum as the Court or Judge shall think fit, not exceeding the estimated value of the property alleged to have been misappropriated; and such writ or writs of ne exeat regno shall thereupon be issued and executed, and shall be returnable in the usual manner, provided that the Court or Judge shall have power to require from the person applying for any such writ security to answer any damages in case it shall be found that such writ was improperly obtained."

It was quite possible, as the Bill stood, that a plausible charge might be brought against a trustee; and although he might be in no danger of being convicted, yet the odium of having been indicted for a criminal offence would remain, and the imputation of dishonesty might deeply injure him. A man, for instance, might consent to become a trustee on a marriage, and afterwards, in the natural course of events, children might grow up; estrangements might take place, and it might become the interest of some member of the family to annoy the trustee. Nothing would be more easy in such a case than to get up a case against him, and on an ex parte statement to procure his indictment, and thus the stigma would remain against the man all his life, that he had been indicted at the Old Bailey. The Attorney General himself felt that there should be some protection against such a contingency, and the only question was what it should be. His hon. and learned Friend proposed that before an indictment was brought against a trustee, the consent of the Attorney General, or some Judge in equity, must be obtained. Now, with regard to the first check, the duties of the Attorney General were already so onerous that he would not have time to investigate the cases which might be brought before him, and which would rest upon an ex parte statement alone. Again, an equity Judge, if asked to determine upon an ex parte statement, would consider it a most obnoxious duty, and would refuse in any case to grant his consent. The expedient which he proposed was a simple one. It was to give the Judge the power of hearing both sides in the most simple, inexpensive, and summary manner, and of then determining where civil responsibility ended and where criminal liability began. In order, also, to avoid the chance of a person absconding, he would give the Judge the power upon affidavit, which afforded a reasonable ground of suspicion of intent to do so, of granting a writ of ne exeat regno.

Mr. Cairns

Mr. BOWYER said, the Amendment appeared to him to be an important improvement in the Bill, because it afforded some security to trustees against the species of danger and vexatious proceedings pointed out by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Belfast. As the Bill at present stood, he believed it would be impossible in nine cases out of ten to find any persons to act as trustees, and it would then become necessary to assimilate the law to that of other countries, and enable property to be dealt with without the intervention of trustees. The law now imposed upon persons who filled this thankless office more responsibility and required from them a greater degree of skill, exactness, and care than from any other class of persons. As a general rule, everything which a trustee did not according to the rules of a court of equity constituted a breach of trust, and anything he omitted to do which equity said he ought to do was also a breach of trust. As to what these rules were, the most skilful practitioners and the most learned judges differed, and therefore there was quite enough at present to deter people from acting as trustees; but if there were added to these burdens the dangers of a criminal prosecution, he repeated that it would be most difficult to find persons to perform these functions. The Bill at present exposed a trustee upon an ex parte statement, perhaps craftily and wickedly devised, to the preliminaries of a criminal prosecution, and a slur would be cast upon his character, even if he subsequently proved his innocence. Against this danger the clause of his hon. and learned Friend would, to some extent, and with certain amendments, guard, and thus tend to mitigate the disinclination which persons would naturally feel to take upon themselves this delicate office. If in the course of any civil proceedings against a trustee it appeared to the Court that that person had so misbehaved himself that the case was inadequately dealt with by these civil proceedings, the Court in such a case ought to have the option of directing a prosecution against the trustee. This was the true remedy to be provided. No step beyond this should be taken, lest prudent men should be deterred altogether from accepting responsibilities which even now were felt to be too heavy.

Mr. COLLIER said, that the effect of the Amendment would be that no criminal prosecution could be instituted against a fraudulent trustee without a previous suit in Chancery, and it appeared to him that a provision of that sort would almost destroy the efficacy of the Bill, which had been brought forward in a great measure for the benefit of the poorer classes. In his opinion a fraudulent trustee was as great a criminal as the man who picked a pocket. But, he would ask, what necessity was there to make the Court of Chancery the vestibule to the Old Bailey? He thought that the clause proposed by the Attorney General was quite sufficient for the protection of trustees, as he considered it to be more in accordance with the principles of jurisprudence in such cases, if trustees were to be protected, that no criminal proceeding should be instituted against them without the sanction of a high law officer of the Crown or of one of the Judges, than that there should be of necessity a suit in Chancery in the first instance.

MR. CAIRNS said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman, who had no doubt a great horror of Chancery proceedings, had entirely misunderstood the effect of the Amendment. All that the Amendment required was that, if there had not been a suit in Chancery, a suit should be instituted. ["Hear, hear," from Mr. COLLIER.] But instituting a suit was the simplest thing in the world; it was merely placing upon a file a piece of paper called a claim, consisting of only a few lines of writing, and, having done that, the suitor could go the same hour to the Judge, tell him his complaint, and state that, in his opinion, there ought to be a criminal proceeding as well as a civil remedy. That done, the great advantage of the Amendment became apparent, because the Judge would then have the power of at once calling the other party before him, which no Judge could do unless a suit were instituted. No expense and no delay would result from the adoption of the Amendment, and the only difference between his proposition and that of the Attorney General was, that the one proposed that the Judge should act upon an ex parte statement, while the other provided that both sides should be heard.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he thought that some objection might be taken both to the clause as it stood and to the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Belfast. The objection to the clause, and a very sound and reasonable objection it was, was that a trustee might have a prosecution entered and a true Bill found against him without ever having had an opportunity of being heard before a Judge. It appeared to him that a very slight Amendment in the clause of the Attorney General would remedy the difficulty. The clause as it stood provided that no prosecution should be instituted except with the consent of a Judge of one of the superior courts or of the Attorney General; but upon that consent being obtained, a Bill might be presented to a grand jury ex parte, and a trustee might thereupon find himself unawares made the defendant in a criminal prosecution. A new class of offences hitherto unknown to the law were created by the Bill, and trustees, whether belonging to the upper or middle classes, might fairly demand the satisfaction of having their cases sifted before they were exposed to a criminal prosecution. He would suggest, therefore, in order to remedy the inconvenience referred to, that before a prosecution should be sanctioned, the trustee should be summoned before a Judge, or before the Attorney General, as the case might be, and heard in his defence. He would, moreover, go so far as to say that it ought to be in the power of every Judge of a civil court, either a court of equity, a court of common law, or a court of bankruptcy, and that not merely in suits instituted against trustees, but in the course of any proceedings whatever in which it should appear to the Judge that a trustee had been guilty of a fraud or crime which would bring him within the operation of this Act, to order a prosecution. But then he would add that the prosecution ought not to be authorized unless the trustee in question was made a party to the suit, and had ample opportunity afforded to him of knowing all the accusations against him. He must confess it seemed to him that the clause and the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend might be very well blended together.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he was willing to allow that the clause was not perfect; still it was to be preferred to the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend. As to whether the Judge or the Attorney General should call the other side before him, that he thought might well be left to his discretion. They could scarcely imagine that, unless a prima facie case were shown, the prosecution would be ordered to issue. He (the Attorney General) objected to the trustee being allowed an opportunity to meet the charge before the Judge in chambers, for the only effect of a summons under such circumstances, if the party implicated were guilty, would be to warn him to take flight with more alacrity than he at first intended. His hon. and learned Friend said that the Judge should have the power of directing a prosecution. That was the law as it now stood. Every Judge before whom it should appear that a crime had been committed might direct a prosecution. But the clause in question did more—it enabled the Judge to be appealed to, and empowered him to order the prosecution to issue at once. He would now deal with the objections to the clause as it stood; and, in the first place he would say that he should have been glad not to have had this clause in the Bill, but it had been introduced to meet the apprehensions of some hon. Gentlemen of the inconvenience that might occur if some check was not established. But he confessed that he did not at all participate in such apprehensions. Hon. Members mistook altogether the things that did frighten, and justly frighten trustees. The honest and well-meaning man was intimidated by those pitfalls which were presented by the present state of the law. Trustees were frightened because there were too many technical rules. But it could not be seriously said that the Gentlemen of England would be deterred from accepting offices of this kind because there were enactments which punished dishonesty and crime. It had been objected, however, to the clause that it gave too much power to the Attorney General; but were not his hon. Friends opposite aware that powers of an analogous character were exercised by him at the present moment, and that scarcely a day passed without his being called upon to sanction the initiation of criminal proceedings? and, speaking for himself, he would say that he had no fear of not being able to make the investigations which the hon. and learned Gentleman thought would entail so heavy an additional burden upon him. If, however, he could accomplish that, which perhaps it was too late to attempt this Session, but which he hoped would yet form part of a great legal measure—namely, the establishment of a public prosecutor—a great part of the machinery of this Bill would be unnecessary. There were many points connected with an investigation of this kind which could not be adequately dealt with by the police magistrates, intelligent as they were, and therefore he had thought it desirable to give a power to some judicial officer to institute a preliminary investigation, in order to ascertain whether there was a corpus delicti under the Act. This would be a sufficient check, a sufficient safeguard, and a sufficient preliminary inquiry to prevent the process under the Act becoming liable to abuse, and yet to render it so quick and ready that only a few hours should elapse between the application and receiving a sanction to proceed. He admitted that the application would be ex parte, but it must be made to a Judge in chambers or to the Attorney General, who were always accessible. He would now come to the suggestions of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Belfast (Mr. Cairns). Let him take the first and second parts of the clause; they provided that there must be some civil proceeding pending; and that it must be made to appear to the Judge before whom the proceedings were going on that there was sufficient cause for a prosecution. Now, such cause could only appear to the Judge after the evidence had been taken, after the defendant had been heard, and when it became the duty of the court to pronounce judgment. Judges would put a strict construction upon this clause; they would approach the discharge of the duty imposed upon them with great unwillingness; they would act with extreme caution, and he might even say reluctance. A Judge, putting a strict construction upon the clause, would say, "I cannot declare that it appears to me there is reasonable and probable cause for a criminal prosecution until the case has been regularly heard, and until the defendant has had a full opportunity of explaining his conduct." The result would be to make the whole Bill a mere farce, for a man against whom a judicial decision had passed would take care not to remain in the country until criminal proceedings could be taken against him. This would render the whole proceedings nugatory, and would also be most objectionable on every principle of criminal law; for if a Judge should, after such a preliminary discussion, think fit to direct a criminal prosecution of the trustee, would any one tell him that the trustee could then have a fair trial before any jury of this country? With regard to the third part of the clause proposed by his hon. and learned Friend, the full extent of the frauds committed by a trustee might not be at once discovered. It might be supposed that he had fraudulently appropriated to his own use £50, £100, or £150; while, in fact, he might have misappropriated as many thousands. The effect of the writ of ne exeat regno would simply be that the defaulting trustee would be required to give bail for the small amount of his discovered frauds mentioned in the writ, and would then be enabled to fly from the country and avoid the consequences of his crime. He (the Attorney General) therefore maintained that the mode of proceeding proposed by the Bill was infinitely more efficacious than that which his hon. and learned Friend wished to substitute, and he hoped it would be sanctioned by the Committee.

The Attorney General

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he only wished to guard himself against a misapprehension of the suggestion he had made to the Attorney General. He entirely concurred with him in thinking that there would be danger of the parties escaping from an indictment for misdemeanour under the Act unless they were apprehended immediately. His desire was that a Judge or the Attorney General should be enabled, if there appeared reasonable grounds to believe that a trustee was about to abscond, at once to issue a warrant for his apprehension, but to allow him to show cause against the accusation. Considering, however, the extensive scope of this Bill—that it applied to every one, from the highest nobleman to the humblest individual in the land who might be a trustee, he was anxious to provide that a person so charged and apprehended under warrant should have an opportunity of going before the Attorney General or a Judge to make such preliminary defence or application as might be proper under the circumstances, before being at once committed to prison.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would consider whether some words to carry out the views of his hon. and learned Friend could not be introduced into the Bill before bringing up the Report.

MR. ROLT said, he was surprised to hear from his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General that this clause had been introduced into the Bill to meet the apprehensions entertained by other persons, and that it did not gain his approval. He should have thought that would obviously have been part of the scheme of his hon. and learned Friend, when he was introducing a new code of criminal law in respect to breaches of trust, to protect the innocent trustee as well as to punish the guilty one. He (Mr. Rolt) contended that the relation in which a trustee stood to his cestuique trust was wholly different from that which obtained between man and man in any of the ordinary transactions of life. All mercantile transactions between men, generally speaking, were simple, short in duration, and easy of solution compared with the relation subsisting between a trustee and his cestuique trust, spreading, as the latter often did, over a whole life, and generating in some cases feelings of respect and in others of animosity. Then, again, in mercantile life men entered into transactions for the sake of their own profit; but it was different in the other case, and there would be great difficulty in finding persons to take upon them the relation of trustees if, while the Legislature provided a punishment for the guilty trustee, it did not protect the innocent trustee from malicious prosecutions.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL explained that what he said was that he had not introduced this clause because he deemed it necessary to allay the apprehensions that persons would feel on becoming trustees, but because it was necessary to have persons better competent to judge of the nature of the fraud than in ordinary cases.

MR. ROLT: The explanation of the hon. and learned Attorney General seemed to approve the view he (Mr. Rolt) took, that it was necessary to shield the innocent trustee from malicious prosecutions, while provision was made for the punishment of the guilty one. At all events, he submitted that the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Cairns) was undoubtedly to be preferred to the clause as it stood originally, inasmuch as in cases where a hostile feeling arose between a trustee and the cestuique trust, it was more likely to meet the justice of the case. The essential difference between the two was, that the clause of the Attorney General proceeded on an ex parte statement, and it would therefore impose so great a responsibility upon the Judge or the Attorney General that it could not be acted upon, and, in consequence of that, the object of the clause would be virtually abandoned. The Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Belfast, on the contrary, hit upon a happy medium, as by it the inquiry might be instituted in any civil proceeding, and at any stage of it, a circumstance which seemed to have escaped the notice both of the Attorney General and of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier). It might be ex parte, but the Judge would in that case hold the trustee to bail, and thus give him an opportunity of being heard before the prosecution was instituted; while at the same time it would prevent a guilty trustee from escaping from the jurisdiction of the court.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, after the statement of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, he could not understand the object of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Belfast in persisting with his Amendment, and the less so as there was so much identity between it and the proposition of the Attorney General. The clause as it stood provided for both cases, that of ex parte proceedings, and of the hearing of the party, leaving the question as to which should be adopted at the discretion of the Judge. What, then, was the meaning of the Amendment? It would not leave the Judge any discretion in the matter. But was his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Belfast prepared to say that there was no case in which the Judge ought not to proceed ex parte? Surely it must be admitted that for the furtherance of justice there were cases in which it would be absolutely necessary to proceed ex parte. He granted that if the person to be proceeded against were a man of status he might be summoned; but for one such case there were a thousand cases of dishonest trustees who wished to escape. He could not conceive that any object would be accomplished by the Amendment which was not duly accomplished by the clause of the Attorney General.

MR. HENLEY said, he understood the object of the clause to be to give some protection to a trustee against malicious prosecutions, but he believed that unless the defendant were heard it would prejudice him rather than protect him. If these cases were so complicated that greater ability was necessary than the ability of a stipendiary magistrate to decide whether the status of trustee existed or not, he thought it quite possible that some deed might be suppressed, or a state of things represented which admitted of a complete and immediate answer. Upon charges of forgery and murder, it could hardly be said that any ex parte proceedings were taken, and the power of going before a grand jury and preferring a Bill of indictment behind a man's back was viewed with considerable disfavour, because of its liability to abuse. It was quite possible under this Bill that one case might be taken before the Attorney General and another before the grand jury. There was not a tittle in the clause to insure the defendant having any knowledge of what was alleged against him. He thought the requiring a suit to be first instituted unnecessary, as in many of the worst cases, the only object would be punishment. If the Government gave an assurance that they would introduce words to secure the party being heard, he should prefer the clause to the one proposed in substitution of it. If the defendant were not heard, he would go before the grand jury with the weight of the Government official unfairly pressing against him; but if he were heard, he would stand in the same position as a defendant before a magistrate, and might exercise his own discretion whether he would say anything or not in his defence.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would give his right hon. Friend the assurance that words should be added to the clause, giving the Judge or the Attorney General, and more particularly the Judge, power to summon the party, and in fact indicating generally that the party ought to be summoned, though he could not carry it to the extent of making it imperative. He would gladly do so if the Judge had power to commit, but he was afraid there was great difficulty in that. If the Judge had the power to commit, he would be in the situation of a committing magistrate, and the party would be summoned before him, which he thought infinitely better. That was his object, and he had so framed the clause; but on consulting the Judges, he found there was an objection to exercise the power. When the Report was brought up, he would introduce an Amendment to the effect he had stated.

MR. CAIRNS said, that after the assurance of the hon. and learned Gentleman (the Attorney General) he need give the Committee no further trouble, the object of his Amendment having been directed solely to giving a due amount of protection to the trustee, and affording him an opportunity of being heard in his defence. He would, therefore, with the permission of the Committee, withdraw his Amendment. At the same time he would suggest, whether it would not make the machinery more complete if they added a power of issuing a writ of ne exeat reyno in those cases in which some step was required to be taken at once?

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. AYRTON objected to this power being placed in the hands of the Attorney General. He thought that these cases had much better be left to the ordinary tribunals of justice. He hoped that the Attorney General would strike out this provision.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 13 to 16 were also agreed to.

Clause 17.

MR. E. C. EGERTON moved, after the words "personal property," to insert the words "goods, materials."

Clause, as amended, agreed to; as were also the remaining clauses of the Bill.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Monday next.

COURT OF SESSION (SCOTLAND) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. BLACK said, that he felt several objections to this Bill, which would operate prejudicially to the interests of suitors. It had been condemned by the Society of Writers to the Signet and by the Society of Solicitors in the Supreme Courts. Its main object was to empower the Lord President to transfer causes from the first to the second division of the Court of Session. The plea was, that the first division was overwhelmed with business. He maintained, however, that by sitting three weeks or a month beyond its usual time the first division could easily get rid of its arrears. The suitors in the Court of Session had enjoyed the privilege of choosing the Judge by whom their causes should be tried for a long series of years, and it had been found exceedingly beneficial. He moved that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

MR. BUCHANAN seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, "To leave out the word 'now,' and at the end of the Question to add the words 'upon this day three months.'"

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he felt strongly the necessity of some measure of this kind. It was intended to remedy a state of things which had been found to act prejudicially in Scotland, and the Society of Solicitors were in favour of it. It was said that it would deprive the suitors of their right. It would deprive the pursuer of a right which he never possessed before 1838. In that year an absolute right of choice between the Judges was given to pursuers—a most injurious step; for, however able the Judges, one would always be more popular than the other. The consequence was, that one court fell into arrear, while the other, the less popular Judge, became languid from want of employment. The option presented by the three common law courts of England was not at all a parallel case. The Court of Session now presented this spectacle:—That in 1856 there was 236 causes ready for trial in the first division, and 37 in the other. The remedies he proposed were, to take away from the court certain summary business; and with regard to the other, to give the Lord President a power of distribution, similar to that exercised in the English Court of Chancery by the Lord Chancellor. The right of choice in the suitor was unfounded in principle; there was no reason why the pursuer should have a choice of courts rather than the defender, and he considered that all Judges should be equal to their duties, in which case the public interests would be burthened by a rapid despatch of business by means of a just distribution of labour. He, therefore, hoped the Bill would be read a second time, and in Committee he should be prepared to listen to Amendments.

MR. CRAUFURD said, that while admitting that some change was necessary in the Court of Session, he doubted whether the remedy proposed was the correct one. The allocation of causes in Chancery was made by the Lord Chancellor, as Superior Judge, to whom an appeal lay from the decisions of the Vice Chancellors. In Scotland there was no appeal from the decisions of the Court of Session, except to the House of Lords. He would suggest that the two divisions should be fused into one court for the purpose of hearing appeals from each division. This was similar to what was done with the law courts here. He doubted the propriety of giving to the Lord President, the popular Judge, the right of distributing causes to the other court. A suitor who wished his cause to be tried by the Lord President, finding it sent before another court, might prefer to withdraw it. To obviate the objection arising from the pursuer having the power of choosing his court, he would give the defendant power to remove the cause on reasons being shown for it.

MR. BLACKBURN said, the Bill was very unpopular in Scotland. It was a measure promoted by the Judges, but he believed that if they had done the extra work that was expected of them, when many years ago they received extra pay, the accumulation of business now complained of would not have taken place. He hoped the Bill would be withdrawn. It was not a case of urgency, as was shown by the absence of petitions in favour of the Bill.

MR. DUNLOP said, the Bill was brought forward for the sake of the public and the suitors, with the view of getting rid of the existing arrears of three or four years. The extended sittings referred to by the hon. Member might have kept down the accumulation now complained of, but would not have prevented it altogether. The Bill was in some respects open to objection, but he, nevertheless, hoped it would be read a second time.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>, and committed for Thursday next at Twelve o'clock.

EDINBURGH, CANONGATE, AND MONTROSE ANNUITY TAX ABOLITION BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved for leave to bring in a Bill to abolish the annuity tax levied within the city of Edinburgh, parish of Canongate, and burgh of Montrose, and to make provision for the payment of the stipends of the ministers thereof.

MR. ELLICE (Coventry) thought that a Bill of this kind ought not to be introduced without explanation on the 10th of July, and when there was so much other business before the House. This was an old job, newly revived—an attempt in one guise or another to extract from the public funds the means of relieving the inhabitants of Edinburgh from a tax which they had paid from time immemorial for the stipends of certain clergymen within that city. A similar tax was levied in several parishes in London (which had been rebuilt after the great fire), in Coventry, and other parts of England; and if any exemption was given to the ratepayers of Scotland, the ratepayers of England would be entitled to the same consideration. No doubt the reason for bringing forward this measure was, because a Bill had been lately passed to relieve certain towns in Ireland from the payment of ministers' money. But it should be remembered that in Ireland the Established Church had a fund peculiarly applicable to the replacement of that impost. In Scotland, on the other hand, there was no such resource from which to provide a substitute for this tax, and they must therefore either come upon the public purse or upon some fund set apart by Parliament for another purpose. In the present state of public business the Bill ought at least to be postponed till another Session, when a general measure, dealing with all the analogous cases, might be introduced.

THE LORD ADVOCATE hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not throw any obstacle in the way of the introduction of the Bill. No doubt it was an old grievance, but it was one which caused considerable heartburning to the inhabitants of Edinburgh, and which the noble Lord the Member for London, in 1851, the Earl of Derby, in 1852, and the Earl of Aberdeen, in 1853, had failed to settle. After the Bill for the abolition of ministers' money in Ireland had passed, the city of Edinburgh had applied to the Government to see if they would not consent to a Bill for the abolition of this tax, and it was now attempted to frame a measure not liable to the objections entertained to the former measures on the subject. It was proposed that the town of Edinburgh should pay to the Government £170,000 by yearly instalments of £13,000, and that it should take, not the whole, but a portion of the funds of the deans of the Chapel Royal, after endowing the chair of the Professor of Biblical Criticism out of them, and also a part of the sum paid by the North British Railway Company for Trinity College Church. Both of these proposals were part of the former Bills on the subject, but instead of taking the whole of the funds of the deans of the Chapel Royal, it was now proposed to take only a part.

MR. BLACKBURN said, that the money paid by the North British Railway Company to the Town Council of Edinburgh was to be appropriated to the rebuilding of Trinity College Church; but that church had never been rebuilt, and now it was proposed to apply the money to relieve the inhabitants of Edinburgh of the annuity tax.

Mr. Craufurd

MR. BLACK agreed with the hon. Member that the money was intended for relieving the College Church, but the opinion of counsel was that all that the town council were required to do was to build a parish church or chapel. He was not of that opinion; but at the same time he did not think the money could be better applied than to relieving the inhabitants of the annuity tax, for no measure could be more advantageous to the Established Church.

Leave given.

Bill to abolish the Annuity Tax levied within the city of Edinburgh, parish of Canongate, and burgh of Montrose, and to make provision for the future payment of the stipends of the Ministers thereof, ordered to be brought in by the LORD ADVOCATE and SIR GEORGE GREY.

Bill presented, and read 1<sup>o</sup>, and referred to the Examiner of Petitions for Private Bills, and to be printed [Bill 116].

Leave given to the Examiner to sit and proceed forthwith.

House adjourned at One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, July 10, 1857.

MINUTES.] Took the Oaths.—The Earl of Mount Cashell.

PUBLIC BILLS.—1<sup>a</sup> Registration of Long Leases (Scotland).

3<sup>a</sup> Police (Scotland).

OATHS BILL.

SECOND READING.—NEGATIVED.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

EARL GRANVILLE moved, "That the Oaths of Allegiance, Supremacy, and Abjuration be read by the Clerk."

The same accordingly read by the Clerk.

EARL GRANVILLE: I now venture to ask the indulgence of the House while I assign my reasons for requesting your Lordships to assent to the second reading of this Bill. At different times when it has been my duty to submit measures to your Lordships, I have felt some difficulty lest I should imperfectly state the objects of the measures I was about to propose. My difficulty to-night is of a different description; for the arguments which I shall have to urge in favour of this Bill cannot be of a very novel character, and I fear lest I should weary your Lordships in attempting the performance of a duty which has frequently been discharged most efficiently by others in this House—I will, however, endeavour to state them as briefly as possible. I feel also that some of your Lordships may think I am somewhat presumptuous, after your opinion has been previously given on a principal part of this measure, in again venturing to bring the subject under your consideration; but I trust that in the course of the observations I am about to make I shall be able to bring forward some reasons which may induce your Lordships to change your former opinion. I can only promise to go as speedily as possible over what is certainly a pretty well-trodden path. The object of this Bill is to amend the oaths which are now required to be taken by Members of both Houses of Parliament. All of your Lordship have so recently taken those oaths that it is unnecessary I should explain their nature. They have just been read by the Clerk at the table, and it is impossible to have heard them without being struck by their anomalous and incongruous character. The object of the Bill is to amend and simplify these oaths, and by so doing to remove some of the evils which, as we consider, at present exist. I have always believed—I trust it is not an unjust prejudice—that there is no nation which attaches greater importance than does our own to the sanctity of oaths, and that not merely as a matter of religious principle, but also as a question of feeling and good taste among the educated classes of this country, whom these oaths most particularly concern. I believe there is no country where so much horror and disgust are felt at anything like taking in vain the name of God; and I think it is impossible not to feel that you are taking in vain that holy name when you make the most solemn appeals with regard to things which are in themselves utterly useless and entirely ridiculous. I think it was Cicero who said he could not understand how two augurs could meet in the streets of Rome without laughing in one another's faces; and I can hardly conceive what would be the opinion of that great pagan if he could see the representatives of the people of this country in another place, and the hereditary legislators who possess seats in this House—the men who have gained their seats in this assembly by their administration of the law in the highest courts of the country, together with Christian Prelates, calling upon the name of that God to whom they ascribe such high and important attributes, to witness anything so puerile as their belief that the descendants of a family which does not exist have no right to the Crown of this realm; or, on the other hand, calling upon Protestants to declare that they do not hold a doctrine which I believe is denied by Catholics, who do not take the oath relating to such doctrine, although Protestants are obliged to go through this most ridiculous mummery. I really think it would be wasting your Lordships' time to dilate upon the very great objections to the three oaths which you are now called upon to take. Different attempts have been made on both sides of this House to amend the oaths, and although those oaths have not been amended, no one has ventured to assert, in his place in Parliament, that he thinks there is anything in them which renders it desirable that they should be retained in their present form. Some of our Parliamentary usages, such as the mode in which the Sovereign gives her assent to Bills which have been sanctioned by Parliament, are of an anomalous and almost ridiculous character, but in them an unbroken antiquity is preserved, and there is a sort of tacit homage to our institutions in maintaining them, which I believe your Lordships and others would be most unwilling to withhold. But, with respect to the form of these oaths no such considerations exist. They have not been handed down from great antiquity. They have been added to, altered, and patched up by various Acts of Parliament, which I have failed in an attempt to count—and they have absolutely fallen into contempt. I therefore think that the Bill, which seeks to effect an alteration in these oaths, is not open to any of the objections which might be supposed to exist in the case of those Parliamentary usages to which I have just adverted. We who introduce this Bill, it is true, aim to effect under its operation the admission to a seat in the Legislature of members of the Jewish persuasion, who, owing to certain words which exist in the oaths as they at present stand, are prevented, in consequence of their religious belief and a conscientious adherence to the truth, from becoming Members of the other House of Parliament. From that disability, my Lords, we propose to relieve them, upon the ground of toleration, and upon the ground of right. We believe it to be directly opposed to the principles of our constitution that any class of men should be debarred from the enjoyment of civil rights on account of the religion which they may happen to profess. We entertain this opinion the more strongly in the case of men with respect to whom there exists no special Act of Parliament prohibiting them from becoming members of the Legislature. To my great surprise I have learnt that some doubt has been expressed as to whether the words "on the true faith of a Christian" were not originally meant to apply to the case of the Jews. I shall not trouble your Lordships by quoting the opinions of our greatest statesmen upon that point; neither shall I quote from the works of any of our great historians to prove how erroneous is that view. I shall not refer to the sentiments of our most eminent Judges, delivered from the judicial bench, in refutation of the supposition; I shall merely appeal to your own good sense upon the subject. Looking to the date of the oath in which the words which I have mentioned appear—bearing in mind that it was framed at the commencement of the eighteenth century, when the object sought to be attained was to protect the House of Hanover from aggression on the part of the House of Stuart—at a period, too, when the Jews had absolutely no political significance whatever—I contend that it is impossible seriously to maintain that the introduction of the words in question into the oath had for its object the exclusion from Parliament of members of that persuasion. If I am right in taking that view, then I say that they are unjustly excluded from the exercise of a civil right, and that it is nothing less than persecution upon our parts to continue the disability. Persecution, my Lords, is a word with reference to which very plausible arguments have been advanced—arguments so plausible as to have produced a considerable influence, not in the case of our country alone, but upon other nations, in the progress of history; arguments which we find influence at the present moment a Government and a people of a character not altogether uncivilized. I am happy, however, my Lords, to think that in the justice of persecution those whom I have the honour to address in no sense acquiesce. I for one hold that, whether you simply deprive a man of his civil rights, or go further, and take from him his property or his life, you are in both cases equally guilty of persecution. In confirmation of the justice of that opinion I have upon my side not alone the sentiments of laymen of the highest eminence, but of some of the most illustrious Prelates by whom our Church has been adorned. Noble Lords opposite think that it is not persecution to preclude a Jew, who may be otherwise well qualified to take his seat in Parliament, from doing so because of the religion which he professes. I think I have a right to ask those noble Lords to define the line where persecution begins and where it ends. I will ask them whether it was persecution some quarter of a century ago to prohibit Jews from being the chief magistrates of that great commercial city which has for many years past returned a Jew as its representative? I will ask them whether it was persecution to prevent a Jew from enjoying the freedom of that city—from being a schoolmaster or a lawyer, and from exercising a retail trade even in this great metropolis? I ask whether the enforcement of any or of all of these disabilities can be regarded as persecution? If the answer be in the affirmative, then point out to me a single instance where to grant relief from such persecution and from the disabilities which it entailed has resulted in the slightest disadvantage to the Christian community of this country. If to maintain those disabilities be not persecution, I ask whether to inflict upon natural-born subjects of this kingdom, as was done far back in our history, the grievance of confiscating their property, and after the exercise in this regard of unexampled cruelty to drive 15,000 of them from the country, comes under the head of persecution or not? The word is one of the true meaning and scope of which we have a right to expect that some explanation should be given. We who advocate the passing of this Bill are desirous that the existing disabilities of the Jews should be removed, and I shall, with your Lordships' permission, proceed to answer the objections which are urged against the adoption of that course. In doing so, I trust your Lordships will attribute rather to a want of understanding upon my part, than to any want of respect for those distinguished men who have spoken both in this House and elsewhere upon the subject, the assurance of my inability, after having given the question careful consideration, to comprehend the exact principles upon which the objections to this measure are based. I, as well as your Lordships generally, have heard most eloquent appeals made to everything of sentiment, of feeling, or of prejudice that may be supposed to exist in a Christian community in opposition to the claims of the Jews to a seat in the Legislature; but I am bound to say, that I have been unable to discover in those appeals any clear or logical principle in support of the views which their authors have advanced. The nearest approach to anything like principle which I have been able to find in them, is the doctrine that, by the admission of Jews to a seat in Parliament, we should be unchristianizing the Legislature. Now, I can conceive no cry which is more calculated to fill with horror everybody who does not reflect upon its true nature than the assurance that the step which we wish you to take would have that result. I venture, however, to give expression to a hope that my noble Friend opposite, who will follow me this evening, will not rest satisfied with shadowing out the horrors which an Act tending to unchristianize the Legislature would produce, but that he will, with that clearness of diction which he, more than any other man in your Lordships' House possesses, explain in exact terms to your Lordships how that result would be brought about by the passing of the measure now under discussion. We ought, I think, to be informed in the first place, whether the country at large is now to be considered as a Christian nation or not. If the preposterous notion be entertained that this is not a Christian State, then I ask, whether it is not clearly chimerical to attempt to maintain for the Legislature a character which the country at large does not possess? If upon the other hand, this nation—as I feel confident she is—be a Christian nation, I think we ought to have some reason assigned as to how it is possible that we can retain our Christian character while Jews are allowed to vote for Members of Parliament, while they are permitted to reside and to hold land in the country, to fulfil all the duties of magistrates, and while Unitarians, as well as infidels of all shades, are allowed to sit and vote in the Imperial Legislature—I should wish, I say, to know how a country is to remain Christian under these circumstances, while the mere admission of a few men of the Jewish persuasion would tend to deprive it of that Christian character? The argument is one which I think none of your Lordships will be disposed to push too far. It would be well to consider, whether in using it you do not derogate from the dignity of Christianity itself. I would confidently ask you, whether Christianity owes its spread in the world to laws, whether intentionally or unintentionally, framed by man, and whether by the adoption of the course to which the argument I have mentioned must legitimately lead, you would not be maintaining rather the outward semblance than the inner and truer substance of Christianity? I have seen it recorded that among the early Christians there were men who, although they were ready to sacrifice their lives and property for conscience sake, yet did not hesitate to take part in the deliberations of the Roman Senate. Now, I cannot understand how a Christian of that stamp could hold himself justified in associating with the worshippers of Venus and Jupiter and other pagan deities in connection with matters of a temporal character, while we, who constitute an enormous majority of a Christian assembly, in which, not matters of religion, but questions affecting the temporal welfare of millions of our fellow-subjects of every form of religious belief are the subjects of deliberation, imagine that we should lose our Christian character by the admission into the Legislature of a few men professing particular religious tenets—tenets, be it remembered, which cannot be said to endanger others, and which they do not seek to propagate? In my opinion, much greater danger to Christianity lies in the unchristian sentiment by which such a doctrine as that is sought to be upheld. For these reasons, my Lords, I think you will come to the conclusion that this argument with respect to unchristianizing the Legislature is one which cannot be fairly maintained. My Lords, it has long been a matter of national pride that this country has appreciated more widely than any other the blessings of civil and religious liberty. Now, for the course in which noble Lords opposite ask us to persevere, it is quite true that precedents can be found in Russia, in Prussia, and in some parts of Italy. In those countries, I admit, the Jews are subjected to civil disabilities. But, if you turn to the great Catholic empire of France, or to the Catholic kingdom of Belgium, to the Protestant kingdom of Holland, or to the dominions of our brethren beyond the Atlantic, you will find that they are in advance of us in the appreciation of that which constitutes in reality religious toleration; for in none of these countries are the Jews debarred of their civil rights. I would ask you even to contrast our own country with itself. Do any disabilities in the case of the Jews exist in India, in Jamaica, in Barbadoes, in our extensive Australian colonies? You will find the contrary to be the fact; while in Canada, I am happy to say, owing to the zealous exertions of clergymen of the Church of England, the disability to hold a seat in the Legislature, under which Jews at one time laboured, has been removed. It may be said, that in the United States there is no Established Church, and that the question has not been mooted there. I think that the existence of an Established Church makes no difference whatever. The existence of an Established Church might have been a good and logical reason for excluding Dissenters, Roman Catholics—every person who did not belong to the Church; but, having admitted these, it is idle to state that for the established church it is of importance that we should exclude Jews. If it were, nothing could be easier than to demand from Jews the same sort of declaration as is now extorted from Roman Catholics. I can see no objection to that, except the fact that it would be utterly ridiculous in itself, and would be tantamount to saying that the Established Church possesses less strength than I am happy to say it has. Nor is the statement true that the question has not been mooted in the United States. In Massachusetts, that purely Protestant State, imbued, even to the present day with something of a puritanical spirit, there existed until very recently a relic of the old feeling, the Governor being obliged to take an oath professing himself to be a Christian. A full discussion took place upon the point, and in that most Protestant State of America it was agreed to sweep from their statute-book everything that bore the appearance of a useless and impractical piece of intolerance. There are some other objections to which I can hardly venture to allude, because I think your Lordships cannot seriously entertain them, such as that the Jews, being a separate people and expecting an eventual restoration to Palestine, will not make good citizens here. I believe that to be contrary to all the principles of human nature. If the Jews confidently believed that at some definite period—say five or ten years hence—they would be restored to Palestine, that might influence their conduct; but to suppose that because they expect a miraculous restoration at some very indefinite time, which they themselves think may occur one or two thousand years hence—feeling, too, that the interests of their sons and grandsons are locked up in the prosperity of the country which they now inhabit—they would not make good citizens, would be as childish as to imagine that those who believe in the more definite event of an approaching millennium, or even the whole body of Christians who believe in a future life, making of little importance what takes place here below, must of necessity be bad subjects. Some other objections have entirely vanished, as, for example, the objection that the Jews are unfit for intellectual pursuits. I shall not go into their history in other countries to show the vigour of their mental powers, but I defy you to point to any profession or intellectual pursuit in which they have not distinguished themselves in England. Jews are to be found among the best teachers in the different departments of science, and I may say with some pride, being myself connected with the University of London, where Jews are now permitted to compete with others, that they have taken, at least, their full share of the honours of that institution. There is another and a different class of objections to which I wish to call the attention of your Lordships. I am told that some of the Roman Catholic Members of this House feel a difficulty in voting for the second reading of this Bill. I entirely appreciate their motives, and am sure they are influenced by the same sentiments which I dare say many of your Lordships heard expressed with such eloquence by one of their ablest advocates in another place. It was immediately after the passing of the Emancipation Act, and the Gentleman to whom I allude said, that as a Catholic he gloried in having an opportunity of voting for the admission of Jews to Parliament, and of thus refuting the calumnies which had been heaped upon his co-religionists by those who wished to maintain their disabilities. With the same justifiable feeling of pride he cried out, “We have been accused of bigotry; where are the bigots now?” I am sure that the same sentiments are entertained by the Roman Catholic Members of this House, and I know that their objections to the Bill are of a very different nature from those to which I have referred. They think that in the amended form of the oath which we propose, there are details which they do not feel themselves justified in imposing upon their fellow-subjects. If the Bill should go into Committee—and I earnestly hope it will—I shall be prepared to state the reasons why it is desirable to retain the words objected to, and what inconveniences would arise from their omission. It will be open to them, in the same manner, to propose any alterations which they may think advisable, and to show to your Lordships that means might be taken to remove their objections without, at the same time, weakening any of those securities which as Protestants we must take. Any such proposal made by them will, I am sure, be carefully and deliberately considered by your Lordships; but, considering that the object of the Bill is to amend an oath which they think defective, and that it collaterally secures the admission of Jews, whom they wish to relieve in the same manner as they have been relieved themselves, and as the nation was relieved from the disgrace of inflicting penalties on account of religious distinctions, I do expect to find them voting for the second reading, whatever course they may take in the subsequent stages of the Bill. I believe that a noble Earl who is not a Roman Catholic entertains the same objection, but I earnestly hope that he and all those who approve the great object of the Bill, will not attempt to defeat it merely because the details are not in every respect such as they would recommend. There is an objection of another kind which I do not think will be heard in this House. It is rumoured abroad, but I hope is without foundation, that your Lordships ought to seize with avidity the present opportunity of showing your independence of the other House of Parliament upon a question of some importance, especially since you may do so with perfect impunity, inasmuch as that, notwithstanding the very large majority by which this Bill passed the House of Commons, that majority is not supported by any excited feeling on the part of the people at large. I cannot believe that your Lordships entertain any such intention. Such fictitious means of strengthening your power would be altogether unworthy of you. The substance of your power is great. You exercise great influence; first, by the effect which your debates have in forming public opinion—the real lever by which everything is done in this country; secondly, by the personal position and high character of some of your number; thirdly, by preventing any one, whether belonging to the Government or not, from bringing forward a measure in opposition to the known wishes of your Lordships. That any notion, therefore, should be entertained that your Lordships would strengthen your position by a fictitious assertion of independence, only requires to be stated to be refuted. There are occasions on which your Lordships may usefully interfere to prevent the passing of measures which have been sanctioned by the other House of Parliament. When a Bill is the result of a temporary enthusiasm on the part of the people, I admit—although it is not wise for any branch of the Legislature to place itself in permanent opposition to the wishes of the country—that you may do infinite good by giving time for that calm consideration which delay sometimes induces. But the present is not a case of that kind. The present case is exactly the reverse. There is, it is true, no passionate feeling or excitement upon this subject out of doors; but I say with the same truth that the cool and deliberate judgment of the people of England is in favour of the measure now before your Lordships. I shall not refer to the petitions which have been presented even this evening, although some of them are indicative of a remarkable change of opinion, and one was signed by the whole of the corporation and by 3000 of the inhabitants of Birmingham. I put aside the test of the public press. I pass by the fact, that two of the largest constituencies in England have returned Jews to Parliament; but I take what I believe to be the real and constitutional test of public opinion in this country—I refer to the enormous majority—enormous not only in itself, but as compared with the majorities which approved the Bill in the last Parliament—of Members just returned from the constituencies by which the measure was passed through the other House. Nor do I think the fact unworthy the attention of your Lordships that eminent men, of all shades of politics, both here and elsewhere, unite in support of this Bill, which has also the sanction of two influential Members of the party of the noble Earl opposite—one an exemplification of how far Jewish ability can be made available for the purposes of the State, and the other a gentleman whom nothing but strong and sincere conviction, the result of long and serious study, could induce to separate from his friends, who we all know exercise such a powerful influence upon a party man. Even the opposition of some noble Lords on the other side of the table does not produce that effect upon me which it might be expected to do, because, whatever may be the conclusion to which subsequent reflection has brought them, they have not always been of opinion that it was a matter of vital importance to exclude Jews from the privileges which we now propose to give them. I, therefore, appeal to your Lordships to act in a judicial spirit—judicial to the extent of putting away all fancies, all prejudices, all improper feelings, and resolving to do what is right between man and man; to do what is in accordance with the principles of political truth; to give a second reading to a Bill which will relieve a deserving part of the community from restrictions, which they feel the more seeing that they have been removed from all other portions of the community; to do an act—I will not call it of grace—but of justice to a most useful, most industrious, most peaceable, and most orderly portion of the nation.

Earl Granville

Earl Granville

Earl Granville

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I apprehend that there are before your Lordships this night two distinct questions, which, nevertheless, it has suited the convenience of Her Majesty's Government to bind up incorporate in one measure. One question is as to the propriety, the expediency, and the justice of admitting into the Legislature of this Christian country—for so I shall take the liberty still to call it—the members of the Jewish nation—for as a nation I shall still take the liberty of speaking of them; the other, the question of the alteration of oaths which are undoubtedly obsolete, and for the maintenance of which in their present form, abstractedly considered, no one would, I apprehend, be disposed to contend. My noble Friend who has introduced this measure, has treated of the first of these questions as a collateral advantage which he apprehends may, in all probability, be derived from the passing of this measure, and which he thinks should be an additional inducement to your Lordships to pass the Bill which, mainly on account of the alteration of the oaths, he submits to you. I venture to think that that is not the process of reasoning which has led Her Majesty's Government to introduce this Bill. I venture to think that that which my noble Friend speaks of as an incidental and collateral advantage has been, in fact, the paramount motive and inducement to this measure, and that the other, of which he speaks as the primary object of the Bill, is one which they have found it very advantageous to include by way of screw upon your Lordships, to induce you, by the desire which you must entertain to amend objectionable oaths—for such I admit them to be—to force your own consciences, and the consciences of many of your fellow-subjects, by the adoption of that which they insist upon attaching to the improvement of these oaths. I hope that I shall not be considered wanting in courtesy to my noble Friend, or in respect to your Lordships' House, or to the importance of the question which is before us, if I abstain from following my noble Friend at any great length in the arguments by which he supported the proposition that it is right and just to admit the members of the Jewish nation, and of the Jewish persuasion, to legislate for this country. This mention of the Jewish nation reminds me of a portion of my noble Friend's speech, in which he said that he hoped he should not, on the present occasion, hear the argument that the Jews are, by their expectation of a future restoration to their own land, disqualified from acting as citizens, and useful and meritorious citizens of this country. I am not going to say a single word to disparage the Jews either in this or any other country. I admit the undoubtedly high antiquity of their nation. I admit that they have been, and may in some future time again be, the most favoured of all the nations of the world. I admit that, in point of eminent abilities, of natural qualifications, and of talents of various descriptions, they stand as high as any nation in the world; but I am not prepared to deny to them that which I am sure they themselves would be the last to abjure—namely, their nationality, and their character as a nation. Although they are scattered by Divine decree over the whole face of the earth, they retain unbroken the chain of their nationality, and they do look forward to that period when, as a nation, they shall have restored to them their national rights and their national territory. The peculiar position of the Jews was pointed out in the earliest days by their great lawgiver, Moses; for, referring to history, even before his time, he asked, “When it had happened that God had essayed to take a nation from the midst of another nation as he had taken the Israelites out of the land of Egypt.” My Lords, the Jews were in Egypt, they are in England, and in every other country to which the decrees of Divine Providence have driven them, a nation within a nation. No doubt, they submit to the laws, and discharge the duties of citizens. In this country they are entrusted to the highest possible degree with the carrying out of the laws, with functions of trust, and with the administration of justice. That which alone is withheld from them is a voice in making the laws, and that is withheld because those laws are to regulate a Christian community. My Lords, I say that the Jews do look forward to a period when another and a greater exodus shall collect them from all the countries of the world over which they are dispersed, and shall bring them back into their own country, and to the enjoyment of their own privileges. They retain their laws; they retain their peculiar customs. Though among us, they are not of us. They do not generally associate freely with their fellow-subjects; they have interests wholly apart. Between them and us there is an impassable gulf; their most important interests, their highest principles, their greatest views are altogether alien and foreign from ours. It may truly be said of them as was said by a noble and learned Friend behind me (against whom the expression excited considerable obloquy) of another people, that they are “aliens in blood, aliens in religion, and aliens in language.”

My Lords, as I have already said, I shall not enter into many of the arguments by which this question of the admissibility of the Jews has been supported, because, as my noble Friend has truly observed, the subject is one which has in it nothing of novelty, and I am quite confident that I cannot hope to advance anything to convince any of your Lordships which has not been over and over again urged in opposition to measures similar to the present. Most of your Lordships are men of mature age, who have had ample time to consider and reflect upon the views which you entertain upon this subject. It is a matter the principle of which lies in a nutshell, and I can hardly believe that any of your Lordships who have had an opportunity of reflecting upon and deciding the question now before you are likely to alter your views or change your votes in consequence of any eloquence on the part either of my noble Friend opposite or of myself. But there was one argument which was urged to-night—although no great stress was laid upon it by my noble Friend—which I did not expect to hear urged in favour of the introduction of this Bill. I mean the argument that it is the undoubted right of every citizen to enjoy by an indefeasible title all the rights and all the privileges—for my noble Friend, I think, added the word “privileges,” and if he did not he ought to have done so—of citizenship. But in saying that the withholding of any of these rights, the depriving them of, or rather not conferring upon them, any of these privileges, is a remnant of persecution, my noble Friend altogether begged the question as to what are the rights and what are the privileges of citizenship. There are undoubtedly rights which are indefeasibly attached to every citizen of a free country. He has undoubtedly a perfect right to claim security for his person, security for his property, and the free enjoyment of the rites of his religion; and from none of these is the Jew in this country in the slightest degree debarred. But he cannot claim as a right—it is conferred upon him as a privilege—the power of legislating for the community at large—which you do not give to every man, but which you confide to certain individuals selected from the community as properly entitled to exercise these privileges. Certain duties, certain obligations, certain restrictions, have at all times been imposed upon the privilege of sitting and voting in Parliament. Again, I did not expect to hear from my noble Friend that the words of the oath by which the Jews are excluded from sitting and voting in Parliament was a mere accident. If my noble Friend means that the precise terms of the oath, the words “on the true faith of a Christian,” were not directed in the first instance—which, by-the-by, I must remind my noble Friend was long before the time of the House of Hanover, being in the 7th year of the reign of James I.—if he means to say that these words were introduced, not with reference to the Jews, but with reference to the Jesuits, I am perfectly ready to admit that that was the object with which these specific words were inserted. But let us look at the time and the circumstances under which these words were introduced, as my noble Friend says, not against the Jews. Why, for two centuries and a-half previous the Jews were not entitled to live in this country. They were banished from the country in the year 1290, and at the time this Act was passed, in the 7th of James I., they were, and for many years afterwards remained, in that condition of absolute banishment. Why, to talk of introducing an Act of Parliament to prevent persons from sitting and voting in Parliament who could not even enter the kingdom, and to say that because words prohibiting them to sit and vote in Parliament were not directly pointed against the persons who could not enter the country, therefore it was not the intention of the Legislature to exclude them, is as much begging the question as if it were to be said that because in the oath of supremacy we declare that no foreign prince or potentate hath any power, ecclesiastical or spiritual, in this kingdom; therefore, because we do not introduce the word “temporal,” we admit that foreign potentates have temporal jurisdiction in this country. My noble Friend must recollect that even in the time of Cromwell there was presented to the Government a very humble petition on the part of the Jews. It was assigned, I think, by Menasseh Ben Israel, Rabbi of Amsterdam, and prayed they might have their ancient banishment withdrawn, and might be permitted to return to this country. What are the terms of the petition? The first they ask is that the Hebrew nation may be received and admitted into the commonwealth under the countenance and protection of his Highness, as the natives themselves. Then they ask that they may have leave to open public synagogues; that they may be permitted to traffic and import merchandise; and, to the end that their coming in might be of utility to this nation, and that they might live without prejudice to any, they prayed his Highness to appoint persons of quality to receive their passports on their arrival, and to certify their having taken the oath of fealty to the Government. There was a conference on the 7th of December to take the petition into consideration—I take this from the Parliamentary History of England—and further conferences on the 12th, 14th, and 18th of the same month, on which last day the conference broke up without coming to any resolution, or even agreeing to a further adjournment. The authoritative narrative declares that the reason why his Highness did not take any active steps to a settlement of this matter was, that he acted, as in all other matters, with good advice and mature deliberation. But in the following year there was the memorable protest, by Prynne, against even this moderate proposal; and in 1657 appeared the "humble advice and petition," which contained, among other things, the oath which was required to be taken in future by all persons who sat in Parliament. That oath was as follows:—

The Earl of Derby

"I, A B, do, in the presence and in the name of God Almighty, promise and swear that to the utmost of my power in my place I will maintain the true Reformed Protestant religion in the purity thereof as contained in the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, and will encourage the profession and professors of the same."

Let us see what are the terms of that Act, and what was the view taken by the Legislature at that period of the right of the Jew to sit in Parliament; if, indeed, it ever entered into their contemplation that the Jew would claim such a right. Every person taking that oath swore to uphold and maintain the Protestant religion as contained in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, and to support the profession and professors of the same. It may be that the words of the Act of James I., taken literally, were not directed specially to the exclusion of the Jew; but, considering that immediately after the application of the Jews to Cromwell to return to this country and to be permitted to enjoy in it the rights of other citizens, which was not acceded to on the objection raised by Prynne, there came a new declaration of what was to be required of all persons sitting in Parliament, in which was contained a promise to maintain the Protestant religion according to the Old and New Testament. I ask my noble Friend to tell me whether this is not overwhelming evidence that at that time and for many years afterwards it was the deliberate intention of the Legislature to make Christianity a necessary condition of admission to the Legislature? It is quite true that this oath was altered subsequently—indeed, it was altered upon many occasions. I do not know, indeed, that there was any Parliamentary enactment providing that the Jews should not sit in Parliament, for up to a very recent period they were treated as aliens. In 1670, there was a Bill introduced to relieve them from the payment to which, as aliens, they were subjected; but the next year there was so much stir about it, that it was repealed, and the character of aliens was again affixed to them. But when you come to speak of the right of the Jew to sit in Parliament, let me remind you that up to a recent period persons who sat and voted in Parliament were required to hold a landed property qualification, and Jews, at that time, could not hold landed property. My noble and learned Friend behind me (Lord Lyndhurst) will remember that so late as 1846 he supported a Bill introduced by Lord John Russell, to remove doubts which existed as to whether Jews were capable of holding landed property. When, therefore, the Jews were considered to be aliens, and, therefore, disqualified from a seat in Parliament; when they were unable to hold landed property, which was an indispensable qualification for a seat there—is it at all wonderful that there should be no special clause excluding Jews from that from which they were already sufficiently excluded by the circumstances of their case and by the common law? Not only, therefore, in the time of James I. and of Cromwell, but in all succeeding times, their alienism subsisted, their disqualification subsisted, and there have always been words in the Acts of the Legislature, not introduced specially for the purpose, but which practically, and to the knowledge of all men, did exclude the Jews from Parliament. My noble Friend says he is unable to quote any one single instance of a Jew being admitted to sit and vote in Parliament, and he will be equally unable to show me any one single time or period of our history when his so sitting and voting was not repugnant to the law of England. The Test and Corporation Act was passed in 1828. I remember my noble and learned Friend behind me took part in that discussion, and I have the authority of the Lord Chief Justice of England for saying, that the words "On the true faith of a Christian" were retained in that Act for the avowed and express object of continuing the exclusion of the Jews. And yet, in the face of the facts I have mentioned—in the face of this declaration, that in 1828 words were kept in that Act for the avowed object of excluding the Jews from participating in its benefits, am I to be told that the exclusion of the Jews is a mere accident which ought to be permitted to exclude them no longer? I say, so far from it being an accident, it has been the consistent and uninterrupted determination of the Legislature, and that this Bill, if it unhappily receives your lordships' assent, will, for the first time, remove a restriction which has ever been looked upon as part of the constitution of the country. I said I was surprised to hear the argument of accident, and also of the indefeasible right of the Jew to all the privileges of every citizen in the community, because, if that is a sound argument, how happens it, my Lords, that Her Majesty's Government have found it convenient, if not necessary, to continue in this Bill some little spice of what I perceive is called persecution? If it is persecution to say that a man shall not be a Member of Parliament, is it not persecution to say that he shall not be Lord Chancellor? I do not admit that it is persecution, for I think that the Legislature has a perfect right to exercise its discretion and to impose such conditions as it pleases; but if the Government do wish to get rid of what they and some of the petitioners call the last link of bigotry and persecution, I think they have laid by a nice little nest-egg of agitation for the future by imposing this exclusion. I should really be glad to know what was the history—not the public and ostensible, but the private history—of the introduction of these clauses. Perhaps my noble Friend opposite, or some other Member of the Government, will give us the secret history of this retention of the very “last link of persecution” by which the Jews are excluded from certain high offices to which a Parliamentary career can lead. I do not complain of the selection which has been made. There are other offices which certainly might have been inserted in the clause; but besides those from which the Jew is still excluded by this Bill, there are some other offices left open to him for which he may possess peculiar facilities and peculiar advantages. Now, I do not think, on the whole, that I should feel comfortable if a Jew were made Chancellor of the Exchequer. He may very possibly have some natural sympathies which would interfere with a due discharge of the duties of his office. The Chancellor of the Exchequer may be a Jew under this Bill, and very possibly will be. If the hon. Member for the City of London should succeed in obtaining his seat under this Bill, he would make a very efficient, and undoubtedly he would be a very influential Chancellor of the Exchequer. There is one provision in this Bill which I do not understand. It says, that it shall not be lawful for any person of the Jewish religion to advise Her Majesty, the Lord Lieutenant, or the Lords Deputies in any matter concerning the appointment to any office or preferment in the united Churches of England and Ireland. That is very right. But, supposing a Jew, by great

The Earl of Derby

Parliamentary influence and various other means should happen to reach the high distinction of being First Lord of the Treasury, he is debarred from advising Her Majesty as to appointments in the Church; then, I want to know, who is to advise Her Majesty in these circumstances? With respect to benefices, the Archbishop of Canterbury is to present to all which are in the patronage of a Jew holding certain offices. I have such an opinion of the Most rev. Prelate the Archbishop of Canterbury as to believe that he would not be led even by the prospect of so much patronage to give his support to this Bill. But, supposing it is intended by the Bill that the Archbishop of Canterbury is to appoint the Bishops, or to fill up vacant benefices, or to advise the Crown in such cases, at all events he cannot give advice as to who shall be his own successor after his decease. No Jew can advise Her Majesty as to appointments in the Church; but who, I again ask, is to be the adviser in such circumstances—for according to the constitution, Her Majesty cannot act without responsible advisers? I should really very much like to know what was the object and purport of the introduction of these clauses. My Lords, this was not a very long entertained proposition on the part of the Government, nor was it the result of very long deliberation, because, if I am not much mistaken, in the course of the discussions in Committee in the other House the absurdity of Jews exercising ecclesiastical patronage and holding certain offices was brought under the notice of the Government, and they were asked if they would consent to the introduction of a clause of this kind; on which the noble Viscount at the head of the Government, in that off-hand way which distinguishes him, said, “this is not a Bill of pains and penalties or of exclusion from offices; this is a liberal measure for striking off the last rag of intolerance, and putting an end for ever to those disgraceful restrictions which have hitherto existed; therefore I will have no such clause introduced into the Bill.” Well, some forty-eight hours or thereabouts elapse, and one day at the end of the week the First Lord of the Treasury comes down, and says, with reference to this well-considered measure—which had been announced almost on the first day of the Session, and of which on the second reading and in Committee Government had declared it should tolerate no exclusions or restrictions—he comes down and states that after consideration it was intended to introduce a clause imposing those very restrictions which had been previously denounced. Now, my Lords, I say that in a question of this kind that is not the mode in which the Government of this country should demean itself. That is not the way to impress on Parliament and the country a high idea of the capacity of the Government. It is trifling with a great question; it is playing fast and loose, and laying Government open to the suspicion of having consented to this alteration for the purpose of gaining some ulterior purpose. My Lords, I believe that a deputation of Roman Catholic gentlemen intimated to the First Lord of the Treasury, that they felt aggrieved at the idea of having to take an oath different from that of other Members of Parliament, and one which they construed in a manner offensive to their feelings. I am sorry they should think so. They prayed that one oath should be prescribed for all classes of Her Majesty's subjects, irrespective of all religious considerations whatever; and that they should not be required to take a separate oath which placed them in a more unfavourable position than the Jews. I must say, I do not think that to be an unreasonable proposition. I should be sorry to place the Roman Catholics on the same level with the Jews. We are closely connected and identified with the Roman Catholics in regard to all the high interests and principles of our religion; and although we make a distinction between them and ourselves, in order to guard against certain dangers which we apprehend may arise from some of the principles they hold, in all the great truths of our religion, in the great leading principles of Christianity, we and the Roman Catholics are at one. We agree as to the Divine origin of our religion, and as to the authority of the founder of that religion there is no difference between us. As regards the moral doctrines inculcated in the New Testament—which, no doubt, are an extension of the principles laid down in the Old—we are at one, and therefore we have a common faith, common principles, and a common morality, all sanctioned by a common authority. But if the Jew maintain the same moral duties with ourselves, he renounces the principles, the motives, and the authority by which those duties are enforced by our common Christianity; and he therefore stands in a very different and much more alienated position than the separate communities of the Catholic body at large stand in respect to each other. I am not prepared, then, to say that because I can admit into our Christian Legislature all denominations of Christians—placing certain restrictions on Roman Catholics in respect to points where their hostility might be apprehended—I am therefore compelled by analogy, and as a necessary consequence, to put all those who do not profess Christianity on the same footing. My noble Friend alluded to the argument that this Bill, if carried, would have the effect of unchristianizing the Legislature, and he said he hoped we would not deal in generalities, but would state distinctly what we meant by unchristianizing the Legislature. I do not recollect having used that word; but, at the same time, I think I understand the meaning of it. I do not understand by it that the introduction of two or three Jews into Parliament would make the remainder of the Legislature less Christian than it had hitherto been. I will not say that the influence, even, of those Jews would have any injurious effect; but I will not be so certain on that point. I give every credit to the Jews for possessing all the qualities necessary to render them good citizens and loyal subjects. I cannot, however, forbear mentioning a remarkable circumstance, in which the peculiar principles of the Jews operated in a somewhat extraordinary and peculiar manner. I recollect that some years ago there was a public subscription raised in favour of some case of general distress, the nature of which I do not at this moment recollect. A general programme was prepared to be sent forth, in which there was an appeal—an appeal never lost on a Christian country—to the Christian sympathies of the people. A Jew, however, said, I object to the word “Christian” in that appeal—strike it out, for it is not merely Christian sympathy you wish to call forth, and Jews cannot respond to that word; do not, therefore, offend us by putting that into your programme, seeing we disclaim what you call Christian sympathy. In consequence of that remonstrance of a Jew, the appeal to the Christian sympathy of the country was struck out of the programme—the liberality of the Jew was accepted—but it was at the expense of those words. Now, I say the same thing might occur in the House of Commons,—nay, I may say it would occur there every day, in reference to the commencement of their proceedings by prayer in the name of the Saviour of the world, for no Jew can join in offering up that prayer. I do not know whether it is intended that the Jew should take a seat in this House—if it be so intended, his religious scruples would be much more severely tried. But, my Lords, I was proceeding to say in what sense the Legislature might be considered unchristianized by the admission of Jews to Parliament. The sense in which I understand that word is this—that by that admission you take from the Legislature that which it has had in all times—namely, the character of an exclusively Christian body. You will disclaim on the part of the Legislature any connection with the religion of the country. In this Bill you call on the Legislature to do that in the most emphatic way by striking out words that give solemnity to the oath in the minds of all Christians—namely, that they make this declaration and promise without any mental reservation, and that on the true faith of a Christian. By striking out those words you take away from the Legislature its profession of Christianity by an act of legislation, and that is what I call unchristianizing the Legislature. The noble Earl has said, what has been often said before, that you exclude the sincere and conscientious Jew, but admit persons of all religious persuasions or of no religious persuasion. Undoubtedly, if a man chooses to forswear himself, the Legislature can do nothing to prevent it. We cannot look into the heart and mind of a man. All we can do is to say that this is a Christian country, and that its Legislature shall bear the impress of Christianity—that no man shall be entitled to legislate for us and take a part in ruling over us who does not, at all events, profess himself a believer in Christianity. Further than that human legislation cannot go, nor would it be wise to go further if it could. But if it is a right and wise thing to introduce Jews to Parliament, is it essential to that object that the conscience of Christians should be offended by excluding from the oath to be taken by them words of such solemn import and such deep and sacred obligation as these—“on the true faith of a Christian.” Why strike out those words for the relief of the Jew when you have it equally in your power to meet the case—if you desire to meet it fairly and honestly—by permitting the oath to be taken in its present form by all persons who desire so to take it, and that the Jews be exempted from using the words “on the true faith of a Christian”? That, my Lords, was the course that was pursued with regard to the Quakers and the Moravians, who were unwilling to take any oath. Exceptions were made in their favour by allowing them to make solemn affirmations in lieu of oaths. If the Jews were to claim a similar dispensation from words which to them appear to be offensive, they might undoubtedly claim to be admitted by virtue of a special clause in their favour, permitting them to take oaths in a manner which they might deem to be binding upon their consciences. But that course would not have answered the purpose of Her Majesty’s Government. It would have given them an opportunity of settling the question which they now say is the primary object they have in view; the oaths would have been separately considered by this House, and the Bill would have been sent down to the other House amended according to your Lordships’ views, and it would then have been for the House of Commons to decide whether they would consent to the amended oath which all were willing to adopt, or whether they would prefer an indefinite postponement of any Amendment on the oath until they could force the House of Lords to accept a proposition which a majority of your Lordships feel to be opposed to your conscientious opinions. Her Majesty’s Government have chosen to take a course which they, no doubt, knew would be embarrassing to some hesitating, undecided Members of this House. They have attached a condition the objections to which are all but insuperable to that alteration in the oath which all of your Lordships agree to be desirable. I need not remind your Lordships that in the last Session of the late Parliament, after the Jew Bill had been rejected by this House, I took the liberty of introducing a Bill to amend the oath, in which undoubtedly the particular words in question would have been retained, but which would have got rid of all the objectionable and obsolete portions of the oath, which my noble Friend seems to think not only ludicrous, but blasphemous. However, I was told that to send down that Bill to the House of Commons would be only inviting a renewal of the conflict upon the Jew question which had been already decided, and that that House would not agree to an amendment of the oath, which all admit to be desirable, unless it was coupled with a condition which your Lordships had several times declared your inability to accept. However, this year we have this Bill, and I confess I approve it so far as it relates to the amendment of the oath that I would have been content to have assented to the second reading and to have dealt with the secondary and collateral question of the Jews by moving for the reinstatement of these words by way of Amendment in Committee. But what has taken place? The addition of the words "on the true faith of a Christian" has already been proposed in the House of Commons, and the proposition has been rejected by that House by a large majority. Thus they have debarred us from taking a course which might have reconciled us to this Bill. They have rejected an Amendment which alone would enable us to concur with them in the passing of this Bill. I have, however, been somewhat diverted from the history of this clause. I am told that a deputation of Roman Catholic noblemen and gentlemen waited on the First Lord of the Treasury to state their objections to the present oath; and what is the answer which the noble Viscount is reported to have made? I am told that he said, of his own part he had not the slightest objection to any alteration; that he did not wish to retain any restrictions on the oath; that he did not see much merit in the present oath; but that there were some gentlemen with ultra-Protestant views in the House of Commons strongly attached to the Established Church; and that if any Amendment such as the deputation required should be made it would increase the difficulty of passing the Bill; therefore, he was very sorry he could not yield to the wishes of the Roman Catholic gentlemen. But the noble Viscount added that, although he could not place the Roman Catholics in a better position, he would willingly consent to place the Jews in a worse. [The Duke of NORFOLK: No, no!] I do not mean to say that statement was actually made to the deputation, but it was the line of argument adopted by the noble Viscount. The noble Duke was present and I am happy to have him here to confirm the truth of my statement. The noble Viscount said that he had no objection to alter the Roman Catholic oath, but that would give rise to inconvenient opposition in the House of Commons. I appeal to the noble Duke who headed the deputation whether such was not the case? [The Duke of NORFOLK: Something very like that.] Now, I appeal to your Lordships whether that is very statesmanlike conduct — whether it indicates any fixed opinions on the part of the head of the Government, who not many months ago went to the country as the exclusive protector of Protestantism? I do not say I have given the exact language of the noble Viscount, but the result of the deputation was that the Roman Catholics did not get what they asked, and the Jews did get what they did not ask for, — namely, a clause disqualifying them from filling certain offices, and perpetuating what the noble Viscount indignantly denounced as the last remnant of religious intolerance. That, my Lords, is the history of this clause. If Her Majesty's Government had been really desirous of settling this question, they might have amended the oath in a manner perfectly unobjectionable; they might have retained for all Christian legislators these words of solemn significance, and they would then have avoided shocking the consciences of a large portion of the religious community, and they might have submitted openly and avowedly the question of whether an exceptional oath should be made to enable Jews to sit in Parliament. That would have settled the question as to the oath, and it would have left the question as to the Jews perfectly open; but, instead of that, we are told that we shall not amend what we are all willing to amend, unless we will also agree to that which to many of your Lordships is most objectionable. My noble Friend (Earl Granville) said he hoped he should not hear used this evening the argument that this was a favourable opportunity for asserting the independence of your Lordships' House—to assert what he styled a fictitious independence. [Earl GRANVILLE was understood to deny having used the expression.] If the noble Earl retracts the expression I shall say nothing more about it; but he did express a hope that this would not be deemed an opportunity for the assertion of the independence of this House. Now, my Lords, I hope that upon this and upon all occasions the House of Lords, upon matters where principle is involved, will assert their independence. If I do not state at greater length my reasons for objecting to the admission of Jews to the Legislature of this country, it is because I believe your Lordships have fully made up your minds upon the subject. It is a question of principle—not of expediency. It is a question not determinable or to be influenced by the operation of temporary causes or changing circumstances; it is a question upon which we must act from principle, apart from all extraneous circumstances, and it is a question upon which I believe the majority of your Lordships have made up your minds long ago. I do not deny that there are times (and when they do occur they are much to be regretted) when the Legislature of this country may be disposed to sacrifice their own firm convictions, when great and fatal danger would attend an unflinching adherence to those convictions. That principle has been acted upon in former times, and it has guided the conduct of some of our most eminent statesmen, and among them the late Sir Robert Peel and the illustrious Duke of Wellington. I admit there are cases in which a sense of justice and right has been overborne by apprehended dangers from a persistence in our convictions; when there has been danger of collision between the two Houses of Parliament—of universal anarchy—of internal commotion likely to ensue upon a determined adherence to our own opinion, then we have yielded. That feeling influenced the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel upon the occasion of the Roman Catholic Relief Bill, when they acted, not according to what they considered to be right, but in consequence of the formidable dangers with which the country was threatened had a different course been pursued. I say the same thing of your Lordships in the case of the Reform Bill, and of a large portion of your Lordships upon the question of the abolition of the Corn Laws. Upon those occasions your Lordships gave up your opinions, which you considered to be abstractedly right, in consequence of the formidable dangers which were threatened by your persisting in acting upon them. But I venture to ask your Lordships what is the formidable danger or inconvenience which my noble Friend expects will follow upon a persistence of this House in their repeatedly expressed views upon this question. [Earl GRANVILLE intimated that he had not referred to any such danger or inconvenience.] I thank my noble Friend for the admission that in case we should persist in the course adopted by a majority of your Lordships on former occasions there will be no danger of a collision with the other House, no disturbance of the public peace, no political or social conflict. The noble Earl said he hoped he should not hear the argument used that opposition to the measure would vindicate the independence of the House. He will not hear that argument from me, but I do say that the absence of any of those causes of hesitation, doubt, or difficulty to which I have referred will prevent us from being called upon to sacrifice our own convictions for the sake of avoiding possible public inconvenience. I repeat I believe your Lordships have long ago made up your minds upon this subject. I hope you will pursue the same course as on former occasions, and that you will adhere to your determination to maintain and uphold the Christian character of a Christian country, and I trust your Lordships will not be led even by the bait which is held out of the alteration of an objectionable oath to accept that which the Government has attached to it as a screw upon your Lordships' consciences; but that, regretting that the Government should have conjoined the two matters so closely that you cannot accept one without the other, your Lordships will reject the compromise and combination, and, as you cannot concur in what the House of Commons insists upon including in the Bill, you will not sanction even that which intrinsically you approve, but which you cannot separate in this measure from the other subject. I regret having detained your Lordships longer than I could have wished. I have only expressed my own opinions, and the opinions of a large body of those with whom I have the honour of acting; but upon the grounds which I have stated I now venture to move that this Bill be read a second time this day six months.

The Earl of Derby

The Earl of Derby

Amendment moved to leave out ("now") and insert ("this day six months").

THE LORD CHANCELLOR having proposed the Question,

LORD LYNDEHURST: My Lords: I could have wished that some other noble Lord should have followed my noble Friend who has just sat down, but I felt, and I feel at this moment, that unless I were to avail myself of this early opportunity of offering my opinion on this subject—which I deem myself bound to do—I might not be able to address you at a later period of the night. My Lords, no one can admire more sincerely than I do the eloquence of my noble Friend; and if beautiful and felicitous language, sprightly sallies of wit, and splendid declamation can determine a question of this kind, then I feel satisfied that we have no chance of reading this Bill a second time. But I have been so long familiar with your Lordships' House, I know its mode of proceeding so well, that I entertain no apprehension whatever of the question being decided on any such ground. I have, while my noble Friend was addressing your Lordships, been considering what course it would best become me to pursue; and, from the confidence I place in your judgment, your independence of thought, and impartiality,—above all, from the confidence I place in the soundness of the principle on which this Bill is founded—I think that I cannot do better than point out distinctly and precisely the facts of this case, upon which so much of the question now at issue depends, and to advert to the arguments which are relied on on the one side and on the other, and among others, to the arguments that have just been urged by my noble Friend. The facts of the case may be stated in a very short time, and in very few words. In the first instance, I must refer to the period of the Revolution of 1688. When that event was accomplished, by which our constitution was settled, it was determined, at the very commencement of the reign of King William III., to revise the oaths now under consideration. The oaths in existence at that time were the oath of allegiance, which was most cumbrous in its form, and the oath of supremacy. This oath of allegiance was originally adopted in the reign of James I., and it contained, for the first time, the words referred to by my noble Friend—namely, “without equivocation, and upon the true faith of a Christian.” This oath, however, after much careful deliberation, was directly and distinctly repealed, every part of it was abolished, and in lieu of it the simple oath of allegiance, in the concise form in which we now have to take it, was introduced. So much as to the form of the oath of allegiance then adopted. I now come to the other remaining oath—namely, the oath of supremacy. This oath at that period consisted of two parts—the one affirmative, the other negative. The affirmative part asserted the supremacy of the Crown—the negative part asserted that no foreign prince, prelate, or potentate has, or ought to have, any jurisdiction, spiritual or temporal, within this realm. The Parliament of that day abrogated the former portion of the oath, and retained only the latter. Therefore, during the whole of the reign of William III., the only oaths required to be taken were the simple oath of allegiance, which we now take, and the oath of supremacy, which we also now take. In addition to these oaths, it was deemed important at that time that a re-settlement of the Crown should be made; and, accordingly, in the first year of William III., the Crown was again settled by Act of Parliament. But, my Lords, no oath was imposed to confirm or support that settlement. The great men of that day did not think it requisite to do so. Thus matters proceeded until the 12th year of the reign of William III., when another change took place. In consequence of the death of Queen Mary, and in consequence, also, of the death of the Duke of Gloucester, a new settlement of the Crown became necessary. The Crown was then settled by Act of Parliament upon the Electress Dowager of Hanover and the heirs of her body, being Protestants. This, in substance, was the settlement of the Crown which now exists. No oath, however, was required by the Legislature of that day to confirm this settlement. Therefore the only two oaths which had to be taken during the first twelve years of the reign of William III.—your Lordships will see the bearing of this presently—were the short oath of allegiance, and the negative oath of supremacy. Now, what happened in the last year of the reign of King William? The death of James II. then occurred, and his son assumed the title of King of England. He was supported in that character by the French Monarch, he was proclaimed in France as King of England, and steps were taken to enforce that claim. Then it was, my Lords, that this oath of abjuration—the subject of our present discussion—was introduced. It was designed to meet that contingency—to guard against that danger—and to uphold the Crown of Great Britain against the combination between France and the descendants of James II. This oath of abjuration, with the other oaths imposed in the reign of King William, has come down to our times. But the objects of this oath have long ceased—the descendants of the Pretender have long been extinct. What, then, is the course which every man of common sense would expect under these circumstances to be pursued? Simply to repeal the oath that had been framed for a particular purpose, and the utility of which is now at an end. And the effect of this would be to leave only two oaths, as in the reign of William III.,—namely, the oaths of allegiance and supremacy. That is the natural and rational course to take—to repeal the enactments passed for a special purpose now that that purpose has been fully accomplished, and then to leave the oaths as they previously stood. That, my lords, is the whole matter in dispute. By this Bill the oath of allegiance and the oath of supremacy, as they were framed in the time of William III., are re-enacted. But there is one addition made to these two oaths to which I beg your attention—an addition which did not exist in the reign of William III.; and it is this—an oath confirming the succession of the Crown. If I were asked whether I thought such an oath to be necessary, I should answer in the negative. If it was not held to be necessary in the comparatively troublous times of William III., how can it be necessary in the tranquil days in which we live? But in deference to the opinions of some persons this oath has been added to the others, and the whole have been combined into one form. What possible object can there be in such a proceeding? What is the difference between our position and the position of the country in the reign of William III. that an additional oath should be called for? But it is said that we are taking away something from these oaths. I deny that we are taking anything away. Why should the words “without equivocation” and “upon the true faith of a Christian” be added? For what purpose were they originally introduced? They were introduced, as everybody knows, to meet a particular contingency, in consequence of the conduct of the Roman Catholics at that time; they were introduced in consequence of the discovery of some correspondence under the hand of Garnet the Jesuit, who was concerned in treasonable plots, because it was believed they would be binding upon Roman Catholics. Why, then, is it wished to add these words to the oath now proposed? They were formerly inserted with a particular object. Do you wish to insert them in this oath in order to carry out that object? Why, that object no longer exists, for Roman Catholics are not required to take the oath. They have an oath peculiar to themselves, from which these words are omitted. This is not a question of omitting words; it is a question of inserting words; and I say it is a folly to insert words which have no application to the present time. It may, however, be said, “We wish to insert these words for the purpose of excluding Jews from Parliament.” Well, is it proper that Jews should be excluded from Parliament? Let us consider what position Jews occupy. It has been said that Jews are aliens. I assert that under the law they are not aliens. I say, that to call them aliens is contrary to the law of England. Undoubtedly those Jews who came over with Charles II. in 1660 were aliens. They were born abroad, and probably all the Jews in this country in the reign of Charles II. were aliens; but can it be maintained that under our law any Jew born in England is an alien? It is equally untrue to say, that Jews cannot hold real property in England. My Lords, in consequence of some doubts having arisen on these points many years ago, a case was stated and laid before Lord Talbot, one of the most distinguished lawyers of his time, and it was put to him distinctly whether or not the Jews were aliens. The answer was distinct, uniform, and precise—that they were not aliens, that there was no pretence for treating them as aliens, but that they were entitled to hold land and to enjoy equal rights and liberties with all other of Her Majesty’s natural born subjects. If, then, although they are natural born subjects of this realm, you exclude them from the privileges of natural born subjects, you pursue an improper and unconstitutional course. You ought to exclude them by Act of Parliament. Introduce a Bill for the purpose. It is the right of a natural born subject to have his case considered by both Houses of Parliament and by his Sovereign, and unless he is excluded from privileges by their joint voices, he has the same rights as any other natural born subject. What are you now doing? You are endeavouring to deprive the Jews of their rights by a side wind—by the voice of one branch of the Legislature only, and that not the representative—or, at least, not the direct representative—of the people. I say, my Lords, this is an unconstitutional course of proceeding, and one which cannot be justified. I am not merely expressing my own opinion upon this subject. When a question as to the construction of this oath was brought under the consideration of the Court of Exchequer, two of the most learned Judges of that Court—one of them now no more, but who was equally distinguished for his acquaintance with every branch of science and for his profound legal knowledge and erudition (the late Baron Alderson)—stated distinctly, that if the Jews were to be excluded from Parliament they ought not to be excluded by a side wind, but by a direct Act of the Legislature. In what position, then, do we stand? What objection is there to the admission of Jews to Parliament? I cannot understand upon what ground your Lordships would be justified in inserting the words “upon the true faith of a Christian.” You cannot insert them with the view of providing any security against Catholics. You cannot insert them with the view of excluding natural born subjects—the Jews—from sitting in Parliament, for you have constitutionally no right to do so. If you wish to exclude the Jews—I repeat it again—exclude them by a direct Act of Legislation. Unless you do so you cannot, according to law and constitutional principles, effect that object. It is said, that the Jews were constructively excluded from Parliament in former times; but I do not believe they were ever considered. My noble Friend says, however, “If it had not been supposed that they were excluded, they would have been excluded.” The argument then comes to this—you did not exclude them by law; if you had thought of it, you would have excluded them; and you would consider them excluded, although, in fact, you never have excluded them. My Lords, I think most of the arguments on the other side are answered by a correct statement of the facts, which in my view are conclusive. I remember that a noble Friend of mine who generally sits on the cross bench, but whom I do not now see in his place (Earl Stanhope), started an argument which has been repeated by the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) to-night, and said, “You will unchristianize the Legislature, if you do not retain these words in the oath.” I would ask my noble Friends to consider the opinions of the great men of the reign of William III. by whom the Revolution was effected, and to whom I have referred. It is said, that by striking out the words “without equivocation” and “on the true faith of a Christian,” you will unchristianize the Legislature. I ask my noble Friend what reception he supposes such an argument would have met with from Lord Somers, from Lord Halifax, or any of the other great men of that day? Would they not have turned their backs upon a conception so weak and so ridiculous? It is said that, by striking out the words “on the true faith of a Christian,” we are unchristianizing Parliament; but was the Parliament of William III., during whose reign these words were omitted from the oath, less a Christian Parliament than the Parliament of the succeeding reign, which was influenced and directed by Lord Bolingbroke, a professed disbeliever in Christianity? But, my Lords, when you talk of these words being so essential to keeping up the Christian character of the Legislature, let me go a little further. Let me ask, was the Parliament in the reign of William III. less Christian than the corrupt Parliament of the reign of Charles II., under a profligate King and a base and corrupt Ministry? Was the Parliament of James I.—when the oath was first introduced and these words were originally inserted—a more Christian Parliament than the Parliaments in the long and splendid reign of Elizabeth and in the brief reign of Edward VI.? Now, when you come to consider the view of the case to which I have just adverted, you cannot fail, I am sure, to regard it in the light of a mere mockery, and as having been resorted to by the opponents of the Bill in a moment of exigency, in order that they might have something wearing an air of plausibility to urge in support of their opinions. My noble Friend has also touched, although somewhat lightly, upon another argument, to which, with your Lordships’ permission, I shall now proceed to address myself. By whom that argument was originally advanced I do not recollect, but it is to the effect that, if you admit Jews into Parliament, you will unchristianize the Legislature. There would, it is urged, be an inconsistency between the designation of a Christian Parliament and the admission of Jews to membership in such an assembly. Now, let us for one moment analyze that argument, and see whether it is worth anything. What, let me ask, is the meaning of calling Parliament a Christian Legislature? It is, I suppose, designated by that appellation, because it represents a Christian country. But what is the country itself? Does it consist wholly of a Christian population or not? It does not, inasmuch as the Jews form an essential part of that population. Are they not British subjects? Now, if this nation is composed of Jews as well as of Christians—the latter being, I admit, largely in the majority—what inconsistency is there in having a Legislature in which Jewish and Christian members may hold seats in a similar proportion as that which I have indicated as subsisting between them as members of one community? Jews have a voice in the return of Members of Parliament; what inconsistency, I repeat, is there in maintaining that the representative should, in the same degree, reflect the character of the constituent body? But this is not all. Are not your courts of justice Christian? Are not your municipal corporations Christian? Is either the one or the other, let me ask, to be looked upon as the less Christian, because members of the Jewish persuasion are admitted to a share in the functions which they exercise? A Christian tribunal may be presided over by a member of the Jewish persuasion. The Christian corporation of this great metropolis has, in fact, had a Jew at its head—a gentleman distinguished for his character and for the admirable manner in which the duties of his high office have been performed. We have been warned, my Lords, how we play fast and loose with principles. But if this be the principle for which my noble Friend contends, that, although Jews may fairly be admitted to discharge the civil functions, yet that they must not be allowed to form part of a Christian Legislature—if that be his principle, let me beg your Lordships to consider how it has hitherto been carried into effect. A case which involves a great principle is one in which my noble Friend cannot be permitted to play “fast and loose.” What has been the course pursued in reference to the maintenance of my noble Friend’s principle since I have been in Parliament? The constitution of Canada has within that period undergone alteration. We have assisted in framing the new constitution. Was that a work which was carelessly executed? On the contrary, the Legislature of Canada was one which was constructed with due deliberation. Were any of the right rev. Prelates present in this House during the debates upon the subject? Many of them were—they were necessarily present, because questions arose in which the separate interests of Protestants and Roman Catholics were involved. Did they—did we, my Lords—seek upon that occasion to enact that from a seat in the Canadian Legislature Jews should be excluded? No; and yet is not the Legislature of Canada as much a Christian Legislature as the Parliament of this country? I have been told by a friend of mine that a member of the Jewish persuasion sat in the Legislature of Canada for many years, and that that gentleman was distinguished for his high character, extensive attainments, and great general information. How are these facts to be reconciled with the views of which my noble Friend is to-night the advocate? But it may be said that it was by an oversight that we omitted to make provision against the admission of the Jews into the Legislature of Canada. That statement will not avail my noble Friend. Let us look to Australia. Is not that a Christian country as much as any other portion of the dominions of England? If so, are we to set less value upon the existence of Christianity in one part of this great empire than in another? We framed a constitution for Australia, and upon that occasion nobody came forward to say, “Oh, you must not allow Jews to sit in the legislative assembly of Australia.” Nobody ventured to make any such proposition. My noble Friend has waited for the introduction of a measure such as that under our notice, to urge upon your Lordships the adoption of the principle for which he so zealously contends. But I may go further. I may allude to New Zealand, to the Cape of Good Hope, with respect to both of which colonies a course similar to that which I have just been describing was adopted. No attempt was made to exclude Jews from a seat in the Legislature of those countries. It may be said, “Oh, we could not have provided for their exclusion. Parliament would not have consented to such a proposal.” Well, if you, the opponents of the present Bill, make that admission, does it not furnish one of the strongest arguments against the course which you are now pursuing which it is possible to advance? You dared not venture to propose a clause in any of those instances which I have mentioned to effect that boldly and broadly the accomplishment of which has been effected in this country by a side wind, through the medium of an oath, which you seek for that reason to uphold. There is another topic in connection with this question which has been introduced by a learned Friend of mine elsewhere, and which has been adopted by my noble Friend, to which I wish briefly to advert. The proposition which it embodies was, it appears, received with loud cheers, and it is as follows. Alluding to the object which the authors of this Bill desire to promote, the learned Gentleman to whom I refer said,—“This is not a question of religious liberty, it is a question of power.” Now, my Lords, let us analyze that proposition, and see what it means. What is the meaning of the term “religious liberty” in the sense in which my hon. and learned Friend used those words? It means nothing more than religious toleration. But will any man tell me now-a-days that is the full and true interpretation of the phrase? Has not the doctrine which would attach to it simply that meaning been long since exploded? Religious liberty, as the term is now understood, means that no man’s religious opinions, unless they happen to be fraught with danger to the State, or some other paramount cause, ought to affect his right to eligibility to fill any civil office. That I conceive to be the true doctrine, and that doctrine involves the question of power, so that my hon. and learned Friend, able and upright as he is, has, I think, taken a somewhat erroneous view upon the subject. I may now remind my noble and learned Friend on the woolsack that he two years ago introduced a Bill, the object of which was to strike out of the Statute-book several penal enactments upon the subject of religion. The preamble of that Bill set forth in the most distinct terms the doctrine which I have just submitted to your Lordships’ consideration. It was read a second time, and no objection whatever was urged against it. It did not, however, pass into a law, because, in consequence of the great prolixity of its details, it was deemed advisable to refer it, not to a Select Committee, but to a tribunal of an entirely different character—I mean the Statute Law Commission, a body composed of men of the highest legal attainments, by whom some of its enacting clauses were amended. They, however, returned the Bill with its preamble unaltered. I have another case, infinitely stronger—a case in which the Government, the country, and the Parliament concurred in establishing the principle which I have stated, and which will be fresh in the recollection of my noble Friend, the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Aberdeen). It is well known that at one time Christians were not allowed to hold office in the Turkish dominions. Our Ministers argued with the Government of Turkey, and stated to them what was the true principle of religious freedom. The Turkish Government yielded to these arguments, and pronounced a decree—the celebrated hatti sheriff—putting Christians precisely upon the same footing as Turks with respect to all civil offices. That measure was not only sanctioned by our Government, but was approved by Parliament, and I will undertake to say was regarded with satisfaction by the whole country. Can there be a stronger sanction of a great principle than that approval. If we lay down particular rules to foreign States, especially to States imperial in power, and if they find that we do not act upon the same principles ourselves, but allow our prejudices or our interests to interfere, they will lose all their respect for us and stamp our conduct with their disapprobation. Again, nobody now pretends to say that Jews are not in point of information and intellectual power upon a footing of perfect equality with their Christian fellow-countrymen. We have put them upon their trial. During the last thirty years they have acted as magistrates and members of municipal councils, and they have not been found wanting. It is said, however, that such is not the best school in which to train and form those who are to do the work of legislation. Nevertheless, it is by acting as magistrates and members of municipal councils that a large proportion of the national representatives acquire that knowledge and experience which fit them for the discharge of their Parliamentary duties. The question has been asked, how could a member of the Jewish persuasion speak or vote in Parliament upon religious questions? I answer, in the first place, that, of course, he would not interfere in any question of doctrine; but I can give a much more complete and satisfactory reply. When the Roman Catholic Relief Bill was before Parliament it was urged with much ability and some degree of force that the Roman Catholics were hostile to our Church, regarding us as the wrongful possessors of their property; that it was a passion with them to make proselytes, and that they professed allegiance to a foreign Sovereign, who might at any time declare war against England. These were weighty arguments, and I recollect the impression they made, having myself taken part in the discussion; but what was the result? We all felt that there might be some inconvenience and even danger in the course recommended to us, but we said that the great principle of reason and of justice ought to triumph, and accordingly it did triumph, the Bill was passed, and those evils that were anticipated turn out now to have been greatly exaggerated. That was the case with respect to the Roman Catholic Church. What is the case with respect to the Jews? They have no hostility to us or to our religion; they do not desire to make converts; they always treat our religion with respect, they owe no allegiance to any foreign Sovereign, they have always been peaceable and loyal subjects. My Lords, there are several other points to which I intended to advert, but I am afraid I cannot proceed any further. My strength is exhausted; I cannot bear the fatigue any longer. It is twenty-five years since a measure similar to the present—at least, similar in its tendencies—was introduced in a speech of great ability by a late learned Friend of mine, upon whom, my Lords, I passed some words of eulogium when addressing your Lordships on this subject during the late Parliament. Those words I will not now repeat—I will content myself with saying that there never was a sincerer Christian or a man of sounder judgment. In successive Sessions of Parliament and in successive Parliaments the measure has been brought forward and carried by large majorities. I find among those majorities men of all parties and of high attainments, statesmen of the first character, philosophers, and men of profound learning—men whose example is worthy of all imitation. During the late elections the subject was presented to the different constituencies of the country, and in the metropolis itself, the chief seat of the Government, a member of the Jewish persuasion was returned, for the third or fourth time, by a majority larger than that which polled for a noble Lord who had fought the battle of religious freedom, and had long deserved well of the country. I do not suppose that the noble Lord objected to the circumstance, but, on the contrary, regarded it as a mark of the strength of the feeling which the constituency of London entertained upon this important subject. When the present Bill was brought before the new House of Commons, it received the support of a majority nearly double that by which it was carried upon any former occasion. Now, my Lords, I think that these facts are not to be disregarded or lightly considered. I have sometimes ventured to state my opinion as to the relative duties of the two Houses of Parliament, the one representing the great mass of the constituencies, the other not representing the people, but rather what may be termed the Conservative influences of the constitution. My Lords, I have always considered the duty of this House to be to mature all plans of sound legislation—to serve as a check against the rash, hasty, and unwise proceedings of the other House, and to give time for consideration, and even for the abandonment of improper measures. I have never thought, however, that this House ought to be a perpetual barrier against sound and progressive legislation. No wise or prudent man can approve such a course. It must lead to a conflict with the other House, and in that conflict, unless we are supported by a great majority of the people, we must succumb. It is with great submission that I have ventured to make these observations. I hope that in doing so, I have not said anything inconsistent with the respect which I feel for your Lordships. I have been now for more than thirty years a Member of this House. I have taken an active part in all those measures which have been brought forward during that time for the purpose of extending the principle of religious freedom. I have myself been the originator of some of them, and I hope I may be allowed to say, that I feel a just pride in the course I have taken. My Lords, we have now arrived at the last stage in our progress towards full and perfect religious liberty. Let us not halt in our career. Let us not lag behind, on this subject, the other Protestant States of Europe. Let us maintain our old position in the van of the nations, and let us now make our last and crowning effort in the great cause of civil and religious liberty.

Lord Lyndhurst

Lord Lyndhurst

Lord Lyndhurst

THE EARL OF WINCHILSEA: My Lords, in 1829 we abandoned the Protestant character of our constitution; but I did not think I should live to see the day when it should be proposed to banish Christianity from the Legislature. If this Bill had merely contemplated the abolition of obsolete portions of an oath, I should have given it my cordial support. I regard it, however, as a side wind by which to remove from the Statute-book that Christian oath which no man can enter this Christian Legislature without taking, for it proposes to admit to it Jews, who deny the authenticity of the New Testament, who look upon our religion as an empty pageant, and upon its Divine author as a base impostor, and I must therefore give it my most decided and uncompromising opposition. Christianity is the great protection of the throne and of the laws of this country, and God grant that, by the firmness of your Lordships, it may long continue so. Towards the Jews I entertain a Christian feeling, and if any remaining disabilities were to be removed—if they were at all impeded in the enjoyment of their religious liberty or in the possession of their property, I would vote for the removal of all such restrictions; but, my Lords, I consider that the Jews have had conceded to them every civil privilege which they are entitled to ask. The Legislature has only stopped short in concession when the Jews have sought to enter Parliament, because your Lordships have declared the perfect absurdity of admitting men to frame laws who deny the very foundation of them. This is not merely a civil question—it exceeds in the deep religious interest involved in it any other question that has ever come before your Lordships. If your Lordships pass this measure, which is opposed to the deeply-seated feelings of the people of this country, beware how you court that heavy judgment which has befallen the Jews. Although 1900 years have nearly elapsed, the Jews still stand out as a living monument of the Divine wrath. From the moment that you banish Christianity from the Legislature, you may not unreasonably date the decline of England's prosperity; for prosperity does not depend on the acts of great and leading men in the country, but upon the mercy of the Divine Disposer of Events. There is much, my Lords, to make us apprehensive with respect to our prosperity as a nation. In the East events are lowering, and those colonies which were once an element of strength to us may become an element of discord. I trust that your Lordships will stand between the Lower House of Parliament and the passing of this measure, and that, independently of all other feelings but a sense of duty to God and your country, you will reject this Bill.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, that their Lordships would remember so many occasions on which the noble Earl who had just sat down had predicted the ruin of the country—all of which predictions had been followed by a large increase of national prosperity—that he did not imagine they would be much alarmed at the prophecies which he had uttered on this occasion. He should therefore address himself to making a few observations on some of the remarks which fell from the noble Earl who had moved the Amendment, and, in doing so, should principally confine himself to that which was, in the mind of the noble Earl and of most other noble Lords, the main question—namely, the question of the admission of the Jews to Parliament. The first position which the noble Earl laid down was that the Jews were a different nation. Why, then, did we make them magistrates, why put them into our municipal corporations? Why, above all, make them sheriffs of counties, the immediate representatives of the Queen in Council? Nay, not only might a Jew be a sheriff, but if he refused to act in that capacity, saying that he was of another nation, he was fined or compelled to serve. The noble Earl was willing that the Jew should exercise all these important functions, but when he knocked at the door of Parliament, and asked for his fair share of political rights, the noble Earl turned round and said, “No! you shall not come here; you are of another nation.” Then the noble Earl said that the Jews were not persecuted. When the Roman Catholics laboured under disabilities, the noble Earl himself called it persecution; why, then, was it not persecution in the case of the Jews? The noble Earl also said that there was no danger now. There was danger in the time of the Catholics,—6,000,000 of them thundered at the doors of their Lordships' House, and then they yielded; but in the case of the Jews there was nothing but the claims of justice, so they were told not to yield. Was that generous; nay, was it safe? There was danger in injustice, although it was injustice to only a small number of persons. It was said that the adoption of this Bill would unchristianize the Legislature; yet for nearly twenty-five years this measure had continually been carried through the House of Commons, and during all that time that House had been more distinguished for its attention to disseminate Christianity and to promote the religious education of the people than at any previous period of its history. But more than this, when the noble Earl opposite, who now said that the effect of this Bill would be to unchristianize the Legislature, wanted to form a Government, this notion about maintaining the Christianity of the Legislature was thrown over immediately. It was in no way insisted upon by the noble Earl as one of the principles upon which his Government was to be formed, for his leader in the other House was an unflinching advocate of this measure. The noble Earl, too, on such occasions, had sought the assistance of men of different parties, and Lord Palmerston's support of this measure was no impediment to his being asked by the noble Earl to take a seat in his Cabinet. A great deal more would be said about foreign affairs than the Christianity of the Legislature in the conversation which took place between them. Was it wise, he would ask, thus to make Christianity a party watchword, to be shouted out at one time, and to be cast away at another, just as it suited the political convenience of the noble Earl? He had heard it said, though he could scarcely believe it, that some Roman Catholic Peers were about to vote against the measure. He remembered sitting on the steps of the Throne, and listening to the first speech which Lord Plunket made in that House on the Catholic question—"Shall I," said that noble Lord, "who have been raised to the Peerage, put my shoulder to the door to prevent the Duke of Norfolk from coming into this House?—I would rather throw it open wide." He hoped the Roman Catholics would follow the example of Lord Plunket on that occasion, and assist in throwing open the doors of the Legislature to the Jews. The country was now well prepared for the measure; it had been discussed for the last twenty-five years, and he hoped the time was come when it would pass into law.

THE DUKE OF NORFOLK: My Lords, it may be convenient, after the allusion which the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) has made to my name, for me to state the course which I am prepared to pursue upon the present occasion.

My Lords, the Bill before us, however it may be endorsed, I consider simply as embodying the principle of the admission of the Jews into Parliament. It has been so treated in another place—it has been so treated throughout the discussion this evening. My Lords, of that principle I completely approve. I cannot conceive how, in a country where a diversity of religions is permitted by law, and where the electors also are permitted to profess a diversity of religions, it is fair to prevent them from electing any person whom they consider a proper and fit person to represent them in the Government of the country.

The Duke of Somerset

My Lords, I consider that it is an act of justice to admit the Jews into Parliament, and I consider that it is also an act of expediency; for I can conceive of nothing more unseemly, if I may be permitted the use of that word, than a constant difference of opinion between this House and the other House upon the question whether a few Members may be admitted into that House. I am aware that it is treated as a question of principle, but I cannot but conceive that the question of justice and expediency is to be considered in the matter; and, advocating the question as a matter of justice and expediency, I cannot forget that it is owing to the principle which I advocate that I have the honour of addressing your Lordships upon the present occasion.

But, my Lords, while approving of the principle of the Bill now before your Lordships, I must state that that Bill possesses, in my mind, many objections. There are, to me, insuperable objections to that Bill. I shall, if it goes into Committee, be prepared either to accept or propose Amendments to the measure. As it at present stands I confess I cannot support it, but must oppose it if it goes to a third reading. My Lords, I trust, and I cannot help hoping, that there may be some chance of so altering the Bill as to induce me to assent to the third reading; but as it at present stands, I could not do so.

I have abstained purposely from saying anything which should introduce into your Lordships' discussion theological or irrelevant matter, and I have confined myself to that little which I felt obliged to say, or I could not have voted for the second reading.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON said, he looked upon this measure as being nothing less than the unchristianizing of the country. He did not apprehend any evil effects from the few Jews who might be admitted to Parliament under this Bill; it was the moral effect in the country of the passing of such a measure to which he looked. From the moment that this Bill passed into law the foundation of our Christian faith would be destroyed. They were about to introduce into the other House of Parliament those who denied the great Mediator, and he dreaded lest such a course should draw down upon this country great and merited evils, for we never could hope to prosper if we abandoned the very foundations of that faith on which all our hopes rested. His noble Friend behind him said that the time would come when Christianity would be disavowed by the Legislature, and he feared that the success of this Bill would be a first step in that direction.

LORD CAMOYS said: If I were to consult my own convenience, and still more the convenience of your Lordships, I should not now rise to address you. As it is, I do not rise for the purpose of taking part in the general debate, but for the purpose of making some observations on the course pursued by the Roman Catholics in reference to this Bill, and in connection with the Catholic oath. And first of all, let me put myself right with the House with regard to the position that the Roman Catholics stand in, in relation to their own oath. There are many in your Lordships' House, and in the other House of Parliament, who say, that a settlement was come to upon this subject in 1829, and that that settlement ought not to be disturbed. My Lords, I fully admit that a settlement was come to in 1829, but I do not admit that settlement must necessarily be permanent. On the contrary, I maintain that the Roman Catholics are fully justified, on every fit and proper opportunity, to solicit from Parliament an alteration of their oath; and having stated their case, to leave the decision of the question to the wisdom and justice of the imperial Parliament. It is also said that the Roman Catholics were parties to the oath of 1829, and that, therefore, they have no right to quarrel with its details. My Lords, there are many of the Roman Catholics who strongly deny this statement; they say they were not in Parliament at the time, and therefore were no parties to that oath. I must candidly acknowledge that I differ from those Roman Catholics in that view, and must confess that we were parties, by consent at least, to that oath. That oath received the sanction of the Catholic Prelates; that oath received the sanction of the great leader of Emancipation, Mr. O'Connell; that oath was gladly taken by us at the time of the Emancipation Act, and that oath has been taken by us ever since; and though here and there some member may be found who had felt some doubt as to the interpretation of some passages in it, when questions affecting the Established Church have come before Parliament; yet, on the whole, that oath has been no bar to the full discharge of our parliamentary and other public duties. But then, again, I come to the same conclusion, that though we were parties to that oath, there is nothing to prevent us, at any proper moment, from soliciting from the Legislature a reconsideration of the oath, and leaving the decision of the question to the wisdom and liberality of Parliament. Now, my Lords, if ever the Roman Catholics were justified in seeking for an improvement of their oath it is now. The Bill before you affords them their best justification. Why, what does it propose to do? It proposes to strike out from the Protestant oaths two sentences, which occur also in the Catholic oath. It proposes to strike them out for the most solid and irresistible reasons; reasons so conclusive that there is scarcely any opposition to this part of the Bill. The same reasons, equally cogent, equally irresistible, apply to the same sentences in the Catholic oath. But then the answer is that we stand upon different ground; that the settlement of 1829 ought not to be broke in upon. My Lords, I will not stop to inquire into the wisdom or logic of such an answer. I am obliged to take that answer. I am obliged to take Parliament as it is, not as I wish it to be. I wish, indeed, that these unnecessary and irritating distinctions should cease, and that I might never again witness what I have lately seen, two Peers standing at the table taking different oaths, those Peers being, by the Constitution, on a perfect equality, as they are also on a perfect equality in their allegiance to the Crown, and in their devotion to their country. Now, my Lords, a word or two upon this Bill. This Bill proposes two objects; one, the improvement of the Protestant oath; the other, the admission of the Jews to Parliament. It proposes to effect the first by striking out certain sentences which are a disgrace to your oath; and it proposes to effect this second by striking out the words that keep a Jew from Parliament; and it further provides that the Roman Catholics shall not be included in its operation. Now, my Lords, that is a fair description of the Bill, and if so, judge of my astonishment when I heard this Bill described by some of the most influential Roman Catholics, as an insult, an injury, and as re-enacting the Catholic oath; and, therefore, that the Members of both Houses of Parliament were requested either to oppose this Bill, or, at all events, not to support it. Why, my Lords, by this Bill there was no insult offered or intended; there was no injury inflicted, and as to re-enacting the Catholic oath, it did nothing of the kind. It excepted the Catholies from the operation of the Bill, and left us precisely as we were before. My Lords, if this interpretation on their part astonished me, I was still more astonished as to their policy. One would naturally have thought that this was a step in the right direction, and that the example you were setting for yourselves, you could not refuse to apply to us when the proper time might arrive when we could ask that favour from you; but now our language must be this, when we ask you to alter our oath, we must induce you to comply with our request, by reminding you that in 1857 we refused to be parties to the improvement of yours. My Lords, I do not know which to condemn most, the inaccuracy of their interpretation, or the want of wisdom that characterised their policy. Subsequently, my Lords, another objection was started, which, I am ready to admit, contained the semblance of an argument. It was stated that this was a new enactment; and as it introduced a new oath, asserting that the Pope has no spiritual power in this kingdom, no Roman Catholic could vote in favour of the Bill. My Lords, if this Bill had said, "Whereas, the Pope has no spiritual power in this country;" or, "be it enacted, that the Pope has no spiritual power in this country;" or, if it asserted the sentence in question for the first time, then I freely admit that no Roman Catholic could vote for this Bill. But so far from this Bill being a new enactment, it merely continues that sentence of the oath of supremacy. This Bill consists of taking away sentences, not making new ones; so that, even if technically speaking it can be called a new enactment, in a moral sense, and in every other sense, it is a mere continuation; so much so, that vote how you will, reject this Bill or carry it, that same sentence will form a part of the oath of supremacy as it does now. My Lords, I have given every attention to every objection that has been urged by the Roman Catholics against this Bill, but after every consideration that I could give to those objections, I cannot see any reason why I, as a Roman Catholic, should not give my cordial support to this Bill. Before I sit down, let me do an act of justice to the Roman Catholic Peers. I have stated the interpretation put upon this Bill by some influential Roman Catholics, and their consequent advice upon it; now I am happy to say that I did not hear that interpretation, nor that advice proceed from the Catholic Peers. In conclusion then, my Lords, let me say, that I will vote for this Bill, for though it does me no good, it does a benefit to you; I will vote for this Bill, for though it does not remove the theoretical grievance which I have a right to complain of, it removes the practical grievance that the Jew has a right to complain of; I will vote for this Bill, because I have always voted for Jewish Emancipation in deference to those great principles of civil and religious liberty to which I owe my own emancipation; and I will vote for this Bill, because it extends that emancipation to others, that I was once in want of, and that I am now in the enjoyment of.

Lord Camoys

LORD STUART DE DECIES said, they were all agreed on this, that the expediency of admitting the Jews to Parliament resolved itself exclusively into a question of religious feeling, and that it was clear no political evils or inconveniences could arise from the measure now before the House. Their Lordships had been warned of the inexpediency of tampering with the Christian character of this country. He did not believe that the Christian character of the country depended upon any particular form of oath which the Legislature might prescribe for its members, but upon the Christian character of the Sovereign and the electors by whom the two branches of the Legislature were constituted. So long as they continued to be Christian there could be no doubt that the Legislature would be Christian, and if ever the nation should cease to be Christian, all tests and oaths for the maintenance of Christianity would speedily disappear. Any attempt to regulate the Legislature by a religious oath was superfluous, and the necessities of the State would be completely provided for by an exclusively political oath. He also believed that the safety of the Established Church depended not upon the oaths required of Roman Catholics, but upon the attachment of the great mass of the people to the principles of the Reformation. With respect to the Jews themselves, he could not agree that there were any peculiar reasons for excluding them from the Legislature; for although that people might be now undergoing the decrees of the Almighty, it had never been maintained that men were called upon to endorse the judgments of Heaven. On the contrary, he considered the Jews had peculiar claims upon our sympathy and forbearance; and, regarding the Bill as one of justice towards them, he would give his vote in favour of the second reading.

EARL ST. VINCENT then addressed their Lordships, but was totally inaudible, that he could only be understood to oppose the second reading of the Bill.

LORD DUFFERIN said, he regarded the Bill as another step in the direction of perfect religious freedom, and upon that ground he should support it. He regarded it as a gross and palpable injustice to exclude any class of our fellow subjects from civil privileges on account of their religious convictions.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, that he was unwilling to give a silent vote on the question before their Lordships, as he had for ten years held on this subject the opinions which he still professed. From the appeals which had been made to the right rev. Bench, he was afraid that there was not only in that House, but amongst persons out of it, for many of whose opinions he had the highest respect, a strong feeling that the religious character of the Legislature was concerned in this measure; but he confessed that, having looked into the measure with all the attention which he could command, and having for many years considered the question with which it proposed to deal, he could not regard it as at all affecting their religious position. He fully concurred with those noble Lords who had said that the religious character of that House and of the Legislature in general did not depend upon the maintenance of those oaths by which any of their fellow-countrymen were excluded from the enjoyment of their civil rights, but depended on the religious feeling which, he was proud to say, existed throughout the country, and which certainly had a strong echo within that assembly. So long as appeals might be made to the Christianity and the religious feeling of that branch of the Legislature, and those appeals were responded to as they now were, so long might their Lordships feel perfectly confident that they were preserving the religious character of their House. It was alleged that it would be impossible to retain in the Legislature those solemn prayers with which its proceedings were now commenced if they admitted the Jews to Parliament. Now, he had never heard that those Members of the Legislature who conscientiously abstained from joining in the prayers, believing them to be the prayers of a heretical body, had ever thought it desirable that those prayers should be discontinued, or had ever sought to destroy their Protestant character. He was quite sure, from the tone adopted by Roman Catholic Members of their Lordships' House in the course of that debate, that they would be the last to propose that because they were not themselves Protestants the Protestant character of the House should be entirely destroyed. When no bad consequences, as regarded the Protestant character of the Legislature, had resulted from the admission of so influential a body as the Roman Catholic Peers, he was sure that the apprehension that danger would result from the introduction of one or two persons of the Jewish persuasion was wholly chimerical. If the Legislature was to be unchristianized in the manner described that night, the process of unchristianizing it must be one which had been going on for a great number of years; for were their Lordships to suppose that all those changes by which the Jews had been admitted to civil rights of citizenship had been one after another steps to unchristianize the country? Were they to be told that this country was less Christian now than it was twenty-five years ago, because those changes had within that period taken place? It was his deliberate conviction, and he thought the conviction of all who had attentively considered the social position of this country, that our Christianity had been gradually deepening, and that the country was more Christian now than when those, and other restrictions of the same kind, were in full force; and therefore he could not apprehend that by the proposed change, following as it did a series of others spread over twenty-five years, their Lordships would run any danger of unchristianizing the Legislature, the evil consequences of which change, if unhappily it were by any means introduced, none would be more ready to deplore than the strongest supporters of this measure. It was a striking fact, which had been mentioned by a noble and learned Lord that evening, that the man who first mooted this question of Jewish emancipation was one whose Christian character was above all suspicion—one of the most religious public men that had ever adorned this country. Another argument used against the measure was that the Jews were aliens—people of another nation—who did not desire to make common cause with the people of this country; that they kept themselves as much separate from us as their forefathers from the Egyptians when in the Egyptian bondage, and that they were only looking for another exodus to deliver them from their position in this country. But was it true that the Jews stood so wholly aloof from us—that they had no desire to make common cause with the people of this country or join in their civil deliberations? How could their Lordships possibly think this when they saw the number of petitions sent by the Jews to the table of their Lordships' House, all expressing the desire of the Jews residing in this country to be amalgamated in citizenship with its people? The petitions under which their Lordships' table now groaned in favour of this measure, afforded a palpable proof that the Jews were not looking to a foreign land, but had a fellow feeling with their Christian countrymen, wishing to be regarded, in all respects, as their fellow citizens. The simple ground on which he gave his vote for the second reading was the ground of justice. If the thing was just, it ought to be done; and it was just, unless they could prove that the presence of those people in their Legislative Assemblies would be injurious to their Christian character. It was not enough to allege by way of objection that they would be altering the oath which was a declaration of Christianity; they must prove that the presence of the Jews would prevent them from expressing themselves and acting as Christians in their capacity as legislators. If they failed in that proof, it appeared that the admission of the Jews came before them as a claim of justice which could not be set aside. The Jew had a stake in the country; he discharged important magisterial and civic duties; he was actuated by patriotic and loyal feelings; and surely, therefore, he was entitled to his full rights, unless it was made clear that his presence in Parliament would do real and obvious harm.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My right rev. Brother who has just sat down has given to your Lordships, with the ability which belongs to him, the reasons of the vote which he is about to give. It would be a great relief to my mind if I could take the same view of the subject as he does—first, because I should be spared the pain of differing from him, which I do with great regret; and further, I should be relieved from the necessity of giving a vote which I have never given without extreme reluctance. My Lords, in giving that vote I am not conscious of being actuated by any of the unworthy motives which have been alluded to in the debate. I am not actuated by a spirit of persecution; neither am I actuated by any feelings of bigotry against the Jewish nation. On the contrary, I hold in much esteem an individual of that nation to whom allusion has been already made, who filled last year the office of chief magistrate of this city with so much credit to himself. With that gentleman, in his official capacity, I had much friendly intercourse; and it cost me real uneasiness on the last occasion when this subject was agitated in this House that I should be obliged to record a vote against a cause in which I knew that he was interested. But, my Lords, the question before us involves a principle which I cannot consent to forego, notwithstanding the low value set upon that principle by the noble and learned Lord who so deservedly obtains so much influence in this House—the principle that a Christian nation ought to be governed by a Christian Legislature, or, in other words, that the profession of Christianity ought to be the qualification of the Legislators of a Christian nation. This principle, my Lords, is avowedly and solemnly renounced if you admit the form of oath proposed in the present Bill. We are told, indeed, that the words which affirm the faith of a Christian are often very lightly spoken; that the qualification may be taken by persons who are as little in earnest in their Christian profession as the Jews themselves. This may be so, though I hope and trust the contrary; but, at all events, the profession of the Christian faith is a homage paid to Christianity; whereas, on the other hand, I cannot but consider the rejection of that profession from the qualification of a Member of the Legislature as a reproach cast upon our holy religion. Nothing, I am sure, was further from the intentions, either of those who framed the Bill, or of those of your Lordships who support it; but I am sure that it will bear that appearance to the public out of doors; such will be the opinion of the public generally; and it will tend to lower the respect which ought to be entertained towards the Legislature if Parliament should seem to reckon it of no consequence of what Members it is composed. For these reasons, my Lords, I must adhere to the opinion which I have before maintained on this question, and support the Amendment of the noble Earl.

The Bishop of London

THE EARL OF ALBEMARLE observed, that the kingdom of Bavaria had, in common with ourselves, adopted a system of proscription against persons of the Jewish religion, and he found, on comparing the census of 1800 with that of 1850, that Bavaria had lost nearly one-half of its Jewish population, who had emigrated to America, where they enjoyed the advantage of civil equality. He would ask their Lordships to consider the benefits which had resulted to America from the adoption of a tolerant policy. He understood that there was scarcely a great town in the United States without a synagogue, and it was stated by the American Geographical and Statistical Society that the city of New York alone contained a greater number of Jews than the whole United Kingdom. A century ago, when Lord Chesterfield proposed a Bill for the correction of the calendar by substituting the Gregorian style for the old and erroneous system, he stated that the only nation of Europe which had not adopted the plan he proposed were the Muscovites, and he said, "It were not well that we were found in such company." So with regard to the question under discussion, he (Lord Albemarle) would say, "It is not well that we should be found in company with the petty and intolerant State of Bavaria."

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, he had always been opposed to the admission of Jews to Parliament; but he could not, by giving his vote against the second reading of this Bill, declare that the Members' oath of abjuration ought to remain in its present form upon the Statute-book. That oath was one which everybody disliked and which many persons took with derision, and which all wished to get rid of. The oath specified a number of things which had existed, but which existed no longer. The first part of it was laughable, and when they came to invoke Almighty God to attest that which had no existence, it appeared to him almost blasphemy. He would vote for the second reading of this Bill, rather than be a party to imposing on himself and on generations to come the necessity of taking an oath which was so repugnant to common sense and to the spirit of religion. He was speaking only for himself. He could perfectly understand that other Peers had taken a different view, most conscientiously, but his own feeling was so strong that he was ready to run any hazard rather than give his vote in opposition to the second reading of this Bill, and thereby to declare that this oath should remain unchanged. Should the Bill go into Committee, he concurred with his noble Friend who opposed the second reading, that the oath in the Bill was very objectionable, and required to be amended. But although he was opposed to the admission of Jews into Parliament, he must vote for the second reading of this Bill, and thereby affirm that this oath ought to be changed.

LORD BROUGHAM: My Lords, it will not be necessary for me to trouble your Lordships at any length, after the able and satisfactory manner in which the subject has been treated by my noble and learned Friend (Lord Lyndhurst) who has been, unhappily, compelled by indisposition to leave the House. My Lords, the noble Earl who last spoke (the Earl of Shaftesbury), is more admirable in his consistency than my noble Friend who has moved the Amendment; for while the noble Earl fully concurs with my noble Friend in utterly repudiating the oath of abjuration, and in regretting its retention on the statute-book—and I entirely agree that the oath is utterly offensive to common sense and decorum, and think that it is almost blasphemous—my noble Friend, I regret to say, while evidently approving of nine-tenths of the present measure, has moved an Amendment, which will, if adopted, lead to its entire rejection. I think that the far better course would have been, that my noble Friend should have assented to the second reading of the Bill, and then in Committee have proposed such changes as he wished to effect in the details of the measure. Now, as to the question of intolerance; I say it is intolerance when we refuse access to the honours of the State, to the powers of the State, and to the various functions and offices of the State, to any body of our fellow citizens, upon the ground of their religious opinions or their religious faith. My noble Friend, in moving the Amendment, seemed to argue that the Jews could not fairly complain of the disability under which they labour, because, he contended, no person or class in the State had any inherent right to hold office—that office was necessarily confined to a few, and therefore that there was no deprivation of a natural right. But what we complain of—what I complain of—is, that whereas all persons have a right to be considered equally eligible to hold office in the State, either when selected by the favour of the Crown, or when selected by the choice of their fellow-citizens, a particular class are excluded, on the ground of their religious tenets, from being eligible in any way for certain offices in the public service. And why are they ineligible? It is because of their honesty—because they conscientiously hold certain opinions on matters of religion, and will not give them up, or pretend not to hold them. If they were not only Jews but hypocrites, they would be admitted.

My Lords, your Lordships have heard a great deal of the effects of this measure if it should pass. We are told that it will unchristianize the Legislature. If that be really its effect, in what an unhappy state is the Legislature of this country whether it should pass or not. If your Lordships reject this Bill, you will preserve your Christian character unimpaired; but, alas! what will become of your colleagues in legislation, the Members of the other House of Parliament? What will be the position of the unhappy Commons? Your Lordships' estate is, no doubt, comfortable and gracious; but the wretched Commons have passed the Bill by a large majority, and have surely reduced themselves to a state—I will not say of absolute perdition—Heaven forbid that I should suppose any portion of our Legislature could reduce themselves to a condition so lamentable!—but surely their estate must be most ungracious. They are, by this argument, no longer a Christian assembly, for they have—by no narrow majority, but by a large and overwhelming majority—declared in favour of a course which we are told will unchristianize their House, and if adopted by us will unchristianize the whole Legislature.

Passing, however, from a view of the case fraught with such unpleasant considerations, I will remind my noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) there is not, in reality, at this moment even that security for the Christian character of the Legislature which is supposed to be obtained by the insertion of the words "on the true faith of a Christian." The oath taken by a Roman Catholic, whether Peer or Commoner, does not contain these words; and my noble Friend opposite (the Duke of Norfolk) did not, before he took his seat in this assembly, declare that he was a Catholic or a Christian at all.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that the Clerk at the Table might have called upon the noble Duke to make a declaration to that effect.

LORD BROUGHAM: My noble Friend has made that statement I will not say with his usual accuracy—nor yet will I say with more than his usual inaccuracy

Lord Brougham

when heated by controversy. The Clerk at the Table has no right to administer or to offer to the noble Duke, or to any other Roman Catholic Peer, any other form of oath than that which the Roman Catholic Relief Act provides shall be taken by the members of that persuasion; and that oath I maintain does not contain the slightest security that the taker is a Roman Catholic or a member of any Christian community whatever. In the instance, then, of the Roman Catholic Relief Act, no precaution was taken by those who framed the oath to preserve that Christian character to the Legislature for which the opponents of this Bill are now so zealous. My noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) replying to the argument that the exclusion of the Jews had arisen from accident, argued that this was not the case, because, he says, when this oath was first framed, no Jews were permitted even to live in England, and that therefore the whole policy of the realm negated their admission into the Legislature. But the real test was what would have happened before the 12 Will. III., when these words were reinserted into the oath, and if at that time the subject had been brought under discussion, would any one have proposed an Act with the preamble that, "whereas the number of Jews has lately increased within this realm, and it is desirable to exclude them from sitting in Parliament," and then going on to enact this test? I venture to say that no one would have dreamt of proposing so preposterous an enactment. But if the argument is good that a Legislature which does not insist upon the presence of these words in the oath is unchristian, the consequence is inevitable that the Parliaments of Charles II. were Christian Parliaments, and the Parliament of the first twelve years of William III. were unchristian Parliaments. But I think few will say that the Parliaments of that period were less Christian than they have been since, or even than in the time of Charles II. Does any one think with more veneration of the Parliaments in which sat men with the morals of Sedley and Rochester, and the religion of Shaftesbury and Lauderdale, than of the Parliaments which were adorned by the pure morality of Somers, the learning and piety of Tillotson and South and Burnet? I will avow my preference for the Legislature which did not insist on the words "On the true faith of a Christian," over those in which they were taken without shame or scruple. There seems to me, my Lords, something not only repugnant to principle but singularly inconsistent and impractical in every provision we make in the nature of a test. The moment we attempt to impose a test we involve ourselves in inextricable contradictions. One instance I have already given—the Roman Catholic oath. We have abolished the sacramental test, than which nothing could be more profane, nothing more tending to desecrate the sanctity of religion—and have substituted a declaration. The present form of sanction is open to the same objection—the same in principle though not, perhaps, the same in degree—while the character which we seek to secure to the Legislature in no way depends on their retention. True, this is a Christian Legislature; but it is a Christian Legislature because it is elected by a Christian people. And then it is not more Christian than it is Protestant; and who believes that Parliament has lost its Protestantism since 1829? Notwithstanding the Act then passed, I am glad to believe that during the last quarter of a century, not only has the Christian character been retained, but that great progress has been made even in advancing the Christian character of the Legislature. But in producing this result, tests and restrictions have exercised no influence whatever.

My Lords, when I hear such extravagant professions of zeal to prevent our religion from suffering by a very small extension of toleration, I cannot help reflecting upon the course pursued in matters affecting the Christian Church by some of the largest dealers in such professions. I do not express the least doubt touching the consistency of the preaching on this subject with the practices of my right rev. Friend (the Bishop of Oxford), whose opposition I much fear this measure will have again to encounter, and who bears a name towards which affection and veneration strive for the mastery in my bosom. Neither can I for a moment suspect the most rev. Primate who has declared himself against us, but whose arguments have availed little in comparison with those so ably urged on our side by my right rev. Friend near his Grace (the Bishop of London.) But how was it with such vehement asserters of the same doctrines and promulgators of the like alarms, and the like tender care of our Christian character, when an attempt, haply successful, was made to free the constitution—the practice of the constitution at least—from the crying scandal of the Sacramental Test—that intolerable desecration of the holiest service of our Church, which had actually led to an aged Lord of the Bedchamber, when made to go through the ceremony, as, he believed, but on returning home and describing what had passed, it was found that he had been involved in the service of churching a woman after child-bearing. But this Sacramental Test so desecrated was proclaimed to be absolutely necessary for preventing the Legislature from being unchristianized. The most zealous supporter of this, once filling the office now held by my noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor), contended that the declaration substituted for it gave no kind of security because it contained no asseveration of the party being a Christian—and his Lordship told the right rev. Prelates, who supported the Bill, that they were pulling down the Church about their ears—the Church of which he professed being a pillar. One of these Prelates on that occasion asked how it happened that his Lordship never was by any chance seen inside any church—"Oh," said he, "I am a buttress, an outside pillar." But it was not in that repartee only, nor in the undoubted fact to which it related, that his practical indifference was shown. I well remember that when the prayers were said in this House, no sooner did the Bishop begin than the noble and zealous Christian put on his spectacles, drew his letters from his pocket and read them during the whole time of the service. Such is the coldness towards sound religious observances of those whose intolerance, inflamed by their zeal, makes them terrified at the risk which we run of becoming unchristian, the moment we cease to make men's religious belief the test of their fitness to sit in Parliament—in the House where such scenes as I have described daily occurred.

My Lords, nothing has been more satisfactory to me, in one respect at least, than the turn this debate has taken. There has been a total abstinence from allusion to that greatest of all crimes, the death of our Saviour, and to the irreverent and offensive expressions used towards him—offences in which only a small part of the Jews were concerned, and from which the great body of the nation stood apart. The crucifixion was, in fact, the deed not of the great bulk of the Hebrew people, but of a comparatively small portion, the Western Jews, the Eastern remaining wholly aloof from it; and no one ever hears expressions of irreverence, much less of insult, from the Jews of the present day.

My Lords, I am ashamed to have trespassed so long on your Lordships' attention. I must, however, before I sit down, add one further remark. Who doubts—who can doubt—that the Jews have failed in obtaining access to the constitution, not on account of their own demerits—not on account of any rational principle—but because, unhappily for them, and unhappily for us, they are small in numbers compared with those to whom justice has already been done;—unhappily for them, because it has led to so long an exclusion from their rights; unhappily for us, unhappily for our character—because I fear there can be but one explanation of this diversity—that we are prone not only to spare but truckle to the haughty, and to trample upon the humble.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD (who rose amid cries for a division) said, it would be very inconsistent in him to detain their Lordships for any length of time at that period of the debate, because he was one of those who joined in the cry of "Question" before his noble and learned Friend who had just sat down addressed them, and right glad should he have been had they then divided. But after the new wind, so to speak, which the debate had taken, and after the totally new aspect in which it had been presented to their Lordships by his noble and learned Friend, he should not be altogether satisfied to vote without saying a word upon the subject. It did seem to him to require all the consummate abilities as an advocate which still so signally marked the great powers of his noble and learned Friend, when at this stage of the discussion he ventured even to persuade himself that he could make any of their Lordships believe that they were really discussing the merits of the oath of abjuration, and not the admission of the Jews. The noble Earl who preceded his noble and learned Friend, not so practised in the great histrionic art, manfully laboured in pain and sorrow under the awful task which he had undertaken; because he must have felt, and he (the Bishop of Oxford) saw in every word that he spoke that he did feel, that his soul was so possessed with the exceeding wickedness of this oath of abjuration, a wickedness trembling on the very edge of the great sin of blasphemy, that it was difficult for himself and for others, knowing his principles, to understand how he had remained for many years a Member of both Houses of Parliament, repeatedly taking this almost blasphemous oath, and yet never endeavouring by a single argument, by a single protest, by a single vote to remove from his own conscience, or from the consciences of other Members of the two Houses of Parliament, this great sin which was being by them so perpetually repeated. The noble and learned Lord who followed him, however, boldly facing this great difficulty, endeavoured in the most practised manner to lead their Lordships away on an altogether false scent, giving them the cry of the field that the game was in that direction, when every one of their Lordships had seen it break cover in the other. He really thought that their Lordships might altogether dismiss from their minds the great apprehensions which had been conjured up at the very moment of a division. The very worst that could be said of this oath was, that it was superfluous and unnecessary. There was in it nothing approaching falsehood. Every one did deny that there was in the branch of the Royal family mentioned in it any one who could claim against Her Most Gracious Majesty the right to the Royal throne of England, and called God to witness that he avowed his belief and was prepared to act upon it. It might be superfluous; it might be an oath which circumstances no longer rendered necessary; but when they were told that if they acted in a straightforward manner they would, instead of moving or supporting the Amendment before the House, endeavour to insert the words which they believed to be necessary in the other oath, was not that really a false pretence? Did they not know that in a place which he must not mention that attempt was made, and if there had been in that place any bona fide intention to suffer this question to be debated those words would have been inserted? Therefore must they not all understand that the meaning of this proposition was simply that they should pass the Bill, putting in these words, that the words should be struck out in another place, and the Bill sent back to them so late that it would pass without these words, and they should fall into the plainest and most undisguised of traps? He would only say, surely the trap was set in vain in the sight of any bird, even although it were one of the anserine order.

Lord Brougham

He thought he might also dismiss another large part of his noble and learned Friend's oration, in which he pointed out the great danger which was incurred, because the clerk at the table could not interrogate the noble Duke (the Duke of Norfolk) as to whether he was or was not a Roman Catholic. The words of the Act of Parliament imposing the oath to which his noble and learned Friend had referred, distinctly stated that any Peer professing the Roman Catholic religion should take such an oath, and the act of stepping forward to take it was in itself a profession that he was of the Roman Catholic religion; therefore he thought that all this argument of his noble and learned Friend might be swept to the wind, and that they need not be at all afraid of any Jewish potentate sneaking into their Lordships' House and taking the Roman Catholic oath. From this, as it seemed to him, false pursuit, he turned to the great question before them. It had been argued by a right rev. Friend of his that this was a claim of justice, and therefore, as religious men, they were bound to grant it. If it were so, he, for one, would say, "Come what may, be there what danger there may be behind, if you can make out a claim of justice, let everything else in this world perish and let justice be done!" But he altogether denied that this was a claim of justice. On what ground could that proposition be maintained? His noble and learned Friend tried with the utmost subtlety of his most subtle intellect to set aside the plain and common sense doctrine which the most rev. Prelate behind him (the Archbishop of Canterbury) so distinctly enunciated. If the noble and learned Lord's argument were sound, the Statute-book was full of rank injustice. Why were the clergy of the Established Church excluded? Why were the Roman Catholic priesthood excluded? If the statement of the noble and learned Lord were correct, it was the greatest injustice to exclude them. But it was not an injustice, because the right to sit in Parliament was not granted to a man as a benefit to himself, but as a trust for the nation; and the question was not whether a man would be benefited by receiving the right, but whether the State would be benefited by the exercise of it. The noble and learned Lord maintained that it was contrary to the principle of toleration that men's religious principles should be the ground upon which this privilege was refused to them. But this was a misrepresentation of the principle of religious toleration. This principle was, that where there was a conscientious opinion that the religious principles professed by those who come forward to claim the privilege were not such as to make it improper that they should be intrusted with the privilege of sitting in Parliament, then they ought to grant it and not capriciously to refuse it merely because they differed from them in religious belief. In the direction of a common Christianity he thought the line had been carried as far as was possible in allowing men to aspire to the duties of a senator in a Christian Legislature. But it was adopting quite a new line to say that they would let into the Legislature those who were not Christians. He repeated, this was not the same line, but a new line altogether. The promoters of this Bill ridiculed the idea that it would unchristianize the Legislature; but to his mind it was a natural and unavoidable result. The noble and learned Lord had expressed an almost dangerous amount of self-satisfaction at the progress in virtue and excellence made by the Legislature within the last few years; but that, after all, was not the question. He was quite willing to take the noble and learned Lord's word for his own improvement; he was quite willing to believe that the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack, the noble and learned Lord himself, and other ex-Chancellors, were better than their predecessors—that they were inside pillars, whereas the others were nothing but outside buttresses—that they did not read their letters while the junior Prelate was reading prayers—but that, after all, did not constitute the great question whether the Legislature was or was not a Christian Parliament. The meaning of a body being a Christian body was this—Did its members profess to be governed by a Christian standard and Christian doctrine in the judgment which they formed on all matters which came before them? Of course they could not undertake to say what a man's private opinions might be. There might be good and bad men, hypocrites and true men among them—that it was impossible to avoid; but the point was, what was the professed ground upon which they legislated? If men were admitted into the Legislature who professed that the faith of a Christian was to be the great principle which was to dictate all the conclusions to which they were to come as legislators, they might be deceivers, but if they were, it was in the teeth of their professions, because they professed to be Christian members of a Christian Legislature, whereas they were unchristian members of a Legislature which continued to be Christian all the same. There was a time when the Legislature was a Protestant Legislature, but it was so no longer, otherwise no noble Lord could rise in his place and claim to take part in their legislation, denying that he was a Protestant. In the same manner if this Bill were adopted, and if men were suffered to enter Parliament and take part in legislation who denied that they were Christians, even though it were only one man, the whole standard of the legislative body was altered to the profession of that one man. It would be idle to appeal any longer to Christian principle when there sat in the Legislature, in perfect equality with the rest of its Members, a man who denied that it was in any way bound by Christian principle. It was that which the nation had settled should be for it the principle upon which its representatives should be elected which made the Legislature either Christian or unchristian. The argument of the noble and learned Lord went indeed so far as to say, that if toleration were carried to a proper extent no man could be excluded from the Legislature because of his religious belief. Were their Lordships prepared to admit all the consequence of this argument? Were they prepared to open the doors of the Legislature to a man professing the doctrines of Mormonism, who might come into Parliament for the avowed purpose of propagating Mormon doctrines and the practices of Utah? There must be a limit somewhere, and the limit which had hitherto been taken was the profession of the faith of a Christian: but now Parliament was asked to remove that limit, and lay down a principle, which, if it admitted our Jewish fellow-subject, must also admit our Mahomedan and Hindoo fellow-subjects, and even those who denied the existence of any God and of a future state of rewards and punishments. But their Lordships, he was sure, were not prepared to take such a step; they would not consent, he felt convinced, to sanction the introduction of such a pestilent imposture under the shadow of the great truth of religious toleration. Then, it was argued that it was too late to refuse to the Jew a share in making laws when we had allowed him to administer them. No two things could be more widely different. The administration of the law might be entrusted to any man of sufficient education, whose honesty, principles, and integrity, could be relied on, whatever his religious belief might be, without danger; but when they came to give the same man a right to make laws for a great community, the whole matter was changed at once; because, if he was an honest man, both in making and changing laws, he would square his conduct according to what was within him, the great master truth—his religious belief. It was, therefore, impossible, in a country where all laws were made in accordance with the truth of Christianity to bring men into Parliament whose first principle was a denial in the most emphatic form of that truth. The difference between the two things was, therefore, so wide, that they could not argue from the one to the other. The conscientious Jew, because he was a conscientious Jew, would administer honestly a Christian code; but the conscientious Jew could not honestly make Christian laws. This was essentially bound up in the great truth that the centre of all Christianity was not the laying down of any philosophical system, but the trust in and love of the person of our Lord, and it was impossible to combine in legislation with men who denied emphatically that central point of our faith. He would not cast on these men any of the reproaches to which his noble and learned Friend (Lord Brougham) had referred, but it remained a fact, nevertheless, that they believed that He who died for us, and whom we believed to be God as well as man, was an impious blaspheming malefactor, justly put to an ignominious death. He asked them, could any one believe that two such opposite classes could act together in the mingled work of legislation for a Christian community? Though they had been told by the noble Earl (Earl Granville) that they had not to do with questions of doctrine or matters of religious belief within the walls of Parliament, yet he must remind their Lordships that it was not possible in ninety cases out of 100 that arose in a Christian land to shut out the consideration and influence of Christian motives. What were all those questions they had been debating lately, but questions touching the foundations of family life—what the law of Christ, rightly understood was—and how a Christian nation could continue to enjoy His blessing. Look at the questions of peace and war—the questions of morals that were raised in that House, and all the other matters to which their attention was called, and what did one and all of them reflect but those great doctrinal truths that underlaid and formed the true foundation of all their legislative acts on those important subjects? Therefore it was, that he was ready to bear the imputation of intolerance, believing that truth was of greater moment than everything besides, and that they could not as a Christian people suffer men who denied Christ, to make their laws without the most culpable inconsistency, and the most abundant danger.

The Bishop of Oxford

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he would confine the few observations he intended to make entirely to an explanation of the course which the Government had taken with reference to this matter. He complained of the unfair imputations cast upon the Government by the right rev. Prelate who had just sat down, and by the noble Earl who had moved the rejection of the Bill. So far from the Government having raised before the House a false issue, they had no less than three or four times brought under the consideration of Parliament a Bill bearing directly and not indirectly on the admission of the Jews to Parliament. They had been unsuccessful in all those efforts, and was it not right and fair on the part of the Government to bring the question before their Lordships in another form? In doing so, they raised no false issue, for they did not deny that one of the main objects of the Bill was to admit the Jews to Parliament, and the Government were only desirous of presenting it in a form which would render it acceptable to their Lordships. The noble Earl who moved the Amendment said they ought not to have mixed up those two subjects—the Amendment of the oaths, and the admission of the Jews; but it was utterly impossible in the present condition of affairs to invent any amendment of the oaths that would not raise the question of the admission of the Jews. It was admitted that the words “on the true faith of a Christian” were, as regarded the Jews, a matter of accident, and surely no one could expect that the House of Commons would consent in any new oath to re-enact those words, considering the large majorities by which they had adopted the principle that the Jews ought to be admitted. It had been said they were acting inconsistently with themselves when they admitted the Jews to Parliament and excluded them from certain offices; but there was no inconsistency in the matter, for there was a great distinction between admitting Jews to Parliament, where there was no religious duty to perform, and to those offices in which they would have to deal with matters of religion and the offices of the Church. As for the remonstrances of the Roman Catholic Peers, so far as he could see, the noble Viscount had not by that interview exposed himself to blame. Had not the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) himself had experience of the difficulties which the head of a Government had in dealing with such questions? Was it fair for the noble Earl to find fault with Viscount Palmerston when he himself had, when Prime Minister, played fast and loose upon a question which had formed the whole principle of the Opposition? The accusation of the noble Earl was untrue and unfair. The remonstrance of the Roman Catholic Peers had reference to some words in the oath set out in the Bill, relating to the supremacy of the Pope. His own opinion was that those words were useless. The question which had been raised respecting the revision of the oaths framed at the period of the passing of the Catholic Emancipation Act was a very different and a very difficult question to deal with. The right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Oxford) had referred to the change which would be made in the Legislature, and had asked whether Mormonites were to be admitted. The fact was, that under the present law there was nothing to prevent Brigham Young, or any Mormon who might be elected by a constituency, from taking his seat in Parliament, because they would take the oath, professing and calling themselves Christians. Could it then be said, consistently with reason and common sense, that the continuance of the present formula was necessary to secure the Christianity of the Legislature?

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY considered that the omission of the words “on the true faith of a Christian” from the proposed oath, showed that the principle of the Bill was abjuration of Christianity, and he should therefore support the Amendment of the noble Earl.

On Question, “That (‘now’) stand part of the Motion ? " their Lordships divided :—

Contents (Present)	...	...	91
(Proxies)	...	...	48
			—139

Not-Content (Present)	...	109
(Proxies)	...	62
		—171

Majority ... .. 32

Resolved in the negative; and Bill to be read 2<sup>a</sup> on this Day Three Months.

CONTENTS.

(PRESENT).

Cranworth, L. ( L. Chancellor. )	Byron, L.
Cleveland, D.	Camoy's, L.
Newcastle, D.	Campbell, L.
Norfolk, D.	Carew, L.
Somerset, D.	Carysfort, L. ( E. Carysfort. )
Wellington, D.	Chaworth, L. ( E. Meath. )
	Clandeboyne, L. ( L. Dufferin and Clandeboyne. )
Allesbury, M.	Congleton, L.
Breadalbane, M.	Dacre, L.
Lansdowne, M.	Dartrey, L. ( L. Cremona. )
Townshend, M.	De Mauley, L.
Westminster, M.	Foley, L. [ Teller. ]
Abingdon, E.	Glenelg, L.
Albemarle, E.	Granard, L. ( E. Granard. )
Burlington, E.	Hamilton, L. ( L. Belhaven and Stenton. )
Chichester, E.	Hatherton, L.
Clarendon, E.	Hunsdon, L. ( V. Falkland. )
Cottenham, E.	Ker, L. ( M. Lothian. )
Craven, E.	Kingston, L. ( E. Kingston. )
Durham, E.	Leigh, L.
Essex, E.	Londesborough, L.
Fortescue, E.	Lovat, L.
Granville, E.	Manners, L.
Lovelace, E.	Minster, L. ( M. Conyngham. )
Morley, E.	Mont Eagle, L. ( M. Sligo. )
Munster, E.	Monteagle of Brandon, L.
Portsmouth, E.	Mostyn, L.
Saint Germans, E.	Oriel, L. ( V. Massereene. )
Scarborough, E.	Panmure, L.
Shaftesbury, E.	Petre, L.
Spencer, E.	Ponsonby, L. ( E. Bessborough. ) [ Teller. ]
Zetland, E.	Portman, L.
	Ravensworth, L.
Gordon, V. ( E. Aberdeen. )	Rivers, L.
Hutchinson, V. ( E. Donoughmore. )	Rossie, L. ( L. Kinnaird. )
Sydney, V.	Saye and Sele, L.
Torrington, V.	Sefton, L. ( E. Sefton. )
	Somerhill, L. ( M. Clanricarde. )
Hereford, Bp.	Stafford, L.
London, Bp.
Manchester, Bp.
Belper, L.
Boyle, L. ( E. Cork and Orrery. ) Brougham and Vaux, L.
Broughton, L.

Stanley of Alderley, L.	Talbot de Malahide, L.
Stratford, L. ( V. Enfield. )	Truro, L.
Stuart de Decies, L.	Vernon, L.
Suffield, L.	Wrottesley, L.
Sundridge, L. ( D. Argyll. )	Wycombe, L. ( E. Shelburne. )

(PROXIES).

Bedford, D.	Bolton, L.
Devonshire, D.	Carrington, L.
Grafton, D.	De Freyne, L.
Portland, D.	Denman, L.
Sutherland, D.	Dorchester, L.
	Dormer, L.]
Bristol, M.	Erskine, L.
	Fisherwick, L. ( M. Donnegal. )
Camperdown, E.	Fitzgibbon, L. ( E. Clare. )
Carlisle, E.	Godolphin, L.
Ducie, E.	Howard de Walden, L.
Fitzwilliam, E.	Kenlis, L. ( M. Headfort. )
Gainsborough, E.	Lismore, L. ( V. Lismore. )
Grey, E.	Lurgan, L.
Innes, E. ( D. Roxburghe. )	Lyttelton, L.
Lindsey, E.	Meldrum, L. ( M. Huntly. )
Minto, E.	Mendip, L. ( V. Clifden. )
Radnor, E.	Monson, L.
Suffolk and Berkshire, E.	Penshurst, L. ( V. Strangford. )
	Roseberry, L. ( E. Rosebery. )
Eversley, V.	Stewart of Stewart's Court, L. ( M. Londonderry. )
Leinster, V. ( D. Leinster. )	Sudeley, L.
	Vivian, L.
Bath and Wells, Bp.	Wharnccliffe, L.
Carlisle, Bp.	Worlingham, L. ( E. Gosford. ) Chester, Bp.
Worcester, Bp.

NOT-CONTENTS.

(PRESENT).

Canterbury, Abp.	Doncaster, E. ( D. of Buccleuch and Queensberry. )
Buckingham and Chandos, D.	Effingham, E.
Manchester, D.	Graham, E. ( D. Montrose. )
Rutland, D.	Hardwicke, E.
	Howe, E.
Bath, M. [ Teller. ]	Lanesborough, E.
Exeter, M.	Leven and Melville, E.
Salisbury, M.	Lonsdale, E.
Westmeath, M.	Lucan, E.
Winchester, M.	Malmesbury, E.
	Mansfield, E.
Abergavenny, E.	Mayo, E.
Amherst, E.	Morton, E.
Bantry, E.	Orkney, E.
Beauchamp, E.	Pomfret, E.
Belmore, E.	Romney, E.
Bradford, E.	Rosslyn, E.
Brooke and Warwick, E.	Sandwich, E.
Cadogan, E.	Selkirk, E.
Carnarvon, E.	Strathmore, E.
Cawdor, E.	Talbot, E.
Dartmouth, E.	Vane, E.
De La Warr, E.	Verulam, E.
Derby, E.	Wilton, E.
Desart, E.

Winchilsea and Nottingham, E.

Bolingbroke and St. John, V.

Canterbury, V.

Clancarty, V. (E. Clancarty.)

Combermere, V.

Dungannon, V.

Falmouth, V.

Hardinge, V.

Hill, V.

Melville, V.

Sidmouth, V.

St. Vincent, V.

Strathallan, V.

Chichester, Bp.

Kilmore, &amp;c., Bp.

Lincoln, Bp.

Oxford, Bp.

Ripon, Bp.

Rochester, Bp.

Salisbury, Bp.

Abinger, L.

Ardrossan, L. (E. Eglington.)

Bagot, L.

Bateman, L.

Bayning, L.

Berners, L.

Blayney, L.

Boston, L.

Calthorpe, L.

Churchill, L.

Clarina, L.

Clifton, L. (E. Darnley.)

Clonbrock, L.

Cloncurry, L.

Colchester, L.

Colville of Culross, L.

[Teller.]

Crofton, L.

De L'Isle and Dudley, L.

De Ros, L.

Dinevor, L.

Downes, L.

Farnham, L.

Feversham, L.

Forester, L.

Kenyon, L.

Lovel and Holland, L.

(E. Egmont.)Moore, L. (M. Drogheda.)

Polwarth, L.

Raglan, L.

Rayleigh, L.

Redesdale, L.

Scarsdale, L.

Silchester, L. (E. Longford.)

Sondes, L.

Southampton, L.

Stewart of Garlies, L.

(E. Galloway.)

St. John of Bletso, L.

Templemore, L.

Tenterden, L.

Walsingham, L.

Willoughby de Broke, L.

Wynford, L.

(PROXIES).

Northumberland, D.

Richmond, D.

Ailsa, M.

Cholmondeley, M.

Tweeddale, M.

Aylesford, E.

Beverley, E.

Buckinghamshire, E.

Cathcart, E.

Denbigh, E.

Erne, E.

Ferrers, E.

Guilford, E.

Harewood, E.

Harrington, E.

Hillsborough, E. (M. Downshire.)

Macclesfield, E.

Manvers, E.

Nelson, E.

Onslow, E.

Orford, E.

Portarlington, E.

Poulett, E.

Rosse, E.

Seafeld, E.

Stamford and Warrington, E.

Wicklow, E.

Bangor, V.

Doneraile, V.

Lifford, V.

Maynard, V.

Bangor, Bp.

Durham, Bp.

Exeter, Bp.

Lichfield, Bp.

Llandaff, Bp.

Meath, Bp.

St. Asaph, Bp.

Winchester, Bp.

Braybrooke, L.

Brodrick, L. (V. Middleton.)

Castlemaine, L.

Clanbrassill, L. (E. Roden.)Clanwilliam, L. (E. Clanwilliam.)Clements, L. (E. Leitrim.)

Clinton, L.

Dunsandle and Clanconal, L.

Foxford, L. (E. Limerick.)

Grantley, L.

Gray, L.

Kilmaine, L.

Middleton, L.

Plunket, L. (Bp. Tuam, &c.)Ranfurly, L. (E. Ranfurly.)Saltersford, L. (E. Courtown.)

Sandys, L.

Sheffield, L. (E. Sheffield.)

Sinclair, L.

Saint Leonards, L.

Tyrone, L. (M. Waterford.)Wemyss, L. (E. Wemyss.)Wigan, L. (M. Crawford and Balcarres.)

House adjourned at a quarter to Twelve o'clock, till Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, July 10, 1857.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—2° Public Health Act (Aldershot).

3° Crown, &c. Suits (Scotland); Bankruptcy and Real Securities (Scotland).

THE IRISH MILITIA—QUESTION.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary for War if he can state to the House whether it is intended to call out the Irish Militia regiments for training during the ensuing autumn?

SIR JOHN RAMSDEN said, it was not the intention of the Government to recommend to Her Majesty to call out any of the regiments of the Irish Militia. He might, perhaps, add that the rule which it was intended to follow was, that none of the regiments which were embodied during the war were to be called out during the present year for training.

RETURN OF OFFICERS TO INDIA.
QUESTION.

MR. NOEL said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary for War whether the Government will give to those of Her Majesty's officers who are ordered to rejoin their regiments in India before the expiration of their leave, on account of the mutiny in that country, a free passage, or whether they will be compelled to return there at their own expense?

SIR JOHN RAMSDEN said, the point to which the hon. Gentleman alluded at that moment formed the subject of communication between the War Department and the India Board. At present he was not in a condition to state whether any decision had been come to upon the subject.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he would express a hope that if a free passage were given to the officers of the Royal Army, the same privilege would also be extended to the officers of the Indian army.

PROBATES AND ADMINISTRATION BILL.
QUESTION.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE said, he wished to ask the Attorney General a question with reference to an observation made by the hon. and learned Gentleman at the close of the evening on Monday last, when an adverse decision was given on a Vote which the hon. and learned Gentleman said would involve serious injury to the Bill then under discussion; and he added, that he should take time to consider whether he should go on with that Bill or not. The Bill to which he alluded was the Probates and Administration Bill. Having since had time for a little calm reflection, perhaps the hon. and learned Gentleman would now state if he were inclined to adopt the Amendment, or withdraw the Bill which stood for discussion that evening.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he thought the question sufficiently answered by the fact that the Bill stood first on the Orders for that evening. The case was hardly one which required calm reflection on his part, because he felt confident that the House of Commons, of which it was proverbial that it rarely did wrong upon reflection, would not obstinately adhere to the error into which it had fallen.

REINFORCEMENTS FOR INDIA AND CHINA—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he did not see the Prime Minister in his place, but, being informed that the right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Admiralty was prepared to answer the question of which he had given notice, he would now ask:—Whether any recent intelligence has been received as to the position and proceedings of Her Majesty's Forces in China; whether Her Majesty's Government have sent out any instructions, empowering the Indian Government to divert from their destination the troops which had been sent from this country to China, and employ them in India? If no such instructions have been sent, whether it be true that the Governor General of India has, of his own authority, acting under the pressure of events in that country, sent orders to Ceylon that the forces sent from this country to China are on their arrival at Ceylon, to proceed to India; and, whether Her Majesty's Government are prepared to tate, in the event of its being intended that the troops sent to China shall be immediately employed in India, what course they proposed to take for strengthening the British forces in China?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he did not know exactly to what extent his right hon. Friend wished he should answer the question as to the exact position of the forces in the Canton river. The last letters received from Sir Michael Seymour were dated the 10th of May, at which time things in the river remained pretty much as they were, no hostilities of any kind having taken place on either side. Sir Michael Seymour was waiting for the reinforcements now on their way from this country. Three gunboats had already arrived, and four others were known to be on their way from Singapore to Canton, and were in fact hourly expected at the time the Admiral wrote. Other vessels were also, it was known, on their way. As regarded the second question of the right hon. Baronet, no instructions had been sent out empowering the Indian Government to divert from their destination the reinforcements intended for China. No orders had been sent to Ceylon by the Governor General directing the forces intended for China to proceed to India on their arrival at Ceylon. It was known, however, to Her Majesty's Government that the Governor General had written to Lord Elgin asking his Lordship if he acquiesced in the propriety of the arrangement to divert the destination of these troops. Whether Lord Elgin had received this letter was not known, but, judging from the last advices received from Point de Galle, the Government supposed he had not. As the supposition upon which the last question was based had no foundation, it was unnecessary to answer it.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: In the event of Lord Elgin being willing to accede to such an application from the Governor General of India, has he any power or authority to assent to the diversion of those troops?

SIR CHARLES WOOD: No such occurrence as that which has taken place was contemplated by the Government when Lord Elgin left this country, and he therefore received no instructions or authority to act on such a contingency. What Lord Elgin might do, acting upon the principle of salus populi suprema lex, if he received an application for the diversion of the troops from the Governor General, it is impossible to say.

On the Motion that the House at its rising adjourn till Monday,

TROOPS FOR INDIA—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, he rose to ask the President of the Board of Control whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to send the troops which are about to embark for India in sailing ships. Considerable anxiety and doubt existed in the country with respect to the mode in which the troops which were to be embarked for India were to be despatched—feelings which had arisen in a great measure from an apparent discrepancy in the answers which had been given by two different Cabinet Ministers on the subject. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty had stated in reply to a question from the hon. and gallant Member for Roscommon (Colonel French) that steam vessels, if they could be procured, would be employed for the purpose, and that statement had been received with strong marks of approbation by the House. In another place, however, the noble Lord who presided over the War Department was reported to have said that it was the intention of the Government to send the troops out in sailing vessels, because steam vessels could not easily be procured, and because at this time of the year sailing vessels would make the passage to India quite as quickly as, if not quicker than, steamers. Now, he felt certain that every person must feel how necessary it was that no time should be lost in expediting the departure of these troops for India, and that the passage should be made as rapidly as possible. He was by no means an alarmist as to the state of affairs in India; but he thought that the time had come when it was essential that we should assert our rule in that country in a positive and unmistakeable manner—when we should show that it was our determination to maintain it, and should convince those who disputed it; that the day of retribution would be not only certain, but speedy.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman had mistaken the statement of his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty, in supposing him to say that all the troops were going out in steam vessels. He believed that all his right hon. Friend said was, that some of them were to be sent by steam; so that there was no contrariety between the answer given by him and by his noble Friend at the head of the War Department. But the manner in which it was proposed to send out the troops was this:—In the first place, he should say that the arrangements for sending out troops, amounting to near 10,000 men, as reliefs, previous to receiving the late intelligence from India, were made for despatching them in sailing vessels; and they would all proceed in the course of the present month to their destination in the way originally intended. When the news arrived, these arrangements having been already made, it was not thought advisable to change them so far as these 10,000 men were concerned; but with regard to the additional 4,000 men asked for by the East India Company in consequence of the intelligence from India, the arrangements were these: that 2,000 of them should proceed in screw steam vessels, and the other 2,000 in sailing vessels. There was a great variety of opinions as to whether, at this peculiarly favourable season of the year, sailing vessels would not be the swifter means of conveyance; and it was in order to excite a rivalry between them and steam vessels, and in the hope of transporting the troops with the greater rapidity, that the arrangement specified had been made. The whole of the steam vessels were engaged to depart from this country between the 21st and 29th of July, and he hoped they would be able to make the voyage in seventy days. There should be no delay, and he could assure the hon. and gallant Gentleman that no considerations of any sort would prevent the Government from despatching the troops by the speediest means of conveyance.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he regretted that the whole 4,000 men were not to be sent out in steamers, because it was absurd to suppose that sailing vessels could perform the voyage so quickly as steamers. If the steamers used their sails when they met the trade winds and lit their fires before they got into them and after they left them, they would be steaming along at a rapid rate, while the sailing vessels would be lying becalmed, and he believed that they would reach their destination quite a month or six weeks before the sailing vessels. The delay which had already taken place showed how impolitic it was of the Government to have reduced our home squadron after the Russian war; because, if the squadron had not been entirely paid off when this news arrived, the troops might have been shipped directly, and might have sailed from this country in forty-eight hours after the intelligence from India had reached it. In 1827, when Spain attacked Portugal, Mr. Canning went down to the House and stated, that the news had arrived on a Friday, there was a Cabinet Council on Saturday, on Sunday the opinion of His Majesty was taken, and on Monday the troops were in full march for Portugal. He regretted that similar despatch had not been used in the present instance.

THE RUSSIAN TARIFF—QUESTION.

MR. J. L. RICARDO said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Board of Trade, whether the Government have any knowledge of the details of the revised tariff of Russia? and, if so, whether they will lay them upon the table of the House.

MR. LOWE said, that the Board of Trade was in possession of some account of a change in the Russian tariff, but that it was neither full nor explicit. He did not think that it was in such a state that it would be proper to lay it upon the table of the House; but, as soon as he received a full account, he should be most happy to present it.

SARDINIAN AND TURKISH MEDALS. QUESTION.

COLONEL NORTH said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary for War, when the Turkish order of the Medjidi, the Sardinian military medal, and the Turkish medal for officers and men, will be distributed to those entitled to them. He considered that a long time had elapsed since those distinctions had been earned. The French army had received and had been wearing them for some period, and it was natural that our officers and men should be anxious on the subject.

SIR JOHN RAMSDEN said, in answer to the first part of the question, that all that rested with the Government in this country to do, as regarded the order of the Medjidi, had already been done. The list of those entitled to it was some time ago prepared at the Horse Guards and transmitted to the Foreign Office, with a request that Lord Clarendon would send it on to Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, with instructions that he should lose no time in submitting it to the approval of the Sultan; at the same time urging upon Lord Stratford de Redcliffe the importance of at once obtaining the insignia of the Order, both for the British Army and the Turkish Contingent. The same answer applied to that part of the question of the hon. and gallant Gentleman as related to the Turkish medal, which had not yet been received, but which Lord Stratford de Redcliffe had been asked to lose no time in forwarding. The Sardinian medals were in the hands of the adjutant general, with instructions to distribute them immediately. The list of recipients of the Sardinian medal had been printed, and would be laid before Parliament in a few days.

Sir Charles Napier

SIR WILLIAM CODRINGTON said, there seemed to be much delay that was not necessary as regarded the distribution of the Turkish order of the Medjidi and the Sardinian War medal. It was on that day twelvemonth that the Crimea was evacuated. In the meanwhile, officers were leaving the army and men were dying. He hoped that something would be done, therefore, to facilitate the distribution. As it was a voluntary offer, he believed, on the part of the Turkish Government to give these decorations, he did not see any reason why the subject should be referred to Constantinople.

THE PERIODICAL PRESS—QUESTION.

MR. AYRTON said, that the other night he endeavoured to call the attention of the House to the course the Government were pursuing, in attempting to enforce the provisions of the law against certain publications, many of which provisions might be regarded as obsolete, and some of which, in his opinion, ought not to be enforced under the circumstances in which the press was at present placed. It appeared that the Government were acting under the advice of the law officers of the Crown, but he was told that it was unprecedented to lay a copy of the opinion of the law officers before the House. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, however, stated, that if any particular case was brought under his notice, he would endeavour to give an explanation of it. The Government had commenced a prosecution against the Bury Times, and he wished to know whether it was their intention to enforce the provisions of the statutes relating to the giving of security and registration on the part of newspapers against every one who contravened those statutes. He believed that the right hon. Gentleman was not correct in the description he had given of what had occurred in the last Parliament. He (Mr. Ayrton) understood that those who desired the repeal of the duty on newspapers, did not wish to embarrass the question by discussing what should be done with respect to registration and security, and therefore the last Parliament came to no deliberate opinion on that matter. Consequently, until the Government took the deliberate opinion of the House upon it, they ought not to institute active measures to enforce the law in that respect. He would now beg to ask, whether it is the intention of Government to continue the prosecution of the publisher of the Bury Times, and to abstain from prosecuting the publisher of the Free Press, and of all other newspapers and pamphlets published without compliance with the statutes relating to security and registration?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he did not understand that it was the duty of the Government to take the opinion of the House as to the enforcement of this statutory provision, which had been law since 1815, or of any other statutory provision. It was their duty to enforce the existing law, and until Parliament altered it, they must take steps to carry the statutory enactment into effect. No alteration was made in the provisions with respect to security to be afforded by newspapers, and with respect to registration when the compulsory stamp duty was taken off; and it was distinctly explained to the House when that change of the law was effected, that the Government did not propose to interfere with those provisions. With that preliminary explanation, he would proceed to answer the question which the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets had put to him. The Government did intend to proceed with the prosecution of the Bury Times, and would similarly proceed against any other newspaper which did not comply with the statutory enactments respecting security and registration. With respect to the other publication, the Free Press, it was not considered to be a newspaper, and therefore no proceedings would be taken against it.

THREATENED REVIVAL OF THE SLAVE TRADE.

MR. TURNER said, he had given notice of his intention to put a question to the noble Lord at the head of the Government, on a subject which was now exciting considerable interest out of doors. It was one which affected and placed in very dangerous circumstances the future trade of the west coast of Africa. This country had made great sacrifices, both of treasure and of blood, to suppress the infamous traffic in slaves on the west coast of Africa; and he believed that one flag alone of those belonging to European States was stained by floating over places where that traffic was carried on. Even Brazil, though justice had scarcely been done to that country by the noble Lord, had suppressed that traffic; and he hoped that the time might soon arrive when the Government would be satisfied that they could with propriety repeal that statute which had been so offensive to the Brazilian Government. To the surprise of the enemies of slavery in this country, a movement had been made by France to obtain a supply of labour for her West India Colonies under the name of a free emigration of negroes. Those who had had long experience of African trade knew that such an idea was perfectly unfounded, and that if the French Government attempted to convey negroes from the west coast of Africa, that would be, in truth and in fact, a revival of the slave trade. He had been informed that they had made a contract with a house at Marseilles, Messrs. Regis, for the supply of 10,000 negroes to their West Indian Colonies. He knew that that firm had establishments at various places on the west coast of Africa; and he believed that they would first attempt to get their supplies from Whydah—a place which was deeply stained with the horrors of the slave traffic in former times. The consequence of this would be, that inroads would be made into the interior, and the populace would be brought down to be shipped at that place; but it was absolute folly to suppose that there would ever be in that country anything like free emigration. The wretched creatures would be driven like cattle to the coast, and there shipped like slaves; so much per head would be paid to those who brought them. It would be, in truth and in fact, a revival of the slave trade; and he was sorry to say, that the French were not the people who had the reputation of dealing in the most humane manner with poor creatures so situate. Some years ago the French took possession of two ports, Assinee and Grand Bassam, on the coast near Ashantee. It was well known how barbarous the Ashantees were; and, no doubt, if the French attempted to get supplied at those ports, a regular supply of slaves would be brought down from Ashantee. He, therefore, wished to put the following question to the noble Lord: Whether any communication has taken place between the English and French Governments respecting the exports of negroes from the West Coast of Africa to the French Colonies in the West Indies; and whether he is aware in what manner the negroes are to be obtained?

SIR EDWARD BUXTON said, he believed it was an undoubted fact, that persons taken from the east coast of Africa had been conveyed as free colonists to the Isle of Bourbon, and that there they practically remained slaves, either for a long term of years or for their whole lives. He wished the noble Lord at the head of the Government to say, whether he knew anything of that practice.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, Her Majesty's Government had information some time ago, to the effect, that a contract had been made by persons in Martinique with a French firm for the supply of 1,200 free negroes, who, it was said, were to be brought from the coast of Africa. The Government felt the full force of the objections to this proceeding, as stated by the hon. Member for Manchester. Though slavery is abolished in the French colonies, and though negroes conveyed there must necessarily by law be free men, subject to a certain period of apprenticeship, yet the importation of a number of free negroes from Africa would, in all probability, degenerate into the slave trade, as far as Africa is concerned, and be attended with all the evils of that trade. An attempt has been made to obtain free emigrants from the West Coast of Africa for our own West Indian Colonies. The attempt has, however, failed. The negroes are not disposed to emigrate and to go across the seas, and there is therefore a great probability that the French Government will be equally unsuccessful in obtaining really free emigrants, and that if this contract is carried into execution it will be productive, to the extent to which it is carried out, of a revival of the evils of the slave trade in Africa. These considerations have been confidentially communicated to the French Government. They have assured us that it is their anxious desire that this arrangement should not be productive of a renewal of the slave trade, and that every care will be taken to prevent the recurrence of such an evil.

Mr. Turner

Such is the state of the question at the present time. Of course, it will be the duty of Her Majesty's Government to obtain all the information they can, so that if their fears are realized, they may bring to the knowledge of the French Government that their intentions are defeated, and that what they wish to prevent has taken place. I cannot have any doubt that the French Government would, in that case, put an end to a proceeding which would be contrary not only to all the feelings of humanity, but to those treaty arrangements which, in common with other countries, have been taken by France with regard to the slave trade. My hon. Friend (Sir E. Buxton) asks me, whether Her Majesty's Government have any information with respect to the Isle of Bourbon. We have information, but not from any authentic source, that there has been an emigration from the East Coast of Africa to the Isle of Bourbon. I cannot state to what extent that emigration has proceeded, nor can I say in what manner the negroes have been obtained.

Motion agreed to.

House at rising to adjourn till Monday next.

PROBATES AND LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION BILL—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

On the Motion that Clause 40, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he wished to bespeak the attention of the Committee while he stated the course that the Government intended to take with regard to the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for York (Mr. Westhead) and adopted by the Committee, and with respect to which he could not but think there was some misunderstanding on the part of the Committee, and after all he was willing to admit that some portion of the blame was attributable to himself. Hon. Members who supported that Amendment no doubt did so in the desire to secure to farmers and small proprietors the supposed advantage of being able to prove wills in local districts without the necessity of coming to town. The property of farmers generally consisted of farming-stock and agricultural produce, all of which might be described as property locally situate, and with regard to which it did not seem easy to commit a fraud through the medium of proving a forged will, or a will irregularly executed, or that had been subject to improper tampering and fraudulent alteration. Such having been the views and intentions of the hon. Member and of the Committee, he desired to meet the wishes of the Committee, and should not object to alter the limits given by the clause, so as to extend it, with the view of including every case that the Committee desired to embrace by the Amendment. He felt confident, on the other hand, and many hon. Members had confirmed him in this view, that the view present to his own mind was that which the great majority of the Committee would be disposed to adopt. His view was that great facilities for fraud would be afforded in dealing with funded property and stock in public companies if wills relating to this description of property were permitted to be proved in country districts. Let him put before the Committee an example of what it would be easy to do under the law if it remained in the state in which the Amendment made in Clause 40 left it. These district registries would be very numerous. They would be presided over by a registrar, who was not likely to be a person of the highest class of qualification, though he might be sufficiently qualified to carry on the ordinary business of his office, with perhaps one clerk under that registrar. The emoluments and business of many of these courts would probably not be sufficient to maintain a greater staff than that. Suppose, then, a gentleman died in Paris or in a distant part of the country, and that an individual presented himself at the office of the district in which the deceased was usually resident, and produced a will of the deceased. According to the present state of the law, all that would be required would be that the person named as executor should bring the will, with the ordinary affidavit as to the place where the will was found and of its due execution, and then he was entitled to obtain probate. Well, suppose an individual went to the district office with a will purporting to be the will of the deceased? He would perhaps find there a clerk in the receipt of a salary of 25s. or 30s. a week. The integrity of a clerk who stood in that situation could hardly be expected to be proof against a very moderate amount of pecuniary solicitation; and thus a forged or irregularly executed instrument might be admitted to probate. That might be performed next day, and after the instrument had been deposited for 24 hours with the Bank of England, the individual obtaining probate would be as much the master of all the stock and property as the deceased himself would be if he had remained alive. That would be a state of things fraught with danger. But take the case of a will fraudulently altered, either by interlining or obliterating a legacy, or the appointment of an executor. By the law, as it stood before the Amendment was adopted, such wills would be tested in London by the experience of men well versed in such matters, competent to judge, and responsible to the court for the individuals whom they undertook to represent being the persons they were described to be. They stood in a similar situation to the broker who went with a person to make a transfer of stock in the Bank of England, the Broker in that case being responsible that the man whom he brought to make a transfer was the person whose name appeared in the books as the owner of the stock. But in the office of the district registrar they could not expect to find that the persons performing these duties should possess the skill and experience requisite to apply a law which was highly technical so as to detect what parts had been altered, what ought to be admitted to probate, and what ought not to be received without further testimony. These were the difficulties which presented themselves to his mind when the Vote of the other day was taken; and feeling that it was of no use to undertake such an important subject without entertaining a sincere desire to carry it out completely, he saw that the Vote was calculated to destroy its beneficial effect, and it was natural, perhaps, that it should have produced at the moment a feeling of vexation. He trusted, however, that no difference of opinion upon such a point would be fatal to a beneficial measure which had been solicited and desired for thirty years. He therefore desired to give the House an opportunity that day of reconsidering the matter, and to do so in a manner which he trusted would be acceptable to the House. He wished to meet the subject in a way which would insure the object of hon. Members who held different opinions to his own in reference to it, and at the same time to save a measure which he believed would be one of great benefit to the country from being an instrument of danger and mischief. With that view he would undertake to frame and bring up on the Report a clause which should give the district court the power of receiving wills in cases where the property locally situated within the district did not exceed £3,000 in personalty, exclusive of funded property and the stock or shares of any public company. With regard to funded property any error or fraud committed in the granting of probate might be irretrievable, for the party to the fraud might obtain possession of the money, and make away with it in less than forty-eight hours after its commission. So with regard to the stock or shares in a public company, the party to whom probate was granted, wrongfully or otherwise, was at once entitled to the shares on the faith of the probate, and immediately put in a position to transfer them. He had, therefore, only to transfer to some person—who might be an agent acting in collusion with him in the transaction—for an apparently valuable consideration, and in that way the property would be altogether taken away from the true representatives of the deceased, and the company might have eventually to pay the loss to the real executor or the real legatee. He was, therefore, about to propose, when the question was put, “that this Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill,” that it be negatived, on the understanding, on his part, that a clause having the object which he had indicated, and worded in the manner he had described, should be brought up on the Report. He did not mean to say that the Government stood pledged not to go beyond the £3,000, but what he meant was that from a variety of considerations they believed that was the amount beyond which it would not be desirable to go. That, however, was a point which would be open to discussion when the clause was brought up. He regretted to state that he did not think it possible for him to recommend the Government to accede to the clause as it now stood, apprehending, as he did, that if it were left in that way the Bill might be converted into a great instrument of fraud; and he could not but hope that this great measure would not pass into a law unless the Committee could meet on this subject on some such terms of arrangement and compromise as he had taken the liberty to suggest.

MR. HENLEY said, if he understood the hon. and learned Gentleman right, he meant property not in one district, but in any district, of the amount of £3,000. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL: In any district.] He should, therefore, offer no opposition to the proposed arrangement, on the understanding, however, that as the clause involved two distinct questions—one, the question of amount; the other, whether any and what description of property, as funded property, for instance, should be excluded—it should be brought up for discussion in Committee, and not on the Report.

The Attorney General

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL considered the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman an improvement, and he would willingly adopt it.

MR. WESTHEAD said, as he was the mover of the Amendment which was carried against the Government the other night, he wished to occupy the attention of the Committee for a few moments. He had heard the way in which the Attorney General proposed to meet the difficulty arising out of the clause as it stood at present. He (Mr. Westhead) acted for a class of gentlemen—mercantile men and solicitors of eminence in this country—who were well acquainted with all the bearings of this question, and he should be holding out false expectations if he led the Attorney General to conclude that they would be satisfied with any such limit as £3,000. He had heard a general disposition to concede all that he thought could be reasonably required—namely, that such property as had heretofore been proved in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury should continue to be proved there; but as regarded the proposed transfer of business to London from such dioceses as those of Chester and York, he thought when he had stated a few figures which had been laid before the Commissioners on this subject, the Committee would see at once that the sum of £3,000 was a limit which it was utterly preposterous to propose under the circumstances. In the five years from 1851 to 1855 inclusive, wills to the following amount in personalty were proved in the Consistory Court of Chester and the Prerogative Court of York—

1 will under £350,000 and above £300,000
1	300,000	250,000
3	250,000	200,000
2	200,000	180,000
3	180,000	160,000
3	160,000	140,000
29	140,000	80,000
94	80,000	40,000
200	40,000	20,000
458	20,000	10,000
3709	10,000	1,500

The total number of wills proved in the Courts of Chester and York alone, exclusive of the Consistory Courts of Lancaster, Nottingham, and Durham, in the five years he had mentioned was 4,503 where the personalty amounted to upwards of £1,500. He certainly thought that persons having such weighty interests in those courts would never consent to the proposition of the hon. and learned Attorney General that this amount of wills should all be brought to London. With regard to funded property and railway shares, he had no very strong objection to the proposition of the Attorney General, although he thought the measure would be more complete if it passed with the clause as it now stood. Under this Bill there would be forty-two district courts in lieu of 400 diocesan courts, and therefore they could afford to pay sufficient remuneration to the officers employed. But with the present 400 courts, and all that was said against the system, where was the evidence of frauds? The registrar of the Archdeaconry of Nottinghamshire said in his evidence that "he had been registrar twenty-eight years; 8,400 wills had passed through his hands; not one had been repudiated or revoked, and only two contentious cases had arisen out of the whole. The principal deputy registrar in the London Courts, who had filled the office since 1829, only recollected one case—that of a forged will, and in that instance the parties were transported. He did not think there was any reason to fear that there would be more fraud—there could hardly be less—than at present, if the district courts were properly officered. It was no doubt very important that there should be a proper index. Mr. Trevor stated that if the name were given he could find the will of any person in five minutes, and in ten minutes who was residuary legatee, and that in the same time he could find out any legatee. There would be no difficulty, judging from Mr. Trevor's evidence, in having a correct index of wills. The clause with reference to the deposit of wills, provided that all wills proved in the district courts should be deposited in those courts. The Bill, as first drawn, provided that four-fifths of the wills which were under £1,500 should be proved in these district courts, and he saw no reason why the whole should not be included. He did not think it safe that wills probably drawn up by schoolmasters should be left in the care of persons who had but a salary of 25s. a week, when there was a probate tax of £90,000, which would enable them to pay sufficient salaries, and thus induce those who transacted the business to perform their duties in a satisfactory and creditable manner. He could not therefore, with any degree of consistency, assent to the alterations proposed.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE said, he hoped the House would not revoke the deliberate Vote already come to on two separate occasions. The clause of the hon. and learned Attorney General would simply alter the amount, but on Monday night the Committee had deliberately decided upon a principle, and not upon any detail. They had decided that persons in the country should be allowed to transact business with those in whom they had confidence, and that it was not for the interest of the public that all the business should be concentrated in the new court in London. He believed notice of an Amendment had been given to make the salary of the Judge of the new court the same as the salaries of the puisne Judges, and the proposition to compensate the proctors would also tend to make the Bill very expensive. With regard to the objection to the business being done by a clerk at 25s. a week, it seemed to be forgotten that no probate passed without the signature of the registrar, and there was every reason to suppose that the Lord Chancellor would take care to appoint proper persons for those offices. It would be far better, in his opinion, to allow executors to go to the office of the registrar in the country, where they could do the business in an hour, than require them to come to the London court, probably with the solicitor who made the will, with the solicitor's town agents, and with a proctor in attendance. He was most anxious that the Bill should pass, but he was desirous it should pass in a shape acceptable to the public. He should, in common with the hon. Member for York (Mr. Westhead), make a stand upon the question of limitation, and, should the Committee divide, he should vote in favour of retaining the amended clause.

MR. AYRTON thought, that as all the other clauses of the Bill depended on this, it would be impossible to go on with the Bill until the clause suggested by the Attorney General was before the Committee.

MR. WIGRAM said, he wished to ask whether, in every case, it was intended that the probate of a will of property consisting of shares or stock should be taken out in the central office in London, and not in the local courts?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that was the intention, and it would undoubtedly be the effect. He felt it essential to the security of the Bank of England, and to the great offices of London, that their stock should not be transferred without the probate being taken out, or counter-sealed in the central court in London.

COLONEL SMYTH remarked, that he believed that the expression of opinion by the Committee the other night, that there should be no limit whatever in the amount of wills registered in the district courts, was in accordance with the general feeling of the country. He should vote for the amended clause.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that with respect to the inquiry of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Cambridge University, he might state that he had given notice of a clause, the effect of which would be that, under probate granted by the registrars of the district courts, no stock in the Bank of England and East India Company should be transferred until the probate was counter-sealed by the central office in London. Of course, he could have no objection to that provision being extended to the shares of railway companies.

MR. HUDSON said, he believed that the Vote at which the House had arrived on Monday last did not in the least refer to the limit of £1,500. It appeared to him to have indicated the opinion of the House to be, that the jurisdiction of the district courts should extend to any amount of property which did not include funded or railway property; and he thought that, with the assistance of the Amendment proposed by his hon. and learned Friend, they might proceed to discuss the clause. He, for his own part, should not be sorry if the persistence of the learned Attorney General in his views led to the loss of the Bill, for he could not but look upon it as a device to bring the practice of the country up to London, while it was most unpopular throughout the country.

MR. COLLINS said, he thought the Attorney General could not be serious in his argument that fraud and forgeries would be encouraged by giving the district courts unlimited jurisdiction. There were a very large number of local courts having unlimited jurisdiction, in which wills to a large amount had been proved without any cause for complaint having arisen, and the danger—if danger there were—must be less when they were reduced to forty. He thought that, in pressing the view which it was now sought to press upon the House, there must be some object in the background, such as making business for London practitioners. Now, he, for one, would enter his protest against persons being dragged up to London from distant parts of the country—Devonshire or Cumberland, for instance—in order that a source of maintenance might be provided for the proctors in London.

MR. WALPOLE said, that the Attorney General had raised two questions—first, whether any limit should be placed as to the amount for which probate might be granted by district courts; and, secondly, whether they should have power to grant probate when the property was funded property. Now, in order to decide the first of these questions, there was no necessity to negative the clause, though it would be necessary to have a new provision brought up, in order to come to a conclusion on the second. Again, with regard to the first question, the House had already arrived at a decision upon the subject. He did not himself take any part in the discussion upon that occasion, but he had read the arguments which had been advanced on either side, and he could see no reason for reversing that decision; and with regard to the second question, it might be more advantageously considered at a subsequent period. He himself could not conceive on what ground the learned Attorney General would be able to maintain the principle of limiting the amount, because all the arguments which applied to granting probate in a district court in cases where the property exceeded £3,000 applied with equal force to all cases where the property was under that amount. An observation of an hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Westhead) appeared to him to be entitled to great attention. That hon. Gentleman had informed the House that, in five years, in Cheshire and Yorkshire no less than 2,000 wills had been proved, each of which related to property amounting to £10,000. Now, that was sufficient to show that to limit the jurisdiction of district courts to £3,000 would be without precedent, either in principle or practice. What he would suggest to the Committee was, that the clause should be maintained as the House had settled it on a former occasion, and he would also suggest to the Government that, as the Attorney General had stated that he did not pledge himself to £3,000 as a limit, it would be a better course for them to accede to the principle which the House had sanctioned, that there should be no limit at all, and at a future period the Committee could consider the question as to whether the jurisdiction of the district courts should extend to funded property.

Mr. ELLICE (Coventry) remarked, that he had not been present at the former discussion upon the question. He could not convey to the House the extreme regret he felt at differing from his learned Friend the Attorney General, but he had heard with regret from his learned Friend that, if the clause were maintained as it at present stood, it would be a question with the Government whether they would proceed with the Bill. The country would view with deep regret the failure of this attempt to reform one branch of the law. For his own part, if the limit of £3,000 were agreed to, he could not, after a long experience of the administration of the courts of probate, determine whether it would not be better for the public to continue to submit to the inconvenience of the law as it at present stood. He could bear his testimony that the business of those courts had been conducted better than that of almost any other courts in the country, and there was not the slightest reason why their jurisdiction should be limited to £3,000. The great complaint against those courts was their ecclesiastical character, and that their number was too great. To remedy those complaints, an attempt had been made to transfer their jurisdiction to the Court of Chancery, but that proposal had been met with universal dissatisfaction. If the ecclesiastical character of those courts was taken away, the number of them reduced, and the expense of proceedings in them placed upon a reasonable footing, that was all the reform which was required. As regarded granting an indemnity to the gentlemen who now conducted the business of those courts, it would be better to give them a certain tenure of their business before admitting the general practitioners. As regarded the Bill itself, it was one of great importance, and he should deeply regret it if the Government, in a moment of disappointment, should abandon a measure of a most useful and salutary nature.

Mr. MALINS said, that he had voted for the Government when this matter was last before the House, but that he could not support them now. No doubt the Government were placed in a difficulty, and it would be impossible to surmount that difficulty with consistency and honour by abandoning the principle which they had avowed. His hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had, after mature consideration, said that the principle of the Bill was involved in the country probates being limited to £1,500. What, then, must be the surprise of the Committee when they heard him say that evening "not £1,500, but £3,000 should be the limit." Was not that an abandonment of the principle of the Bill? [The ATTORNEY GENERAL: No!] He would make good his assertion. The principle of the Bill was, that there should be but one probate, and that it should cover every description of property. But the hon. and learned Attorney General came down to the House that evening, and under pressure said, "I will make an exception; the country probate shall be limited to £3,000; but, although I will give authority to a country district to prove a will for £3,000, which may consist of money in the hands of bankers in a neighbouring town, or of money lent on mortgage to the neighbouring squire, it shall not cover £100 Three per Cents. in the Bank of England, nor a single share in a railway, nor in any joint-stock bank whatever." He wanted to know why. Were these district probate courts fit to exist or not? If they were fit to administer, regulate, and control property of one description to the extent of £3,000, why were they not equally fit with respect to property to that amount of another description? The Government had professed throughout, that one great object in bringing forward this Bill was to get rid of the monstrous evil of bona notabilia, and that it was their desire that personal property, wherever situate, should be regarded as of equal quality. Now, that principle of the Bill had been abandoned, and because the Government had been placed in a difficulty by the vote of the Committee the other night, the hon. and learned Attorney General proposed to get out of it by making a distinction between properties of a different description, and rendering money in the funds, railway and joint-stock shares of a more sacred character than any other kind of property. His hon. and learned Friend said it was very important that there should be no frauds, that the Bank of England and the great railway and joint-stock companies should not be imposed upon. Did he, then, avow that the country district courts to be established under his Bill were to be so little trusted—that the property of the country was to be upon such fragile tenure, if entrusted to them, that they ought not to be permitted to prove a will which might give authority to the Bank of England to transfer £100 Three per Cent. stock. The Committee ought not to forget how numerous were the small fundholders. Returns presented to Parliament showed that where there was one man who had £1,000 stock, there were he knew not how many who held £100 stock. The hon. and learned Attorney General, on introducing the Bill, said that it would, among other things, save the country a great deal of expense, because it would permit a will to be proved within the district in which it was made; but, as the hon. Baronet the Member for Lincolnshire had pointed out, all that had been abandoned with regard to property of a particular description, because for that nothing but a London probate would do. He (Mr. Malins) supported the Government the other night, because their Bill was founded upon the Report of the Commissioners, and because it proceeded on the principle that the country probates should be limited in amount only: but, although he was prepared to enter into a sort of compromise on a matter in which no great principle was involved, yet he could not agree to the proposed distinction between bank-stock, railway, and joint-stock shares, and other descriptions of property. He could understand that wills ought to be subject to a careful revision, and that they should come to London for final settlement. But, when he was told that money in the Bank of England was to be protected beyond every other property, he could not understand why such a distinction should be made. He believed that the law was this—that if a man obtained probate of a forged will, and by means of it obtained, as executor, payment of stock in the Bank of England, the property of the person whose name had been forged, that payment was absolutely good. There was the less reason, then, for the proposed distinction between Bank of England stock and other kinds of property. His hon. and learned Friend behind him, the counsel for the Bank of England, would agree with him that, so long as the probate was valid, the Bank would be quite justified in transferring to the pretended executor stock purporting to be bequeathed by the will: therefore, while he supported the principle on which this Bill was originally brought in, he should be obliged to vote against the Government, because, on two essential points, they had abandoned that principle.

Mr. Malins

MR. HENLEY: I believe I have been misunderstood in what I stated. I carefully avoided giving any opinion as to whether there should be a limit at all, or whether probates in the country should be limited to £3,000. All that I said was that I was willing to postpone the consideration of that question. I did not at all enter into its merits, though every hon. Member must have known that all through the debate he had been opposed to any limit whatever.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Among the amusing incidents of this debate, if there had been any amusement in it, was the contrast between the speech just made by the hon. and learned Member for Walsingham (Mr. Malins) and the hearty support which he gave to the Bill on two divisions on a previous night. To what wonderful influence that conversion was to be attributed he could not say. [MR. MALINS: No conversion whatever.] Well, then, the delightful inconsistency between the speech and the votes of the hon. and learned Member was a mystery perfectly unintelligible to every one who had marked his conduct. The Government had not been guilty of any inconsistency, nor did he (the Attorney General) admit that they were in a difficulty. If there were any difficulty at all about this measure, it was the people of England who were in that difficulty. The course taken by the Government was this—in order to accomplish what had been represented to be a great good—namely, the giving local opportunities and benefits to persons in the country in humble circumstances, they departed from the true principle of requiring that all wills should be subjected to that perfect examination which could only be given in the principal registry in London. And, accordingly, £1,500 was put in the Bill as the extent to which that departure was to be permitted. He trusted that they might hear no more of the ordinary puerile declamation about the rights of the poor as contrasted with the rights of the rich. It was, undoubtedly, a beneficial thing to the poor that a Bill should be brought forward in which, for the sake of consulting their interests, a right principle was, to a limited extent, departed from. But he understood that his right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire, to whose mature judgment on these questions he desired to pay every possible respect, suggested an enlargement of that compromise, to which the Government acceded; and in order to meet that concession on the one side a further concession had been made on the other, that the country probate should be limited with regard to property of a particular description—namely, funded or share property. [Mr. HENLEY: Funded only; not share property.] There was therefore to be a departure from the principle on which £1,500 was inserted in the Bill. That was so obvious that everybody perceived the reason for that departure but the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford. And hence his thunder. If £1,500 had remained in the Bill it would have comprehended all funded and share property within that limit. The hon. and learned Member for Wallingford did not perceive that it would be very difficult for a man to run away with a rick of corn or a flock of sheep, but that it would be very easy for him to run away with £1,000 Consols. Again, he (the Attorney General) maintained that the Government were not in a difficulty, for the present was merely a case of concession on the one side, and on the other. If he were to express his own individual opinion—but which he gave up in deference to that of others—he should at once frankly say, with regard to property locally situated in the country, such as agricultural stock, machinery, stock in trade, &c., let there be no difference. But then he was expressing his own individual opinion. All he could say was that, with this expression of his own individual feeling on the point (which might furnish some sort of assurance to the Committee as to the decision of the Government upon further consideration), he must unquestionably persevere in the course he had indicated—namely, to negative the question that this clause as amended stand part of the Bill. While pursuing this course, however, he would follow out to the letter the undertaking he had given to bring up a new clause in Committee, and as far as he was concerned, if his opinion had any weight, he should not be obstinate with regard to the limitation of the amount of property.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he agreed with his hon. and learned Friend in regard to the first question, which had been very distinctly put by the right hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Walpole)—namely, the question of limitation. He confessed that at first it appeared that some limitation of the amount of property locally—that was, anywhere—situated might be desirable. But the general sense of the House was against such a limitation, which, moreover, was not essential to the principle of the Bill. This measure was one which the Government considered it of great importance to pass; indeed, he thought it so important in its general provisions that it would be a great evil if, in consequence of the differences of opinion upon what he must say were subordinate details, a measure of such unquestionable value should even be delayed for another year. If, then, they were prepared by mutual concession to agree that there should be no limitation in the amount of property locally situated, exclusive of stock and funded property, and subject to future consideration as to whether it should be exclusive of shares in railways and other companies, he thought it was hardly worth while to put the House to the trouble of a division upon this clause. The clause did not prejudice those other questions; it left the matter open for discussion, when his hon. and learned Friend brought up (in Committee, and not on the Report) the clause of which he had given notice; and therefore he thought they had better waive the Motion for disagreeing to this clause. The clause would stand as it was, and then his hon. and learned Friend would have an opportunity, before the Committee terminated, of bringing up his clause, which would settle the point respecting share and funded property.

Motion agreed to; Clause, as amended, to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 41 to 50 inclusive were then agreed to.

Clause 51 (Appeal from the County Court).

MR. MALINS said, this clause gave the appeal from the County Courts to any Court of Common Law. He thought it would be better to give the appeal to the Court of Probate; it would be more consonant to the principle of the measure. He should, therefore, move to insert the words, "Court of Probate, whose decision shall be final." In properties of small amount one appeal would be sufficient.

MR. AYRTON suggested, that as the Common Law Courts sat only in term, if the appeal was to them, the probate might often be delayed most inconveniently.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he was quite prepared to agree to the Amendment, but he wished to consider how it had best be carried into effect. In the Act referred to in the clause, the mode of appeal from the County Courts was extremely simple, and he would wish to preserve the same mode.

The Amendment was then withdrawn, on the understanding that the Attorney General would bring up a clause to carry it into effect.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he could not permit this opportunity to pass without urging upon the Government the claims of the County Court Judges to something like an equalization of salaries and emoluments. It was well known that when the business of the County Court Judges was nothing in comparison with that which was now committed to them the salaries were fixed at £1,200 a year. Since then a distinction had been made in favour of a few individuals whose salaries had been raised to £1,500 a year; but the duties of all of them had been largely increased. They were about to have confided to them under this Bill contentious jurisdiction over a class of causes embracing sometimes very difficult questions of law, and always very perplexing questions of fact. He thought, therefore, that this was a fitting opportunity for reminding the Government that the County Court Judges were very hardly and unfairly dealt with in respect to their remuneration, and for expressing a hope that the claims of all of them to the increased allowance would be fairly considered.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that last year a Bill was passed which did accomplish prospectively an equalization of the salaries of the County Court Judges, but it did it by reducing all in future to the rate of £1,200 a year. Those who now had £1,500 a year—not in consequence of their greater qualifications, but owing to the larger amount of work which they were supposed to perform—would continue to receive that salary during their lives, but their successors would only have £1,200 per annum. No doubt, it would be very agreeable to the Government to concur in a measure which should raise the salaries of all to £1,500, but the Committee must remember that such a change would add greatly to the public expenditure. Last year a change was made with respect to fees, which imposed on the national exchequer an additional charge of about £100,000; and he thought that, under these circumstances, they had better pause before making so large an addition to the public outlay as would result from increasing all these salaries from £1,200 to £1,500 a year.

Mr. Ayrton

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY suggested funds might be got by abolishing the office of high bailiff.

Clause agreed to, as was also Clause 52.

Clause 53 struck out.

Clause 54.

MR. MALINS said, he had certain proposals on the subject of compensation to submit to the Committee, but as his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had not yet made up his mind with respect to the distribution of testamentary business, he would postpone those proposals till some future occasion.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 55 to 84 were also agreed to.

Clause 85.

MR. ADAMS said, he wished to know whether the Government meant to afford any additional remuneration to the registrars of the County Courts, on whom new duties would be imposed under the provisions of the measure.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE said, that in reference to this matter he felt it his duty to remind the Attorney General that great doubts had been entertained last year that the salaries of the registrars of the County Courts had at the time been raised extravagantly high, regard being had to the work done, and the salaries of the Judges of those courts. The Government would not, he hoped, without careful consideration, resolve on increasing the allowances of those officers.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the impression left on his mind last year was that the servant was in that case better paid than the master. But that circumstance only afforded a proof of the singular power of the country attorneys over certain hon. Members of that House, and a similar testimony, he might observe, was furnished by their proceedings that evening in reference to the present Bill.

MR. CAYLEY observed, that he thought the remark of the Attorney General, with regard to the influence of country attorneys upon hon. Members was scarcely justifiable. What was it but the influence of the London attorneys and the proctors that had prevented such a Bill as that now under consideration from being carried many years ago?

MR. SPOONER said, he believed that the influence of country attorneys was not so excessive with hon. Members on his side of the House as the hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to suppose.

MR. G. CLIVE said, that no class of men could be less injured than the country attorneys by the loss of the description of business transacted in the County Courts; and therefore it was a matter of indifference to them.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, it was the intention to give the Lord Chancellor power to issue a table of fees, but in order to determine the scale, it would be desirable to wait and see what additional business would under the present Bill be thrown upon the County Courts. The House would then be in a situation to consider what additional compensation ought to be given to the County Court Judges and other officers.

MR. MALINS said, he thought that the additional business would be so inconsiderable that it would be unworthy of notice.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 86, Taxation of Costs.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY observed that this clause involved the whole question of compensation, and required explanation.

MR. HADFIELD said, as regarded the expenses of these courts, he should be glad to know out of what fund they would come, and whether there would be an ad valorem duty, or a charge for the work done, or a tax similar to the succession duty.

MR. SALISBURY rose to order. The clause related to the transaction of business, as between solicitor and client, and not to the business of the court, and therefore the hon. Member was not in order.

MR. HADFIELD contended he was in order, and would advise the hon. Member for Chester not to be so zealous on behalf of the Chancellor of Chester. He would again ask out of what fund it was proposed to take the sum which would be required for compensation? He considered it the duty of the House to make probates and administrations as cheap as possible. If, in addition to the probate duties, the succession duties, and the legacy duties which brought a revenue of £3,000,000, and would shortly bring more, estates were to be taxed for the benefit of proctors, registrars, the rev. H. Moore, or any other person to be compensated out of this fund, an act of great injustice would be committed, and the law would be evaded as much as possible. At present the House was literally besieged for compensation by proctors from all parts of the country. They were the only professional class in the community that had ever claimed compensation from the revenues of the Crown. It was in another view of the case an important thing in a political sense to induce parties to bring their wills and administrations freely into court, and he objected to the payment of proctors by an ad valorem rate, instead of according to the amount of work done. They ought, therefore, to have a clear understanding as to the scale of fees, on what principle they were to be charged, and out of what fund they were to be paid.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the speech of the hon. Gentleman, so far as it related to the question of compensation, was out of place; for the Committee was then many hours from the clause relating to that subject. As to the source whence the compensation was to be derived, it would be taken, whatever might be the amount which the Committee might be pleased to give, out of the fund to be created by the costs and charges imposed upon the suitors.

MR. W. N. HODGSON asked the Attorney General if he was prepared to lay on the table a scale of the fees to be taken on probates and administrations in future.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the scale of fees would require a good deal of attention to be given to it by the Lord Chancellor, and he could not undertake, at that moment, to lay it on the table; and if it were on the table, hon. Members not conversant with the minutiae of business to which it related would be unable to form correct opinions with regard to it. He had stated over and over again that the fees to be charged must depend upon the money required to pay the compensation that might be awarded.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 87 (Treasury to provide Buildings).

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that he understood that a portion of the money at least would come out of the Treasury. It would be most satisfactory if the hon. and learned Attorney General could state that no portion of the sum would be chargeable on the Consolidated Fund.

MR. MALINS said, that in his proposals, he certainly did not contemplate throwing a single farthing on the Consolidated Fund, and he believed the hon. and learned Attorney General entertained the same view. He understood the object would be attained, not by imposing an additional charge upon the public, but by continuing the existing charges for a limited period.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the amount of compensation would be provided for by fees; but with regard to the other charges for the due administration of justice in these courts, although they would primarily come out of the fees, yet if any deficiency arose, the Consolidated Fund would be called in, though only in the last resort.

MR. BARROW said, he wished to remind the Attorney General, in reference to the question put by the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. W. N. Hodgson) that when the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for the University of Oxford, brought this subject before the House he stated the percentage at which he proposed to charge the fees payable on granting probates and letters of administration. He thought, moreover, that as the Treasury would provide the necessary officers for carrying on the business of the courts, that portion of the charge would, as in all other cases, properly fall upon the fund set aside for the general administration of justice in this country.

MR. ROLT asked whether, as the business of the College of Advocates, which was an incorporated body, would be at an end, there should not be a clause empowering them to sell their property, which at present they were incapacitated from doing.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE observed, that it was very desirable that a secure place should be had for depositing wills, and as the public were accustomed to the present place, he knew of no better than the building in Doctors' Commons. There was nothing in the Bill which would enable them to retain that building, although power was given to hire or build a place for that purpose.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, on a former occasion, when he introduced the measure, he stated in great detail the opportunities which were presented for the deposit of wills in the fire-proof chambers at Somerset House, which were at present unoccupied, and where they could be placed in the most convenient form for reference and inspection. The Registrar General had devoted a great deal of attention to the subject, and had furnished him with plans which showed at how little expense all the wills in London and the country might be stored and arranged at Somerset House, where they would be in immediate connection with that great store-office of statistical information, the office for the registration of births, deaths, and marriages, and with the Legacy-duty Office. It was his earnest hope that he should see all the wills in the country so arranged at Somerset House that they might be at all times inspected. With regard to the court itself, it was no doubt very desirable, if not absolutely essential, that it should have its local habitation in immediate vicinity to the Superior Courts of Westminster Hall, and one result would no doubt be that the advocates would follow the court. A great part of Doctors' Commons belonged to the Faculty of Advocates, and he had on several occasions expressed it as his opinion that they had a right to dispose of it; and if his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Rolt) would propose clauses with a view to the attainment of that object, they should have his best consideration.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he took it for granted that when his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General expressed a hope that all wills would be deposited in Somerset House, he meant only copies, so far as country wills were concerned, it being an essential provision of the Bill that all wills should be so deposited that persons interested would be able to gain immediate access to them.

MR. CAYLEY said, nothing would be more objected to in the country than the idea of removing original wills to London.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, no such idea had been entertained. The subject was one on which the feelings of the inhabitants of the country must of course be consulted. He regretted very much that country wills must remain in the country, because he thought the retention of them there prevented the collection of a great body of valuable information. The building of suitable depositories in the country was, in fact, contemplated in the Bill.

Sir Henry Willoughby

MR. WESTHEAD observed, that he had given notice of an Amendment which he intended to move on the bringing up of the Report, to the effect that wills proved in any district court should be deposited in the registry of that court.

Clause 87 agreed to; as was also clause 88.

The Committee then proceeded to the consideration of the additional clauses.

On the clause fixing £4,000 a year as the salary of the Judge,

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he had given notice to move as additional clauses 1. To enable the Judge, if a Privy Councillor, to sit as a Member of the Judicial Committee. 2. The salary of the Judge to be £5,000 a year. 3. To enable the court to summon and empanel juries in like manner as the Superior Courts of common law, and to try issues and hear and determine motions for new trials in the court itself, and to direct issues to be tried at the assizes. 4. To require grants of probate or administration, where the estate comprises stock at the Bank of England or East India House, to be sealed at the principal registry in London, as well as in the district registry. In conformity with this notice, he should first move to insert £5,000 as the salary, instead of £4,000. This Judge would be precisely in the same position as the Vice Chancellors and the common law puisne Judges. He thought, therefore, that a permanent salary of £5,000 a year should be granted, as the adoption of any other course would stamp the office with an inferiority which might have the effect of throwing difficulties in the way of the Crown in its endeavour to secure the services of the most eminently qualified person to preside over the new court.

MR. AYRTON objected to the proposal of the hon. and learned Member. The Government must have considered the matter, and upon that consideration come to the determination that £4,000 was a fitting salary. For his own part, he concurred in that view, and thought the Amendment ought not to be pressed.

SIR FRANCIS BARING observed that he thought that the Committee ought to hear from the Government what were their views upon the subject, as it was well known that there was never a salary that some one did not propose an increase of it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said that if there had been a general feeling expressed by the Committee in favour of the suggestion of his hon. and learned Friend he would have been prepared to accede to it, but such did not appear to be the case; and he would remind the Committee that there was a provision in the Bill to increase the salary to £5,000 when the labours of the judge became more arduous. In that event the salary would be equal to that received by the other Judges. As the hon. Member had supposed, the Government had gravely considered the question, and he trusted therefore that the Committee would pass the clause as it stood.

Amendment by leave withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause (providing an additional salary in case of the Judge of the Court of Probate filling the office of Judge of the Admiralty Court) agreed to.

Clause (Crown to grant a retiring pension of £2,000 in case the salary of the Judge stood at £4,000, and a pension of £3,500 in case it stood at £5,000.)

MR. MOWBRAY said, he rose to move to reduce the latter pension to £2,500, considering that it was disproportionate as it stood.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL trusted that the Committee would allow the clause to stand as it was. The additional pension was given only in the event of the salary of the Judge being £5,000. This amount was the amount which a long course of usage had sanctioned in the case of all the other Judges. When the Committee considered the duties which the Judge of this court would have to fulfil, duties demanding great learning, occupying considerable time, and requiring most patient investigation, he thought they would agree with him that the amount was not too large. The Committee had, in negating an Amendment to increase the salary from £4,000, given the Government credit for having carefully weighed this matter; he hoped they would still extend that credit to them.

MR. MALINS observed that he quite concurred in what had fallen from the Attorney General; he considered, however, that the retiring pension of £2,000, which was to be the sum if the salary remained at £4,000, was too small.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he wished to point out that as the Bill stood it made no provision for the learned Judge of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, supposing he should decline the office of Judge of the new Court. In such an event, the learned Judge would find his office abolished and himself left without one shilling of compensation. He trusted that the Government would consider this matter. If the present opportunity were allowed to pass by, Government would be under the necessity of passing a special Act of Parliament to provide an allowance for him.

MR. HUDSON said, he also thought that the retiring pension of £3,500 was not too large. The Committee should remember that it was only payable after fifteen years' service. He hoped that the Amendment would be withdrawn.

Amendment by leave withdrawn.

On the question that the Clause stand part of the Bill,

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that it was impossible for the Government to state what steps they would take in the event of a contingency occurring which it was not in their power to foresee. If the learned Judge of the Prerogative Court declined to accept the new office, the House, he had no doubt, would deal with him in that liberal spirit which had animated them in the arrangement made with respect to the Masters in Chancery. If the duties of the Court of Admiralty devolved upon the new Judge, the salary attached to the office would be £5,000 a year.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, if the Bill passed, the Government could not confer on Sir J. Dodson a retiring pension of even one shilling. He thought that some provision should be inserted in the Bill against the contingency of that learned Judge deciding against accepting office under it.

MR. AYRTON said, that it was perfectly well understood that Government would offer the appointment to the learned Judge of the Prerogative Court, and he agreed with the Attorney General that it would be useless to legislate for a contingency which had not yet arisen, and which, to judge by the learned Judge's high antecedents, was not likely to occur.

MR. MALINS said, he hoped that if Sir J. Dodson should decide on not accepting the new judgeship to be created under this Bill, the House would deal as liberally towards him as they had a few weeks ago towards Mr. Hatchell, the Judge of the Irish Insolvent Debtors' Court, to whom a retiring pension equal to his full salary was to be paid during the remainder of his life, because a Bill was passed whereby he was removed from his office. This principle ought to be applied to the Judge of the Prerogative Court. His office was abolished for public convenience, and it would be contrary to all principle if the same act which abolished the office did not secure him proper compensation. The point was one which ought to be left in no doubt.

Sir Fitzroy Kelly

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, his hon. and learned Friends could have no doubt as to what were his own views on the question. All he could say, however, was that he would press the matter upon the attention of the Government, and if they took the view which had been just expressed he would bring up a clause in accordance with that view.

Clause added to the Bill.

Clause brought up, (Judge to fix a table of fees to be taken by officers of the Court and by officers of County Courts).

MR. ROLT said he thought there would be very little for the London proctors to do, and that the court might be thrown open to solicitors generally. If so, the table of fees paid to proctors must be altered.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he proposed to postpone for the present the question of compensation until they knew the amount of business likely to be transacted in the new court; so that the clauses proposed to be inserted by his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Malins) respecting the case of the London proctors, and the clause proposed by the noble Lord (Lord Goderich) as to the proctors of York and Chester, would be considered at the same time. With regard to the remark of the hon. and learned Member for Gloucestershire, it would be easy to make the proposed alteration, if the event he anticipated should occur.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to remark upon the large amount of compensation which seemed to be contemplated under this Bill. He feared it would cost the country at least a quarter of a million of money. The Attorney General ought to produce a schedule stating the number of officers who were to be compensated and the amount of compensation; and he thought it most unwise to raise the money to be applied to this purpose through the medium of fees, the future amount of which would be totally unknown, and which would inflict a most serious tax on the community.

MR. HUDSON said, that at present the Committee had no means of information as to what amount of taxation would be fair and just. He thought it would be a great evil to throw the court open to the solicitors. The limited number of persons engaged in the duty of proving wills was a great security for its being properly performed.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the hon. Baronet had rather misunderstood what he had stated. This Bill merely provided for the full compensation of those who were in office before the statute of Will. IV.; and but on a limited scale for those who have been appointed since that period. No additional fees would be created for that purpose, the fees at present taken being sufficient to provide both for the remuneration of the practitioners and for all the compensation that could be required. The whole amount of compensation provided for under the Bill could not, according to his apprehension, exceed £30,000 or £40,000 a year—an insignificant sum compared with the advantage to be gained from the reduction of the fees.

Clause added to the Bill.

Clause proposed, providing for the transfer of offices from Mr. Moore to the registrar of the new court.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the buildings occupied by the Prerogative Office at Doctors' Commons were held by Mr. Moore under a lease, which expired on Lady-day last. Mr. Moore applied to the Government to say that the lease would come to an end on Lady-day, and he wished to know whether the Government desired that the lease should be renewed. He was told that some short renewal would be required, but the actual terms of the renewal he did not know. Mr. Moore had, however, acted at the request of the Government, and had no interest in the term of renewal, which would not, therefore, be a subject of compensation to him. The interest in the lease or occupation would be transferred to the new registrar, and might be the subject of a small compensation to the parties.

MR. HADFIELD said, he would take occasion to remark that he and hon. Members around him could not hear one word of these explanations of the Attorney General. He believed that Mr. Moore, the present possessor of the office, had received £8,000 a year for fifty or sixty years. His successor in reversion was Lord Canterbury, and the present Archbishop of Canterbury had done what Archbishop Howley had refused to do, and had appointed his own son, a young gentleman of twenty-five years of age, to succeed Lord Canterbury. So that there was a registrar in possession while there were two in reversion. Were all these gentlemen to be compensated out of the fees raised from widows and orphans? Had the archbishop's son any interest in this office, and had he a claim to compensation?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the hon. Member for Sheffield ought to give notice to repeal a former Act of Parliament. He regretted that the hon. Member was not a Member of the Parliament which passed the 2 & 3 of Will. IV., c. 109, which was a millstone round the necks of the House in this matter, but which they were obliged to obey. The appointment of one of the relatives of the present Archbishop of Canterbury, as a reversioner in expectancy in succession to Lord Canterbury, was not recognised by the present Bill as entitling him to compensation.

MR. HENLEY said, he should be glad to know whether it was not obligatory on Mr. Moore to find a building for the safe custody of wills. If so, that would be a deduction out of the great leviathan sinecure, which would be an element in reducing his claim to compensation. He thought that the clause had better be postponed.

MR. COLLIER observed that he believed that Mr. Moore was bound to furnish a proper place for the custody of wills, but it was clear that he had neglected to do so. The building in which the wills were deposited was insufficient, it was not fire-proof, and it was near a carpenter's shop, and liable to be burnt on the ignition of the shavings. He also would recommend the postponement of the clause, in order that the matter might be inquired into.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL agreed that the clause had better be deferred and come up with the other compensation clauses.

Clause postponed.

Clauses 32 and 33, which had been postponed, struck out, the ATTORNEY GENERAL stating that he would bring up another clause on the subject.

Clause brought up (Judge of the Court to make rules and regulations for the proceedings of the Court).

SIR FITZROY KELLY suggested the addition of the word "pleadings."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he feared the word would carry with it all the meaning attached to it in Westminster

Hall. It was desirable that the proceedings of the new court should be as simple as possible. In the majority of cases, he hoped that the pleadings would hardly extend beyond this: "I, A B, propound the will of C D, for proof;" while the other party would say, "I oppose it."

Clause agreed to.

MR. WESTHEAD then moved a clause instead of Clause 81.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL objected to the Motion as irregular, Clause 81 being part of the Bill.

Motion withdrawn.

The Schedules were then taken.

Schedule A.

MR. MOWBRAY said, he would move, as an Amendment, that Durham be the place of registry for the counties of Northumberland and Durham, instead of Newcastle for Northumberland, and Durham for Durham.

MR. HEADLAM said, he must oppose the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR JOHN JOHNSTONE said, he should propose that York should be the place for the district registry of the whole of Yorkshire, instead of York for the West Riding (excepting the Leeds district), Richmond for the North Riding, and Hull for the East Riding. He supported his Amendment upon the ground of economy, because a registry existed at York, and upon the ground of convenience, because York was the nucleus of a number of railways.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "West Riding of the county of York, except Leeds District, North Riding Ditto, East Riding Ditto, Parish or County Court District of Leeds," and to insert the word "Yorkshire," instead thereof.

VISCOUNT GODERICH said, that the East Riding, for which the hon. Baronet was interested, had only a population of 400,000, while the population of the West Riding was 1,300,000, sufficient to entitle it to be made a separate district. The proposition of his hon. Friend, if carried, would prove singularly inconvenient to the great mass of the inhabitants of the West Riding. The city of York was not within the West Riding at all. He would hope that the Government and the Committee would not inflict so great an injustice upon the people of the West Riding as to make York—which was situated upon the extreme border of the riding—the place of registration. He was surprised to find that it was proposed to make Leeds a place of registration for a small district, while the great bulk of the inhabitants would have to pass through it on their way to York.

The Attorney General

COLONEL SMITH said, that he considered that the city of York had a prior claim on the Committee, inasmuch as there was at present there a staff of persons accustomed to these duties, and all the machinery was prepared for carrying into operation the provisions of the Bill. Besides, York was nearly in the centre of the county. He believed that the feeling of the inhabitants of the West Riding themselves was in favour of York, it being the place most convenient for those who had business to transact.

GENERAL THOMPSON said, the question was, whether convenience should be meted out by counties or by tithings. And as it had been found convenient to divide the county into three for the purpose of representation, the same reasons pointed to its being convenient to do the same for the purpose of registry; and what was central for one was central for the other. On this ground, Wakefield, the town in which electoral proceedings were carried on, would be the proper place to establish a registry.

MR. CROSSLEY said, he also would contend that Wakefield should be selected as the place of registration.

MR. COLLINS remarked, that he thought that the wishes of a population amounting to a million and a half should be attended to. The question would not bear further argument.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, the great object was to select the place which would be most convenient for all purposes of business. Now, at York there was already an office for the registration of deeds, and it would be well to bring the general business of the West Riding to one place; and no other place, all things considered, would be so convenient for the inhabitants of the West Riding generally as York.

MR. CHARLESWORTH maintained that Wakefield was the most convenient place for the registry.

MR. BECKETT DENISON said, every hon. Member appeared to be anxious to make the place which he represented the place of registry. He was quite conscious that in proposing that York should be the place of registry for Yorkshire he was making a proposition which would be very unpopular as regarded himself. York had for almost time out of mind been a place of registry, and it was as accessible to the people of Yorkshire as any other place that could be mentioned. The business of the diocese had been conducted there in a most creditable manner, and he could not understand the reason of the exception which the Bill proposed to make in favour of a small part of Yorkshire. If you were separating the county into three divisions for the purpose of selecting three places of registry, undoubtedly Wakefield, Beverley, and Northallerton ought to be selected, but for public convenience and safe deposit of wills no place could be so adapted as the city of York; it was as accessible as any place in the county.

LORD HOTHAM said, he had received no instructions from his constituents in respect to the matter, but agreed with the hon. Member for the West Riding that York was the most eligible place.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he could not understand why York should be all in all in the matter, and would undertake by a detail of statistics to show both with regard to population and of distance, that Leeds, for the West Riding, was likely to be more convenient as a place of registry than that city. The principal reason which had induced Government to assign the districts in question was, that they had thought it desirable wherever they found a registry established to retain it as a place to which persons had been accustomed to resort. Under all the circumstances, he could not concur in the proposition of the hon. Member.

MR. CAYLEY observed, that no inhabitant of the West Riding had, until now, thought of objecting to York as the place of registry.

MR. HILDYARD thought that no practical inconvenience could result from continuing the registry at York, and in an economical point of view such an arrangement would be far better than that proposed, for if the county were separated into three districts, no doubt the York proctors would have to be compensated.

MR. HUDSON remarked, that the whole tendency of the Bill was towards a system of centralisation, and upon that principle he would support the proposition for retaining the proctorial business at York.

VISCOUNT GALWAY said, that if it were a question between Leeds and Wakefield he should vote in favour of the latter place, but as the office in York seemed to have given satisfaction to the whole county he could see no reason to remove it from that city.

MR. RICH said, that the small county of Sussex had two separate Probate Courts, and yet it was proposed that the enormous district comprised within the county of York, with a population in round numbers of 2,000,000, should have but one place in which wills could be proved. He trusted the Attorney General would adhere to his schedule.

Question put, "That the words 'West Riding of the county of York' stand part of the schedule."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 177; Noes 67: Majority 110.

MR. CHARLESWORTH proposed to leave out from Schedule A the words "except Leeds District."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the words must have been inserted by mistake.

Motion agreed to.

MR. CHARLESWORTH also proposed to substitute Wakefield for York as the place of district registry for the West Riding.

MR. BEECROFT submitted, that between Leeds and Wakefield there was no sort of comparison. He trusted the Committee would allow Leeds to be the register district of the West Riding of Yorkshire, as it was the centre of a large populous and commercial district.

MR. TATTON EGERTON said, he wished, before the Committee came to a decision on this point, to know what amount of compensation the public would be expected to pay to the proctors and different officers connected with York, which at present was the place where all the business of the province was transacted.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that as the schedule at present stood, the whole of the West Riding was to be one district except Leeds, which was to be a separate district. The question now to be determined was, whether Leeds was to be a separate district. He could not see that Leeds had any permanent claim to be a separate district. He should vote for making the West Riding one district, and for omitting Leeds as a separate district.

MR. BECKETT DENISON said, that there was no pretence for putting Leeds into a separate district. Wakefield ought to be the sole place for the West Riding. He never saw a more absurd schedule drawn up than this was, so far as it regarded Yorkshire.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, it was impossible to state with anything approaching to accuracy what might be the just claim to compensation on the part of the country proctors, because that must wholly depend on the arrangements that might be made on bringing up the new clauses. His idea was, that they would be only entitled to compensation in respect of the contentious business which would be taken from them and transferred to London.

Amendment agreed to.

COLONEL SMYTH moved that York be the district for the North and East Riding of Yorkshire, instead of Richmond and Hull.

Motion agreed to.

On the Motion of Mr. ROEBUCK the words "parish or County Court district of Leeds," were struck out.

EARL JERMYN said, that a numerous signed requisition of inhabitants of Bury St. Edmund's, including a large number of persons of small property, had been presented to him for the purpose of inducing him to move that town, which had been a place of registry for centuries, might continue so under the Bill. He should accordingly move, that Bury St. Edmund's should be the place of registry for the western division of the county of Suffolk, and Ipswich that for the eastern division of the county of Suffolk and northern division of the county of Essex. He would remind the Committee that Bury St. Edmund's was not only the chief town in the western division of the county, but the chief town of an ancient jurisdiction, called the Liberty of Bury St. Edmund's, extending over more than a third of the county of Suffolk.

Amendment proposed before the word "county of Suffolk" to insert the words "Eastern division of the."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that Bury St. Edmund's appeared to come within the principle which had been as far as possible adopted in the assignment of those places of registry, and he should therefore consent to the Amendment.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he should oppose the Amendment, on the ground that it went to multiply district registries and officers unnecessarily, and consequently compensation, and he should therefore take the sense of the Committee upon it. The Commission of 1854 had recommended that Ipswich should be the only place of registry for the county. The Commissioners recommended that there should not be more than thirty districts, but in consequence of there being so many large towns in the north of England the Government had increased the number to forty; but if the principle of his noble Friend were agreed to, they would have 120 districts.

Mr. Beckett Denison

MR. BENNET said, he should support the Amendment.

MR. ADAIR observed, that he was astonished that the Attorney General should have assented to it.

MR. HENLEY wished to know what principle was to be adopted in determining the districts. The Committee had refused to constitute Leeds, with 170,000 inhabitants, into a district. That now proposed had not near so large a population.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he had acceded to the Amendment, because it appeared that if he did not, many persons in Suffolk would be obliged to come to London because of the great distance at which they resided from Ipswich.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, the district created by the Amendment would, he believed, be the smallest in England. This was an entire departure from the principle of the Bill.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 151; Noes 53; Majority 98.

MR. REBOW expressed a hope that the inhabitants of the northern division of Essex would not have the necessity imposed upon them of going to the district registry at Ipswich; but that a district registry would be established in the large and important town of Colchester. He begged to move as an Amendment, on Schedule A, that the northern division of Essex be separated from the county of Suffolk, and stand as a district by itself, and that Colchester be appointed the place of district registry.

MR. DU CANE said, he should support the Amendment.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he should oppose the Amendment, as there was no machinery at Colchester for establishing a registry. It was exceedingly inconvenient to increase the number of districts.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL remarked that he saw no reason for making any further alteration in the schedule. If it were inconvenient for the people of Colchester to go to Ipswich, the remedy was very simple—namely, for them to come to London.

MR. MILLER said, he would support the Amendment on the ground that it would bring cheap law to the doors of the people.

Amendment negatived.

MR. DILLWYN moved the appointment of separate places of registry for Glamorganshire and Monmouth.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, it was impossible to discuss these local questions when no notice had been given. The proposed place of registry, Llandaff, was an ancient town, with the requisite buildings and machinery, and as these did not exist elsewhere, he could not accede to the Amendment.

MR. H. H. VIVIAN said, the population of Glamorganshire and Monmouth was not less than 500,000 souls. The population of Llandaff was very small, while there were two towns in Glamorganshire and Monmouth with a population of 30,000 each, and those towns would form suitable places of registry.

Amendment negatived.

MR. COLLIER proposed that Exeter should remain the place of registry for North Devon, and that Plymouth should be the place for South Devon.

SIR JOHN BULLER thought that the suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman, while it might meet the views of some parties, would not be generally convenient to the inhabitants of Devonshire. Besides, a better town for the purpose than Exeter could easily be found. He thought it wisest to retain the schedule as it stood, as both Exeter and Plymouth were at the bottom of their respective divisions in the county.

MR. COLLIER had no objection to substitute South Molton for Exeter; but he maintained that the population of Plymouth, Devonport, and Stonehouse ought to have a registry.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the circumstances of the case did not permit him to accede to the proposition of the hon. and learned Member.

MR. J. WHITE said, he regretted much to hear the statement which the learned Attorney General had made, as he considered that Plymouth had great claims to be a place of registration, especially as Totness was about to be abolished.

Amendment negatived.

Schedules A and B agreed to.

House resumed, Committee report progress; to sit again on Friday next.

ELECTIONS PETITIONS BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. AYRTON moved, that this House do now adjourn.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he thought that this was a very fair Motion to make at that time of the morning, as it was hardly fair to press the House at ten minutes to one o'clock to go into Committee on a Bill which must occupy two or three hours.

MR. ADDERLEY said, this was not a very fair way of getting rid of a measure which had already been sanctioned by a large majority. He would, however, consent to the Motion if the Government would give him a day. If not he must press the House to proceed with the Bill. If the Government would not give him a day, and the House would not then go into Committee, it would be almost hopeless at this period of the Session to proceed with the measure, and next Session the evils which the Bill was intended to remedy would not be so fresh in the minds of hon. Members, to say nothing of the press of new business which the next Session would bring with it. It was impossible for him, a private Member, to bring on the measure at any other than a late hour, and if it was not to be discussed then, it could not be discussed at all; while it was absolutely necessary that the sanction of the House should be rendered necessary both to the presentation or withdrawal of petitions, in order to prevent those collusive proceedings of which they had had a specimen just previously in the pairing off of petitions.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, his right hon. Friend's object in wishing to postpone the Bill was not to get rid of it; all he had said was, that it was a Bill which required considerable discussion, and, consequently, could not be conveniently taken at that hour of the morning. He would not go now into the merits and demerits of the Bill, although he must say that he thought it contained provisions which were highly objectionable, but if there was any good in it, that would be just as valuable next Session as this. It was intended chiefly to come into operation after a general election, and he hoped the present Parliament was not so near its death as to make it necessary to provide for its testamentary jurisdiction. It did not follow that if the Bill were postponed it would be lost. The hon. Gentleman might bring it forward on a Wednesday.

MR. E. EGERTON said, he hoped that the House would go into Committee pro forma. Every Wednesday was fully occupied with other business.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House do now adjourn."

The House divided:—Ayes 95; Noes 25: Majority 70.

House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, July 13, 1857.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1<sup>a</sup> Bankruptcy and Real Securities (Scotland); Crown, &c. Suits (Scotland).

2<sup>a</sup> Larceny, &c.; Offences against the Person; Malicious Injuries to Property; Forgery; Libel; Coinage Offences; Deer, Game, and Rabbits; Accessories and Abettors.

3<sup>a</sup> Sale of Obscene Books, &c. Prevention.

THE MUTINY IN INDIA—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords, I am anxious to put a question to the noble Earl with reference to the news which has been received from India, and the course which Her Majesty's Government intend to pursue. It is now three months since the minds of the most reflecting men have been directed with great anxiety to the state of the army in India, and every successive mail has tended to increase that anxiety. But, notwithstanding this state of affairs, no one word of official information has yet been given to Parliament. We have been left to depend upon private letters and upon articles in the newspapers; and while the empire is in danger, we know nothing of the cause of the danger or the nature of the measures adopted by Her Majesty's Government to suppress it. My Lords, I do not think that this is a state of things that ought to continue. I have said that every successive mail increases our anxiety, and yet by every successive telegraphic despatch we are told that the crisis is past, that the danger is over, and that things have been at their worst. My Lords, it is not so. In a case of this kind—of a dangerous and extensive mutiny—things go on from worse to worse, and so will proceed until the strong hand of power has interfered to suppress the resistance to the authority of the Government. As yet no indication has been given of the existence on the part of the Government of India of that power which is necessary to suppress the present mutiny. The general tendency of those who call themselves the public instructors of the country is to endeavour to induce persons to believe that this is only a passing calamity, and that slight measures only are required to put down the rebellion in India. It seems to me that there are many among us who resemble that sagacious animal which, when pressed by its pursuers, hides its head in the sand and thinks it is not seen because it cannot see. My Lords, all Europe is regarding with the deepest interest the conduct which under the present circumstances we are pursuing. Upon that conduct depend our present character and our future position in India. I do not believe that there exists in this House or in the other any indisposition to grant to Her Majesty's Government all the means they may ask for the purpose of establishing our authority in India. If we do not do right, the disgrace is with the Government, but the loss of India must undoubtedly be with us. But it depends upon the noble Lord at the head of the Government whether he shall obtain for himself a reputation similar to that which was obtained under difficult and dangerous circumstances by Lord Chatham, or allow his Government to go down to posterity as the most calamitous, the most disastrous, and the most disgraceful since the time of Lord North. My Lords, what Her Majesty's Government have done since the last telegraphic communication which we have received is, so far as I am acquainted with their conduct, right. They could not, I think, have appointed a better officer than Sir Collin Campbell to be at the head of the army in India. I have at all times held the highest opinion of that gallant officer. I received it from the late Sir Charles Napier, who from the first moment of his acquaintance with him formed his opinion, which was afterwards fully confirmed, that he was one of the first officers we had. But in order to give full effect to the abilities of Sir Collin Campbell, two things are necessary ; first, that in acting as Commander in Chief in India he should be altogether relieved from the thralldom which it has been too customary to subject commanders of forces in the field in India to—the thralldom of politicals : the next is, that he should, as Lord Harris did in the time of Lord Wellesley, carry with him the whole strength and force and power of the Governor General. It was the pride of Lord Wellesley that he thus supported the officers under his command, and we see what successes in the field rewarded his wise and generous conduct. I approve the wise measure which has been adopted by the Government in India in appointing Sir Patrick Grant to the temporary command of the army. I do not ask whether they are strictly and legally justified in making that appointment, nor is it at the moment a matter worthy of consideration. They have regarded the public interests in placing the best man they could find at the head of the army. In doing so they have deserved well of their country. But, my Lords, observe this—that on the arrival of Sir Colin Campbell, Sir Patrick Grant will cease to hold the military command ; and I must say that I have long regarded it as an object of the greatest importance that the Governor General should have the aid of Sir Patrick Grant as his military adviser in this crisis. It occurs to me that this great object can be effected in this manner—by enabling for a time the Court of Directors to appoint as an Extraordinary Member of Council a military officer. When once they appoint Sir Patrick Grant, he will remain in Council with the Governor General and aid him with his advice. There are already two respectable officers who act in that capacity—the one as military Member of Council and the other as military secretary. I respect them both for the creditable manner in which they discharged in previous situations their duties—the one as political officer and the other as Judge Advocate. But there was nothing whatever in their previous services which could enable them to give to the Governor General that advice upon which he may rely as an authoritative expression of that which it is right for him to adopt ; and it is most desirable that his Council should contain such men. I know that persons are very much disappointed at not having received by this telegraphic communication an account of the capture of Delhi. I think that disappointment unreasonable. I did not expect to receive that account ; nor do I think any one can fairly impute blame to the commander of our force that, at the worst season of the year, and without the means of carriage, he should not have made a march of more than 130 miles in the time that was anticipated. I understand, however, that our troops have succeeded in defeating a body of the enemy which opposed them in the vicinity of Delhi. This account brings two things to my mind. The first is that the insurgents must have been much stronger than we supposed if they were induced to go out beyond the walls of Delhi ; and the next, I rejoice to say, is that it impresses me with the conviction that they have no leader to command them. Happening to know the ground I am not in the least degree surprised that they should have lost all their guns ; because in such a position it would be impossible for them when pressed to carry their guns away. My Lords, we hear that the defection is becoming very general—that it is extending to the whole of the Bengal army, of whom 26,000 are in revolt. We hear more than this—we hear that in the Punjab all the Native regiments have been disarmed. Now, among those regiments there are two of which I happen to know the recent history—namely, the 16th Grenadiers and the 26th Light Infantry. The 16th Grenadiers was one of the noblest regiments of the Indian army. It bore on its colours almost as many records of actions fought and victories gained as any regiment in Her Majesty's service. It was brigaded with Her Majesty's 40th Regiment during the whole of Sir William Nott's operations in Affghanistan. It served at Maharajpore, and by the side of the 40th Regiment it equalled the Queen's troops in courage, fortitude, and devotion, and lost as many men. The 26th Regiment of Light Infantry distinguished itself under the command of Sir George Pollock. When Sir George Pollock joined the army at Peshawur, 800 men, out of the whole 4,000 men he found there, were in hospital, the majority of whom, however, suffered more from their own apprehensions than from any actual sickness. The only troops, under those circumstances, upon which Sir George Pollock could entirely depend were this 26th Regiment which has just been disarmed. My Lords, there must have been a continuance of mismanagement and misconduct which I cannot comprehend before the nature of the soldiers composing those regiments could have been so changed. There cannot have been one non-commissioned, and certainly not one commissioned, Native officer in those regiments who did not show his gallantry and fidelity under General Nott and General Pollock; and it is lamentable to think that the glories of two such regiments should be obliterated from the Indian army, or that any circumstances, whatever they may have been, should have occurred to alienate them for an instant from the Government, and to make the officer in command think it necessary to deprive them of arms which they have always borne so nobly and so successfully in the field. It becomes us, then, my Lords, to look forward and consider, from the facts we have before us, what is likely to be our position in India on the 1st of November—the time when our troops will arrive, and when, after the rains, it will be possible to move. I have endeavoured, my Lords, to form an opinion on that subject. I assume that we take Delhi—I assume that our troops continue to hold Delhi, Meerut, and the neighbouring stations. But I know the locality. No European regiments are ever stationed there on account of the sickness which prevails; and at the end of the rains even the Native regiments have from two-thirds to three-fourths of their strength prostrated. Therefore, if our troops take and occupy Delhi, if they expel the King from his palace and drive out all his forces, and even if they do everything in their power to promote the health of our men, you cannot possibly expect them to be in a state to resume operations on the 1st of November. All I can venture to hope is that they will be able to hold the places they occupy. In the very centre of the mutiny our troops will be like the French in Spain—they will hold what they stand upon, but little or nothing else. When the army, which constitutes our strength, is dissipated and gone, and the men have become, as they will do, rebels or robbers, it is impossible to believe that we shall be able to collect the revenue and administer the government. In the Punjab things may be a little better. You have able men there who, I trust, will be able to maintain their own. They may perhaps be able, through the aid of the local corps, to collect a portion of the revenue, but I do not think they can possibly do more. Certainly they will not be able to move beyond the banks of the Sutlej to render assistance to any other corps. All I can hope is, that in these provinces our authorities will stand their ground, and that the Punjab will be maintained. With your Lordships' permission I must enter into a few details, and examine what force we really want; because it is idle to talk of sending out regiments unless we know what are the demands upon us and what the troops are to do when they arrive. When the insurrection first broke out we had only two regiments at Calcutta and its neighbourhood. The Government sent for one regiment from Madras, and two from Bombay, which were in the Persian Gulf at the time. This, with another regiment previously ordered up, will make six regiments at Calcutta when these troops arrive. The first thing to consider is the protection of the capital, the seat of Government, where there is a treasury containing many millions, and an enormous amount of mercantile property. It is the point through which alone the Customs, the salt tax, and the opium revenue can be levied. It is essential to the maintenance of British authority in India not only that Calcutta should be held, but that there should be no possible doubt as to our holding it, and that the Government should be always able to act and legislate there in perfect security. In order to do this you must maintain at least three regiments there. In addition to the troops there you ought to have at least six steamers in the river to protect the Government offices, &c. Allahabad is a most important station at the junction between the Jumna and the Ganges; while at Lucknow—the centre of a great Mahomedan population—there ought to be more than one regiment. Thus, the whole of the six regiments which will arrive at Calcutta will be required for the protection of Bengal alone, without the power of moving beyond the confines of that Presidency, and, therefore, they will have no disposable force for retrieving affairs at the other provinces. Of these six regiments three must, at the earliest convenient moment, be sent back to their previous stations—one to Madras and two to Bombay—we must not run the risk of a movement in those Presidencies. Consequently of the eight regiments which we know have now been ordered to sail for India three will be detained in Bengal to supply the place of the corresponding number who will return to Madras and Bombay. Thus there will remain of the entire force of which we have as yet heard, only five regiments for any operations from Allahabad. I hold that five regiments are totally insufficient. And here I ought to observe that whatever force the Government may send out the difficulties of the Governor General in affording it the means of movement will not perhaps be insuperable, but they will be enormous; and unless he interferes in the business himself, looking into every detail and communicating personally with the officers intrusted with the duty of furnishing transport for the troops, our measures will entirely fail. There is no use in having men if you cannot move them. In Bengal you cannot find horses to mount the cavalry, or for the purposes of the artillery. It is absolutely necessary that the horses should be sent from hence; and it is most desirable that you should at the same time give orders at the Cape and in Australia for the forwarding to India of all horses fit for the service of the cavalry and artillery. But I shall assume that these five regiments have all reached Allahabad. They will not, however, be there by the 1st of November. That is the day on which they will arrive at Calcutta; and, having obtained the means of transport, they cannot possibly get to Allahabad before the 1st of January. This force will be wholly inadequate to enter without cavalry or artillery into a country with from 30,000,000 to 40,000,000 of inhabitants, full of disbanded troops, and containing the really military population of India—the Rohilla population. I say that your force should consist of at least nine regiments of infantry, three regiments of cavalry, and six batteries of artillery. Upon a late occasion Calcutta was left with only one battery of six guns, and although it is contrary to all our previous notions, it will be necessary, for the first time, to send artillery to India. And now comes another difficulty. The gun-carriages made here will be of no use there, and unless you send out orders to Madras and Bombay to provide gun-carriages, those made in this country will crack in pieces, and your guns will be lost. My Lords, I think I should fail in my duty if I did not say most decidedly that I do not think it sufficient to act on one line of operations only. There will be on the right bank of the Sutlej a force which may maintain its own, but which will be in jeopardy in the midst of a great population very warlike and very hostile, and I hold it essential that there should be a movement of troops by the line of the Indus and the Sutlej, which may connect itself with the force from Allahabad, and crush all opposition between those two points. This force should be equal to that proceeding from Allahabad. And more, I hold it to be most expedient, wise, and necessary, to go yet further, and to have some reserve of perhaps two European regiments—one reserve at Allahabad, and another at Sukkur on the other line of operations I have indicated—to which some Native regiments might be joined who might be relied on for the purpose of completing the communications, of sending up supplies, and protecting the rear of the army. And now, my Lords, what force is required? Five regiments we have for the operation from Allahabad. If all the troops now in China are sent to India, those five regiments would supply the infantry force required for the movement from the side of Bengal. I assume that three regiments could be spared from Bombay for the movement up the Indus. You require, therefore, in addition to the eight infantry regiments now to be sent out to the five from China, ten regiments of infantry, six of cavalry, and twelve batteries of artillery; and with these troops you must send horses, or they will be immovable. I firmly believe that, if Parliament and the Government will reinforce the army of India to the extent I have suggested, you may with absolute certainty—subject to those unforeseen accidents which befall all military operations—calculate that, by the end of April, the authority of the British Government will be firmly re-established in every part of the upper provinces. But, if you act in a different way—if you act undecidedly—if you think there is nothing in it, and that it will die out of itself—if you are not determined to put forth your whole strength, and crush this rebellion against your dominion, which threatens your existence in India as conquerors, you may depend upon it you will have entailed upon you campaign after campaign, and the suspense which will affect the minds of the whole people of India will imperil your rule, and destroy your character and authority in India. My Lords, I do not believe there will be any indisposition on the part of Parliament to support the Government, if the Government take the right view of the present state of things. It is for them to decide. I trust that they will prove worthy of the difficulties of their position, and of the greatness of the danger in which we are all involved, and that, by coming forward in a manner to maintain the national character and the public interests, they will give permanent security to our Indian empire, as well as honour—which I shall not grudge them—for themselves. What I wish to know from the noble Earl is, what measures the Government now intend to take for the reinforcement of the army of India, and whether it is their intention to give, at the earliest period—that is, within three days—official information on the subject.

Viscount Palmerston

The Earl of Ellenborough

EARL GRANVILLE: I think the noble Earl was somewhat unjust to Her Majesty's Government in the beginning of his observations. I am not aware that any information has been sought for which has been refused by the Government. Her Majesty's Government have endeavoured to explain as fully as they can the events which have occurred in the East. There will be no difficulty in giving every information, either with regard to that which has been already received, or that which may be expected this evening or to-morrow, an official summary of which will give full information to the country. I assure your Lordships, once for all—because there are rumours about that the Government possess disastrous intelligence, which they are not willing to communicate—that the object of the Government is not to conceal the real state of affairs, whatever that state may be. I would go at once into the history of all that we know, but I have very little to tell, for the public have been put in possession by electric telegraph of the whole substance of what we know. The Government have only received three or four official communications by electric telegraph, namely, by Malta, Marseilles, and Trieste, all agreeing, in substance, with that published by the ordinary channels of information, and the only addition I can make to it is, that the last telegraph received states that the Punjab is perfectly quiet. I can assure the noble Earl that the Government do not treat this matter lightly. They consider this as a most serious question, and one most seriously to be considered, and they hold that it is their duty to take every precaution in their power, and to treat the matter as one of importance. But when the noble Earl talks of calamity, disgrace, and disaster, I cannot say that the Government share in that opinion. Whatever they may think of this serious crisis, they are not disposed to prophesy, and I think that the noble Earl himself, notwithstanding all his experience, would act more wisely and more safely for the public, if he satisfied himself with giving his opinion upon the facts he knows, and not upon facts based upon his imagination and upon the probability of what is likely to take place. Of course, any suggestions from the noble Earl, if not followed, will always receive, as they deserve, the careful consideration of Her Majesty's Government. With regard to those military details upon which the noble Earl has entered, I am incompetent to go into them, and even my noble Friend (Lord Panmure), and the illustrious Duke (the Duke of Cambridge) behind me, however competent, will, perhaps, not think it convenient or desirable to follow him into those details. But so far as we are acquainted with what the Governor General has done—and I now speak for Her Majesty's Government—we are perfectly satisfied and entirely approve every act brought to our knowledge which has been taken by the Governor General in dealing with these events. In regard to the Government at home, they will not neglect to take every precaution to strengthen the hands of the Governor General. There is a notion, which may, perhaps, cause additional anxiety, that the Government possess information with regard to particular persons, but with respect to whom we have no information whatever. I regret to say, that the melancholy news is too true that General Anson has died from cholera at Kurnaul; but the Government has not received information of the death or illness of any other person. Your Lordships who knew the character of General Anson, and who appreciated his abilities, his sound understanding, his clear judgment, and that presence of mind which is equally valuable in civil as well as military matters, will feel the great regret that the Government entertain at the death of General Anson. I think that the Governor General has acted judiciously in his temporary appointment of Sir Patrick Grant; and I am grateful for the noble Earl's approval of the sending out of Sir Colin Campbell. Whatever may be the course taken in his selection, every one must think that infinite credit is due to that gallant officer in being ready to start for India within a few hours after he was informed that his services were required. I am not aware I can give the noble Earl any further information. The noble Earl argues as if there were a general insurrection, but it has not extended beyond the army. As to the regiments that have been disbanded, we have no knowledge that they had any communication with the rebels. Her Majesty's Government will give the fullest information to Parliament and the country; they will act with the greatest vigour on the present emergency; but they will not give way to unfounded apprehensions of any great calamity and disaster.

The Earl of Ellenborough

VISCOUNT MELVILLE said, that the condition of the Bengal army was one to which his attention had some time since been directed, and he had no hesitation in saying that it was the worst in the world. The want of discipline which had recently been manifested in its ranks was a circumstance of no unusual occurrence. He had served with that army, and he was therefore in a position to state the reasons to which the difference which existed between it and the Bombay and Madras armies was to be attributed. The system of appointing Native officers in the Bengal army he looked upon as one of the causes of that absence of discipline by which it was characterized, and probably of the mutiny which had lately taken place. Those officers, he might add, were, generally speaking, selected, not for their merit or fitness to command, and were raised from the ranks when they were old men, and when disaffection at not having previously been enabled to obtain their discharge from the service had, to a considerable extent, operated upon their minds. In the Bombay and Madras armies, upon the contrary, a different system prevailed. The havildars in those armies were selected for their intelligence and activity, and were recommended for promotion to that rank by the commanding officers of their regiments. But, be that as it might, nobody could deny that the discipline of the Bengal army was of the worst possible description, and in that light it had been looked upon by the late General Anson, who had in consequence, ever since he had assumed the command of the army in India, deemed it to be his duty to represent to the Board of Directors the absolute necessity of increasing the European force in India — a recommendation to which, however, so far as the Government was concerned, no sort of attention had been paid. In proof of the statement that the discipline of the Bengal army was of the worst description, he might inform the House, that in the year 1849, shortly after the first occupation of the Punjab, when he commanded on the frontier, two Bengal regiments mutinied; and when he returned home in 1850, he expressed the greatest disapprobation of the condition of the troops of which that army was composed. He was, however, told that, no matter how just his opinions upon the subject might be, he must not give utterance to them in public, inasmuch as it was extremely undesirable that foreign nations should be acquainted with the real state of affairs. The result, at all events, was, that no steps were taken in the matter by the Board of Directors, and that the discipline of the Bengal army continued to be of that character to which he had drawn their Lordships' attention. He had had the honour of commanding the Punjab division of the Bombay army, and he had no hesitation in saying, that nothing could be more praiseworthy than the conduct which the troops composing that division had exhibited. To show their Lordships how different was the conduct of the Bengal army, he might state a circumstance which took place at the siege of Mooltan, and which was reported to him by an officer who was present on the occasion. A covering party was ordered into the trenches, and some disturbance having occurred among them during the night, the officer to whom he referred went to ascertain its cause. He found that it arose from the fact that some soldiers of the Bengal army had been endeavouring to prevent the men belonging to one of the Bombay regiments from digging in the trenches in discharge of their duty, observing that they were sepoys, and should fight, but would not work. Yet the officer in command of those Bengalese had not ordered them into confinement, notwithstanding that they had not done one bit of the work which had been ordered by the engineers; and it was not until the officer threatened to have two of the Bengal men, who were the ringleaders, shot, that they could be got to retire. He might also add, that the morning after the assault of Mooltan, Mr. Lake asked the officer in command of one of the pickets to post a sergeant and twelve men at one of the gates of the town, to prevent any one going in or coming out. The officer did so; but not long after the men had taken up their position, three officers of the Bengal Engineers came up, one of them having a loaded gun, and bearing between them something covered by a piece of tarpaulin, which they represented to be engineering stores. They were, however, told by the guard that they could not pass, and, the tarpaulin having been raised, that which they were in reality carrying was found to be plunder. The circumstance was not reported, lest it should be ascribed to jealousy; it, however, showed the want of discipline in that army, and that the officers did not perform their duty as those of the Bombay army did. But it was unnecessary to cite further instances in proof of the accuracy of the opinion which he had expressed in reference to the spirit which prevailed among the troops of the Bengal army. He trusted, now that a fitting opportunity of dealing with the subject presented itself, Her Majesty's Government would become alive to the necessity of reorganizing that army, and placing the whole system upon which it was based, upon an entirely different footing. As to the existing mutiny in India, he could not find in the fact that certain cartridges had been issued, a sufficient reason for its occurrence. It was, indeed, difficult to ascertain to what the breaking out of that mutiny was immediately to be attributed; but of one thing he felt assured—namely, that the Government would act very culpably if they did not pay due attention to the representations which had been made to them in reference to the want of discipline which prevailed among the regiments of the Bengal army.

THE EARL OF ALBEMARLE said, he attributed the existing discontent in the Bengal army to the fact, that men of high caste were exclusively employed in the Bengal service, and in that opinion, he might add, he was confirmed by a letter which he had received from Dr. Buist, the editor of the Bombay Times, distinctly attributing one of the causes of the mutiny to the policy of the Indian Government in selecting men of high caste to the exclusion of every other caste. In Bombay, on the contrary, men of high and low caste were employed without distinction, and no difficulty had been found in their acting together; and, although 10,000 men had been sent from that province to the Persian Gulf, a disposition to mutiny had not even in a single instance been evinced among those troops. The mutiny which occurred in 1825 at Barrackpore, was altogether to be attributed to causes having their origin in the prejudices of caste.

THE SWISS LEGION.

PRESENTATION OF PETITION.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY presented a Petition from the Officers of the late British Swiss Legion, complaining that the agreement under which they were enrolled by the British Government has been violated in respect of their Pay, and praying for Redress; and said: My Lords, I gave notice some time since of my intention to bring under the notice of your Lordships a case which, prima facie, seems to me one of hardship as regards the petitioners in the matter, who were officers in the Swiss Legion. I wish particularly that your Lordships may be persuaded, and Her Majesty's Government convinced, that I have no intention whatever of making any attack on her Majesty's Ministers, or bringing any accusation against them. The case is simply one of no less than forty-seven officers of the Swiss Legion, who complain that certain articles under which they were enlisted have not been faithfully fulfilled by her Majesty's Government; and that they have not received the amount of pay which they expected, and to which, as they allege, they were entitled under those articles. The whole case depends on the accuracy of the statement made by the petitioners; and this being so, my Lords, I think I cannot do better than read their petition to the House. It is as follows:—

Viscount Melville

“THE HUMBLE PETITION OF THE OFFICERS OF THE LATE BRITISH SWISS LEGION, COMPRISING THE 1ST AND 2ND BATTALIONS OF THE 1ST REGIMENT, “Humbly sheweth,—That in the months of May, June, and July, 1855, your petitioners were enrolled (pursuant to the Foreign Enlistment Act) in the above-named legion, under certain articles of enlistment then printed and published, at Bern, in Switzerland, dated Schelestadt, 1855, and bearing the signatures of “HANS SULZBERGER, Colonel.

CHARLES EDWARD FUNK, Lieut. Colonel.

JOHN BAUMGARTNER, Captain (Staff).

“These gentlemen, formed under the presidency of Colonel Dixon, the commission appointed by the English Government to enlist and organize the Legion; the articles alluded to were promulgated by Sir G. Gordon, the British minister at Berne, Colonel Dickson, the said president of the Swiss Committee, and by the members of that body, and your petitioners were sworn in under those articles and under the precise terms and stipulations therein contained.

“That such articles contained amongst other things the following stipulations:—

“Art. 2.—‘That the officers and men should be enlisted for the duration of the war, and for twelve months after the ratification of peace.’

“Art. 25.—‘That upon disbandment the officers should receive fifteen months' full pay, and the non-commissioned officers and men the full pay of two years, according to a certain tariff therein set forth, and subject to certain reductions if retained in service after the ratification of peace.’

“That in July following the British Government caused certain other articles, without date, to be printed and published, bearing the signature of Colonel Charles Sheffield Dickson, wherein it is stipulated by “Art. 1.—‘That the officers and men should be enlisted for the duration of the war, and for one year after the ratification of peace.’

“Art. 10.—‘That on disbandment the officers should be allowed three months' pay to carry them home.'

"These terms do not appear to differ from those of the original articles, as thereby also your petitioners would be entitled to fifteen months' pay after the ratification of peace.

"That upon disbandment your petitioners of course claimed the fulfilment of the terms under which they enlisted, but the War Office refused to recognise the original articles, terming them unauthorized and spurious. They offered the three months' pay, which your petitioners accepted, under protest, and an arrangement was then made that, should your honourable House sanction the fulfilment of the articles of enlistment, the War Office would make no further objection to carrying out such stipulations.

"That a further offer of three months' pay has since been made to some of your petitioners, which in most instances has been rejected.

"That your petitioners were led to believe the accredited articles issued by the military agents of the British Government in Switzerland, and promulgated by the British minister at Berne, and never doubted the honourable fulfilment of the articles of stipulation.

"That your petitioners, numbering forty-seven officers of the British Swiss Legion, and forming the 1st and 2nd battalions thereof, were legally enlisted and sworn in under the said original printed articles, issued at the English Ambassador's office, at Berne, no other articles being at that time in existence, and that it was not until three months after their enlistment that the second articles were published."

Now, my Lords, whether the articles relied on by the petitioners be spurious or not, assuming to be true what is stated by Colonel Baumgartner, and his evidence on the matter is attested by various local authorities, there must have been some articles printed and promulgated early in May, 1855, under the supervision of Sir G. Gordon, Colonel Dickson, and the other members of the Swiss Committee; and this must be true, that those officers having enlisted in the month of June or the beginning of July, before the second articles were issued by the noble Lord at the head of the War Department, must have been enlisted under that first code. The question, then, naturally arises, whether the Government should not carry out this first convention, the non-fulfilment of which did not arise from any fault of those officers, and which they alleged they believed to be bonâ fide, and not a spurious one. To show that this convention was not a spurious one, but had all the authority of the Swiss Committee, Colonel Baumgartner made a declaration, of which the following is a copy:—

"I, John Baumgartner, late a major of the British Swiss Legion, and one of the Swiss committee appointed by the British Government to organize the legion, do hereby declare that the military convention under which the officers were to be enrolled was drawn by me and submitted to the other members of the committee, and as several articles therein remained undecided upon, as Colonel Dickson was waiting, as he pretended, further instructions from his Government, it was agreed to publish extracts of such articles as had been agreed to by Colonel Dickson, and such extracts were accordingly prepared by me (as was afterwards also the full convention), but altered and corrected by the other members of the committee, as the first and second drafts thereof now in my hands, with alterations and corrections in the handwriting of Colonel Dickson, will prove, and such extracts fixed the allowance of pay for retraite. It was found necessary to do this, as we could not begin the levy until some conditions were published.

The whole commission gave their sanction for the printing and publishing of such extract after it was corrected and approved by Colonel Dickson. The secretary to the commission superintended the printing, and the first printed copies were handed to Sir G. Gordon, the British Minister at Berne, others were taken to the recruiting office, by which, as also by the members of the commission, Colonels Sulzberger and Funk, the same were promulgated; all costs and expenses of the printing were made on account of the British government, after the bill was approved of by the commission; the extract was printed in May, 1855, and between that time and August following, when Colonel Dickson's convention was published, more than 30 officers were enrolled. The extract of the first convention was never revoked or disavowed.

"Given under my hand and seal, at my residence, at Schelestadt, department Lower Rhine, January 4th, 1857.

(L.S.)

"JOHN BAUMGARTNER."

In addition to that, my Lords, we have the affidavit of Captain Grussy, which is as follows:—

"AFFIDAVIT OF CAPTAIN GRUSSY.

"Appeared personally, Charles Louis Grussy, an officer of the British Swiss Legion, and made oath, that in the month of May, 1855, deponent was acting as lieutenant in the British Swiss Legion, and in that capacity was detached for Berne, when the British Swiss Legion was about to be established, and as the recruiting was against the Swiss law, deponent would have been liable to arrest, but the British Consul, Sir G. Gordon, procured for him the authority of an attaché of the British embassy, with the customary privileges and exemptions. That deponent in the performance of his duties was witness when the articles of enlistment were printed, at the office of M. Jenny, Son, at Berne, on the 26th of May, 1855, and was also witness to the promulgation of those articles amongst the Swiss officers by the officials of the British consulate, and deponent was ordered by the English consul, Sir G. Gordon, to promulgate those articles so printed at Berne, and dated 'Schelestadt, 1855.'

"Sworn at Dover, in the county of Kent, this 8th } GRUSSY, Captain. day of October, 1856.

"Before me,

"W. H. PAYN,

"A Commissioners to administer oaths in Chancery in England, ex-Mayor of Dover."

Now, my Lords, having read these documents, I can only say, that the case is on the word of one man against that of another. We are told by Colonel Baumgartner that the articles, the fulfilment of which these forty-seven officers demand, had not only his approval, but that of the whole Commission, who gave their sanction to the printing and publishing of the extracts now relied on by those officers. No other rules were printed before the month of July, so that those men who entered the Legion and took the oath in the month of June, must have had shown to them this code, which is now declared to be spurious by my noble Friend, the Secretary of War, and the English Government. As regards the authenticity of the extracts in question, that question is, as I said before, one which rests upon the word of one man, as against that of another. But, my Lords, the main question involved in this difference between Her Majesty's Government and those forty-seven officers is, indeed, a very serious one, both as affects the honour of this country and her future policy. On an occasion like the present, when the extent of our military resources must naturally engage the attention of Her Majesty's Government and every member of your Lordships' House, the consideration of a question like that the subject of this petition is one not altogether foreign to the business which has just been before us. Some day or other it may be thought desirable to again enlist foreigners. When the question of foreign enlistment was first mooted in this House, I was one of those who expressed regret that such a measure should be resorted to; but the late war showed me the very great difficulty which we should have to encounter in carrying on hostilities on an extensive scale, and raising armies equal to those put in the field by great military Powers, if we were compelled to confine ourselves to the voluntary system of enlistment. Therefore, my Lords, I think it most important that this country should continue to uphold its good name with foreigners, and I am of opinion, that the Swiss are the best foreigners that we could, in times of emergency, enlist into our service; because there is not in Switzerland that opprobrium to enlistment in foreign armies that exists as a feeling in other countries. The Swiss have for centuries served in foreign armies, and such service is in that country esteemed an honour. I would then, my Lords, say that, not only as a point of honour, but also as one of policy, it is incumbent on our Government to keep faith with foreigners enlisted in Her Majesty's service. I would go further, my Lords, and say, that if, under the difficulties of war, and acting as it were under a fear of doing that which was illegal, any of our agents smuggled a code of this kind into the pockets of Swiss officers, still we ought to be most scrupulously careful in fulfilling all engagements which foreigners believed we made with them when inducing them to enter our service. These forty-seven officers believed that they were enlisted under a particular code. Whether that code be spurious or not is another question. The entire claim of the petitioners only amounts to £2,700; and I cannot believe that such a sum is of moment as compared with the importance of leaving Switzerland and all other foreign nations under the impression that this country is anxious to do her duty towards those who responded to her call in the hour of need. Having said thus much, my Lords, I shall make no further observations on this petition till I shall have heard my noble Friend, the Secretary for War, reply to what is, in my opinion, at least a prima facie case.

LORD PANMURE said, he did not find any fault with his noble Friend for introducing this case to their Lordships, but he thought the fact that this petition was signed by only forty-seven out of the large number of officers belonging to the Swiss Legion would show that its complaint was by no means a general one. He assured their Lordships that, in settling the claims of both officers and men of these foreign corps, there had been, on his part, every disposition not only to act up to the terms of the engagements which we had made with them, but even to extend the generosity of this country beyond that limit, in order to show that we appreciated the service which they had rendered to us. Of course, in the settlement of these claims, many disputes occurred both with officers and men; but, if his noble Friend had been at all aware of the infinite care which had been taken to adjust these matters, and of the almost unanimity with which they had been adjusted, and the corps disbanded with the entire satisfaction both of officers and men, he would not in any way have questioned the disposition of the Government to deal fairly with all these persons. But there was a peculiarity about these forty-seven officers which he must explain. He assured the House that he had considered the case with reference to the position of both parties, without regard to the trumpery sum which they claimed, with a view of settling their claims according to what was right, but so as not to awaken claims in others for which there was no ground. It was asserted by these officers that they were enlisted—that was not a proper term—that they accepted service under Her Majesty upon certain conditions. Colonel Dickson was the officer charged with carrying out the Foreign Enlistment Act, so far as concerned the raising of a Swiss Legion. Early in May, he (Lord Panmure) sent that officer to Switzerland, giving him in this country a letter of service, in which were recorded the terms upon which he thought it right that that regiment should be raised with regard to both officers and men. As this enlistment for the British army was not recognized by the law of Switzerland, Colonel Dickson established, at a place on the frontier, a committee of three officers, consisting of Colonel Sulzberger, Lieutenant Colonel Funk, and Major Baumgartner, of which he was himself the president; and at this place the formation of the Legion was carried on. Afterwards Colonel Dickson went to Berne, and there, in conjunction with the committee, he drew up articles of service, and directed that they should be printed as they had been drawn up. This direction was not carried out. One member of the committee, Major Baumgartner, took upon himself to have printed what he called an extract from these articles, and to this he forged the signatures of the other two members of the committee, both of whom now denied that they gave him any authority to append their names to this spurious extract. In the course of time Colonel Dickson saw this “extract” in print, and he immediately took steps to deny its authenticity, and to explain to every officer who had been engaged under it that these were not the terms upon which service under her Majesty was to be taken; and up to the disbandment of the legion no officer complained that he was not satisfied upon this matter. That, however, was not all. The spurious extract appeared to have been issued at the end of May or beginning of June. Colonel Dickson immediately took means, by writing to the Swiss newspapers, and by sending them copies of the Foreign Enlistment Act, and of the genuine articles, to establish its falsity: and, so far as appeared from documentary evidence, it was impossible that any officer could have been deceived by it after the beginning of July, some time after which date it was that the large majority of those who had signed this petition took service. It appeared to him that this was a case which had been got up by English lawyers. At the disbandment of the legion, some officers who thought they had claims under these articles communicated with Colonel Hackett, who conducted the disbandment abroad; but, by conversing with them, he satisfied them that they had no such claims. These officers, however, appeared to have fallen into the hands of English lawyers, who had given them bad advice; because, upon being disbanded, all the officers, these petitioners included, had signed a receipt stating that they had received their gratuity, and had no further claims upon the British Government. In their petition, these forty-seven officers stated that they signed this receipt under protest, but he could find no trace of the existence of such a protest, and he believed that the whole matter had been got up since. He was confirmed in this view by the fact that, after the claim had been raised, he received a letter from a solicitor and ex-mayor of Dovor, intimating that the matter would be brought before Parliament, but that he was open to a compromise, if he (Lord Panmure) would accept it. He refused to accept that offer, and in doing so he thought he had acted well, both with regard to the honour and credit of this country, and with regard to that responsibility with which he was bound to look to the expenditure of the public money which Parliament so liberally placed at the disposal of the Government for carrying on the war. He entirely agreed with his noble Friend (the Earl of Malmesbury) that it was absolutely necessary that no idea should exist in the minds of these foreign officers that faith had not been kept with them, and that they should have no feeling which could deter them from serving the Government on a future occasion. He had much gratification in informing his noble Friend and the House that one officer whose name was attached to this petition, Major Hafelin, had only that morning written to the Foreign Office to say that, having heard of the state of affairs in India, he and a great many others were most willing to re-enter the service of the British Government, and that no doubt, if England required them, she could call from the mountains of Switzerland all those who had formerly so zealously enrolled themselves under her standard. He (Lord Panmure) had received similar offers of service from many other officers, and he was quite convinced that in disbanding the Swiss Legion at the close of the late war we left upon their minds the impression that England had dealt fairly with them, as they had dealt fairly with England. He could not forbear from stating the following facts. The formation of the Legions commenced in the month of May, 1855. In the month of August, 1855, 4,000 of these soldiers, thoroughly equipped, thoroughly armed, and thoroughly drilled, were reviewed by Her Majesty at Shorncliffe, and in less than six weeks afterwards 6,000 of the Legion were transported to the neighbourhood of the seat of war ready for action. He had received the highest testimonials of their conduct, both in this country and at Smyrna. With reference to the general question of foreign enlistment, he agreed with his noble Friend that so long as we had no conscription in this country we must not give up the power of enlisting foreign troops in our service. As the noble Earl had observed, we were bound to deal with them fairly and honestly; but at the same time, as Minister of War, he was bound to see that we did not deal with them on any but terms of fair justice, and to protect the taxpayers of the country from paying more than was right even for the best article.

The Earl of Malmesbury

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY admitted that in some respects the noble Lord had answered many of his remarks satisfactorily, but he had not explained how his own articles differed from those which were supposed to be spurious. The articles as stated in the petition could be construed in two ways. The officers of the Legion believed that they entered our service for one year after the ratification of peace; but the Minister of War thought that that was entirely a mistake, and that he had the power of discharging them before that time, and also of retaining them to the expiration of it if he thought fit. That was the point in dispute between the officers and the War Office. He believed that the articles might be construed both ways; but any way those officers who had entered our service under this idea, and who had been deceived by the officials of the Government, ought, he contended, to be indemnified, and to be paid the sums which they expected to receive. He was astonished to hear that Colonel Funk had repudiated his signature, for he held in his hand a letter from that gentleman's solicitor, in which he said not one word of repudiation of the signature, but that he had received within the last few weeks instructions from Colonel Funk to institute an action at law against Colonel Dickson for his repeated slanders against his character. With respect to the receipts in full of all claims given by the officers, all he had to say was, that when the Minister at War gave the officers a gratuity of three months' pay it was accompanied by a letter from the War Office, stating that it was given without prejudice to any future claims, and they gave a receipt, therefore, without prejudice to future claims. There was such discrepancy and such contradiction in the evidence that he was perfectly unable to say any more upon the subject, but must leave it to the sagacity of the noble Lord to go to the bottom of it.

Lord Panmure

LORD PANMURE said, he had received the following letter from Colonels Funk and Sulzberger in respect to their signatures to the article:—

"The undersigned have the honour to state that the so-called extract from the Convention, dated Schelestadt, 1855, was made without their co-operation; that it is said that the same has been arranged by Colonel Dickson and Major Baumgartner, and that during the absence of both (undersigned) their signature has been attached to it, and has been published.

"We have, &c., "H. SULZBERGER, Colonel.

"K. FUNK, Lieutenant Colonel."

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE denied that it was at all necessary for this country to have recourse to the employment of foreign troops in time of war if proper measures were taken by our Government at the outset. On the contrary, we might always raise men enough among our own population both for defensive and for offensive purposes. It was the stinginess of the Government at the beginning, and their unwillingness to offer a sufficient sum of money to tempt our own people to enter into our military service, which rendered it necessary to turn to foreign countries for men. This description of force had never been found so satisfactory as our own troops, and by this means of increasing our armies we ran the risk of getting into collision with foreign Governments. The noble Earl concluded by moving for a Return, already presented to the House of Commons, showing the cost of raising and maintaining the Foreign Legions (which was afterwards agreed to).

THE EARL OF CLANCARTY said, that it was a most impolitic thing to have recourse to foreign aid. It would be almost better to raise troops by conscription at home.

Petition ordered to lie on the table.

IMPROVEMENTS IN ST. JAMES'S PARK.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: I rise to call the attention of the House to the correspondence between the Treasury and the Board of Works on the subject of the Ornamental Water in St. James's Park, and to the expenditure which has taken place, by way of improving, as it is said, that locality. When, six weeks ago, I asked my noble Friend opposite (Earl Granville), what the expense of that work would be and presumed to guess it would amount to £14,000, I was triumphantly answered by my noble Friend, who said that it would only cost £11,200. He further stated that there would be a great advantage and saving of public money by the expenditure now going on, as £900 a year now paid to the Chelsea Waterworks for water would thereby be saved. I further observed—and this is a much more serious part of the subject—that the expense had taken place without any authority whatever from Parliament; that a correspondence must, I suppose, have passed between the Treasury and the First Commissioner for Works, but that there appeared nothing in the Estimates to lead me to suppose that the money asked for had been voted by Parliament. Assuming these points, which were to a certain extent affirmed by the speech of my noble Friend opposite, I asked for returns showing why the expense had been undertaken so urgently and suddenly without the consent of Parliament, and I asked for the correspondence on the subject between the Treasury and the right hon. Baronet the Chief Commissioner for Works. My noble Friend promised this six weeks ago, and repeated that promise three weeks ago. I moved for it a week ago, but I have not since seen or heard anything about it. Fortunately, however, there is a correspondence which answered my purpose moved for by Sir Francis Baring in the House of Commons, and to this I beg to draw your Lordships' attention. My noble Friend opposite said that the question was a sanitary question, and that the expenditure was made on sanitary grounds. He said that the right hon. Baronet the Member for Marylebone had been besieged by protests against the unwholesome state of the water in St. James's Park. But Sir Benjamin Hall does not add to the correspondence any prayers from petitioners who, being within the reach of the miasma from this lake, complained of its unwholesome exhalations. Now, the public health was in peril, and that no time was to be lost, would have been the only justification for so unconstitutional a course as the expenditure of £11,000 upon the lake in St. James's Park, and £4,000 upon the drain, without the previous sanction of Parliament. But what is the history given by Sir Benjamin Hall himself of these works in these lakes, that of the Serpentine and that in St. James's Park? He says that originally there was a limpid stream flowing from Bayswater into the Serpentine, which, as he correctly says, was now turned into a sewer. That was a feeder, to a certain extent, of the water in St. James's Park. Naturally, then, as the population increased, these lakes required a supply of water from a different source. Accordingly, in 1840, the Government applied to the Chelsea Waterworks, who agreed to supply the Serpentine with a certain quantity of water at £600 a year. This is to be saved, it is said. But I am puzzled how £900, which my noble Friend says is to be saved out of the transaction, is to be saved out of £600. If my noble Friend can solve that problem I trust he will be Minister of Finance for this country to the last days of his life. It appeared to most people, and also to Sir Benjamin Hall, that the one obvious way of correcting the evil was to divert the polluted water derived from the drains which flowed into the Serpentine, and admit only the pure. But this alone was not sufficiently ambitious for the mind of the Chief Commissioner of Works. He went to other persons and asked what a much larger operation would cost—that of draining the lakes and paving them with a sort of concrete. Now, in 1835 the late Sir John Rennie was consulted on the subject, and he estimated the cost of purifying the lakes at £12,000. At a subsequent period, Mr. Mann, the gardener of the parks, estimated the cost at £25,000. These estimates were made during the modest and methodical Government of Lord John Russell, when the Earl of Carlisle was at the Board of Works. But even these were rejected by Sir Charles Trevelyan. A very different answer was given to Sir Benjamin Hall. We are not now under a modest and methodical Government like that to which I have referred; we are under the rollicking rule of the noble Viscount, and the management of the metropolis is confided to the right hon. Baronet the Member for Marylebone. Under these circumstances, Mr. Mann's estimate for cleansing the Serpentine has risen to no less than £110,500, while that, for diverting the sewer is £22,000, and this does not include the lake in St. James's Park, for which a sum of £28,900 more is charged, and for diverting the sewer which runs under the Horse Guards £4,000 more; on the whole, £165,900 for these colossal operations of Sir Benjamin Hall. There is one thing I should have liked to see, and that is the face of Sir Charles Trevelyan when that estimate was handed in to him. If that face had had the power of Medusa's face when Sir Benjamin Hall handed it in, it would have turned him to stone, and we should at once have had a ready-made statue of the right hon. Baronet to immortalise him. The sum included in this estimate, I may remind your Lordships, is sufficient to pay four regiments, and to keep 4000 or 5000 bayonets for a whole year. I think it must be difficult for even a Whig Government to extract much money from Sir Charles Trevelyan. I know from experience that it is impossible to a Tory one. I think one of the greatest triumphs of my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and it was an attempt in which I failed, was in succeeding in strengthening the staff of the Foreign Office, which was so much undermanned; but not only Sir Charles Trevelyan, but Mr. Wilson was startled at the prospect of £165,000, and came forward with the common-place suggestion that they should begin by diverting the Bayswater sewer. The right hon. Baronet then went and asked for other estimates, on which Mr. Mann reduced the estimate to £65,000, being £100,000 less than the first. This is only important as showing how much money men can spend when they are perfectly reckless. Well, on the 27th of August, 1856, the Treasury gave leave to spend £16,000 on cleansing the lake in St. James's Park. But Sir Benjamin Hall said that the Commissioners of Sewers must divert the sewer, so that after all the real evil still remained to correct. Then there was a hiatus in the correspondence. But on the 27th August the Treasury say that they will make the advance necessary for the purpose in anticipation of the vote to be taken in the Estimates of the following year. But I do not find, as there should be, any letter from the Pay Office authorising that statement, and stating from what fund the money was to be taken. This, then, raises a very serious constitutional question—whether it should be permitted for any Minister, however urgent the case may be, to spend money without the authority of Parliament? I deny the urgency in this case. How is the pond situated? There is Buckingham Palace at one end; there is Carlton Terrace on the north side, Birdcage Walk, and the Wellington Barracks on the south, and on the east there are the official residences of many of the Ministers and the public offices. I should like to see any of the complaints that come from any of these parties. Now I will mention the names of some of those who live in that neighbourhood, and the House will judge whether these persons have suffered much from the miasma. I will take my noble Friends the Earl of Clarendon, the Duke of Leinster, the Speaker of the House of Commons, the Prussian Minister, Earl Lonsdale, Lord Overstone, and others, and I will ask my noble Friend opposite whether he sees in any of those gentlemen the signs of premature decay. Most of them are his intimate friends. Has he been alarmed for their lives? Can he state that any of these gentlemen or their neighbours have intimated any fear for their health, or any apprehensions of the value of their property being deteriorated in consequence of the state of the lake in St. James's Park? Then, what is the case with respect to Whitehall—the noble Viscount at the head of the Government having long lived there. The Comptroller of the Exchequer, I believe, lives in Birdcage Walk. I believe that there are no haunts more healthy than those of the squares in that locality. Therefore I cannot think what excuse the right hon. Baronet could have had to violate one of the most sacred rules of the constitution, not to spend a shilling without a vote in Parliament. The moment a Minister is allowed to divert money from one purpose to another, there is no reason why £5,000 or £10,000 voted for an object unanimously approved of, should not be applied to an object on which no two people had the same opinion. It is impossible to say what may be done by a daring Minister like the one at the head of the Government if this be permitted. He may get into one of those little disputes which sometimes arise in the course of his Administration. He may begin and carry on a war without asking Parliament for money or for leave to undertake it. And then when Parliament meets again, the Minister may turn round to the House of Commons, as he has done, and say, "You owe me £500,000." I am sorry to say that the House of Commons was so treated, and what is more, that it submitted quietly to such treatment. What I object to is more money being asked for than is wanted. Money should be asked for on account, as works are proceeded with. That is the only way you can check public functionaries. In 1849, the late Lord Auckland thought it necessary that a dockyard should be established at Pembroke. In carrying out the works he exceeded the Estimates. The late Mr. Hume then moved a Resolution, which was adopted by the House of Commons, in which, after setting forth that the expenditure in the naval department had, for the years 1847-48 exceeded the appropriations by £300,000, and that that on the Pembroke dockyard was £52,000 in excess, it was declared that that House concurred in the opinion expressed by the Treasury with regard to the great excess of expenditure under the control of the Admiralty, and that it was of opinion that the proper course was to postpone the enrolment of men after the money voted by Parliament was expended, and not to engage in any fresh expenditure after that sum was exhausted. This is one of the Resolutions that had been adopted by the House of Commons, and it appears to me that nothing but recklessness or vanity could induce a Minister to disobey it. No reasonable sum of money for a useful purpose, if asked for in the ordinary way, would be refused by Parliament; and it is not because a Minister may have a particular fancy for one thing or another that he can, without consulting anybody, undertake such works as these. The right hon. Baronet in the present case, following his own caprice, has dipped his hand into the public pocket, trusting to the indulgence of Parliament for its repayment.

The Earl of Malmesbury

EARL GRANVILLE said, he thought that his noble Friend had attached too much importance to the matter. The delay of which the noble Earl complained in the production of the papers for which he moved was occasioned by an irregularity. By some omission or another no formal order was given at the time the papers were moved for. The formal order was only given on the 6th July, and the papers were not in the hands of the printer on the 9th of July. The noble Earl had complained of the nature of the works in St. James's Park, and of the expense incurred in respect of them, without the assent of Parliament. He had, on a former occasion, complained of the character of the water, which he said would be dirtier instead of cleaner, and that the ducks would all die. Now, on the 19th of June there was a great thunder-storm, and the rain fell in such violence as to sweep a great deal of dirt on both sides into the lake, and consequently the lake remained for some time in a bad state. A few days after that occurrence his noble Friend gave notice that he would call their attention to the state of the water and the works generally carrying on in the park. The noble Earl no doubt felt that he had a triumphant case from the state of the water; but very soon after the water was purified; and it was now impossible for any one walking by the side of the lake not to see the improvement which had taken place. With regard to the strong point in the noble Earl's complaint, namely, the amount of expenditure upon those improvements without Parliamentary sanction, he begged to remind his noble Friend that since he had first brought the subject under the consideration of their Lordships no less than two discussions upon the matter had taken place in the other House of Parliament, and after a careful consideration of it, the right hon. Baronet himself having had an opportunity of explaining his conduct, the House of Commons was induced to acquiesce in the measure, and expressed the opinion generally that the right hon. Baronet had acted judiciously in having saved the country an expenditure of £5,000, and had effected most excellent arrangements. The question having been thus satisfactorily settled, he thought it rather too much to have the subject again opened. The Estimate having been agreed to by the other House it was scarcely competent for the noble Earl to renew the matter. He did not object to the noble Earl applying epithets generally to those from whom he differed, but at the same time he thought it somewhat unworthy of him to apply the words "rollicking rule" to the conduct of the noble Lord at the head of the Government. What he also complained of was, the noble Earl attacking civil servants of the Crown, who were not there to defend themselves. The noble Earl made an accusation against Sir Charles Trevelyan, in saying that while that officer was willing to afford every assistance to a Whig Government he was indisposed to give any aid to a Tory Government.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: I said nothing whatever that could be considered disrespectful of Sir Charles Trevelyan. I stated that when I had the honour of a seat in the Cabinet there were many improvements in the Foreign Office, which, notwithstanding I had much trouble about, I was unable to have carried out. Those improvements were subsequently carried out by my noble Friend opposite, and nobody could be more rejoiced at it than myself. I stated that fact in connection with the assistance sought for from Sir Charles Trevelyan, but not in a manner disrespectful to Sir Charles Trevelyan.

EARL GRANVILLE thought that Sir Charles Trevelyan was quite right in the first instance to raise as many objections as possible to the expenditure of the public money. As the noble Earl had referred to the Government of which he formed a part, he might remind him, too, that there was a certain right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Government of his noble Friend (the Earl of Derby), and, nevertheless, the noble Earl the other night, apparently forgetting that fact, said that he could have no confidence in any Chancellor of the Exchequer who was of the Jewish persuasion. Whether the Jewish extraction of Mr. Disraeli weakened the confidence of the noble Earl in that right hon. Gentleman he did not know; but with regard to Sir Charles Trevelyan, he did not think that that distinguished civil servant ever asked whether an improvement emanated from a Whig or Tory Government, but examined the proposal wholly on its own merits; nor did he think that any of the civil servants of the Crown were open to such a charge. In respect to the sanitary portion of the question, he was of opinion it was impossible that they could have a lake of water in a stagnant stinking state without it being unsalubrious to the people residing in its neighbourhood. The right hon. Baronet (Sir B. Hall), while acting as President of the Board of Health, had paid great attention to this subject, and was firmly convinced, by consultation with certain medical officers, that great inconvenience had arisen from the insalubrity of the water in the park. He dared to say he saw the matter in a different light from that of the noble Earl, who could spend half the year in the country; but he confessed he felt a sympathy for the 2,500,000 of his fellow-citizens who were crowded together in this vast city. St. James's Park was one of the few open places for the population to enjoy a little recreation in, and he believed it to be the duty of the Government to take every measure possible to render those public places salubrious as well as agreeable to them. He deplored that local patriotism which confined its attention to one particular part of the metropolis. For example, they hardly knew in the west-end what they were doing at the east-end. When an arrangement had been made with the Crown as to the Crown revenues he thought that the Government were doubly bound to see those public parks kept up in a proper and salubrious state. He was quite sure that the public generally approved of the strenuous efforts which the right hon. Baronet the President of the Board of Works was making for the improvement of the metropolitan parks.

Earl Granville

LORD MONTEAGLE said, he had never heard any complaints made of the unhealthiness of the water in the park even during the visitation of cholera. He thought that a constitutional offence had been committed in a misappropriation of the public money by diverting it from the purposes for which it was intended, and applying it to other purposes for which it was not voted. If money had been wanted for this purpose, it might have been obtained in a legitimate manner. No doubt Sir Benjamin Hall's conduct, his spirit, and his desire to discharge the functions of President of the Board of Health entitled him to the gratitude of the people of this country, and it was natural that he should bring into the Board of Works the feelings which had been excited in the office he had left. Sir Benjamin Hall came into office in July, and he did not blame him for not coming to Parliament in the short interval between July and August; but when he found that these improvements were required, he ought to have applied to the Treasury to make an advance from the fund placed at their disposal for civil contingencies. He might thus have obtained funds enough to complete these improvements instead of pursuing a course which was certainly not constitutional. Their Lordships were not free from the obligation to watch over the expenditure of the public money with as much jealousy as if they were representatives of the people. They would find that in 1856 the Board of Works were authorized to undertake the formation of the sewer. The natural course was in 1856 to have laid the whole question before Parliament. He believed that some inconvenience was occasioned by the sudden death of an officer of the department, but this would not account for adding several thousand pounds to the former outlay. The matter was brought before Parliament after the event, nor would the Vote of 1856 affect the misappropriation of money in 1855. Her Majesty's Government in the other House had admitted the irregularity of the whole proceeding, but the noble Earl had passed it over with graceful negligence, as if it were a matter of no importance.

EARL GRANVILLE had admitted that the subject was one which might very properly occupy the attention of their Lordships.

THE CONSOLIDATED CRIMINAL STATUTES.

SECOND READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR then moved the Second Reading of the series of Bills which, he said, had been framed with the view of carrying out the consolidation of the criminal statutes. Those Bills comprised the Offences of Larceny, &c.; Offences against the Person; Malicious Injuries to Property; Forgery; Libel; Coinage Offences; Deer, Game, and Rabbits; Accessories and Abettors Bills.

LORD CAMPBELL said, he did not rise to oppose the second reading of the Bill, but he must state that he was not prepared for this proceeding of his noble and learned Friend. When these Bills were read a first time, he understood that they would be laid on the table this Session and considered, but that they could not be proceeded with till next Session. That seemed to him the most expedient course, for there might not only be consolidation but alteration of the Acts, and though no doubt they had been most skillfully prepared, still if there had been any alterations, they ought to be well considered. He had always been most hopeful with respect to the feasibility of effecting a consolidation of the statute law, but while that was the case, he thought such consolidation ought to be effected as a whole and not piecemeal; and, taking that view of the matter, he thought his noble and learned Friend would act wisely in deferring all legislation upon the subject until a future Session.

LORD WENSLEYDALE said, he differed from his noble and learned Friend the Lord Chief Justice, with reference to the expediency of postponing legislation upon the subject under discussion. He was of opinion that the Bills ought to be proceeded with during the present Session, inasmuch as the utmost pains had been taken by the Commissioners to reduce them to a satisfactory shape, and inasmuch as no advantage was likely to result from further delay.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH called attention to the 57th Clause of the Act for the punishment of offences against the person, for the purpose of urging upon their Lordships the expediency of amending the law regarding the punishment of rape. By the Act as it stood, the punishment was the same whether the offence had been committed by one or by more persons. He recollected when the Marquess of Normanby was Home Secretary, the Amendment of the law was under consideration, and he (the Marquess of Westmeath) had proposed, that inasmuch as the abominable offence of rape was greatly aggravated when committed by more persons than one, and that frequently the unfortunate woman died from the violence committed under the former circumstances, that the punishment should be death when the offence was proved against two or more individuals. At present the sentence was transportation, whether the offence was committed by one or by several persons. He divided the House twice on the subject, but the proposition was rejected, though only by small majorities.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that as those Bills were simply to consolidate the existing law, the noble Marquess was out of order in raising this particular question.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he hoped that no alterations had been made in the Acts relating to the several subjects, inasmuch as by the form in which those Bills were now moved, it would be most inconvenient to discuss the merits of any alterations. He thought it was highly expedient that those consolidations should take place under separate headings. Their Lordships had better, then, accept those measures as consolidations, upon the assurance of the Government that no alterations had been made in the several Acts.

The Bills were then severally read 2<sup>a</sup>.

SALE OF OBSCENE BOOKS, &c.,
PREVENTION BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

LORD CAMPBELL, in rising to move the third reading of this Bill, said, he felt it to be his duty to call the attention of their Lordships to a letter conveying information of a nature the most appalling in reference to the subject to which the Bill related. The letter to which he referred had been written by Mr. Pritchard, secretary to the Society for the Suppression of Vice, a gentleman of great intelligence and of high honour, who had been for many years most zealously engaged in the endeavour to suppress those publications against which he (Lord Campbell) asked their Lordships to legislate. Mr. Pritchard had written to him as follows:—

“My Lord,—I have gone through the records of the prosecutions instituted by the society, for the sale or exposure of obscene publications, during the last fifty-five years. The total number during that period is 159, or within a very small fraction of three every year. Out of these 159 cases there have been but five acquittals, and the terms of imprisonment, varying from fourteen days to two years, average eight months each within six days and a-half. But in this calculation of the duration of the terms of imprisonment, no allowance is made for the circumstance that, in many of the earlier instances, to imprisonment was added the pillory, and, after the latter mode of punishment was given up, a fine. But it must always be borne in mind that the number of cases in which the society has prosecuted by no means represents the cases that have occurred. I may safely say that it has not been in one case in six brought under the society's notice in which they have been able to prosecute, chiefly from the heavy expenses attending a prosecution. I believe that one case in ten would be nearer to the truth, but I am anxious not to fall into any exaggeration. About the year 1834, there were no less than fifty-seven of these shops existing in London at one time, and no exertions that the society has been able to make have reduced these below from eighteen to twenty, which represents the number of shops that may be considered as permanently opened for this abominable traffic. It is also known that a system exists of sending out men from London, who periodically visit the different country towns, and attend the different fairs, races, and markets to circulate these abominations as their regular trade. One man died, not long since, while under imprisonment on a conviction obtained by the society, who regularly visited the two Universities twice a year with a stock of highly-finished French prints far exceeding, if it be possible, the books that have generally been brought before the criminal courts. To show the immense stock of these things which the dealers have been able to collect, in the year 1845, from one dealer, who was permitted by the Central Criminal Court to retract his plea of ‘Not Guilty,’ and plead ‘Guilty,’ were taken no less than 12,346 prints, 393 books, 351 copper plates, 88 lithographic stones, and 33½ cwt. of letterpress. And from another, in the same year, 15,300 prints, 162 books, 1 cwt. of letterpress, 96 copper plates, 21 lithographic stones, and 114 lb. of stereotype. And within two years afterwards both of these men had again accumulated large stocks. Part of the stocks above enumerated were given up, and part the society was enabled to take under circumstances that cannot be expected to occur again. I may further mention that there are two men upon the society's list, one of whom has been prosecuted not fewer than nine times, and the other seven times. The truth is, that the trade is so lucrative that the dealers can well afford the risk of an occasional imprisonment. While their stocks are safe, their families can carry on their trade till their term of imprisonment expires, when they return to their old practices with increased experience of the modes by which the operation of the law may be eluded. And the only chance of success is to make this traffic a losing speculation.”

That was the present state of that abominable traffic, and he was afraid that there would be no means of checking it, unless a similar power was given to search for and seize those detestable publications as was given in the case of uncustomed goods, unlicensed printing places, and implements of gaming. All that he asked their Lordships to do was to grant a similar power, but with considerable modification to that which already existed in other cases. There was another subject to which he wished to refer before sitting down. He had been informed that on the second reading of the Bill he had been understood to make use of an expression of an insulting and offensive character to his noble and learned Friend opposite (Lord Lyndhurst). He could only say that, if such was the case, it was without any intention of doing so, and without being in the slightest degree aware that anything which he said could be construed as being offensive to his noble and learned Friend; if, however, he had inadvertently let fall anything which might possibly be so construed, he begged most fully and entirely to retract it, and to express regret that he had said anything which might bear such a construction. His noble and learned Friend on that occasion had done no more than his duty, and he had since then rendered material assistance in amending the

The Earl of Derby

Bill, and for that he begged leave to return thanks to his noble and learned Friend. There was one other subject to which he wished to refer. He had on a previous day referred to a book which he stated had been purchased at a railway station, and which contained a catalogue of a great number of most improper works for sale. Now, the Messrs. Smith, who had a contract for supplying books at all the principal railway stations of England, and who were persons of the very highest respectability, were naturally much hurt at the supposition that they should in any way be concerned in circulating that which was improper at any railway station, and he had received a letter informing him that the Messrs. Smith were at all times most sincerely anxious that no improper publication should be sold at any station at which they had any control. He could only add that to that statement he attached most perfect credence, from the high opinion which he entertained of the respectability of the Messrs. Smith.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 3<sup>a</sup>.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, that he ventured, the moment his noble and learned Friend produced that book, to say that it had never been sold by the authority of the Messrs. Smith. He knew those gentlemen very well, and he did not suppose that there were more unlikely persons in the world to assist in the circulation of such a publication. They had devoted much time to the examination of the subject, and undoubtedly they had been the means of diffusing throughout the country an immense body of the purest literature. Indeed, their collection was as pure as that contained in the most select library in the country. He was anxious to vindicate the reputation of the Messrs. Smith, whom he must characterise as truly Christian gentlemen, utterly incapable of doing an unworthy act.

LORD LYNTHURST: As I have not been able to attend upon the various stages through which this Bill has passed, I wish to take this opportunity, now that it has arrived at its last stage, of offering a few observations with regard to it. Before doing so, however, I beg to acknowledge the full and proper manner in which my noble and learned Friend, the Lord Chief Justice, has atoned for what I considered to be most offensive words which he uttered with regard to myself on the second reading of this Bill. I did not hear those words myself, because I have the misfortune to labour under physical infirmity, but they were repeated to me by different friends, upon whose accuracy I most completely rely, and certainly they were of a most offensive nature. I apprehend, however, that my noble and learned Friend is not always aware of the effect of the expressions which he uses. My noble and learned Friend has been so accustomed to relate degrading anecdotes of his predecessors in office, that I am afraid his feelings upon those subjects have become somewhat blunted; and I am the more confirmed in that opinion from a circumstance which occurred not long ago. My noble and learned Friend, in a publication which he recently gave to the world, inserted two or three paragraphs of a nature by no means complimentary to myself, and having done so, he selects the particular volume containing those paragraphs from the whole set and sends it to me as a present, with the author's compliments. I conclude, therefore, that my noble and learned Friend does not, upon all occasions, understand the force of the expressions which he uses. Why, immediately after the division had taken place the other evening, my noble and learned Friend, after having uttered expressions with regard to myself more degrading to the utterer than to the person against whom they were directed, came over to me with a smiling face, and asked me to amend his Bill. I consented to do so, and suggested those Amendments which have since been introduced. I will now, however, say a few words upon the Bill itself, because certain misrepresentations have been made as to what I stated on the second reading. My principle objection to the Bill was, that it was so wide, so extensive, so loose, and so vague, that it would give rise to every kind of abuse; and I illustrated the vexation to which it might lead by several instances—I might have taken many stronger cases—which I submitted to the consideration of your Lordships; and I ended by saying, that no publisher, no print-seller, would be safe from vexation under this Bill as it then stood. I will give you a sample of its provisions. A man makes an affidavit that some one—he does not say who—has reason to suspect that there are improper publications at such a house. Upon that vague surmise a warrant is issued, the effect of which will be, that at any hour of the day, or any hour of the night, an officer may go into the house, search every room, every bedroom, even the beds in which women are lying, because they may conceal improper publications, break open, or order to be opened, every drawer and every closet in the house, and after all it may turn out that there is nothing to be found; but the householder will have no remedy for all this vexation. I am not saying that that is the Bill as it stands at present, but that was the Bill which the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench presented to your Lordships for your approbation; and then I was rebuked for opposing it. In the name of common sense could I do otherwise than oppose a Bill drawn in such a monstrous shape? But that is not all. That was the first clause of the Bill. According to the second no affidavit was required. The report of a mere superintendent of police that he believed there were improper publications in a house would give rise to all the vexation to which I have referred. Under these circumstances, I think I shall stand justified for having opposed the second reading of the Bill. My noble and learned Friend has repeatedly said, "Oh! these are not the objects I have in view," and in a kind of deprecatory tone, "I do not mean anything of the kind." Why, it is not what the Chief Justice means—but what is the construction of the Act of Parliament? The construction of the Act of Parliament is such as I have stated, and nobody can deny that it will lead, or may lead, to the vexation which I have described. Now, as to this question of vexation. It is said that no bookseller or printseller of respectability will ever have his premises opened and searched under a Bill of this description. Is that so? Some time ago there occurred a case of this description. A man named Hetherington published some low and blasphemous publications at a penny a-piece; he was tried, and was sentenced to four months' imprisonment. When in prison, he employed one of his dependents to go about to the shops of different booksellers and see whether he could find anything that could be made the subject of a prosecution. This man went to the shops of a bookseller named Moxon, a publisher of great respectability; a bookseller named Otley; and a third whose name I do not remember. A short time before, the widow of Bysshe Shelley had published a new edition of his works, including all the pieces which he had written, some of them at the age of 18. Hetherington picked out some passages from these works and indicted Moxon,

Lord Lyndhurst

Otley, and the other person, for publishing and selling them. The indictment was removed by certiorari into the Court of Queen's Bench and tried before a special jury. Lord Denman, who presided, after very severely censuring the course which had been pursued, said that he must put this question to the jury, "Are these particular passages blasphemous libels or not?" The jury found that they were. Lord Denman imposed only a nominal penalty, but the prosecution was of the severest kind, because every one must know that an indictment preferred at the quarter sessions, removed by certiorari into the Queen's Bench and tried by a special jury, must operate as a very heavy punishment. I mention this case in order to show the necessity for so framing this Bill as to guard against vexatious proceedings. The Amendments which I suggested and which I drew were framed with that object and for that purpose. As the Bill originally stood, any person making an affidavit that there was reason to suspect, &c., laid the foundation for a warrant. I have now provided that the person shall swear that he has reason to believe, and that he does believe, that there are such publications in such a place, and shall further state to the magistrate the reasons which lead to that belief. Nor does it stop there. The most material Amendment is, that he must state what the publications are, and that they are of such a nature that, if published, the party publishing them will be guilty of a misdemeanour. The magistrate must also be satisfied that the case is a proper one for a prosecution, so that if indecent passages were taken out of such authors as Dryden or Pope, he would say, "Although these are very indecent passages, and ought never to have been inserted in these works, yet this is not a case for a prosecution." I hope, my lords, that I have justified the course which I pursued. I thought the Bill badly constructed, and I opposed it on that account. I saw that it would lead to vexatious proceedings, and I stated why it would do so. When my noble and learned Friend asked me to amend the Bill, I amended it in that sense, not for the purpose of defeating the measure, but to guard against the evil of which I complained, with which the Bill in its original form was pregnant, and the existence of which everybody admitted. I am sorry to have detained your lordships with this explanation, but so many misapprehensions and misapplications of what fell from me have gone abroad, that I have felt as though I were upon my trial, and that I was imperatively called upon to justify myself. I hope the statement which I have made is perfectly satisfactory to your Lordships.

LORD WENSLEYDALE admitted that the Bill had been much improved by the Amendments which had been introduced into it, but he could not recognize the necessity for introducing a system of domiciliary visits, which had always been considered contrary to the principle and spirit of the law of England. It was necessary, he thought, if such provisions were made, that the magistrates should be enabled to judge of the necessity of the proceeding, and that not only the belief but the ground of the belief should be laid before them. He believed that the object of his noble and learned Friend might be fully attained by the augmentation of the punishment for publishing these libels. Having been for twenty-eight years concerned in the administration of justice, and never to his recollection having had a case of this kind before him either in London or on circuit, he had thought that the mischief was not of great extent. His noble and learned Friend had read a statement of what had been done during the last fifty-five years, and he could not help thinking that in the last case mentioned in it the prosecution had been attended with great success. He was therefore disposed to think that an augmentation of the punishment would be sufficient to put a stop to the business of selling these infamous publications. [Lord CAMPBELL said he had sentenced persons to two years' imprisonment.] He did not mean to blame his noble and learned Friend for the sentence which he had passed upon offenders, but he did not think that the common law had been allowed a fair chance of success. He should therefore be glad to assist his noble and learned Friend to make the law more severe. We could not return to the pillory, but why should not the sellers of these publications be imprisoned and flogged? He was most anxious to put a stop to this infamous traffic, but thought that that might be accomplished without the introduction of domiciliary visits, for which there was no precedent in the common law.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that he had been very much impressed with the difficulties which would be found to stand in the way of carrying this Bill into excution when it was first introduced, and though he could not say that those difficulties were entirely removed by the Amendments which his noble and learned Friend (Lord Lyndhurst) who had just left the House had introduced into it, still, after the information which the noble and learned lord who had charge of the Bill had read to the House of the great number of persons who had been prosecuted for this offence without any satisfactory result, they were bound to listen with great deference to any suggestion of his noble and learned Friend for an improvement of the law in this respect. As the Bill now stood, these search-warrants would only be granted after great precautions, and, considering that the offence was on the increase rather than on the decrease, it would be unwise not to pass this Bill.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY was understood to say that throughout he had felt the greatest anxiety for the fate of the Bill. He must confess that up to that evening he had fancied that a little misplaced sympathy on the part of some of their lordships had been evinced towards the publication of these obscene prints. His fears, however, on that point had now vanished. In conclusion, the right rev. Prelate tendered to Lord Campbell his thanks, and those of his right rev. Brethren, for his exertions in this cause.

LORD CAMPBELL said, he was highly gratified to find that the Bill was likely to pass through their Lordships' House, notwithstanding the opposition which was made to the second reading. He regretted exceedingly that, after what he conceived to be his ample apology to his noble and learned Friend, he should have thought it necessary to express himself in such harsh terms. His noble and learned Friend must have been misinformed as to what he had said upon a former occasion, for he was sure that he had made use of no expressions calculated to raise such feelings in his noble and learned Friend's most liberal and just mind. All that he had said upon that occasion was to assure his noble and learned Friend that, as he had talked with so much delight of certain works of Correggio and of the prints from them, there was nothing in this Bill which would disturb his enjoyment of them, and that he had not the slightest idea of saying anything which could be in the least degree offensive. With regard to his noble and learned Friend's observations upon him as a biographer, he appealed to the public on that question, and that was not the place to raise a discussion upon it. He hoped his noble and learned Friend would find a chronicler who would justify every action of his life, and would prove him to have ever been a consistent politician. He trusted that the Bill would soon pass into law, and that the time would soon come when Holywell Street would become the abode of honest, industrious handicraftsmen, and a thoroughfare through which any modest woman might pass.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 3<sup>a</sup> accordingly and passed, and sent to the Commons.

PRIVILEGE OF REPORTS.

REPORT OF SELECT COMMITTEE PRESENTED.

LORD CAMPBELL laid on the table the Report of the Select Committee which had been appointed to consider how far the privilege now given to reports of proceedings in the Courts of Law in newspapers might be extended to reports of the proceedings in the two Houses of Parliament, and in other public assemblies. The prayer of all the petitions laid before the Committee was substantially the same—namely, that there should be entire immunity to newspapers for printing and publishing anything whatever spoken at a public meeting. They heard the petitioners and their witnesses in support of that prayer; but the Committee came to the unanimous resolution that it was a prayer that could not be safely granted in the latitude in which it was sought, because a mob might be called a public meeting, and if a newspaper could lawfully publish whatever was said by any one member of that mob it would lead to the most mischievous consequences, for sedition might be spoken, and the most acrimonious attacks made upon private character. It was proposed by the petitioners also that the remedy should be against the speaker, and not in any instance against the journal; but that would in many instances leave the party calumniated without a remedy, because a man of straw might be put forward to say things to gratify the malice of some one who remained behind; and, as the law now stood, a speaker would in many cases be protected by taking refuge under the plea that he had made a privileged communication. No action would lie against a speaker for merely saying that a man was a liar or a scoundrel, or that a woman was unchaste; but when put into writing or published such language became actionable. Supposing a newspaper were to contain an account of a speech attacking private character, in which a man was called a liar, a coward, or a scoundrel, and it was circulated all over the world, to say that no action could be brought against the publisher of the journal would be to leave the person whose character was assailed without a remedy; for, as he had already said, no action lay against spoken words that merely amounted to general abuse. Parliament might, of course, make a speaker liable for a printed report of everything that was spoken by him, and thus take away all distinction between written and spoken slander; but it would be a most important change in the law of England, and, as he believed, was wholly unnecessary. The committee thought that such a concession was unnecessary, and could not be safely granted to those who petitioned for it; but they at the same time believed that, with perfect safety to the public, there might be a protection granted against vexatious suits that did not now exist. A majority of the Committee were of opinion that a faithful report of the proceedings of either House of Parliament, when strangers were permitted to be present, should have the same privilege as a report of the proceedings of a court of justice. The majority thought that all the reasons which existed for giving that privilege to a faithful report of the proceedings of courts of justice extended to the two Houses of Parliament. It was equally important to the public that the proceedings in Parliament should be published, and that those who published them should not run the peril of an action or indictment. As to the Standing Orders forbidding the publication of the proceedings of either House of Parliament, it was hoped that these antiquated rules—which were, in fact, mere waste paper—would be speedily repealed as they were merely an impediment to that which was for the public interest. But the most important practical alteration proposed in the law for the protection of the public press was this:—At present, if a journal containing a faithful report of a meeting, called for a lawful purpose, contained anything against an individual, though he had sustained no damage whatever, he might bring an action, and if the case was proved, the Judge was bound to tell the jury to find a verdict for the plaintiff, and they were compelled to do so, giving, perhaps, a farthing damages. By a late Act of Parliament, which certainly had checked this class of actions, the plaintiff could get no more costs than damages, so that a farthing damages only carried farthing costs; but then the defendant was burdened with his own costs. In the case of "Davidson v. Duncan," which had caused so much apprehension, though the jury, with the approbation of the Judge, found that the report was a faithful report of the proceedings of a public meeting, that there was no malice whatever, and that the plaintiff had suffered no damage, they were obliged to give a verdict for the plaintiff, which they did with a farthing damages; but the defendant was obliged to pay the costs of his own defence, which were said to be above £400. Now it was proposed that if an action was brought against a public journal for that which professed to be a report of a public meeting the defendant might plead that it was a faithful report, and that the plaintiff had sustained no actual damage; and if the jury should be of that opinion, then they could find a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff, instead of recovering damages or costs, would be obliged to pay all the costs of the vexatious action which he had brought. But the difficulty arose as to what should be considered a public meeting; and on this point the Committee were of opinion that public meetings should be those lawfully called by the sheriff of a county, or the mayor of a borough, for the purpose of petitioning the Queen or either House of Parliament, meetings of a town council, or board of health, or of any body acting under the authority of an Act of Parliament met to impose a rate, or to consider the local affairs of any district. These were public meetings, of which it was very important the localities in which they took place should be informed, and faithful reports of the proceedings of which should be protected; therefore the Committee came to the resolution that where a faithful report of the proceedings of such a public meeting was given, and a plaintiff brought an action, having sustained no damage, the jury should find a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff be compelled to pay all costs. It would be in vain to think of legislating on such a subject as this during the present Session.

Lord Campbell

He could not personally make the attempt as he was about to go on circuit; but he gave notice that at the beginning of another Session he would frame a Bill upon the Resolutions agreed to by the Committee, and submit it to their Lordships. He hoped the Bill would receive the approbation of that and the other House of Parliament and of the Queen, so that the class of vexatious actions to which he referred might never occur again.

House adjourned at Nine o'clock, till to-Morrow, Half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, July 13, 1857.

MINUTE.] NEW WRIT.—For the City of Oxford, v. Charles Neate, esq., void Election.

PUBLIC BILL.—2<sup>o</sup> Justices and Police Force (Dublin); Revising Barristers (Dublin).

GALWAY TOWN ELECTION—REPORT.

House informed, that the Committee had determined,—

That Anthony O'Flaherty, esquire, is not duly elected a Burgess to serve in this present Parliament for the Town and County of the Town of Galway:

That the last Election for the said Town and County of the Town of Galway, so far as regards the Return of the said Anthony O'Flaherty, esquire, is a void Election.

And the said Determinations were ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

LAMBETH ELECTION—REPORT.

MR. INGHAM reported from the Select Committee appointed to try and determine the matter of the Petition of Patteson Nickalls and Robert Henry Bristowe, complaining of an undue Election and Return for the Borough of Lambeth; That Joseph Tredre had been duly summoned by the Warrant of the Speaker of the House of Commons to appear before the said Committee, and that the said Joseph Tredre had disobeyed the said Warrant; that such a disobedience having been satisfactorily proved to the Committee on Saturday the 11th day of this July instant, and the House not being then sitting, by the direction of the Committee he had, by a Warrant under his hand, required the Serjeant at Arms to take the said Joseph Tredre into custody; and the Serjeant had informed the Committee that he had not succeeded in apprehending the said John Tredre.

Resolved, That John Tredre, having been duly summoned by the Speaker's Warrant to attend the said Committee, and having disobeyed such Warrant, and not having appeared before the said Committee, has been guilty of contempt and of a Breach of the Privileges of this House.

Ordered, That John Tredre having been guilty of contempt, and of a Breach of the Privileges of this House, be for his said offence taken into the custody of the Serjeant at Arms attending this House; and that Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant accordingly.

PROPERTY TAX UPON OFFICERS' QUARTERS.—QUESTION.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary for War whether the Secretary of State for War has issued an Order, dated the 30th of May, 1857, directing Field Officers of Artillery, occupying field officers' quarters, to pay property-tax for those quarters?

SIR JOHN RAMSDEN said, that an Order to the effect stated by the hon. and gallant Member had been issued, but that it did not rest with the War Department to decide anything upon the subject, inasmuch as it was prescribed by Schedule A of the Property-tax Act that all houses belonging to Her Majesty, excepting the Royal Palaces, should be assessed to the property-tax, which was to be paid by the occupier.

THE INDIAN MUTINY.—QUESTION.

MR. DISRAELI: There are such serious and, in some respects, such contradictory statements respecting the information contained in the last arrivals from India, that I think it would be greatly for the convenience of the House if Her Majesty's Government would make some authentic statement of the intelligence which they have received on this subject. Besides inviting the noble Lord at the head of the Government to make that statement I would also ask him whether it is his intention to lay any papers connected with the recent transactions in India upon the table of the House?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I cannot disguise that the accounts which have gone forth to the public of the intelligence recently received from India are in some degree contradictory, and, therefore, I am not surprised that they should have led to the question which the right hon. Gentleman has addressed to me, but I am only able to state in reply that all the information which Her Majesty's Government have received is that which has been communicated to them by telegraph messages, first from Cagliari and then from Marseilles, the messages conveying, although in somewhat different words, very nearly the same information. That information is as much known to the public as it is to Her Majesty's Government, and until the mails, which I believe may be expected to-night or to-morrow, arrive from Marseilles, we shall have nothing additional to communicate. The general outline of the intelligence which we have received is, in the first place, that we have had the misfortune to lose the Commander in Chief; in the next place, that the disaffection which existed only in a few regiments, according to the former accounts, appears to have spread to a greater extent among the Bengal army; and that a large number of the Bengal troops have, as stated in the despatch, "disappeared." From that I presume that they have returned to their homes, but that is the expression used, and no further information is given. On the other hand, the native troops which remained faithful to their allegiance, together with some British forces, have had an encounter with the mutineers under the walls of Delhi. That encounter is stated to have resulted in the complete success of Her Majesty's troops—twenty-six pieces of cannon were taken, and the mutineers were compelled to seek refuge within the walls of the town. The walls of Delhi, as the House is no doubt aware, are not regular fortifications, but are merely upright walls, not possessing any of the defences which are usual in the case of fortifications. Further, it was expected when the intelligence left, that the town would be immediately assaulted; but, of course, the Government can know nothing of the result of that assault. When the despatches arrive we shall certainly be ready to lay before Parliament such portions of the communications as may be calculated to give to the House and to the public the fullest obtainable information as to the course of recent events. It may easily be conceived that in these despatches, when they arrive, there may be many circumstances, reasonings, and explanations which, from their very nature, it would not be desirable for the advantage of the public service to communicate; but whatever may be essential in order to afford full information as to what has occurred shall be presented; because, although not usual in matters of this sort, Her Majesty's Government think that this is a case in which the ordinary custom should be departed from, and that exact information should be afforded both to Parliament and to the country with respect to the actual position of affairs in India.

Mr. Ingham

MR. DISRAELI: My question with respect to the production of papers referred rather to despatches already received by the Government before the absolute occurrence of these events, and which, perhaps, intimated their probable occurrence, than to the despatches referred to by the noble Lord. I do not wish to limit my inquiry merely to the production of papers giving only a narrative of the events which have occurred during the last few weeks. I wish now, however, to ask a direct question of the noble Lord, involving a matter of much importance in connection with the Persian war and the occupation of the city of Herat. Has the noble Lord received any information recently from that city to the effect that the person nominated as the Governor of Herat has sworn allegiance to the Shah of Persia; that the Shah has accepted that allegiance, and empowered him to coin money, such transactions being at variance with the treaty lately laid before Parliament?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: In regard to the first question of the right hon. Gentleman, Her Majesty's Government will endeavour to select from the correspondence connected with the events in India that which appears well calculated to give the fullest information to Parliament without compromising the public service. If further information should be desired, it would be for those who think further information necessary to state their reasons for that belief. With respect to the right hon. Gentleman's second question, the Government has received no information with reference to Herat tending to confirm the report to which the right hon. Gentleman has alluded. He is aware that by the treaty the Persians were to evacuate Herat within a certain time, and we were to send an agent to that city to see that the evacuation was complete. That agent, according to the last accounts, had not yet arrived there; but when he does arrive he will of course make his report on the state of things at Herat.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I wish to put another question to the noble Lord respecting the events in India. I have seen in a public newspaper that in the encounter before Delhi the mutineers mustered a force of 7,000 men, and that the British force amounted to only 1,800 men, consisting partly of Sepoys, and the statement went on to the effect that with this force of 1,800 men the attack on Delhi was to be carried into effect. I wish to know whether there is anything in the telegraphic despatch received by the Government to justify that statement?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The telegraphic message has given the Government no details of that encounter. The despatch simply states that an encounter had taken place under the walls of Delhi, and that twenty-six guns had been taken, and that Her Majesty's troops had taken possession of the heights round the city. Perhaps, though no question on the point has been put to me, the House will give me permission to state the general outline of what the Government have thought it right to do. Immediately on the receipt of the information I have just described steps were taken by my right hon. Friend at the head of the Indian department in conjunction with my noble Friend at the head of the War Department, and his Royal Highness the Commander in Chief here, to select an officer to go out to India to take the place of General Anson. The offer was made to Sir Colin Campbell, who accepted it. Upon being asked when he would be able to start, the gallant officer, with his ordinary promptitude, replied "To-morrow;" and accordingly, the offer having been made on Saturday, he was off by the train yesterday evening. A telegraphic despatch was sent to Marseilles to stop the steamer which is to take the mail, which left London on Saturday night, until the arrival of Sir Colin Campbell, who, therefore, would not lose a single hour in reaching his destination. The House is aware that 14,000 men were under orders to go out to India before the arrival of the recent intelligence. Additional troops will now be sent out, and the House may rest assured that the Government will take all the steps necessary to meet the emergency. I should add that Lord Canning, the Governor General of India, has, in the meantime, on his own responsibility, done that which has been entirely approved of by the Government. He wrote to Lord Elgin, whom he thought his despatches would find at Ceylon, to request that he might divert for the Indian service a part of the force now on its way to China. I have no doubt that those despatches have reached Lord Elgin, and that the request will be complied with, and the Government have made such arrangements with respect to China that, even if those troops should be for a time diverted from their original destination, still there would be found on the China station ample means to carry on the operations there.

VISCOUNT GODERICH said, he wished to inquire whether the Government were aware that it had been reported that Sir Patrick Grant had been appointed to the command of the forces by the Indian Government.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: We really know nothing but what I have already stated. All our information comes by telegraph, and it often happens that private persons know, or pretend to know, more than the Government.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he would beg to inquire whether any additional reinforcements were going out to India from this country, or whether the reinforcements were to be confined to those originally destined for China, and which Lord Canning would intercept at Ceylon.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The reinforcements certainly are not confined to the troops on their way to China. Fourteen thousand men were under orders for India, and would have embarked independent of the news just arrived; but the Government think it their duty to despatch as early as possible a considerable force in addition. Of course means must be taken by recruiting to supply the gap which will be thereby made in the forces at home.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, that after the announcement just made by the noble Lord, perhaps it would be convenient for the House to know that he should not now bring forward the Motion of which he had given notice, to call the attention of the House to the inadequacy of the reinforcements proposed to be sent to India.

Viscount Palmerston

SAVINGS BANK BILL—QUESTION.

MR. J. TOLLEMACHE said, he wished to ask whether the Government intended to proceed with the Savings Bank Bill this Session?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he saw no prospect of proceeding with the Bill in the course of the night or even the week. He would state as soon as possible whether he saw any prospect of proceeding with the Measure during the present Session.

VACCINATION—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he wished to know whether it was the intention of the Government to bring in any Bill to amend the law with respect to Vaccination this Session?

MR. COWPER said, the President of the Board of Health had prepared a Bill on the subject, but delayed presenting it until the Bill now before the House respecting the transfer of the powers of that Board should pass. It would then be brought in if the period of the Session would allow of that course.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that an important paper on the subject had lately been printed, and was lying in the Vote Office. Had the Government any objection to distribute that paper to Members.

MR. COWPER said, he believed that the paper in question was one of great interest and of remarkable research; but according to the rules of the House it was not circulated to Members, but was only given to those who applied for it at the Vote Office.

THE PERSIAN AND CHINESE ESTIMATES. NOTICE.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER gave notice that on Thursday next in Committee of Supply he would move the Estimates for the expenses of the war with Persia and of the hostilities with China.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, before moving in Committee of Supply for a Vote of £500,000 for the Persian Expedition, he would lay on the Table of the House the Estimate of the East India Company, presented to the Government last February, and containing their rough calculation of the entire cost of the Persian war to December next; and also the Correspondence which had taken place between the East India Company and Her Majesty's Government on the subject?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the correspondence relative to the Estimate had already been laid on the Table. That Estimate was made when the war was still unfinished, and when the total amount of the expense was uncertain. He should be in a condition on Thursday to lay on the table the Estimate of the East India Company with respect to the total expense of the war. He thought that would be more satisfactory than to communicate one that had been formed on imperfect knowledge.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he wished to know whether the right hon. Baronet would lay the Estimate referred to on the table before the discussion?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he should object to lay on the table the first Estimate of the East India Company as to what the expense would probably be. He would lay on the table the Estimate which he meant to move.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM: When will that Estimate be laid on the Table?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: To-morrow.

INDIAN OFFICERS—QUESTION.

MR. NOEL said, he would beg leave to repeat the question he had put on a previous occasion, whether those officers who were on leave, but were, before the expiration of their furlough, ordered out to India would be obliged to go out at their own expense or at the expense of the Government?

SIR JOHN RAMSDEN said, the question of making an allowance in aid of their expenses to officers in the service of the East India Company who were on leave of absence in this country, and had been ordered to rejoin their regiments, was at present the subject of communication between the Board of Control and the War Department, but that, as soon as a decision was arrived at, no time should be lost in announcing it to Parliament.

THE ORDNANCE SURVEY—QUESTION.

SIR DENHAM NORREYS said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury to explain the meaning of his letter to the Secretary at War, dated 2nd July, 1857, relative to the completion of the works of the Ordnance Survey now in progress on the 25-inch scale.

MR. WILSON said, he had received from Colonel James the following explanation of the interpretation put by him upon the Vote of the House with reference to the completion of the works of the Ordnance survey.

"I should complete the plans of the cultivated districts of those counties which are in progress on the 25-inch scale, and draw the plans of those counties which are not in progress on the 6-inch scale only. That is, I should complete on the 25-inch scale the plans of the cultivated districts of Northumberland, Westmoreland, Roxburghshire, and Lanarkshire, and the other counties now actually in progress on that scale, as we have completed the plans of Durham and Linlithgowshire; but should construct on the 6-inch scale only the plans of Cumberland, and the other counties, in which the field survey has not been commenced, on the 25-inch scale."

He (Mr. Wilson) could only add, that the Government were most anxious to carry into effect the wishes of the House on this subject.

SIR DENHAM NORREYS said, he would beg to ask what was the meaning of the phrase "in progress," in Colonel James's communication? Would works which had only just been commenced be considered as "in progress"?

MR. WILSON said, he understood from Colonel James's note, that the expression applied to all those counties in which the survey had already been commenced upon the 25-inch scale.

THE INDIAN MUTINY.

QUESTION.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT: The Noble Lord at the Head of the Government having distinctly acquainted the House with the number of troops he proposes, under the existing state of India to despatch there from this country, I wish to know from the First Lord of the Admiralty, looking to the large reserve of our steam navy, whether it is the intention of the Board of Admiralty to make use of any of the screw line-of-battle ships available for the conveyance of those troops to the East Indies.

SIR CHARLES WOOD replied that the Admiralty had reason to believe that the troops could be conveyed to their destination more conveniently and rapidly by the employment of hired transports.

NATIONAL ART COLLECTION.

QUESTION.

MR. W. EWART said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Board of Education whether, as it appears from the Returns laid before this House that in the case of some of our National Collections of objects of art, science, and historical interest, as well as in the case of civil and religious edifices and monuments (all maintained or assisted by the Money Votes of Parliament), the public have the benefit of instruction by means of descriptive labels affixed or appended to such objects, without incurring the cost of a catalogue, while in the case of other such collections, edifices, and monuments (similarly supported by public money) no such advantage is given to the public, whether measures will be taken for extending the system of labelling generally for the benefit of the public?

MR. COWPER in reply said, that the Government had been most anxious to carry out the object to which the hon. Gentleman referred in the case of all museums and collections of objects of art, science, and natural products. At the British Museum, at the Kensington Museum, and at other similar institutions, all the articles exhibited were described in a short and condensed manner; and in the case of the Turner collection, not only were the subjects of the various paintings described, but the date at which they were painted was also given—an arrangement which he considered afforded great assistance to students.

THE ORDNANCE SURVEY.

MOTION.

Order for Committee (Supply) read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

LORD ELCHO, in rising to propose the Motion of which he had given notice with reference to the Ordnance Survey, observed that circumstances of a private and very painful nature, connected with the intelligence just received from India, would have induced him to forbear from bringing this subject under the attention of the House, were it not that this was the only opportunity of which he should be able to avail himself for eliciting their opinion on a question which he regarded as of great importance. He had been told that in again calling attention to the subject of the Ordnance Survey he would only be wasting the time of the House, but he could not think he was open to such a charge when he asked hon. Gentlemen to consider whether something like £2,000,000 of the public money was expended profitably or unprofitably. He did not propose to reopen the question of the 25-inch scale, as he bowed to the decision at which the House of Commons had arrived on that subject. He believed, however, that that decision was in a great measure attributable to the general misconception which existed on the subject, and to the idea that this was exclusively a Scotch question, or, as it had been termed, "a Scotch job." With regard to its being "a Scotch job," he begged to say that whatever steps might have been taken in Scotland since the survey upon the 25-inch scale had been in progress, a similar course had been adopted in the northern counties of England. The fact was, that the survey had proceeded in the two countries pari passu. What was the position of the survey when the House arrived at its decision? In the northern portion of England, and throughout Scotland, the Ordnance had made surveys, and had published maps of the cultivated rural districts upon the scale of 25 inches to the mile; and they were also publishing a 6-inch map, and a 1-inch map of the whole country. The large towns, the population of which exceeded 4,000, were surveyed upon a 10 feet scale. When the scale for the survey of the rural districts was raised from 6 inches to 25 inches, the scale for the survey of towns was raised from 5 feet to 10 feet; and it might have been thought that when the country survey was reduced from 25 inches to 6 inches, the town survey would also have been reduced from 10 feet to 5 feet; but no change had hitherto been made. He was, however, quite willing that towns should enjoy the advantage of a really good practical survey, which would be afforded by a 10-inch scale. He found, from the letters of the Secretary at War, that the survey was in progress on the 25-inch scale in three counties in the north of England—Northumberland, Westmoreland, and Durham—and in nine counties in Scotland, including Renfrew, Ayr, Dumfries, and Peebles; and in those counties of Scotland would be found the large proportion of the cultivated districts of that country. The total estimate for the survey of Scotland, conducted in the way he had described, after making a deduction in respect of the work already done, amounted to £624,000; and as regarded Scotland the only saving effected by the change would be about three farthings an acre, or £50,000 in the aggregate. Again, in the counties which had been begun in the north of England the only saving would be £5,000. The total saving, therefore, would amount to £55,000. But there were considerations why that sum should be reduced by at least £25,000, so that the actual saving would be something like £30,000, or rather under that sum. He admitted, however, that the unsurveyed portions of the two countries must be taken into account, and that whatever the House had done with respect to the north of England and Scotland, they must be prepared to do in the south of England. What would be the saving effected on the survey of the whole of Great Britain? Why, somewhere about £230,000, which appeared to him a very trifling one. But they had further to consider whether, in effecting that saving, they were adopting a really useful scale. It often happened that the economical votes of the House proved the most extravagant in the end. His desire, however, was not that the House should at once decide the matter, but that it should come to the conclusion that further inquiry was needed. He might remind the House that the 6-inch scale originated in Ireland in 1824, on the Motion for a Committee to report on that question made by Mr. Spring Rice, now Lord Monteagle. That Committee, after referring to the various divisions and subdivisions of land in Ireland, such as townlands, ploughlands, colps, gneeves, cartrons, tates, bullibos, bullibellos, horsemen, beds, cows' feet, and cows' toes, came to the conclusion that the survey of that country should be conducted on such a scale as to admit of an accurate delineation on the map of the town boundaries, for the purpose of a general valuation for local purposes, and that that scale should be 6 inches to the English mile. They stated that "a survey by townlands appeared to be the rational medium between a baronial or parochial and field survey, and that the best scale for effecting the intended survey would be that of 6 inches to the English mile, adding that "a survey of 6 inches to the mile might be applied to various purposes of private utility." It was, therefore, for special purposes in Ireland that that scale was adopted—namely, for a property purpose, and for aiding the Irish in making local assessments. Now, they had to consider whether such a scale as that was or was not a proper scale for a property survey in England and Scotland. When he used the word "property" survey, he did not mean a survey of a gentleman's property for private purposes, but a survey for registration and other public purposes—one, in fact, which should fulfil all those national objects for which such a survey should be undertaken. That brought him to the Committee of 1851, appointed to consider the survey of Scotland. He had heard complaints made—chiefly by Irish Members—as to the constitution of that Committee, that the Scotch had shown very little delicacy in the matter, in that the majority of Members who served upon it were Scotchmen. Now, he found that the Irish Members had had three Committees appointed in connection with the question of an Ordnance Survey. The first was in 1824, which consisted of twenty-one Members. Lord Monteagle being Chairman, of whom one was a Scotchman, five were Englishmen—one of the latter being the Irish Secretary—and fifteen were Irish. In 1846 there was another Committee appointed to inquire into and report upon the then state of the Ordnance Survey in Ireland and on the works which would be required for its completion. That Committee, of whom Sir Denham Norreys was Chairman, consisted of fifteen Members, of whom one was a Scotchman, two were Englishmen—one being the Irish Secretary and the other the Clerk of the Ordnance—and twelve were Irishmen. Mr. Barry Baldwin was subsequently added to the Committee, a name which he (Lord Elcho) suspected was that of an Irish gentleman, though he sat for an English borough. Again, in 1853, a Committee was appointed to consider and report upon the details of the reduced map of Ireland then in course of publication; and that Committee consisted of thirteen Members, of whom, while there was not a single Scotchman, one was an Englishman and twelve were Irish, Sir Denham Norreys being again Chairman. He (Lord Elcho) therefore trusted, after that, that the House would hear no more from any hon. Member from across St. Georges's Channel as to the indelicacy of the Scotch in the constitution of any Committee of that House. He would revert to the Committee of 1851, which was appointed chiefly on account of the delay which had occurred in the survey of Scotland. What had that Committee done? They examined several persons both for and against the 6-inch scale, and the conclusions they came to were:—

"That the 6-inch scale be abandoned. It is evident that if the 6-inch scale were abandoned a very large saving would be effected, and the time necessary for the completion of the map (1 inch) greatly shortened. Your Committee, therefore, recommend the abandonment of the 6-inch scale as being, generally speaking, inapplicable to Scotland."

What applied to Scotland applied equally to England, either in the north or in the south. The Committee added, that undoubtedly the plans would be of some value to proprietors in the valuation of their estates. The Scotch Members decided, notwithstanding, against the 6-inch scale, upon the ground that they did not think the advantages to the public would be proportionate to the cost to the country. All the objections which could be taken to the 25-inch scale, on account of size, applied equally to the 6-inch scale, because the moment they abandoned the 1-inch scale they adopted the principle of a plan, and not of a map. It appeared in evidence before the Committee that a map of Scotland on the 6-inch scale would be 216 feet long by 120 feet broad. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Mallow (Sir Denham Norreys) said he considered a large map a great evil, and that the thing was to get as small a map as possible. In the Committee of 1846, when the hon. Baronet was very anxious to get a 1-inch map, he denied as far as possible the utility of a 6-inch map. When Mr. Griffith was under examination Sir R. Ferguson asked, "Is it likely there would be any room large enough to hold the map of a very large county upon the 6-inch scale?" The answer was, "It would require a very large room indeed. In the county of Cork I do not suppose they have any room large enough to hold the map of the county." The hon. Baronet who was Chairman of the Committee was not satisfied, and he put this further question:—

"Even if there were such a room, would it be of any practical utility from the impossibility of the eye catching the names and lines upon it?" The answer was, "No eye could take in two distant points in one view with sufficient clearness." The objection, therefore, of the hon. Baronet to the 25-inch scale applied equally to the 6-inch scale. In either case it was not of much value, for no one ever thought of putting the maps together; they were, as every hon. Gentleman well knew, bound up in separate parts. Still it seemed to afford strong reason for inquiry, but his reasons for inquiry were not exhausted. He came next to the correspondence upon the scales which was published in 1854, and which resulted in the circular from the Treasury, to which he had on several occasions alluded. His right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford being then Chancellor of the Exchequer, determined to endeavour to ascertain what would be the best scale, if there were to be a large map, for the survey of England and Scotland, and with that view sent out upwards of 300 circulars to public bodies, engineers, surveyors, valuers, land agents, and others whose opinions were entitled to consideration. The replies returned were in favour of the 6-inch scale 32, in favour of the larger scale 120. He begged to call attention to the names of some of the public bodies who condemned the 6-inch and were favourable to a larger scale. Those names included the Registrar General, Copyhold, Enclosure, and Tithe Commissioners, the President of the Geological Society, the President of the Geographical Society, the Cathedral Commission, Society for Promoting the Amendment of the Law, Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, the Poor Law Board, Highland and Agricultural Society, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Lord Belper), the Commissioner of Woods (Mr. Gore), the Board of Supervision for Relief of the Poor (Scotland), the General Board of Health, the Statistical Society, the Statistical Conference (held at Brussels, 1853, Mr. Farr deputed by Government), Sir H. De La Beche, Messrs. Brunel, Stephenson, and Locke, Mr. Vignoles, Colonel Dawson (engineer to the Tithe, &c. Commission), Lord Ross, Lord Wrottesley, Lord Beaumont, Mr. Coulson, Mr. Bellenden Ker (Titles Registration Commissioners), and Mr. Warburton. The substance of those replies supported the view that, however applicable the 6-inch scale might be to the large properties, large counties, large estates, and large holdings, when they came to smaller divisions, such as the 40s. freeholders in England and the £10 franchise in Scotland, they must have recourse to a larger scale. Mr. Griffith, who was engaged in the valuation of Ireland, was obliged to enlarge the 6-inch maps when he came to the smaller parishes and parishes where the division of property was more minute. The same had been the result in the Encumbered Estates Court. Colonel Dawson, the engineer to the Tithe Commission, stated that—

Lord Elcho

“For rating purposes in England and for valuation every separate parcel of land or tenement, however small, is required to be accurately drawn upon the plan, and to have marked within its limits a reference number to an accompanying terrier; those numbers consisting very commonly of three or four figures, and possibly of five or six. It is, moreover, indispensably requisite that the exact acreage, as for buying and selling, should be obtained by admeasurement within the limits of each parcel or tenement upon the plan; and no surveyor, valuer, land agent, or other person employed in the management and transfer of land in England would admit the sufficiency of a smaller scale than twenty inches to the mile for ascertaining the areas with the degree of minuteness required.”

Mr. Griffith, in the correspondence of 1854, said :—

“In making the tenement valuation, I find the 6-inch scale sufficient for determining the area of tenements not less than one acre, measuring from the paper; when the area is less than one acre, its contents is ascertained by measurement in the field.”

For valuation purposes, for the transfer of property, for the registration of assurances, it was important that they should be able to measure the area on the paper without reference to the property, and that the map should be of a size to admit of five or six figures of reference being inserted and accurately read. The blue-book was full of evidence given by persons most conversant with the subject, and tending uniformly to show that in England and Scotland a survey should be made much larger than that of six inches to the mile. The Board of Supervision for the Relief of the Poor in Scotland, of which Sir J. McNeil was the able head, expressed an opinion that it was most important for valuation purposes, and the purposes of the board, that there should be maps of from twenty to twenty-six inches to the mile. Since the subject had been under discussion, a Valuation Act for Scotland had passed, and he believed the Lord Advocate would confirm his statement, that for the purposes of that Act such maps would be extremely valuable. The head of the Poor Law Board gave evidence to the same effect. They were empowered to order maps to be made. They were unable to avail themselves of the 6-inch maps, and when they ordered any, they ordered them on the larger scale. It was the same with the Tithe, Enclosure, and Copyhold Commissioners. From the Commissioners of Woods they had instances of the disadvantages of not possessing a plan sufficiently large. There was a Crown estate at the mouth of the Humber. They could make no use of a 6-inch plan, which was in existence in Yorkshire, and had to survey upon the larger scale. The same was the case with regard to the drainage of Windsor Park. He could keep the House for a week listening to extracts to prove that in England and Scotland for valuation purposes it would be advantageous to have a map much larger than six inches to the mile. In the blue-book would also be found the strongest evidence from Mr. Bellenden Ker, and the other authorities who had been consulted, that it was essential, with reference to the transfer of property and the registration of assurances, there should be a larger map than one of that size. He had delayed the House at such length because he wished it to feel that the decision to which it came the other day upset the 25-inch scale, which would have been perfect for all purposes where a map or plan could ever be used, and that if no further inquiry were instituted the survey of the rural districts would proceed upon the 6-inch scale. He did not deny that the 6-inch scale had its merits. It had succeeded in Ireland for the purposes to which it was applied in that country, and, as the son of a landed proprietor in the Lothians, where all the divisions were large, it would be more convenient to him to have a plan of his estate upon that scale than upon any other. But when they came to great national purposes—such as valuations, registration, and transfer of property—they must adopt a larger scale than six inches to the mile if they wished to make the survey useful. He could understand the views of those who said that a 1-inch map was all that the nation should be required to make. He did not deny the beauty and advantages of such a map; but they ought to bear in mind that the principle of a property survey—and by that term he meant a survey for great public purposes,—was adopted in Ireland in 1824, and that it was extended to England and Scotland in 1840, when it was resolved to proceed upon the 6-inch scale. Moreover, such an amount of work had been done upon a larger scale than one inch to the mile, and the advantages of the enlarged scale were so fully appreciated by the public that he believed it impossible to revert to a 1-inch map alone. The Government of Lord John Russell tried to do so in 1851, but the administration of Lord Derby, which succeeded, found that they could not abide by the decision of their predecessors, and they were obliged to depart from it in consequence of the memorials they received from all parts of the country praying for a larger scale. In the same manner the Ministry of Lord Aberdeen found it impossible to revert to the 1-inch scale. Upon his own suggestion—for at that time he held an office in the Treasury—a circular was sent to all the most competent authorities in Great Britain with a view of ascertaining what, in their opinion, was the best scale, and the result he had already detailed to the House. So great and universal, indeed, was the demand for large plans, that no Government could take their stand upon a 1-inch map alone; and, seeing that the difference of cost between the 6-inch scale and the 25-inch scale was a mere trifle—something like three farthings an acre in the cultivated districts, the total difference upon the whole of England and Scotland being £230,000, and upon the unsurveyed districts of the north of England and Scotland only £30,000—he thought it would be unwise economy not to spend a little more in order to get a really useful map. England was not so poor that it could not afford to spend £230,000—spread, if they pleased, over ten or twenty years—upon a map which, in the opinion of all the most competent authorities whom the Treasury had consulted, was essential, if they wished to have a map practically useful for the national purposes of the valuation and registration of property. At the same time, England was not rich enough to spend £2,000,000 (which would be the cost of the 6-inch map for the whole of England and Scotland) for a map which might to a certain extent be useful, but which the authorities united in declaring would not be sufficiently large for any practical purpose. He did not ask the House to negative the 6-inch scale. He did not, indeed, submit any proposition with respect to scales at all. That was not a question for the House to decide, because it was of a technical, scientific, and practical nature, and as such the Treasury, feeling its incompetence, had been obliged to refer it to acknowledged authorities. He warned them not to be led away by professional opinions which might be given in that House. There had always been a jealousy on the part of the civil engineers towards the Ordnance with respect to this question of survey. The civil surveyors had uniformly endeavoured to get the work into their own hands, and were naturally vexed that the Ordnance-office should be allowed to proceed with it. But this great national work was undertaken by the Government corps of engineers. Commenced in the last century it had proceeded gradually and slowly over the length and breadth of England under the same superintendence. The civil engineers were naturally anxious that the survey should be limited to as small a scale as possible, because the more that was left undone the more would remain for them to do. Mr. Jones, the Cathedral Commissioner, in his reply to the Treasury circular, said that he was in favour of a map upon the scale of 26 $\frac{3}{4}$  inches to the mile, that being the scale which the civil engineers always adopted, though it would appear that they locked up their maps in order that they might be employed to make fresh surveys upon different scales. Any professional opinion, therefore, which might be given upon this question must be taken cum grano salis. He trusted he had said sufficient to induce the House not to take any hasty or irrevocable step with respect to the scale or scales upon which the survey should be made. The question was already in a state of great confusion, and he believed that by referring it to a fair, impartial, and competent tribunal, they would adopt the only practical issue out of their difficulties. The most fair and competent tribunal to which it could be referred would be a Royal Commission properly constituted. Do not let a single Scotchman be upon the Commission, but let it consist of such men as his right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford University, the hon. Member for Sheffield, the hon. Member for West Surrey; or, in the other House, Lord Eversley, Lord Belper, Lord Rosse, and Lord Wrottesley. It would be only fair to exclude civil engineers, but the Commission ought to have the services of some scientific man, such as the Astronomer Royal. If the Commission were properly constituted he had no doubt that the inquiry would be a fair and searching one; and in that event he would be content never to open his lips again upon this subject, but to abide by the decision of the Commissioners.

Lord Elcho

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the present position of the Ordnance Survey of Great Britain, the Survey on the six-inch Scale ought not to be proceeded with without further inquiry; and this House is of opinion, that an humble Address should be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to be graciously pleased to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the whole subject of the National Survey, and report upon the Scale or Scales on which it should be made and published," instead thereof.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: My noble Friend has thrown out challenges right and left. He has challenged the Irish Members, he has challenged my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford, he has challenged the civil engineers who are Members of this House. Now, I hope none of these parties will accept the challenge of the noble Lord. It is no disparagement to the courage of any man that when he is engaged in the performance of public duties, or is about to be called upon to do so, he should, for the moment at least, decline any private challenge that might be tendered him. We are met this night to enter upon the performance of a public duty far more important than any discussion upon the 25-inch scale, the 6-inch scale, or the 1-inch scale. We are anxious to go into Committee of Supply in order to determine the expenditure of the country, and really I do hope that we shall not have a renewal of the discussion; about the 25-inch or any other scale, which, if once begun, would probably occupy the whole night. I hope the House will be satisfied with having indulged my noble Friend with what, no doubt, was his real object, to vindicate the character of his countrymen from any charge of selfishness, or that their desire for the larger survey arose from other motives than those which should guide all public men in their advocacy of public measures. He has also stated again, in great detail, the reasons which he gave the other evening in support of his own opinions, and I am bound to say that in many of them I agree with him, for the House will excuse me for saying that I believe the decision it arrived at the other evening was a wrong one. But, nevertheless, there is that decision, and whether it was based upon full examination and careful deliberation, or founded upon prejudice and superficial impressions, it is not for me to inquire. The House determined by a majority that the 25-inch survey should not be continued or published. That decision we adopted, and by it we are bound to abide. My noble Friend purposes, with a view to the reversal of that decision and the re-establishment of the 25-inch scale of survey, that all surveys of any kind should be at once stopped, the officers and men engaged upon them should be paralyzed until a Commission, which he suggests, shall have reported to the Government, and the Government shall have laid the Report before this House in the next Session. By that proceeding many months would be wasted, all the persons now engaged in these surveys must be kept in idleness at a great expense or be discharged; and in the latter case, it would be found necessary, when the work was recommenced, to reorganize the staff, at great cost and labour, and after all, with a great risk of inconvenience, from the ignorance of the persons employed. It is impossible, therefore, for me to agree with the Resolution proposed by my noble Friend—that is, as to the first part of it. If he will consent to strike out all the first portion of the Resolution, and, not to-night, but on some future occasion, would propose a simple address to the Crown to appoint a Commission to inquire into this matter, I should have no objection to offer to such a proposal. Every one must admit there have been so many changes of decision, so many plans adopted and abandoned, perhaps I may be permitted to add, so much tergiversation upon the question of these surveys, that it may be desirable to have a Commission properly constituted to inquire into the whole matter, and to endeavour to educe some order out of this seeming chaos. However that may be, it would be highly inexpedient to stop all proceedings until the Report of that Commission shall have been read, and still more inexpedient would it be to raise at this time a debate upon these surveys, which would certainly entail the loss of this night, as far as the Committee of Supply is concerned. I entreat the House, therefore, not to be drawn into a discussion, however tempting the occasion may be, but hope they will allow this matter to drop for the present, and proceed at once with the business of the evening.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he believed his noble Friend (Lord Elcho) would be much mistaken if he suffered himself to think that the House was prepared to sanction the suggestion thrown out by the noble Lord (Lord Palmerston) towards the close of his address. All the inconvenience which the noble Lord had pointed out as likely to follow from the adoption of the course proposed by his noble Friend must inevitably be produced by the adoption of that recommended by the noble Lord himself; and he (Lord J. Manners) rose for the purpose of stating, that upon that, or upon any other occasion, he should feel it his duty to oppose any attempt to reverse the decision at which the House had arrived the other evening in reference to that question.

SIR DENHAM NORREYS observed, he was quite prepared to accede to the suggestion of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, and to allow the challenge of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire to pass without notice, if the Government would declare that no Commission should issue upon this subject during the present Session. He must, however, be allowed to say, that any Commission nominated by Lord Panmure could only be intended as an evasion of the decision arrived at by the House on a former evening.

MR. BAILLIE wished to know whether he had correctly understood an answer which had been given that evening by the Secretary for the Treasury, that whenever the engineers had commenced the survey of any county on the 25-inch scale, no matter how small the commencement had been, the survey of that county should be proceeded with on the same scale.

MR. WILSON said, he believed the Ordnance Department had put an erroneous construction on the division of the House the other evening. The opinion entertained at the Treasury upon the subject was, that the 25-inch survey might be completed in those districts in which it had previously been commenced, but that it should not be adopted in any portions of the counties in which those districts were situated; and that opinion would be communicated by the Treasury to the Ordnance Department.

MR. JOSEPH LOCKE said, he thought there could be no doubt the object of the Motion was to reverse the decision to which the House had come on a former evening. If he was to understand that the Government intended to oppose that Motion he would not say one word; but if it was intended that hereafter the same Motion was to be brought forward without the same opportunity of resisting it that existed now, he should feel inclined to go on with the discussion at once.

SIR GEORGE GREY: We have moved that the Speaker do leave the Chair, in order that the House may go into Committee of Supply. My noble Friend (Lord Elcho) has moved his Resolution as an Amendment to that Motion. The Government support the original question. If my noble Friend should on some future occasion think fit to renew his Motion in its present or in a modified shape, of course ample opportunity will be afforded to all hon. members to state their objections.

Lord John Manners

LORD ELCHO: The course I propose to take now is to withdraw my Resolution for the present, and to bring it forward on some future occasion. [Loud cries of "No!"]

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, as the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) had occupied one hour of the time of the House in introducing his Resolution, it was only fair that he should now submit it to the House.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES.

House in Committee; Mr. FitzRoy in the Chair.

(1.) £109,842. Superannuations.

MR. BLACKBURN said, that these allowances were proposed to be granted under the Act of Parliament, but several of them were not in accordance with the scale laid down by it. He thought, moreover, that the system was radically wrong, as those who enjoyed a long life after their retirement, received much larger sums than the nature of their services deserved. He found from the papers that these instances were by no means uncommon; amongst others he might mention that one gentleman had retired over twenty years ago on the ground of ill-health, and was still drawing his retired allowance. He would suggest that a capital sum should be given instead of a pension: it would be a better provision for his family if an officer died soon after his retirement.

MR. WILSON said, that the present scale of superannuation pensions was founded on an Act of Parliament; and if the system of paying sums down were adopted, he feared there would be many cases in which public servants would spend the money thus given them upon their retirement, and would be thrown upon the public bounty after all. He would also state that the cases referred to by the hon. Gentleman were not cases which had occurred under the ordinary course of superannuation, but cases in which the parties had retired for purposes of economy at the desire of the Government.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that of this enormous amount of retiring allowances, a large proportion was paid by way of compensation for abolished offices. Now, why were these persons not appointed to other departments of the service upon the abolition of their offices? A large saving would be effected by adopting this system. In many instances retiring allowances were granted to persons who had spent but a few years in the public service, and it did seem as though this large expenditure was saddled upon the public to a great extent for purposes of patronage. One instance he would mention in which an individual was paid £700 a year as a retiring allowance in 1820—thirty-seven years ago—on account of “infirmity of body,” and he had been receiving it ever since. The proper course would have been to give this person six months or so to recover his health instead of pensioning him off in this way. He had no doubt that many of these retiring pensions were occasioned by the improper creation of vacancies, and he believed that if the subject were inquired into by an independent Committee of that House a large sum might be struck off from these estimates.

MR. WISE said, he wished to call the attention of the Committee to the scale on which the retiring allowances to Consuls were made, which he thought quite inadequate. In almost every case where they had retired from ill health, the allowances were miserably small. In one case, where a Consul with £800 a year salary, had been obliged to retire from that cause only, the miserable pittance of £200 a year was allowed to him. He knew twenty-six cases in which the Consuls had retired on account of serious ill health, and in all of which trifling pensions had been granted after twenty, thirty, and forty years' residence abroad. The injustice of this was, he thought, the more striking when contrasted with the pensions allowed in the diplomatic service. Ambassadors and Ministers received considerable pensions when they retired, while the Consuls who had been long in the service did not receive much more than the amount contributed by the consular body. The total consular salaries were £137,260, and the pensions £10,542; but the Consuls contributed to the Superannuation Fund no less than £6,863, whilst the diplomatic service paid nothing and received £22,530 in pension, and £150,000 in salaries. A Consul with £500 a year, after serving twenty-five years, and being subject to a deduction of 5 per cent, would receive on retiring £250; and he might mention the case of a Consul General at Chili, who after eighteen years' service at £1,400 a year, received but a pension of £400, having contributed £1,440 to the fund. Considering our complicated relations all over the world, and the immense interests of British property and of the British people, and how important it was to secure the services of able and qualified persons, it seemed to him, that if they wished to obtain good public servants for this branch of our service, they must treat them better than that. He also complained that in many instances, where an office had been abolished, and compensation granted, the office had been shortly after revived, and instead of the same civil servant, another person had been appointed to fill the office against all principles of economy and efficiency. The compensations to be voted this year amounted to £9,720, and he should cite two or three instances in proof of what he stated. A Consul General at Buenos Ayres, receiving £2,500 a year, retired a few years ago at the age of thirty-eight with a pension of £1,000 a year, and it was said that the office was abolished. Almost immediately after, another Consul was appointed, held the office for a very short time, and then retired with a pension of £266 at the age of thirty-one. At the present moment, we had a Consul General and Agent with a salary of £1,885, and a Vice Consul with £500 a year, making the total outlay £3,651. Again, at Venice, a Consul General receiving £1,200 a year, retired at the age of forty-three with a pension of £600 a year. Abolition of office was the reason assigned. We had now, however, another Consul General at Venice with a salary of £700 a year. He would leave the Committee to judge, whether these appointments and reconstruction of offices were necessary, and whether they were made for the good of the country or for the private advantage of some favoured friend. For his part, he did not see why, if a port became of less importance and the trade small, so as to call for little labour at the hands of a Consul, a reduction in the salary of the existing Consul could not be made; or, at all events, a more systematic promotion established, instead of taking the Consul out of the service altogether on a compensation, and then appointing a fresh officer. The third case he would mention was, that of Tripoli. In 1852, a Consul General receiving £1,600 a year, retired upon a compensation of £850. The office was abolished; but, notwithstanding that, we had now a Consul at Tripoli with £800 a year, and a Vice Consul with £300 a year. He did not say that it was not essential to have a Consul at Tripoli; but he could not see the advantage of abolishing an office, of granting compensation, and then of appointing a fresh officer in that fashion. Again, in 1851, we had a Consul at Foo-chow-foo with £1,200 a year; the office was abolished, and he retired on a pension of £600. Immediately after, another Consul was appointed, and the present establishment consisted of a Consul and Vice Consul, with salaries of £1,200 and £750. He mentioned these facts, because he thought that it was better to give cases, than to make long orations on the Estimates. The public purse was not unlimited; he hoped, therefore, that the Government would consider the subject, that they would not give these compensations, where they were not deserved, and that they would not abolish offices, and in a short time reconstruct them at such a serious expense to the country.

COLONEL SYKES said, he thought that though a certain latitude must be allowed to the Government with regard to pensions and allowances, there should be some general rules observed with regard to them. There were two items with regard to which he should like to have some explanation. It appeared that Mr. Espine Batty, Consul, retired after eight years' service, and, his salary having been £1,000 a year, the pension he received was £500 per annum; and, on the other hand, that Jonathan Johnson, clerk, retired after thirty years' service, and his salary having been £800 a year, his pension was only £550.

SIR FRANCIS BARING said, he wished to inquire whether the rule laid down by the Committee of 1834, with reference to superannuations and compensation on the abolition of office, was now adhered to? As he understood, the recommendation of that Committee was that they should be the same. He wanted to know whether that rule had been altered, or whether some of the cases referred to in which the compensation awarded had been very large were special ones, out of the ordinary course?

Mr. Wise

MR. WILSON said, that the practice of the Treasury as regarded abolished offices was by no means uniform. No doubt the rule of giving compensations according to the principle laid down in the Act of 1834 might be considered as the general practice of the Treasury; but in some cases, where it was for the convenience and the economy of the public service that particular offices should be abolished, and where great hardship to individuals accrued, they had considered it competent to the Treasury to act with greater liberality. If a person were superannuated under the Act of 1834, either through age or illness, he must be taken to have left the service for his own convenience, and it must be remembered that his office was immediately filled up by another person, and there was no gain to the public. But the case was altogether different when they abolished an office and compelled a man to retire sooner than he otherwise would have done. No other person was then appointed to the office; the gain was all to the public, and the person so deprived of his situation was entitled to consideration. With respect to the two cases selected by the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeen, (Colonel Sykes) one was the case of a professional gentleman taken from the law, and in all such cases professional officers were dealt with differently from those who were in the public service as clerks, and who had not been called on to give up a profession. There was a strong instance of this which he could mention. Two years ago Parliament passed an Act which did away with the Metropolitan Building Board, and provided that all servants who had been employed in that department for three or four years should have two-thirds of their then salary. That provision was inserted in the Act on the distinct consideration that they were professional men, who had been withdrawn from their profession, and had, consequently, lost what connection they might have had. With respect to the observations of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Wise) with respect to the case of the late Consul at Buenos Ayres, he wished to remind the Committee that that charge would not again occur, because arrangements had been made for the re-employment of the officer in question. He was willing to admit the hardship of some of the rules respecting the consular service, but at the same time he would observe that next year, as his hon. Friend was aware, the whole matter would be submitted to a Committee, when abundant opportunity would be given to bring forward the whole details of the service.

SIR FRANCIS BARING said, he did not think that his hon. Friend had exactly answered his question. No doubt there might be cases of great hardship on the abolition of offices. But his hon. Friend was aware that the recommendation of the Committee was that the same practice should be followed in superannuation cases as in the case of abolition of office. His question was whether in this case the rule had been exceeded, or whether the cases in question were special? No doubt the case of a professional man taken out of his ordinary line of life to fill an office was different from that of a clerk who was taken into the office early in life, and who retired after long service. He quite agreed, also, that many cases of hardship might arise from the sudden abolition of office; but his experience told him that it was by no means the best class of officers who were reduced. When the Committee made its recommendation he knew that the officers were full of complaints; that officers who were selected for reduction were selected because they were not the best officers in the service, and they had retiring allowances granted them, while others were retained, and had to serve much longer, merely because they were more energetic and able men. He believed that in all cases where an extra sum was allowed to retiring officers, the recommendation was that a special minute should be made and laid on the table of the House.

MR. WILSON was understood to say, that in the particular instances alluded to, the Act of 1834 had been complied with, and special minutes made and laid on the table. With regard to others the minutes had been made in former years.

In reply to a question from MR. BLACKBURN,

MR. WILSON said, that the Act of 1834 did not grant any specific compensation for the abolition of offices. It merely referred to compensation to those worn out in the service. Up to the age of sixty-five the Treasury had no power to grant superannuation allowances, except under a medical certificate that the officer was no longer fit to serve, combined with a general certificate of good conduct. The superannuation for offices abolished was under a different law, or, rather, arose out of the prerogative of the Crown itself, which had been exercised for a long period and had been recognized by various Parliamentary Committees.

MR. BLACKBURN said, he would refer the hon. Gentleman to the Act itself, which enacted that no compensation shall be given for offices abolished, except under certain circumstances.

MR. WILSON replied, that what really was enacted was, that in the cases of offices abolished the compensation should be made out of the funds devoted to the service of that particular department.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he wished to call the attention of the hon. Gentleman to a case in the superannuation list, where a gentleman retired from the service at eighty-four years of age, after a service of ten years only. That gentleman had been receiving a salary of £1,500 a year, and since his retirement a pension of £375 a year. He wished to ask whether it would not have been better to have appointed a younger man from whom more work could have been obtained. There were some other cases which he might name were it not invidious to do so.

MR. WILSON replied, that the cases referred to were those very ones abolished by the doing away of the Metropolitan Building Board, and in which the compensation had been distinctly defined in the Act.

COLONEL SYKES said, he also would beg to call the attention of the hon. Gentleman to the case of a clerk of the venison warrens, who, after a service of fifteen years at a salary of £150, was allowed to retire on his full salary, and to ask upon what principle that amount of compensation was allowed?

MR. WILSON said, he could not state the exact ground upon which the full salary had been given. Probably it was a patent office, and the person who filled it was entitled to the full salary.

Vote agreed to, as were also the following Votes—

(2.) £2,058, Toulonese and Corsican Emigrants.

(3.) £1,300, National Vaccine Establishment.

(4.) £325, Refuge for the Destitute.

(5.) £2,680, Polish Refugees, &c.

(6.) £4,281, Miscellaneous Allowances.

MR. WISE said, that he observed that £700 of this Vote was to the poor French refugee clergy. Now, as he understood that it was sixty-six years ago since this Vote was placed on the Estimates, and as he assumed the clergymen in question must have been at least twenty-one years of age at that period, and therefore must by this time have reached the age of eighty-seven, he wished to know how much longer it was expected that Parliament would be asked for this money, and whether the recipients were indeed living?

MR. WILSON replied, that the application was made through the secretary of the society, a most respectable person, and there was no reason to suppose the money was improperly paid.

In reply to Mr. BLACKBURN,

MR. WILSON said, that the Vote did not include £1,200 given by the Government to certain literary characters.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he must object to several items of the Vote. For instance, he found an item of £22 formerly charged on the hereditary revenues of Scotland, which included alms given to Her Majesty's beadesmen and the expense of finding them with gowns. He thought such payments ought to be discontinued. He also saw an annuity of £500 granted by King Charles II. to the ancestor of the late Sir Thomas Clarges in fee, which he saw no reason why the country should be called upon to pay at the present time. He objected to the charge on principle.

MR. WILSON replied, that all these charges had been subjected to the strict examination of a Committee of that House, and had been retained on the ground that it would not be keeping good faith with the recipients. The Committee must remember that the items were formerly charged on the land revenues of the Crown, and the charge had been transferred with the revenues in question.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that he did not object to their present payment, but thought they ought to cease on the decease of the recipients.

In reply to Mr. SPOONER,

MR. WILSON stated that the item of £90 9s. for repairs of the bridge at Berwick was a charge which had formerly been defrayed from the Civil List.

Vote agreed to.

(7.) £1,895, Infirmaries in Ireland.

MR. W. WILLIAMS expressed his opinion that this was one of those items which ought not to continue in the Estimates. It might have been defensible before the establishment of the Poor Law in Ireland, but he thought the charge of such institutions ought not now to be thrown upon the public taxes.

MR. WILSON could console his hon. Mr. Wise

Friend by informing him that under the 14 & 15 Vict., c. 68, these allowances would be gradually discontinued.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £3,135 be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Expense of the Westmoreland Lock Hospital, Dublin, to the 31st day of March, 1858."

MR. COWAN said, he rose to object to the item. The noble Member for the City of London (Lord John Russell), when he was at the head of the Government, had proposed to reduce the allowances to the Dublin hospitals at the rate of 10 per cent per annum, until they altogether ceased. In 1854, on the Motion of the hon. Member for Dublin, the subject was investigated by a Committee, who recommended that the grants should be continued. The Commissioners appointed at the suggestion of that Committee recommended that the total sum granted for the support of the Dublin hospitals should not exceed £15,600, while the aggregate amount now asked of Parliament was £19,017, or an excess of nearly £4,000. In Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, and other large towns, there was a large immigration of poor Irish, for whose support the ratepayers were compelled to provide from their own resources. The people of Scotland were also about to be called upon for large contributions for the establishment of lunatic asylums; and if it was right that grants similar to that now under consideration should be continued, the House ought to decide upon what principle the money of the State was to be applied to such objects. He therefore proposed that the recommendation of the Committee of 1854 in favour of a certain fixed and specified sum should govern the House on this occasion, and that the £2,600, less the £850 voted on account last Session—in other words, £1,750—should be the sum granted for the Westmoreland Lock Hospital for the present year.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum not exceeding £1,750, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Expense of the Westmoreland Lock Hospital, Dublin, to the 31st day of March 1858."

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, it was extraordinary that, in the face of complaints from year to year, the grant for this hospital should on this occasion be £2,770 more than the grant of last year.

MR. WILSON said, he had endeavoured to do all that lay in his power to carry out the understanding of the Government of which his noble Friend the Member for the City of London was at the head, until he was interrupted by the appointment of a Committee of that House. He certainly opposed the appointment of that Committee, but unsuccessfully, and when it reported to the House, no other course remained to the Government than to carry out the recommendations which it made. A Commission was also appointed for the purpose of inquiring how the £16,000 granted by the House for the support of those hospitals should be applied. That Commission recommended a certain distribution of the funds, which the Government, of course, adopted. Besides, an Act of Parliament passed last Session which confirmed the proceedings both of the Committee and the Commission. As to the charge that the Government was this year exceeding the Vote of last year in respect to the Westmoreland Lock Hospital, he could explain how that was. Only £1,215 of the Estimate of 1856 happened to be voted, so that £1,385 was advanced from the Civil Contingencies Fund to make up the Estimate, and that £1,385 had now to be repaid, and was included in the Vote for the present year.

SIR J. TRELAWNY said, he doubted whether the explanation of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Wilson) was correct on constitutional grounds. The Government ought to have a policy and to act upon it.

MR. COWAN observed, that he would remind the Committee that he opposed the Bill last year, which passed into a law, and took a division upon it, on the ground that its object was to make the grants for these hospitals more permanent than they ought to be.

MR. KIRK said, the Vote ought not to be objected to by the English Members, inasmuch as whenever it was found that any of those numbers of poor Irish who came over to this country and enriched it by their labour on public works in London, Glasgow, and Liverpool, were unable longer to contribute their labour in that way, they were at once sent home and landed on the nearest shore, unless by long residence in this part of the kingdom they had gained a settlement in it.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he begged to remind the hon. Member (Mr. Kirk) that any Irishman gained a settlement in England after he had resided in it for four years.

MR. VANCE said, he wished to recall to the recollection of the Committee that the grants for these hospitals were guaranteed by the Act of Union, and had continued ever since uninterruptedly, and that a Committee of that House, of whom eleven were English and four were Irish Members, had recently recommended their continuance. He added that on a division thirteen Members of the Committee voted for the continuance of all the grants, and that the grant which they were unanimous in recommending should be continued without reduction was the very one now under discussion. Moreover, he might mention that at the time of the Reformation there were hospitals in London, such as St. Luke's, St. Thomas's, and St. Bartholomew's, which had lands in Ireland, and which they were allowed to retain. There were monasteries at that time in Dublin which had lands in England, but they had lost their lands, and had been allowed grants by Parliament in lieu of them. This alone constituted an equitable claim to an equivalent.

MR. COX said, he could not but characterise the Vote as a paltry one, and was quite surprised that an hon. Member for such a city as the city of Dublin (Mr. Vance) should ask assistance for the Dublin hospitals. The people of Dublin were rich enough, and he was quite sure they were willing, to support their own charitable institutions. The London hospitals were supported by voluntary contributions, and he did not see why the people of Dublin should not act in a similar manner.

LORD NAAS said, that in fact three of the largest London hospitals were supported by public moneys, being endowed with the revenues of monasteries suppressed in the reign of Henry VIII.

MR. W. WILLIAMS concurred in the opinion of Mr. Cox.

MR. COWAN expressed his wish to withdraw the Amendment, but

MR. COX objected.

Amendment put, and negatived.

Vote agreed to; as were also the following Votes—

(9.) £700, Lying-in Hospital, Dublin.

(10.) £300, Combe Lying-in Hospital, Dublin.

(11.) £4,600, House of Industry, Dublin.

(12.) £2,500, House of Recovery, Dublin.

(13.) £400, Meath Hospital, Dublin.

(14.) £150, St. Mark's Ophthalmic Hospital.

(15.) £1,805, Dr. Steevens' Hospital, Dublin.

(16.) £427, Board of Superintendence, of Hospitals, Dublin.

(17.) £4,338, Charitable Allowances.

MR. BLACKBURN said, he must complain that so large a sum should be granted to persons at the will of the Government. The Committee ought to have a list of the persons, and some explanation ought to be given as to the manner in which the money was expended.

MR. WILSON said, he had no means of furnishing details at present, as the money was expended in Ireland.

Voto agreed to.

(18.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £39,008, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expenses of Non-conforming, Seceding, and Protestant Dissenting Ministers in Ireland, to the 31st day of March, 1856."

MR. BAXTER said, he rose to move the reduction of this Estimate to £366, the amount for widows and orphans, at the same time he wished to state that in asking the Committee in reality to reject the Vote, he was not actuated by any ill-feeling towards the people of Ireland. Being a Protestant and a Nonconformist, he would be the last to breathe a syllable against a body of men for whom he entertained the highest respect, and he should not grudge the money if he believed that the grant was founded upon a correct principle, or was likely to benefit the Irish people. A similar grant was withdrawn from the Nonconformists of England when the noble Lord the Member for the City of London was Prime Minister, and the Nonconformists in this country regarded its withdrawal as a boon and an advantage. He did not wish to raise the question of the Established Church in Ireland. But in Ireland they had not been content with the establishment of Protestant Episcopacy. They had passed an Act providing for the education of Roman Catholic priests, at the same time that they made grants out of the public Treasury to Presbyterians and Unitarians of the Synod of Ulster. The principle of indiscriminate endowments had been received with considerable favour by some of our leading statesmen, and perhaps this might turn out to be a step in that direction; but he believed that principle to be a most vicious one, and calculated, if acted upon, to subvert our civil and religious liberty. Still it was a principle, and he could understand it; but, in selecting four out of twelve denominations in Ireland, he did not think they were acting upon any intelligible policy whatever. He was convinced they would never have ecclesiastical peace in that House or in the country until they began to act upon the opposite principle of impartial disendowment. There were no special reasons why this grant should be maintained. He had often heard it said that the grant was given in lieu of tithes, and that the Presbyterians in the north of Ireland had a right to it. But he had looked carefully into the history of the transaction, and, after the fullest and most impartial investigation, he believed the statement in question to be a pure and unmitigated fiction. Dr. Reid, the historian of the Irish Presbyterian Church, said not a syllable about it; and he learned from a passage in the Memoirs of Lord Castlereagh, that the Presbyterian ministers were put in possession of the tithes being at that time ministers of the Irish Church. They were deprived of them in the time of the Commonwealth, and from the Restoration down to 1672 the Presbyterian ministers of Ireland were supported by the voluntary liberality of their people. William and Mary afterwards granted them a sum of £1,200 a year, to be paid out of the revenues of the Irish Establishment; but in little more than a twelvemonth the Irish Parliament passed a Resolution to the effect that this pension was an unnecessary branch of the Establishment. The Queen continued the grant, but it was soon discontinued by the Irish Government. He thought that the whole history of the donum proved most conclusively that it was neither more nor less than a reward for political services. In 1772 it was placed in the annual Estimates under the head of "secret service" money, and when Lord Castlereagh endeavoured in 1799 to alter the mode of distribution, he entitled his scheme—"A plan for strengthening the connection between the Government and the Presbyterian Synod of Ulster." Such being the origin and history of the grant, what had been its effect upon the Presbyterian Church? It had weakened that Church, and diminished the stipends of its ministers by drying up the sources of voluntary liberality to such an extent that one of their own pastors had spoken of it as the most beggarly denomination in Christendom. It appeared from a recent Parliamentary Return, obtained by the hon. Member for Sheffield, that the Presbyterian congregations of Ulster raised on the average, by their own exertions, no more than £57 per annum each, and it was very remarkable—such had been the effect of the grant—that some of the largest and wealthiest congregations actually contributed less than some of the smallest and poorest. Let him contrast that miserable result with what had been done by the Free Church of Scotland. When the disruption in the Scottish Church took place, 448 ministers and professors abandoned their offices and emoluments in the Established Church of Scotland. That number had grown, in 1857, to 801, with about one-third of the whole population of Scotland adhering to their discipline. In the first year of the disruption the sustentation fund was £68,000; last year it was £108,000. In the first year of the Free Church's existence the ministers received a stipend of £105 annually; now, the number of ministers had increased to 712, who received £140, in addition to the freewill offerings of their congregations. In fact, the average salaries of the Free Church ministers were larger than those of the ministers of the Established Church. The missionary fund had risen from £3,000 in 1843 to £14,000 in 1856. The Free Church schools last year numbered 607, and the mansees 535: all created since the disruption. In that space of time the Free Church had raised no less than £3,902,000 for religious purposes. He asked the House to contrast the working of Presbyterianism under the voluntary system in Scotland with its working under State subsidies in Ireland. He submitted that he had made out a case for the consideration of the Committee which justified him in asking them to support the Amendment which he proposed. He was fully persuaded that, if they would take that course, it would have the effect of strengthening Presbyterianism in the north of Ireland, and would be the first step towards the abolition of a policy which was false in principle, and could not be permanently maintained. He should, therefore, conclude by moving that the Vote be reduced to £366.

MR. KIRK said, he felt it necessary to correct some of the mistakes into which the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) had fallen. When the Presbyterians first settled in Ireland, the question was not whether they were Episcopalians or Presbyterians, but whether they were Protestant. The Irish Protestant Church at that time was not altogether identified with the Church of England, but was founded on seventy-two Articles, differing in many essential particulars from the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England; the object then being to establish a universal Protestantism in Ireland. Accordingly, the Presbyterian ministers took possession of the mansees and tithes, but when the Commonwealth came, they, in common with all other clergymen, were deprived of their revenues. Upon the Restoration they were restored to their benefices, but when the Act of Uniformity was passed, they again, in common with all other non-conforming ministers, were deprived of them. In 1672, however, and not in 1772, as the hon. Gentleman had stated, the present grant was made. It was true, that during the latter part of the reign of James II. the grant was withheld; but it should be understood that James II. was a Roman Catholic, and, therefore, not likely to favour any grant for the maintenance of Protestant ministers. After the Revolution of 1688, the first Act of William III. upon landing in Ireland was to restore the grant, and the very words of that grant were, "in lieu of the tithes of which they had been unjustly deprived." Thus, the Presbyterians claimed it as a contract entered into between them and the Government at that time. It was on a similar footing as the Scotch grant, and like it had been placed on the Consolidated Fund, and it was only very recently that it had been put on the annual Votes. The opposition to this grant did not come from the Free Church of Scotland, but from a society in the city with a very long name—he meant the "Society for the Liberation of Religion from all State Assistance and Control." He had attended one of their meetings and learnt that their object was to destroy the Irish Church, and to effect that object they sought to obtain the support of the Roman Catholics by depriving them of the Maynooth grant, and of the Presbyterians by the withdrawal of the Regium Donum. The hon. Gentleman who objected to this grant, if he had referred to a paper laid upon the table of the House in February last, would have found that Scotland had not been without her share of grants for religious purposes. These having exactly the same object in view as the Irish grant, but not a word was said against them by any Scotch Member. That return showed that in five years the Church of England had received grants to the extent of £203,296; the Church of Scotland, £106,452; the Church of Rome, 131,910. The grant to the Irish Presbyterians had been always a free and unconditional grant. No Government had attempted to impose terms in respect to it, and if any attempt had been made to impose such terms it would have been vehemently resisted. The Irish Presbyterians believed the grant to be their inalienable right; they received it from their fathers, and would certainly, if possible, hand it down untouched to their children. Let it be remembered that the Scottish Presbyterians found the north of Ireland a barren morass, from which the English settlers had fled in disgust. They had transformed it from barrenness into fertility; and, though the worst land, it was now the best cultivated part of Ireland. It had no fuel of intense power to work its manufactories but what it imported from England and Scotland; and yet, in the face of all these disadvantages, it competed successfully with both countries. He trusted earnestly that the Committee would not assent to the proposal of the hon. Member for Montrose.

MR. C. GILPIN said, he would beg to ask the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, if he really believed that a contract existed between the Government of this country and the Unitarians of the north of Scotland for granting them a certain sum annually? If the principle of State support for purposes of religion were right, then the Roman Catholics of Ireland undoubtedly had the first claim as constituting the great majority of the people. He should support the Motion of the hon. Member for Montrose, however, upon the plain and intelligible principle that all grants of public money for religious purposes were wrong in principle, and also from a strong conviction that these grants tended to lessen the vitality and diminish the strength of true religion wherever they were applied. If the Motion of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Baxter) were carried, it would be one step towards the consummation so earnestly desired by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner)—the abolition of the Maynooth grant. Let the Protestants first show to the people of Ireland that they did not want the money of the State, and then they could consistently, and with clean hands, demand that the Roman Catholics should give up the grants they received.

Mr. Kirk

MR. HADFIELD said, that he should support the Amendment, as he altogether denied the existence of a contract. The whole system of State grants was humiliating and degrading to their common Christianity, and was, moreover, absurd, as the Legislature was called on at one and the same time to support the most opposite systems of religion. It was miserable to see the contrast presented between the Free Church of Scotland, which during the thirteen years of its establishment had collected £3,900,000 by voluntary contributions for the support of its institutions, and the Irish Presbyterians, who during the same period had been begging £520,000 or thereabouts from the State. Throughout the whole of Great Britain and Ireland there was not one denomination of Dissenters, with the exception of this rich body, which received a single shilling from the State for religious purposes; and he trusted that the Committee would come to the decision that the grant should no longer be continued to a body so well able to maintain its own institutions; for they might rest assured that, if the grant were withdrawn, the income of the Presbyterian clergy would be increased fourfold by wealthy voluntary contributions.

MR. BAXTER briefly replied, and observed, that the reference which had been made by the hon. Member for Newry (Mr. Kirk) to Scotland was peculiarly unfortunate, seeing that no nonconformist body in that country received a penny from the State for religious purposes.

Motion made, and Question put, "That a sum, not exceeding £366 be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of Non-conforming, Seceding, and Protestant Dissenting Ministers in Ireland, to the 31st day of March 1858."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 41; Noes 117: Majority 76.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(19.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £1,600, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to pay the Salaries of the Theological Professors and the Incidental Expenses of the General Assembly's College at Belfast, and Retired Allowances to Professors of the Belfast Academical Institution, to the 31st day of March, 1858."

MR. BAXTER said that, though opposed to the policy of this Vote, he should not trouble the House to divide against the grant, as he looked upon the last division as decisive in respect to it.

MR. HADFIELD said, he should propose to reduce the Vote by £900. There were six orthodox professors at Belfast College, and he thought three would be quite ample; and that of the two non-subscribing professors of divinity one might be dispensed with, for they were only occupied about an hour each day. He trusted that all such miserable grants would shortly come to an end, and that the noble Lord at the head of the Government, who had put a termination to ministers' money, would also get rid of every one of these subjects of contention.

MR. CAIRNS said, the hon. Member objected to this Vote on the voluntary principle; but how did he propose to set it right? Not by taking it away altogether, but by reducing the amount. What sort of argument was it that because there was a small number of students, one professor should teach them everything? It was said the professors did not lecture more than an hour a day each. He should like to know in what academical institution the professors lectured longer. The establishment of the Queen's College in Belfast had given rise to an agreement that the Queen's University should be supplemented with this theological college; it was a solemn compact entered into by the late Sir Robert Peel.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question, "That a sum, not exceeding £700, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to pay the Salaries of the Theological Professors and the Incidental Expenses of the General Assembly's College at Belfast, and retired Allowances to Professors of the Belfast Academical Institution, to the 31st day of March 1858,"—put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(20.) £575,482, Customs Department.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he wished to express his satisfaction that the cost of collecting the various branches of the public revenue was now submitted to Parliament, at the same time he must complain that the expenditure incurred for this purpose far exceeded that which was found necessary during the early portion of the present century. In the ten years preceding 1810 the cost of collecting the revenue was 5 per cent, and in the years between 1810 and 1814 it was 5½ per cent, the revenue at that time being nearly equal to its present amount. Last year, however, the cost of collecting the revenue exceeded 7½ per cent, the whole amount expended for that purpose, including superannuations, amounting to £4,699,000.

The cost of collection during the last year exceeded that of 1854 by £642,000, and that of 1855 by £313,000, and he hoped the Government would afford some explanation on the subject.

MR. WILSON observed, that they were at present on the Customs Votes, and undoubtedly he must admit that there had been a considerable increase in the cost of collecting the Customs duties, but it must be borne in mind that, although the revenue from Customs had exceeded that of former years—which was somewhat a matter of surprise after the large reductions of duty which had taken place—it was necessary to regulate the establishment of the Custom House, not with relation to the amount of duties to be collected, but to the amount of trade with which it was necessary to deal, because it was requisite to provide for the examination and superintendence of every vessel, whatever might be the nature and value of the goods she carried. When hon. Gentlemen remembered the extraordinary increase of trade which had taken place within the last two years, and especially last year—when they recollected that the entries of shipping were double what they were in 1849, when the Navigation Laws were repealed, they would readily understand that a very large establishment must necessarily be required by the Customs department to superintend the vessels and the goods landed from them. He thought it ought to be a matter of great gratification to the House that, although such extensive reductions had taken place in the Customs duties, the revenue derived from that source had not suffered, and the increase of trade was proved by the circumstance that a lower rate of duty yielded an amount equal to that formerly received.

In reply to Mr. HASSARD,

MR. WILSON stated, that it was quite true that at present the cost of the tobacco warehouses was in excess of the rent received from that source, but that in a short time an arrangement would come into force which would do away with the present system, and tobacco would in future be warehoused like any other commodity.

Vote agreed to.

(21.) £979,133, Inland Revenue.

MR. COWAN said, he wished to know whether the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury had received any representation with respect to the salaries of the officers of Excise. Several petitions had been presented to the House, representing that since those salaries had been fixed at their present amount an increase had been made in the salaries of various other departments, and that the Excise officers were inadequately remunerated. He believed that the salary of an Excise officer was no more than £90 a year, which was never raised, while the salaries in other departments were increased by £5 or £10 each year. Unless an Excise officer was promoted to the rank of supervisor, his salary remained at £90 to the end of his life. He believed that the Board of Inland Revenue had strongly recommended the Treasury to consider favourably the representations of the Excise officers; but he was aware that was an inopportune moment for making any demand upon the Treasury. He begged to thank the Government, and particularly the Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue, for having conceded the prayer which had been presented for so many years by the officers of Excise that the system of compulsorily removing them to distant parts of the country might be abolished. He knew that a feeling of gratitude pervaded the Excise officers for that concession.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he wished to ask how it was that the charge for this year was £200,000 in excess of the year 1854?

MR. WILSON stated that the increased poundage on the income tax, which, however, had ceased on the 20th of March last, accounted for it. The only other increase in the Estimate was on account of the allowance to riding officers of £20 a year for a horse. With regard to the observations of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh respecting the remuneration of Excise officers, the Government had received a very large number of applications for increase of salary from the Excise officers. The majority of them evidently emanated from one common centre, although they had arrived from a great number of quarters. One of the main reasons urged for an increase of salary was their liability to pay the income tax. All he could say was that the Board of Inland Revenue and the Treasury would consider the application, and make known their decision in a short time.

MR. BLACK observed, that the salary of a first-class surveyor of Excise in Scotland was £200 a year, while the salary of a first-class surveyor in England was £460 a year. Again, the salary of a second-class surveyor in Scotland was £170 a year; the salary of a second-class surveyor in England was £400 a year. The salary of a third-class surveyor in Scotland was £160, while in England the salary of a third-class surveyor was £340 a year. So that while the average salary in England was £253, in Scotland it was only £170. Now, the officers in Scotland had precisely the same duties to discharge as those in England, and the qualifications demanded were identically the same. He hoped, therefore, that an end would be put to the odious distinction between their salaries.

MR. WISE said, he wished to be informed by the hon. Secretary to the Treasury whether the Chief Commissioner of Works had the superintendence of the building and repairs of the Ireland Revenue Offices and the General Post Office, because he found in this Vote an item of £25,000 for new buildings, although last year a sum of £30,000 was voted for the same purpose.

MR. WILSON said, that till very recently the whole of the expenses connected with each department of the Inland Revenue were paid out of the gross receipts of that particular department; but the whole of the works of the public departments were for the future to be under the superintendence of the Commissioner of Works. The reason why this Vote was not transferred was that the works to which it referred were in progress when that change was effected.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he would beg to remind the hon. Secretary to the Treasury that he had not answered the question of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Black) as to the distinction between the salaries of the English and Scotch surveyors of Excise.

MR. WILSON apologised for not having replied to the hon. Gentleman's observations. He was informed that although the name was the same the duties of the officers referred to were entirely different, and he could only say that the Chairman and Deputy Chairman of the Inland Revenue Board were exceedingly desirous of doing everything to do justice to all the officers employed in the collection of the Inland Revenue. He was sure that the difference of the duties was quite sufficient to justify the difference of the salaries.

MR. BLACK said, he would admit that there was a difference in the duties, and it was this—the Scotch surveyors had to do all that was done by the English surveyors and something more into the bargain.

Mr. Cowan

Vote agreed to.

(22.) £43,120, Revenue Police (Ireland).

MR. VANCE asked, if there had been any increase in illicit distillation in Ireland during the last year to justify this large estimate? He observed in the Estimate an item of £2,880 for the "wages and victualling of crew of Seamew revenue steamer, and coals." This was not an Estimate for the coastguard service; it was merely for the revenue police, and he could not understand what the police had to do with a revenue steamer.

MR. WILSON said, the Government had no reason to believe that there had been any increase of illicit distillation in Ireland within the last year; on the contrary, there appeared to have been less than formerly. With respect to the amount of the Estimate, the Government hoped, under the Bill which he should ask the House to read a second time on an early day, to reduce the expenditure materially in the course of the present year. As to the Seamew steamer, the hon. Member might not perhaps be aware that for many years past it had been absolutely necessary to maintain a steamer on the north and west coasts of Ireland for the purpose of visiting the creeks and islands where illicit distillation formerly prevailed to a very large extent, and that it had been found extremely useful in suppressing the trade.

Vote agreed to.

(23.) £1,268,181, Post Office.

MR. W. WILLIAMS observed, that there was an increase on this Vote of £348,000.

MR. WILSON explained, that no fewer than 1,500 new district post offices had been established, so no village of any size was without a post office, and no farmhouse without its letter carrier. Indeed, the department was to be looked at as a part of the public service rather than a means of revenue.

MR. GROGAN said, he wished to know why there was a medical officer and medicine provided for the men of the London Post Office, and not for those of Dublin?

MR. WILSON said, that the number of men in the Dublin office was small as compared with the number in the London office, and would not justify the appointment of a medical officer.

MR. WATKIN said, he must complain that in the Estimate for the conveyance of mails by railroad, amounting to upwards of £580,000, no less than £268,039 was put down as an unascertained sum for services which were easily ascertainable—namely, £204,703 for the conveyance of mails on the Great Western, North-Eastern, and South Wales Railways; £47,000 for the same service on the Great Southern and Western Railway, Ireland; and £16,336 for the same service on the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway, the Glasgow and Paisley Joint Railway, and the North British Railway. He suggested that it was desirable to bring those charges before the House in a more complete and businesslike manner.

MR. WILSON explained, that whenever a service was ascertained the cost was given with precision. But this large sum was taken as an estimated charge only, because there were a great number of arbitrations pending, the claims connected with which the Post Office might be called upon to pay at any time in the course of the year.

Vote agreed to, as was also—

(24.) £323,150, Superannuations (Revenue Department).

(25.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £100,000 be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of Civil Contingencies, to the 31st March, 1858.

MR. WISE said, that in a great country like this £100,000 was probably not too great a sum to be intrusted to the executive for unforeseen expenditure; and all that the country required was, that it should be used for necessary and proper purposes. He thought that some of the items required explanation. There was a sum of £1,000 paid to the parties who brought home the treaties of peace from Paris and Persia. Seeing that the country paid £42,000 a year for couriers and messengers, the necessity of giving to a gentleman who was in the receipt of a good salary, a sum of £500, merely for travelling from Paris to London, was not very obvious. There was also £2,000 given to the clerks of the Foreign Office in consequence of the extra duties performed by them during the war. He believed the clerks at the Foreign Office did their duty well, and he was the last person to grudge them full and ample payment for their services, but he was anxious to know whether the hardworking junior clerks had received their fair share of this amount, or was it all swallowed up by two or three superior officials.

who superintended the labours of the rest and generally obtained most of, if not all, the credit. The item of £1,200 for the legal expenses connected with the purchase of Burlington House seemed to be excessive. The Solicitor of the Treasury had a large salary, and he could not imagine how such an expenditure could have arisen from the purchase of a house and two acres of garden. The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland received an annual salary of £20,000, yet there was a paltry charge in this account of £18 for a robe for that distinguished representative of royalty. There was a charge of £28,517 for special missions, being those of Lord Clarendon to Paris, and Lord Granville to Russia; but they had voted a few nights since £37,500 for miscellaneous diplomatic expenditure, of which £12,500 had been appropriated to the mission to Petersburg and Moscow at the recent coronation. There was no portion of our expenditure that required inspection more than this department, for it was scattered over several Estimates. £180,000 was annually charged on the Consolidated Fund for the salaries and pensions of the diplomatic body, and he might mention, that since 1840 no less a sum than £5,431,000 had been expended for all the departments connected with the diplomatic and consular establishments. So long as Reports of Committees and Resolutions of that House were ignored and set at defiance, and such small missions as those of Hanover, Florence, and Stutgard continued, we should find that this expenditure would continue, and probably increase. Last year, besides £150,000 for salaries, and £22,530 for pensions, and £37,500 for miscellaneous expenses, the sum of £7,390 had been allowed for outfits, making £217,420 for one year's diplomatic expenditure, and to show the Committee the character and amount of this outlay, he might state, that during twelve years we had voted for outfits £55,304; for special missions £123,720; for house rent £110,774; and for miscellaneous expenses £235,581; amounting in all to £525,379; and unless the Committee had these items in sectional Estimates, it was not possible, without considerable trouble, to know what each department cost. It was easy to assume that the Paris embassy cost £10,000 a year, that being the sum stated in the annual accounts; but in another Vote was £3,909 for miscellaneous expenses; in another £1,709 for repairs and taxes, and £401 for wages; and it must not be forgotten that we had paid £87,000 for the embassy house; and in addition to this, during the last three years, we had paid £1,150 for altering and repairing the chapel. So at Constantinople the salaries were £11,340, but the extra were £8,269, the repairs £1,000, the wages £564, whilst the House had cost £86,615. Until he had carefully inspected these Estimates and examined those of past years, he had no idea of this large expenditure, and he thought that Her Majesty's Government were not doing their duty in permitting what appeared to him a very unnecessary and very extravagant drain upon the public purse.

Mr. Wise

MR. BLACKBURN said, he really must correct the hon. Gentleman's inaccuracy, for the robe of the Lord Lieutenant cost £18 and 7d. He must also complain of £287 for the translation of a French tariff, and £2,000 for a Commission to Erzeroum to settle differences out there between neighbouring Governments. This charge for that Commission had been going on for fifteen years, and yet the Commission had returned to this country ten years ago, and one of them, the Hon. Mr. Curzon, had written a very amusing book of his goings on there. Then there was £834 for researches in the neighbourhood of the Dead Sea for nitre—rather an out-of-the-way part of the world.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, there was an item of £62 17s. 8d. for bringing home John Frost, after transporting him out of the country at the public expense. There was an item of £1,516 for the Islington Park, and an item of £4,000 for collars and badges for knights. He also objected to the charge for the police at Aldershot and other encampments. It appeared to him that the commander at a camp ought to be able to keep his troops in proper discipline without the aid of the civil force. Then he found the sum of £1,200 to be distributed among the Episcopalian clergy in Scotland—a vote which was open to many objections; but he would not detain the House upon that. Unless a party was formed in that House to keep down the expenditure, they would never produce an effect on the Government, and he feared the country would be thrown into financial difficulties. He could not but believe that more attention would be paid to these subjects in the House of Commons if the franchise was extended.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he wished to call attention to the very large sums remaining unexpended of balances of civil contingencies. Not less than £150,000 remained of the balances of former years, and this ought to be spent before any new money was voted. He found in page 5 an account of expenses incurred for presents to Dr. Kane and others of the American Arctic expedition. He did not, in the least, complain of that money being spent, but he thought the Government ought to take some notice of the spirited conduct of Mr. Peabody, a gentleman of great wealth and high position, who had contributed several thousand dollars towards the expedition for discovering the Erebus and Terror. He objected to the items of £6,145 for the Commission for settling the territory of the Cape of Good Hope, as he held that the colony ought to pay this expense.

MR. GREGORY said, he spoke from a knowledge of recent proceedings in the Bight of Benin, and consequently must complain of the Vote which had been made to a most unworthy person, King Pepple, who had been lately deposed from his kingdom in those regions. The liberated negroes in the Bight of Benin were preyed upon by the kings of those countries; but it was to the efforts of those free negroes that the increasing trade which was springing up between this country and the coast of Africa might be attributed.

MR. WILSON explained the items in the Vote. As to the balances, a statement was presented last year, showing the exact state of the accounts. There was a balance of £80,000 in hand, and that sum, £70,000, was afterwards repaid to the Exchequer. With regard to the presents voted to the officers in command of the expedition sent out to search for the Erebus and Terror, they were confined to those officers who were actually employed in the expedition. He was quite sure that Mr. Peabody, from his position, made contributions from higher principles than the expectation of any marks of approval from this country, but the Government would always feel the greatest gratitude towards those gentlemen, and especially Mr. Peabody, who assisted to fit out that expedition. With regard to the gratuities which had been referred to, it had been an immemorial custom to give £500 to the messenger who brought home a treaty of peace or the news of a great victory, and the custom had been followed in the instances of the fall of Sebastopol, the Treaty of Paris, and the Persian Treaty. With regard to the £2,000 given to the clerks in the Foreign Office, that was the only office to which no extra assistance was afforded during the whole time of the war. There was great pressure upon it, and he was sure the Committee would be of opinion that the Treasury only did what was right in complying with the earnest request of Lord Clarendon and distributing £2,000 among the whole of the clerks, irrespective of their grades. With regard to the charges for special missions, such as Lord Clarendon going to Paris and Earl Granville to Moscow, they were different from those voted the other night for special expenses connected with the embassies, the latter being for couriers, postages, and other extra charges of the current year. With regard to the cost of obtaining a translation of the French tariff, it was thought desirable that the Board of Trade should be in possession of all the different tariffs to meet returns ordered by the House, and to put hon. Members in possession of valuable information. With regard to the item of £1,200 for the Episcopalian clergy of Scotland, that sum was paid last year, and it was the last time the item would appear. With regard to the charges for police at Aldershot, Dover, and Shorncliffe, where there were large numbers of troops congregated in camp there would be camp-followers, and the police were required, not to keep the soldiers, but to keep the camp-followers in order. The small charge for searching for coal was incurred at the time of the war, when it was thought important to discover new supplies of coal for our steamers. With regard to the charges for Orders of the Garter, it had often been remarked that it was a very mean thing to offer an honour to a military officer for distinguished service in the field, and at the same time expect him to pay £200 or £300 for fees. The Government had therefore come to a decision two years ago to distribute these honours gratuitously, and their decision had received the approval of the House in the last and preceding Sessions of Parliament. With regard to the charges for the passage of governors, they were made upon a regulated scale, and had long been defrayed by the country.

MR. BLACK wished to know the principle upon which grants to Ireland were increased and grants to Scotland withdrawn.

MR. WILSON explained that the grant to the Irish Presbyterians was a very old one. It originated with the Irish Parliament, and had been voted ever since the Union. That to the Scotch Episcopalians was of recent origin. It was at first only occasional, and did not become regular until about fifteen years ago. Government felt, therefore, they could withdraw one, but not the other.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, no one would wish that distinguished naval and military officers should be called upon to pay fees when they received a well-merited honour: but he objected to having any fees at all paid to a set of idle, useless officers.

SIR JOHN TRELAUNY said, he should move the reduction of the Vote by £5,403 4s. 6d., made up of the following items:—Expense incurred on account of police on duty at Dovor and Shorncliffe, £542 13s.; the Commission for inquiry into the Government of Maynooth College, £1,200; fees paid to the Clerk of the Crown on the election of a temporal peer for Ireland, £46 3s. 1d.; for granting a pardon to J. Frost and others, £62 17s. 8d.; expenses incurred on account of intended park at Islington, £1,516 16s. 8d.; Episcopalian Church of Scotland, £1,200; and Mr. Poole, remuneration and expenses while engaged in researches for coal in Nicomedia, and for nitre on the shores of the Black Sea, £834 12s. 1d.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £94,507 be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of Civil Contingencies, to the 31st day of March 1858."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that perhaps the hon. Baronet was not aware that all these sums had been already paid. If the Amendment was carried, the only result would be that the sum at the disposal of Government for next year would be £95,000 instead of £100,000, but not one of these items would be affected.

SIR JOHN TRELAUNY thought that in that case their control of the public finances was a mere farce. He withdrew his Amendment.

MR. WATKINS asked for an explanation of the sum charged for creating Lord Wensleydale a Peer.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER stated that Lord Wensleydale was, in the first instance, created a Peer for life, but it was afterwards found necessary to make him an hereditary Peer. He paid the fees for the first patent himself, but the Government thought that they ought to pay the expenses of the second.

MR. ADAMS said, he considered the practice of giving a present of £500 to the messenger who brought a treaty to be most objectionable, and not at all applicable to the present day. He gave notice that whenever such an item appeared in the Estimates again he would move that it be disallowed.

MR. WYLD said, he wished to ask whether any expedition to Africa were now in preparation?

MR. WILSON said, that the last expedition of Dr. Barth to Central Africa had produced very remarkable results, and great benefits were likely to be derived from it both as regarded the interests of commerce and civilization, and therefore the Treasury had adopted the recommendation of Lord Clarendon, that successive expeditions should be sent out for four or five years, as he considered that it was only by following up the experiment in that manner that a way could be opened for private enterprise. Arrangements had been made to carry out his recommendation.

MR. WYLD asked to what district the expeditions were to be directed?

MR. WILSON replied, that the expeditions were now in preparation. One was to be directed to the north-east coast of Africa, and the other was to ascend the Niger.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he must still complain of the item for a robe for the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, as Grand Master of the Order of St. Patrick.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

The House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again on Wednesday.

FRAUDULENT TRUSTEES BILL.

REPORT.

On consideration of the Bill as amended.

MR. HADFIELD moved to insert the following Clause after Clause 3, page 2, at the end of line 4:—

"Any person entrusted with any property of any description for the purpose of performing, or causing to be performed, any work or labour upon, to, or in respect of the same, who shall fraudulently sell, transfer, pledge, dispose of, or convert, in point of law or of fact, to his own use or benefit such property, or any part thereof, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour."

He observed that the Bill as it stood was by no means clear, and if the hon. and learned Gentleman wished to render it so, he trusted he would accept the suggestion.

Clause brought up, and read 1°.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he should oppose the Motion, as a clause to the same effect had already been inserted.

Motion made and Question, "That the said Clause be now read 2°," put and negatived.

MR. BUTT said, he rose to move to omit Clause 10, which interfered with a principle that had hitherto been respected, namely, that no person should be obliged to answer any question the tendency of which was to criminate himself. Up to this moment that principle had never been departed from. There were but two Acts which appeared to be departures—namely, the act against bribery at elections, and the Bankrupt Act. In the former case, however, there was a distinct provision that no proceedings should ever be taken against the person for the matters in respect to which he should have been compelled to give evidence; not that his evidence should not be used against him, but that no proceedings should ever be taken. In the second case also, that of the Bankrupt Act, it was provided that if he answered fairly and truly, no subsequent proceedings should be taken. It was true that the clause went on to provide that his evidence should not be used against him on any criminal proceeding, but he thought that provision was insufficient, as though the evidence could not be used, yet questions might be put with a view to obtain information that would enable parties to get up evidence against him. He did not say that the change ought not to be made, the innovation might be a wise and proper one, though he did not think so; but he wished them to consider that they were reversing an old-established principle, and that they ought not to do so without due deliberation.

MR. HADFIELD seconded the Amendment.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, he was at a loss to know how the clause as it stood altered the law with regard to a witness criminating himself.

MR. SERJEANT KINGLAKE said, the principle of the law was that a witness should not be involved in a predicament by any answers he gave on examination, or in other words, that any particular question he may have answered shall not be used against him. But it did not go on to provide that if a Trustee were compelled to disclose certain matters which would involve him in a criminal prosecution, he should be therefore held to be exempt from punishment. All he proposed to do was this—That a Trustee should be bound to answer faithfully and fully as to the management of the trust property, and that he should not, by reason of his being a trustee, take advantage of that position to commit a fraud. He wanted to carry out the great principle that a man should not set up his own wrong to enable him to escape from being punished.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. I. Butt) had mistaken the object of the clause. What he proposed was that a Trustee, being already bound by civil contract to answer faithfully and fully every question which might be put to him concerning the use which he had made of the property entrusted to him, when he had committed a crime by stealing some of that property, should not afterwards be allowed to set up his theft as a defence to a civil suit in which he was required to make a full discovery. The clause was intended to apply solely to proceedings in a court of equity.

Question, "That Clause 10 stand part of the Bill," put. and agreed to.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, it would be in the recollection of the House that when the 20th Section was under consideration a good deal of discussion took place with regard to it, and the result was that it was postponed. The preceding clause declared that no prosecution should be proceeded with until the matter had been brought before a Judge of one of the Superior Courts, or the Attorney General, or the Solicitor General, &c. The Committee thought it might be desirable that the accused party should have a hearing previous to an indictment being preferred, and, in order to meet its view, he should propose the insertion of the following words: "But he"—that is the Judge—or the Attorney General, or the Solicitor General—"shall in every case give the party accused an opportunity of answering the charge, where the same can in his opinion be done with a due regard to the interests of justice."

Amendment agreed to. Bill to be read 3° on Thursday.

JUSTICES AND POLICE FORCE (DUBLIN)
BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a Second Time."

MR. GROGAN said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not press the Bill at that late hour. When the Bill was last before the House, he represented to the Secretary for Ireland that it was a measure in which the people of Dublin were deeply interested, and it should not pass without giving them the fullest opportunity of considering its provisions. The Corporation of Dublin had stated by petition many objections to the Bill, and they complained that not even the heads of the Bill had been submitted to them previous to its introduction to Parliament. If the Bill was read a second time that night he did not think it could pass during the present Session, especially as he should consider it to be his duty to give it his most strenuous opposition. He begged to move as an Amendment that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months:"

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, that nineteen days had elapsed since the Bill was printed and distributed amongst hon. Members, so that the hon. and learned Gentleman could hardly say there was any surprise. In deference to the Corporation of Dublin he last year withdrew the Bill, and had since, after carefully examining their petition, and the speeches of those hon. Members who then opposed it, expunged from it every objection of which they complained. The hon. and learned Gentleman had not pointed out a single objection to the measure as it now stood, and which merely consolidated into one Act all that was really useful in the nine separate and conflicting Acts by which the Dublin police was at present regulated. It also proposed to do away with one of the three existing Police Offices, and thereby effect a saving of £4,000 a year, and to reduce the number of police magistrates from seven to five, increasing, however, on account of the extra labour thus imposed on them, the salaries of the remaining five from £600 to £800 per annum. There was, in the Bill, no provision for extending the power of the police, but the real wish of the Corporation of Dublin was to place the whole charge of the force upon the finances of the country, which already bore one half the cost, for they asked to have the Dublin police placed upon the same footing as the Irish constabulary, or else themselves to have the control of that body. ["Hear, hear," from Mr. BUTT]. The hon. and learned Member for Youghal cheered that proposal, but was he willing that, in return for being entrusted with such control, the ratepayers of Dublin should bear the whole cost of their own police? The Bill merely consolidated the law, and was in all respects a very beneficial Act, enabling the meanest capacity to understand what the police law of Dublin was by reducing a very complicated law into the provisions of one Bill. He certainly should press the Bill to a second reading.

MR. BUTT thought that, if the Government had the management of the police, they ought to pay all the expenses attendant thereupon, though if he were a citizen of Dublin he should be willing to pay any extra expense to have the control of that force, for at present the inhabitants of that city were subject to much vexatious tyranny at their hands. There was a case in Dublin of a man being dragged off by a police-constable for using obscene language, and when the constable was asked what the language was, he replied that the man had actually "d—d the police." There were most objectionable powers re-enacted in the Bill, and one of them was with regard to obscene language. He should oppose the second reading of the Bill.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON denied that the Attorney General had any authority for stating that the Bill was similar to the Bill of last year, except that the objectionable clauses had been struck out. The Amendments of the Attorney General had not removed all the objections to the Bill. The Attorney General had not, as he should have done, consulted those who last year made the objections to the Bill. The Attorney General, before he brought in a Bill affecting the municipal laws of Dublin, ought to have given full notice. It appeared, however, that the authorities of the city of Dublin had been taken quite by surprise by the present Bill.

MR. VANCE said, it was his intention of giving the strongest possible opposition to the Bill in all its future stages. The Bill had been referred to a committee of the Corporation in Dublin, and they had not had time to report. The members of the corporation had urged him and his colleague to take every possible step to arrest the further progress of the Bill. He would suggest, however, whether it would not be better to bring the Bill in next Session, and then refer it to a Select Committee, or at all events to refer it to a Committee during the present Session.

MR. H. A. HERBERT said, the Bill had been printed nineteen days, and had been before the House during the whole of that time. Not one single substantial objection had been made to the Bill. Under the circumstances he hoped the House would consent to the second reading. His hon. and learned Friend would be prepared to entertain any suggestions before it went into Committee.

CAPTAIN D. O'CONNELL said, there was the strongest objection among the people of Dublin to an increase of power being invested in the commissioners of police in that city.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 155; Noes 19: Majority 136.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>, and committed for To-morrow.

PUBLIC OFFICES EXTENSION BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Clause 1.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, that the Bill empowered Government to purchase certain properties required for the extension of the Public Offices.

Clause 1 to 39 were agreed to.

On Clause 40,

MR. MACARTNEY said, he hoped that the right hon. Baronet would give the House some approximate notion as to the amount of money that would be required. With wars in Persia and China on our hands, he thought the House should know the amount of the demand that was likely to be made on it.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, that the Government were only proposing to carry out a portion of the recommendations of the Select Committee of last Session on public offices. The amount which the Government intended to ask to enable them to purchase the site of the new offices was £270,000; but the present Bill contained no money clauses, but only such as were requisite to empower the Public Works Commissioners to purchase the land. Should the House of Commons grant the money for that purpose, and the third reading of the Bill should not be taken until after the vote for money which would appear in Class No. 7 of the Civil Service Estimates,

The remaining Clauses were agreed to, and the Bill passed through Committee.

On the Bill being reported, without Amendments,

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he would give the right hon. Baronet notice that, although this Bill had gone through Committee at a railroad pace, the country would never sanction the enormous scheme of building which it contemplated. Bricks and mortar too often led to bread and water, and he for one would rather see great men in little offices than little men in great offices. He warned the House that unless they kept a sharp eye on this matter of the public offices, the country would be involved in an expenditure of £5,000,000 before they knew where they were. The present Parliament were supposed to be more jealous custodians of the public purse than the last, and he certainly should oppose any such extravagant plan as he believed to be in contemplation.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that if the House did not agree to the Vote, the Bill would fall to the ground. The Government had no large scheme of building in contemplation; they merely intended to build a new Foreign Office, a new Colonial Office, and a new War Department. Any one who saw the Foreign Office must admit that a new building was necessary; and with respect to the War Department, its business was now carried on in various buildings, and to remove it to one edifice was a measure not only of metropolitan improvement but of administrative.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE observed, that he thought that the best thing Government could do under this Bill would be to adopt the plan he had suggested.

MR. PEASE said, he did not think they had done their duty to their constituents by passing such a Bill through Committee at such an hour of the night.

Bill to be read 3<sup>o</sup> on Friday.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS BILL.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

MR. COWAN then moved that the House adjourn. They would have to meet early the next day, and it would neither be fair to Mr. Speaker nor to their own constitutions to sit longer at present.

MR. ADDERLEY, who had a Bill on the Orders of the Day (the Industrial Schools Bill), expressed a hope that the hon. Member would not persist in his Motion.

Motion made, and Question, "That this House do now adjourn," put, and agreed to.

House adjourned at One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, July 14, 1857.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—2<sup>o</sup> Representative Peers (Ireland); Joint-Stock Companies; Registration of Long Leases (Scotland).

MILITARY EDUCATION—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE asked the noble Lord the Secretary at War, whether Her Majesty's Government had definitively settled the plan of education for young officers entering the army, and, if so, what was the plan in all its details.

LORD PANMURE: The question which my noble Friend has put to me, would require a very long explanation from me, if I entered into details; but I am happy to inform him—of what I dare say he is aware—that the education of officers of the army is (of course under the responsibility of the Secretary at War) placed in the hands of the Commander in Chief. The Commander in Chief is president of a council which consists of three members besides himself—one of whom is a general officer of great learning as well as military acquirements; another, is an eminent officer of Engineers; and the third, is an officer who has on many occasions distinguished himself. This council has made to me its first Report, which addresses itself to the point to which my noble Friend has referred—namely, the education of candidates for the military service. I have expressed my concurrence in that Report. It has been submitted to Her Majesty for approval, and as soon as that approval has been expressed, I will lay it on the table of your Lordships' House, in which case all persons will be made fully aware of the details of the plan.

In reply to a further question from the noble Earl,

LORD PANMURE said, it was not intended to continue Woolwich and Sandhurst exactly in their present condition. It was intended to amend them both, so that officers might obtain commissions in the Artillery and Engineers, as well as in the line, from them.

THE INDIAN MUTINY.

EARL GRANVILLE, in presenting (by command) correspondence between the Indian Government and the Court of Directors said, that since last night Her Majesty's Government had received some further intelligence on this subject, which, with their Lordships' leave, he would read. [The noble Earl accordingly read a series of despatches, addressed from various places to the Government officers at Bombay].

JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said, that the object of the measure which had been sent up from the other House of Parliament was substantially to give to creditors of joint-stock banks that became insolvent the same relief as they would have against an ordinary bank when it became bankrupt. The law at present was in an anomalous condition with regard to these banks. If a joint-stock bank became insolvent, a shareholder might obtain a winding-up order, and the Master in Chancery, or the Chief Clerk of the Vice Chancery, whose duty it was to wind up these affairs, had the power of making calls on all the shareholders in order to raise a fund to pay the creditors; but that was a proceeding to which the creditors were not parties; it was a mere proceeding of the shareholders inter se. The object of the present Bill was, as far as possible, to remedy this defect, to give to the creditors the power of taking care that in making the calls proper steps might be taken to seize the whole of the property of the shareholders if need be, in order to raise a sufficient sum out of which the creditors might be paid in full. For this purpose it provided, in the first section, that the creditors might summon a meeting, and, if two-thirds in value thought fit, they might appoint a person to represent them in the matter of winding up the concerns of the company. If the company had become bankrupt, then there was no necessity for the choice of a representative, because the assignee in bankruptcy would perform those functions. The second section provided, that where a company had become bankrupt, and there had been a winding-up order, the assignee might proceed with it. Then there was a provision which gave to the representative the power to make any compromise, whether for the discharge of the liability of all the shareholders or of any one of them, and if the compromise were approved by a Judge, it should be valid and binding. Then there was a further provision of great importance. By the law as it at present stood, any creditor of a joint-stock bank, when he recovered judgment against the public officer of a bank, had a right to take out execution against any of the existing members of the corporation, and if he were able to show that he had exhausted the resources of all those members in seeking to obtain satisfaction of his claim, then he might proceed against parties who were not existing members, but who had been so within the limit of three years. Practically this last had been found to be a delusive remedy, because it was a remedy only on the creditor being able to satisfy the Court that he had exhausted all reasonable means to obtain payment from all the existing members, and in a large joint-stock banking company that was almost an impossibility. In order to remedy this inconvenience, the Bill provided that where there had been a compromise entered into, such as he had already referred to, that was to be deemed proof that all reasonable steps had been taken to obtain payment from the existing shareholders. These creditors would therefore obtain a locus standi, whereby they would be in a position to enforce their rights against those shareholders who had ceased to be members of the company within three years. There was another provision to prevent the shareholder of an insolvent joint-stock bank from going out of the country without giving security for the repayment of the debt or of his share of the fund to be contributed. In the course of the last year or two there had been two memorable failures of joint-stock banks which had caused great disaster, and been the ruin of a great many honest and industrious depositors. The position the creditors of these banks was placed in was this:—they had the right to bring an action against the public officer of the bank, or in the case of a winding-up order, against the official assignee, and having recovered in the action, they might by scire facias get execution against any of the shareholders, and if that did not satisfy them, against another; and therefore, all the creditors who resorted to these steps might take any number of proceedings, and run a sort of race against each other as to who should obtain payment first. Now, it was said that the effect of the measure would be to do an injustice to those creditors who might have obtained a judgment by placing them upon a level with all the other creditors; but that was a charge which, in his opinion, the whole tenour of recent legislation, in relation to similar questions, tended to disprove. The Bill would have the effect of enabling two-thirds of the creditors to bind the remaining third to submit to a rateable share; but, at the same time, it was provided that the sanction of a Judge or master should be necessary to every compromise, in order to secure creditors against any injustice which might be done them. The Bill was, in point of fact, very similar to the one which had obtained their Lordships' sanction last year, and, although it might be said that at present there was a larger number of creditors who had obtained judgments at that time, he had already endeavoured to point out that no material injustice would be done to them.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>.

LORD MONTEAGLE said, that a noble Friend of his (the Earl of Donoughmore) had placed upon the paper a notice of his intention to move that certain persons who had petitioned their Lordships against the Bill be heard against it by counsel. The petitioners complained that the Bill would operate very unjustly towards judgment creditors in Ireland, because it would destroy the advantage which attached to a judgment in Ireland, where it operated as a mortgage on the debtor's property. He himself would not express any opinion upon the subject of that petition, but, as his noble Friend was unable to be present that evening, he hoped that the noble and learned Lord would not consider that he was stopped from making that Motion at a future stage of the Bill.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that he could not hold out any notion that he could concur in the prayer of the petition; but at the same time the noble Lord would not be prevented making his Motion at a subsequent period.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, he wished to point out to their Lordships the position of the creditors of the Tipperary Bank. These creditors believed that under an Act of Geo. II. they were entitled to lay hold of the whole of the real and personal estate of the bank shareholders, and they took measures to give them what they considered to be their rights. After very long arguments, however, at their Lordships' Bar, it was considered that they had no rights of the sort, for the Act of Geo. II. was repealed by an Act of the 6th of Geo. IV., which gave the creditors certain remedies against the shareholders of joint-stock banks, and did not enable them to take all the property. The law of England was quite clear. Not only might the shareholders themselves resolve to wind up the company, but the creditors might issue a fiat in bankruptcy against the shareholders. In Ireland it was otherwise; there they could not make them bankrupts. He (Lord St. Leonards) had certainly come to a different opinion; but since great doubt existed on the point, and it was the duty of the Government to remove that doubt, and to give the creditors in Ireland the same rights as they had in England, he hoped their Lordships would take care in arranging for a compromise that they did not destroy the security which certain creditors were already in possession of by virtue of the judgments which they had recovered. It would be a great injustice to take away from them a security which in law amounted to a mortgage.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

THE TRANSPORT SERVICE.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE: My Lords, I rise pursuant to notice, to call your Lordships' attention to the subject of hiring tonnage for the transport service of Government. The matter is one of considerable importance, and one, in my opinion, well worthy of the consideration of my noble Friends opposite. During the late war, the money expended in carrying troops amounted to no less than £5,000,000 in one year, and in the year previous to £3,000,000. I took occasion at that time to notice the immense expenditure in the conveyance of munitions of war; and I ventured to criticise the mode in which the tonnage was taken up. I will not now go into the question of tonnage; for I admit that the authorities who govern the country, and manage these matters, have no guide whatever as to the hiring of tonnage, so as to know what they really hire for the use of the State. They are almost completely in the hands of the owners of shipping who use terms of tonnage that do not give you the slightest notion of the carrying power. This question grows larger and larger the more you employ steam vessels; because, when these vessels have their machinery and coals on board, so much of their tonnage is occupied that, though they look very imposing, and seem to have great carrying powers, they have in many instances failed to efficiently carry out their contracts. The number of transports hired during the late war was 118. They were hired indiscriminately as to tonnage in this respect—that sometimes they were hired on their registered tonnage, and sometimes on their gross tonnage. The consequence of this confusion was, that the public paid enormously for the transport service to the country. It can readily be shown that, when the Government came to hire by gross tonnage, they paid at least one-third more than when they hired by registered tonnage, and gained no advantage whatever. Two returns laid upon the table of the House of Commons on the 8th July and the 8th August, 1856, respectively, are most important as going to elucidate the case now before your Lordships. Of the 118 transports hired for the conveyance of troops, twenty-four were hired by gross tonnage. The names of these twenty-four were—Magdalena, Golden Fleece, Arabia, Jura, Alma, Nubia, Tamar, Medway, Thames, Trent, Europa, Niagara, Queen of the South, Emeu, Andes, Cambria, Tynemouth, Emperor, Robert Lowe, Toning, Cormorant, Albatros, Sovereign, and Hope. The gross tonnage of these twenty-four vessels was 39,806 tons. I shall now take twenty-four of the vessels hired by registered tonnage, the gross tonnage of which amounted to 41,517 tons. The names of the twenty-four vessels which I select from those hired by registered tonnage are—Great Britain, Orinoco, Jason, Simla, Candia, Ripon, Severn, Victoria, Hydaspes, Adelaide, Argo, Imperador, Canadian, Imperatrice, Cleopatra, Melbourne, Alps, Australian, Sydney, Charity, City of London, Lion, Telegraph, and Kangaroo. The hire per month for the first class of vessels—namely, those hired by the gross tonnage—was £92,588; while the hire per month of the twenty-four hired by registered tonnage was £63,765. The rate of hire per gross ton per month of the twenty-four hired by registered tonnage was £1 10s. 8½d. Now, take 39,806 tons, the gross tonnage of the twenty-four hired by gross tonnage, and at £1 10s. 8½d. per gross ton, the entire amount for hire would only stand at £61,118, instead of what it does really amount to on the gross tonnage hiring—namely, £92,588. This shows a loss per month on the hiring of the first twenty-four ships whose names I have read to your Lordships of £31,470. I think I have said enough to show that there must have been very great ignorance as to the mode of taking up tonnage; for, unquestionably, if there had been a thorough understanding as to the manner in which transports should be hired, Government would never have made this monstrous blunder. That is the whole of my case, and it is important that these matters should be considered carefully, when we are entering on another—I will not call it war—but difficulty, and when a great amount of tonnage must be taken up. I am not desirous of eliciting any answer from my noble Friend, but the matter is one which should not at the present juncture be passed over.

Lord Monteagle

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY hoped the noble Earl would excuse him for not being able to give him any information upon the subjects to which he had referred, as they did not belong to the department with which he was connected. The Admiralty had the sole control of the transport service, and without making inquiries at the Admiralty, it was impossible for him to give any information to the noble Earl on the various points on which the noble Earl had touched.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he had expressed his opinion on a former occasion that it was possible, particularly at this season of the year, to make a better passage to India in a sailing vessel than in a steamer—at least, his experience was to that effect; but he hoped that those who had the engaging of the sailing transports would pay particular attention to their sailing qualities, because, unless good sailers were selected, fast passages could not be expected. He had seen with regret the names of a number of vessels mentioned as being engaged for the transport of troops to India which were notorious as bad sailers when he was in India, fifteen years ago. He had heard yesterday the name of one vessel which was celebrated for only being able to go four knots an hour. It might be that the vessels themselves had been repaired and were now good sailers; but he hoped the attention of the Government would be earnestly directed to the imperative necessity of choosing none but good vessels for this service.

LORD PANMURE said, he had had an interview with the Chairman of the East India Company, who had assured him that the vessels engaged for the conveyance of troops were vessels generally known by the name of clippers, and were fast sailers. He was not prepared to speak as to the comparative value of sailing vessels and steamers; but in deference to the feelings of families in India, the Government had determined to give a trial to steamers, and five screws had been taken up for the conveyance of troops to that country.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, he was a little alarmed at the appearance of a divided authority and the consultation of new departments which was suggested by his noble Friend's mention of a conversation with the Chairman of the Board of Directors. He hoped that the entire direction of the transport service during the present emergency would be left with the Minister of War. That this ought always to be the case in time of war was an opinion which had been expressed from the commencement of the Russian war, and which he had stated before the Sebastopol Committee. Although, during the time that he had held the office of Secretary of War, the transport department had been under the direction of one of the ablest administrators in the country, Sir James Graham, assisted by Captain Milne, a distinguished naval officer and most indefatigable in the discharge of his duty, the conviction had been forced upon him that the transport service, during the time of war at least, ought always to be under the sole control of the Minister of War.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he thought he could explain to the noble Duke how it was that the Chairman of the East India Company was mixed up with this matter. The East India Company paid the expense of the transport of troops to India, the Crown paying the expense of the transport of troops going to China. Notice was given of the number of troops required, and then the East India Company, under the control of the Board of Control, took up the requisite tonnage. The contracts were all laid before the Board of Control.

LORD PANMURE : That has been the practice time out of mind.

Subject dropped.

THE INDIA MAILS—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, he wished to put a question to the Postmaster General, as to whether any arrangements had been made for expediting the India mails through France. In consequence of the existing state of circumstances, the conveyance of the India mails was a matter of great importance. At present, however, a delay took place in France, which might, and he believed would, be obviated if the subject were brought under the notice of the Emperor, whose kind feelings towards this country were known. The homeward Indian mails now generally arrived at Marseilles either in the middle of the night or early in the morning. The mail bags were then conveyed to the French Post Office and lodged there. Of the magnitude of the mail, some idea might be formed when he stated that, in consequence of the vast increase of the French trade with the East, in one instance lately the French portion of the mail consisted of 118 boxes. Then, having been lodged in the Post Office, the French authorities first sorted their own letters, and until they had done that they would not allow our letters to proceed. The consequence was, that our mails were delayed at Marseilles from twelve to twenty-four hours. Now nothing could be more easy than to have the English mails, on the arrival of the steamer at Marseilles, conveyed direct to the railway station, and then despatched at once. A special train might either be put on by the railway company, or, if they did not think that the conveyance of the passengers and mails would pay its expense, we might ourselves, at our own expense, put on a special train, which should proceed direct to the port of embarkation on the Channel. By this means he thought that from eighteen to twenty-four hours might be saved in the conveyance of the mail, which was a matter of very great importance at the present time.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he had taken some pains to inform himself of the exact state of the facts relating to this matter, and he was happy to say that his noble Friend had considerably overrated the delay that had taken place in any one instance. During the last six months, there had been thirteen overland mails, and only in one case, on the 27th January last, had there been a delay of more than twelve hours. Representations had been made to the French Government, and in February new arrangements were made for forwarding the overland mail. There were two mail trains despatched from Marseilles to Paris each day, one in the morning and the other in the evening, and if our mails did not arrive in time for the departure of these trains, we had no right to demand that the French Government should put on fresh ones for our convenience. We had a right to demand that they should forward our mails by the first train after their arrival, but nothing more. However, the French Government had very kindly and considerately made an arrangement by which, if our mail bag arrived at Marseilles within two hours of the departure of the morning mail, and provided it was not beyond noon, they would forward it by an express train, and should that train not overtake the mail at Lyons, they agreed to send it on all the way to Paris. If, however, the mail bag arrived after the departure of the night train, it was thought in that case to be unsafe to send it forward by express, on account of the traffic. He could assure the noble Earl that every effort was made by the Post Office Department to facilitate the communication between this country and India, and that no time was lost in conveying the correspondence all over the country. As a proof of this, he might state that last night the India mail arrived about eleven o'clock, and that no fewer than 20,000 letters were distributed by the first delivery in London, and sent off by the first trains to all parts of the kingdom.

House adjourned at Seven o'clock to Thursday next, half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, July 14, 1857.

GRAND JURIES (METROPOLITAN POLICE-DISTRICT BILL)—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Question again proposed, "That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

MR. BOWYER said, he rose to move, as an Amendment, that the Chairman do now leave the Chair. This was a Bill which meant nothing more nor less than to abrogate a part of the British constitution. And what grounds were assigned for so important a step? A good deal had been said about the inconveniences arising from the present system; and on these grounds of inconvenience alone the institution of grand juries in the most important part of this country was to be abolished. No suggestion was made of any means by which this inconvenience might be obviated; it was proposed not to amend but to abolish and destroy. He was much surprised that such a Bill should come from the Conservative side of the House, which professed uncommon respect for, and devotion to, our antient institutions. No doubt the hon. and learned Gentleman who had charge of the Bill (Sir F. Thesiger) was actuated by the purest motives in bringing it forward, but he (Mr. Bowyer) could not help thinking that he now somewhat regretted the task he had undertaken. There were not wanting indications in the past history of this question to show that the agitation against grand juries in the metropolis arose simply from the unwillingness of persons engaged in trade and other occupations to serve on them. Attempts had been made on previous occasions to introduce a Bill of this description; and it was not long since the late Solicitor General, then Recorder of London, had proposed a measure with the same object in view, which passed that House rather rapidly, but which was rejected by the other House, being received with reprobation by all the law Lords, and being especially condemned by the Chief Justice of England, who denounced it as an attack upon the constitution of the country. He might be told that this Bill applied only to London; but if grand juries were abolished here, he did not see how it would be possible to maintain them elsewhere. It was letting in the small end of the wedge. Indeed, he was not quite sure it was not letting in the large end too. He would, with the permission of the Committee, now proceed to advert to what the law was upon this subject, and to urge upon their attention the violation which such a change must make in one of the most valued principles of our constitutional system. To put a man on his trial without the intervention of a grand jury was against the whole policy of our constitutional history and against the law of England. Certainly, the Attorney General had the power of filing an information for misdemeanours without the intervention of a grand jury, and the Court of Queen's Bench possessed a similar power, but these very exceptions showed the principle on which the rule itself was founded. For the law allowed criminal informations to be filed, only in cases of misdemeanour, and no one could therefore be put on his trial for felony except on an indictment found by a grand jury, or on the inquest of a coroner's jury. And, indeed, it was customary, even after a verdict of a coroner's jury, to prefer a Bill before the grand jury, and put the prisoner on his trial on the indictment. And in cases of misdemeanour, the law would not allow any man to be tried without indictment found by a grand jury, unless with the sanction of the highest Criminal Court in the realm next to the House of Lords, or by the act of the highest law officer of the Crown responsible to Parliament. Such is the constitutional principle of the law of England. Yet this principle was sought to be abrogated for the convenience of a few persons. Blackstone, in the fourth volume of his Commentaries, p. 349, quoted the famous passage of Magna Charta, which says—

"Nullus liber homo capiatur vel imprisonetur aut exulet aut aliquo alio modo destruat nisi per legale iudicium partium suorum vel per legem terræ."

Blackstone then proceeded to say—

"The antiquity and excellence of this trial for the settling of civil property has elsewhere been explained at large. And it will hold much stronger in criminal cases, since in the times of difficulty and danger more is to be apprehended from the violence and partiality of Judges appointed by the Crown in suits between the king and the subject, than in disputes between one individual and another to settle the metes and boundaries of private property. Our law has, therefore, wisely placed this strong and twofold barrier of a presentment and a trial by jury between the liberties of the people and the prerogative of the Crown. It was necessary for preserving the admirable balance of our constitution to vest the executive power of the laws in the prince; and yet this power might be dangerous and destructive to that very constitution, if executed without check or control by justices of oyer and terminer occasionally named by the Crown, who might then, as in France or Turkey, imprison, despatch, or exile any man that was obnoxious to the Government by an instant declaration that such is their will and pleasure. But the founders of the English law have, with excellent forecast, contrived that no man should be called to answer to the King for any capital crime, unless upon the preparatory accusation of twelve or more of his fellow-subjects—the grand jury—and that the truth of every accusation, whether preferred in the shape of indictment, information, or appeal, should afterwards be confirmed by the unanimous suffrage of twelve of his equals and neighbours, indifferently chosen and superior to all suspicion. So that the liberties of England cannot but subsist so long as this palladium remains sacred and inviolate not only from all open attacks (which none will be so hardy as to make) but also from all secret machinations which may sap and undermine it, by introducing new and arbitrary methods of trial by justices of the peace, commissioners of the revenue, and courts of conscience. And, however convenient these may appear at first (as doubtless all arbitrary powers well executed are the most convenient), yet let it be again remembered that delays and little inconveniences in the forms of justice are the price that all free nations must pay for their liberty in more substantial matters; that these inroads upon this sacred bulwark of the nation are fundamentally opposite to the spirit of our constitution; and that, though begun in trifles, the precedent may gradually increase and spread to the utter disuse of juries in questions of the most momentous concern."

Could the House entertain the slightest doubt as to the course which Blackstone would take were he now a member of that body. He (Mr. Bowyer) would admit that there were inconveniences incidental to the present system, but he believed they might be all obviated without trenching upon the liberties of the subject in the way this Bill proposed to do. For instance, he was aware that cases sometimes occurred in which indictments were preferred against persons behind their backs, and in which bench warrants were issued before they knew that they were accused. No doubt that was a great inconvenience; but it might be easily avoided by providing that no indictment should be sent before a grand jury without previous notice being given to the accused person, or without proceedings having been taken publicly in the first instance before a magistrate. Another inconvenience of the present system was that sometimes witnesses were bought off and were prevented appearing before the grand jury, or that, having gone before the grand jury, they neglected to make their appearance at the trial. This might be effectually remedied, however, if proceedings in the first place were taken before a magistrate, by binding over the witnesses to appear both before the grand jury and at the trial. The real difficulty in the way of administering criminal justice in this country arose from the want of a public prosecutor, and this was a difficulty which did not arise in Scotland or Ireland, as in the former there was the Lord Advocate, and in the latter there was the Crown Solicitor. In short, all the existing evils were susceptible of an easy remedy, without resorting to the extreme remedy of abolishing grand juries. If grand juries were abolished in London the thing must go further. Grand juries in the country would be soon done away with, for the argument would be speedily urged, if grand juries have been abolished in London, why should they continue to exist in the country. The institution of grand juries brought into the administration of justice many persons who would not otherwise be brought in, which was a great feature in a free country. Though it might be an inconvenience to tradespeople to attend on grand juries in London, still it was most important that those classes should take a part in the administration of justice. If the present Bill passed, instead of the people having in their hands the important function of accusation by means of presentment, what duty would pass into the hands of magistrates, removable at the pleasure of the Crown—practically of the Home Secretary. The exception of cases of treason and misprision of treason made in the Bill, showed how much the hon. and learned Gentleman felt the force of this objection. But the hon. and learned Gentleman had not provided for cases which might have a political complexion, and in troubled times be no less important in a national point of view; and such cases were more likely to arise in London than in any other place. The importance of this Bill could scarcely be exaggerated, and involved the most grave constitutional considerations. It appeared to him to be fraught with so much danger and evil that he could not consent to its proceeding further. He, therefore, moved that the Chairman do now leave the chair, with a view to preventing the further progress of this measure; as he believed that if it stood over till next Session his hon. and learned Friend would in the interval apply his great ability to the task, not of abolishing grand juries, but of ascertaining how any inconveniences resulting from them might be obviated.

Mr. Bowyer

SIR FREDERIC THESIGER said, he thought he had some reason to complain of the course pursued by his hon. and learned Friend. When he asked leave to introduce the Bill, he heard nothing urged against its principle, except some desultory observations from the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Bowyer). Ample notice was given of the second reading, and the Bill passed without opposition until the night when it was appointed for Committee, on which occasion the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) merely stated that he had some Amendments to move; while the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk, even at that time, gave no notice of any objection which would go to the principle of the Bill. He thought it inconvenient, and he might almost say unfair, to the House and to the introducer of a Bill of this kind, that no intimation should be given, until the present late stage, of an opposition to the principle of the measure. With regard to the observations of his hon. and learned Friend, he (Sir F. Thesiger) did not in the slightest degree regret having introduced the Bill; he should, indeed, regret it if it failed, as it was solely from a knowledge of the existing inconveniences and not through any pressure from other parties, that he had done so. He had adopted this course, too, after communication with the Government, who had kindly left the matter in his hands. His hon. and learned Friend had assailed the measure on the ground of principle, quoted Blackstone and other ancient names to raise a prejudice against it, and finally characterised it as a violation of the British constitution; but he (Sir F. Thesiger) could refer to more important institutions than this which had been broken in upon by legislation. In the County Courts, for instance, a single Judge decided on the interests of parties without the intervention of a jury. Now, he thought that Blackstone, if he were living, would be of opinion that that was a greater inroad on the constitution than the proposition now made. His hon. and learned Friend had referred to the danger of the present measure leading to an interference with grand juries in the country. Now, when he brought in the Bill, he had expressly guarded himself against the supposition that the measure had any such object, for he thought it was of importance that the country gentlemen should take a part in judicial proceedings, and be connected with the Judges in the administration of criminal jurisprudence. He thought, however, with regard to the Metropolitan police districts, that there were special reasons in favour of the adoption of his Bill. His hon. and learned Friend had not made himself master of his subject, for if he had read the evidence given by witnesses of great experience before the Commissioners for the Amendment of the Criminal Law, he would have found the highest names recommending that, within the metropolitan districts at least, grand juries should be dispensed with, and that a Committee of that House, composed of persons of great legal knowledge and experience, had also urged the adoption of that course in all cases where preliminary inquiries had taken place before police magistrates. The grand juries at the Central Criminal Court and at the Middlesex Sessions had been in the habit of presenting themselves session after session as not only unnecessary, but a positive obstruction to justice; while Recorder after Recorder, and Judge after Judge, had strongly expressed their opinions that grand juries might properly be dispensed with in the metropolitan police districts. The late Recorder of London, in 1852, declared in the strongest manner his opinion that grand juries were positively an impediment to the administration of justice; the grand jury at the same time made a presentment to a similar effect; and, as Attorney General under Lord Derby's Administration, he (Sir F. Thesiger) introduced a Bill for the abolition of grand juries within the metropolitan districts, which he believed would have been carried but for the dissolution of Parliament. He considered that grand juries might safely and properly be dispensed with in the metropolitan districts, where, by means of the stipendiary magistrates—who were carefully selected from the Members of the legal profession—preliminary investigations might be instituted which would be full and searching, at the same time that the interests of the accused were sufficiently protected. Such inquiries were conducted publicly, the parties charged being confronted with their accusers and their witnesses, whom they had an opportunity of cross-examining. After the case had been attended with all this publicity, which alone was a sufficient protection to the accused, for it brought the circumstances as much home to the knowledge of every person in the kingdom as if he had been present in court, the magistrate, if he saw sufficient reason, committed the accused for trial. But before a trial could take place a new tribunal of persons, sitting in a secret chamber, hearing witnesses in the absence of the accused, desultorily assembled for the purpose of deciding as to whether there should be an inquiry, which had already been decided under more favourable circumstances by the magistrate. The case was, therefore, a peculiar case, as applicable to the metropolitan police district, and did not affect any other portion of the country. If the grand jury sent the case for trial, they only endorsed the decision of the magistrate; but if, on the contrary, with their imperfect means, under any circumstances, they should throw out the bill of indictment, the greatest public evil would be done, for in that case the grand jury became an obstruction to justice. The grand jury in the metropolitan district was known as the "Hope of the London Thieves." But supposing the bill thrown out—the bill of indictment after the decision of the magistrates—would the accused party under all the circumstances of publicity be any better because he did not go to trial, more especially if he could clear his character? The public were acquainted with the accusation; they knew it was the opinion of a magistrate that the accused ought to be put upon his trial; but they could not be aware of the reasons which had induced the grand jury to ignore the bill. Whether, therefore, the grand jury found or ignored a bill, their action was supererogatory and frequently mischievous. Another strong objection to the continuance of grand juries in the metropolitan districts arose from the circumstances that persons were enabled to prefer bills without any notice to the accused parties, to obtain bench warrants for their apprehension, and to use this legal machinery for purposes of malice or extortion; and these instances were unfortunately not very rare. He trusted, then, that the principle of this Bill having been already recognised by the House, hon. Members would consider that he had answered the objections of his hon. and learned Friend, and the more especially as this was not the stage when there ought to be any interposition to stop the further progress of the measure.

MR. AYRTON said, the Session was remarkable for the number of Bills passed through their earlier stages sub silentio, on condition that their principles were to be discussed at a subsequent and unusual period. Therefore it was, that the hon. and learned Member had been allowed to pass his Bill to its present stage, the second reading having taken place at a late hour, and during the confusion of hon. Members leaving the House. He (Mr. Ayrton) endeavoured to prevent the hon. and learned Member pushing the Bill subsequently through another stage at the unseemly hour of 2 o'clock in the morning, and succeeded by hon. Members declining to be parties to such a proceeding, and quitting the House so as to reduce it below the proper number for carrying on business. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir F. Thesiger) had, therefore, rendered it incumbent on his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Bower) to take the course he had done. He (Mr. Ayrton) entirely objected to the proposition for abolishing grand juries within the metropolis. There was no institution in the country, which they could not show to have some defects, either in its origin, nature, or practical application, and if that was to be the ground on which destruction was to proceed, he knew no institution which could stand the test of such a scrutiny. He would beg to ask, what was the distinctive feature of the administration of justice in this country as compared with that of almost all others? In France, and indeed throughout the rest of Europe, the administration of criminal justice depended solely on the Crown; while, in this country, the administration of justice was a mixed operation between the Crown, the aristocracy, and the people. The latter were represented by petit juries, the aristocracy by grand juries, while the Crown presented itself in the person of the Judge. Some supposed that our mixed system of Government of Sovereign, Lords, and Commons, depended entirely on Parliament, but it had a broader basis in all the institutions of the country, of which the most important was the administration of justice; and it was to this system that we were indebted for the maintenance of liberty. He insisted that if we changed this system, and if in the metropolis the wealthy and intelligent classes were no longer to take part, as now, in the administration of justice, we should destroy one of its principal features. The grand-jury system, he would submit, did most essential service in guarding the liberty of the subject, and he must ridicule the idea that a stipendiary magistrate, a mere creature of the Home Office, was a sufficient barrier between the subject and the Crown. He objected to uncontrolled power being placed in the hands of stipendiary magistrates; and, if this Bill passed, it would have the effect of giving the stipendiary magistrates of the metropolis, greater powers than any court of justice possessed, with the exception of the House of Lords, because they could refuse to commit, and thereby deprive a complainant of all means of seeking redress without appeal. He (Mr. Ayrton) knew of a case in which a magistrate of that class refused to commit parties for an assault, who were subsequently, by the intervention of the grand jury, tried, convicted, and sentenced to two years' imprisonment. It had been suggested that the grand jury of the Court of Queen's Bench, would afford a substitute for the local grand juries, but that was an error, for if that court were to sit out of Middlesex, as it might do by law, there would be no grand jury at all for the county of Middlesex. The hon. and learned Gentleman desired to get rid of certain evils connected with grand juries, and yet left the grand jury of the Court of Queen's Bench untouched. It was notorious that for the very purpose which the hon. and learned Member deemed most objectionable the grand jury of the Court of Queen's Bench was found more convenient, and that some persons chose rather to prefer indictments there than before grand juries of the Central Criminal Court. While the Queen's Bench grand jury was left, the alleged grievance of grand juries would be only partially remedied, and this measure, therefore, could not be said even to accomplish the ends which the hon. and learned Gentleman had in view. But there was a fatal objection to the Bill, that it proposed that every inhabitant of the metropolis should hold his liberty at the will of the Attorney General. There was no provision that in all cases there should be investigation before a magistrate, but there was a clause which gave the Attorney General the right to file an information for felony, a power which he had never possessed. By the mere fiat of the Attorney General, without inquiry, without oath, without even an affidavit, any individual might be committed to prison upon a charge of felony, and such a person having no right to a writ of habeas corpus, might have to lie in gaol until the Attorney General chose to discharge him or bring him to trial. It was most reckless legislation, and so insulting to the inhabitants of the largest metropolis in the world, that the Bill ought to be at once rejected. The object of grand juries was to secure an independent tribunal between the Crown and the people, so that the people might not be left to the mercy of the stipendiaries of the State. If the Committee should come to the conclusion, as he trusted they would, not to proceed further with this Bill, he would not shrink from entering into the whole question of the constitution of grand juries, and he would remind the Committee that the objections of the hon. and learned Gentleman applied to all grand juries, and not to the grand juries of the metropolis alone. There were stipendiary magistrates out of London. But were they to understand that the hon. and learned Gentleman thought the landed gentry, who exercised the powers of magistrates, were so unworthy of trust in the discharge of their duties, that it was necessary to have a special institution to watch over them? Such must be the doctrine of the hon. and learned Gentleman, in fact, though he might deny it in language; but he would advise the Committee to look to acts and disregard language, especially when it fell from the lips of a learned and accomplished lawyer. He warned hon. Members to beware how they trifled with an institution like this—seeking to abolish it in respect of two and a half millions of people, and to retain it in so many other places smaller than London. It was said there was a greater check upon magistrates in the metropolis by means of publicity, but he would remind them that there was hardly a country town where there was not a newspaper, and in the country there was tenfold more publicity, because the local papers, not concerning themselves so much about the affairs of the whole kingdom as The Times, looked for support in publishing at length matters of local interest. He trusted he had said enough to prevent the Committee proclaiming, by their assent to this measure, that country justices were so deficient that, while grand juries were abolished in London, it was absolutely necessary to maintain them to watch over the conduct of the aristocracy in the country. He hoped the House would let it go forth to the inhabitants of the metropolis that their rights and privileges would be as much respected as if they had a representation commensurate with their numbers, wealth, and intelligence. Grand juries were no idle or useless tribunals. There had been 20,000 bills ignored in ten years, and 57,000 persons acquitted. It was very easy to tell a man that, if innocent, he would be acquitted upon trial; but was it no punishment to be compelled to submit to the disgrace of standing in a dock and being charged with an offence? The evils incident to grand juries were two in number. The first was, that a man might be indicted without a preliminary inquiry and without depositions. What could be easier than to pass a law, not for the metropolis alone, but the whole country, that no bill should be found by a grand jury unless an information had been taken down in writing, so that it might remain on record for the use of the accused when he was put upon his trial? The second abuse was that, when the witnesses had been examined before a magistrate, it was putting them and the public to unnecessary expense to have them examined again before the grand jury. Why not provide that the written statements on oath of the prosecutor and the witnesses should be laid before the grand jury, with liberty to send for the latter if required? By the adoption of these two provisions, they would get rid of every grievance affecting the institution of grand juries, make the administration of justice quicker and more simple, relieve witnesses and the public from unnecessary expense, and render grand juries more efficient. If grand juries had been in abeyance for great political purposes, so had the Habeas Corpus Act, for there was scarcely an instance on record of a subject being brought into Westminster Hall to be discharged from imprisonment merely oppressive on the part of the Crown. A Minister of State might wrongfully direct a subject to be seized or his house to be broken open, but by the law of England he could be indicted, with his agents, for this offence against the law. The very existence of such safeguards obviated the necessity for calling them into action, and it was because a Minister of State could be thus indicted by a grand jury, without the intervention of the Crown, that such proceedings were unknown. He believed that the liberty of the subject depended upon the maintenance of grand juries and other similar institutions. Without them Parliament would be of little avail, we might talk of liberty in the House of Commons, but we should be deprived of the means of possessing it, and we should be reduced to the state of the continental nations, where the word of command was obligatory, and those to whom it was directed had no option but to obey, whilst those who were aggrieved were dependant for redress upon the pleasure of the Crown. Such an outrage on public liberty as this Bill would effect was never before attempted; and it was the duty of the House, if they wished to prevent the ultimate predominance of a civil service class, to refuse to proceed with it, the more especially as all the evils incident to grand juries might be remedied by the two short and simple provisions he had suggested.

Sir Frederic Thesiger

MR. M'MAHON said, that if the Bill provided that when any ordinary case had been investigated by a police magistrate, there should be no further inquiry before a grand jury, nothing could be said against it; but it so completely substituted the police magistrate for the grand jury that it could not safely be passed into law. It was based on the assumption that there were stipendiary magistrates in every division of the metropolitan district, but this was a mistake; there were no stipendiary magistrates in the City of London; and did the hon. and learned Gentleman, who was the adviser in that House of the country party, mean to tell them that tradesmen in the City of London who might have attained a certain dignity had all the learning and experience of legally educated persons, and were competent to decide as magistrates, and that country gentlemen were not competent? The county of Essex formed a portion of the area over which the Central Criminal Court had jurisdiction, and at the present moment a man was lying in Newgate under sentence of death for a murder committed at Stratford. That man had been heard before, and committed by, county magistrates. It was true that the grand juries at the Central Criminal Court, and at the Middlesex Sessions, were in the habit of denouncing themselves as useless nuisances and obstructions, but the present Bill was not a proper remedy. The sheriffs ought to be required to summon the same class of gentlemen who were summoned to serve upon grand juries in the country, where no such depreciatory sentiments were made. At present the persons summoned in London were small shopkeepers, and others to whom it was an honour to be placed even on a petty jury; but because they did not like the duties and the trouble it occasioned them, they were pleased to abuse the functions entrusted to them. The Bill proposed to give extraordinary power to the Crown. All cases within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court must be heard before a police magistrate or the Attorney General; but it must be remembered that the police magistrates in the metropolitan districts were the creatures of the Crown, and held their offices only during the pleasure of the Crown. He could only speak in terms of praise of the manner in which those gentlemen now performed their duties, but a time of great political excitement might come—a meeting collecting within a mile of Westminster Hall might be dispersed with bloodshed and violence; if they appealed to a stipendiary magistrate, he would lay it down that he was precluded by the statute of Charles II., and the sufferers would have no redress, as his decision under the Bill would be final, and there would be no grand juries to appeal to, as at present. It was not right that the people of the metropolis, and the representatives of the country at large, should be at the mercy of the stipendiary magistrate and the Attorney General, which they would be under the Bill. The inhabitants of the metropolis appeared somewhat disposed to imitate the rioters of Wales in their opposition to toll-gates, and a Rebecca outbreak might occur, obnoxious members might be assaulted, and upon application to a police magistrate for redress, it might be refused, and they could go no further. The hon. and learned Gentleman told them that one of the evils of the grand jury system was, that parties could go secretly before a grand jury, and obtain a warrant against other persons for the sole purpose of extorting money. The remedy for that evil was to make such persons give security for costs. There would always be an opportunity of tampering with witnesses under any system; but that might be avoided by a recurrence to the ancient system of appointing an examining officer. Another reason against the abolition of grand juries in the metropolis was, the fact that the City of London Judges were appointed by the Corporation; and it was not likely that a prisoner would consider he had fair play from a Judge appointed by, perhaps, the influence of the alderman who had sent his case for trial. He (Mr. M'Mahon) had no objection to the application of the principle of the Bill to minor and petty cases; but the result of passing it as it stood would be, to create a public prosecutor, an institution which he, for one, trusted never to see in this country, for then justice would be administered in England as it was on the Continent, and there would be an end to the liberty of the English people. The system of administering justice in England was as near perfection as it could be; and, as there was no way of mending the clause as it stood, he suggested that the hon. and learned Gentleman should withdraw it, at least until the Criminal Law Commission should have made its recommendation on the general subject. The Bill professed to exempt treason and misprision of treason; but, under the Treason Felony Act of 1848, the whole jurisdiction, in such cases, would be placed in the hands of the stipendiary magistrate, in consequence of that having made treason felony for the convenience of trial.

Mr. Ayrton

MR. W. WILLIAMS was of opinion that grand juries had afforded more protection to the liberties of the people than, perhaps, any one of our institutions. He did not believe that there was any general desire, on the part of the public, to put an end to the present system, and, at all events, a measure of this kind, if brought forward at all, ought to be introduced by the Government. He hoped the House would reject the Bill; and he, for one, would give it every opposition in his power as a metropolitan representative, as well as a representative for the whole country.

MR. COBBETT said, he looked upon this measure as only the small end of the wedge, which would be pushed much further. The intention must be to do away with grand juries altogether, which he should consider a fatal change in the constitution. If this were not the intention, where was the necessity for this Bill? The objections to grand juries in the metropolitan districts applied with even greater force to those beyond the metropolis. It was said that in London the police courts formed a preliminary tribunal, and supplied all that was necessary. The stipendiary magistrate was the younger institution of the two, and he saw no reason why they should not co-exist, as they had hitherto done; certainly he could see no reason why one should absorb the other. For his own part, however, he did not see the benefit of trying a man before a police magistrate and then sending him before a petty jury. It was, in his opinion, an objection to the police court, that the proceedings which took place there, were in the nature of a trial. One of the great advantages of the grand-jury system was, that the case was discussed in private, and came before the petty jury without being in the slightest degree prejudged, whereas the proceedings in the police court appeared in all the newspapers, opinions were formed and expressed respecting the case, and it could not fail to be, to a considerable extent, prejudged. Another objection, too, arose with regard to the police magistrates—namely, that they were created by the Home Secretary, and only existed at the will of the Home Secretary; they were, in fact, dependent on the Home Secretary for their continuance in office and their very bread; and he would remind the Committee that Mr. Arnold, one of the metropolitan magistrates, had only last year published a pamphlet complaining of this, and adducing instances in which the police magistrates do not feel themselves independent of the Home Office. The substitution of police magistrates for grand juries, therefore, did not afford that security which was required before the Crown could put a man on his trial for a criminal offence. Mr. Justice Willes had objected to the present Bill in a recent charge to the grand jury at Hertford, and expressed a hope that it would not pass. With regard to another point, he did not think that his hon. and learned Friend (Sir F. Thesiger) had at all made out his case, that grand juries in the metropolis acted as an obstruction to justice. It was said that their investigation involved a great waste of time. It should be remembered, that grand juries saved a good deal of time by throwing out bills which must otherwise be heard by the petty jury. His own experience as a criminal lawyer convinced him (Mr. Cobbett) that grand juries, so far from obstructing the course of justice by wasting time, expedited it by the number of bills which they threw out. Among the advantages which arose from the grand jury system was the amount of information which was circulated among country gentlemen during their attendance at the assizes and amongst the middle class at sessions of the peace. There were fifty-two counties in England and Wales. Twice in the year, in each county, the Judges in their charges to grand juries, consisting of the gentry of the county, gave in fact useful lectures on law, on recent changes of law, and on social questions of all kinds. The gentry, in their turn, lectured farmers and tradesmen from the bench at quarterly sessions, and taking six grand juries in each county, there could not be less than six thousand persons of these two important classes of the community who were bound to come and sit quietly and listen to these lectures every year. Every man went home a better informed man than when he came. Was there no advantage in an institution like this? But, this was not all; Judges and Governments learned something from grand juries. For years great efforts had been made to mitigate the severity of the criminal code of this country, but the Legislature remained unmoved, despite the efforts of Sir Samuel Romilly and others, until a petition from the grand jury of London (the very grand jury now proposed to be abolished) was presented by Mr. Brougham in 1830, which, stating that juries would not convict in the clearest cases in which the punishment of death was inflicted for comparatively trifling crimes, led to the abolition of that punishment in numberless cases, and brought about the change that others had vainly sought to obtain from Parliament. He trusted, under the circumstances, that the hon. and learned Member would withdraw his Bill for the present, and bring it forward again with any practicable amendments of the system, but preserving the principle; if he did not, he (Mr. Cobbett) should be compelled to vote against it.

Mr. Cobbett

MR. BAINES said, that, believing that the Bill was capable of being made safe and valuable by the aid of alterations which might be engrafted on it, he should not support any Motion the effect of which would be to throw it out altogether. It had been said that the Bill would subvert the whole grand jury system of England; but he did not believe that such a result would follow, and the hon. and learned Member, who had introduced the Bill, had himself stated that it was his desire to maintain the system throughout the country generally. As to the objection that the measure was opposed to principle, he thought that the whole question resolved itself into this—had such a strong case of public expediency been made out with regard to the metropolitan district as would justify them in passing the Bill, although it was to a certain extent an infringement of the ancient criminal law of the country. He (Mr. Baines) would not meddle with any institution without a strong legislative necessity; but when that necessity existed he could not withhold his support from remedial measures. The House had not long since given its assent to the Bill for the increase of summary jurisdiction in cases of larceny, and that Bill had been an improvement upon the old system, although it was a great innovation on the old system of criminal law. The real question was, whether this Bill was calculated to promote the salutary and effective administration of justice? If the Bill would prevent the escape of the guilty, which in a great many instances now occurred, and if it would prevent that danger to the innocent which was also of frequent occurrence, he thought that no one could doubt that the operation of the measure would be beneficial. It was said that Mr. Justice Willes had expressed an opinion unfavourable to this Bill; but that learned Judge had had little experience in the administration of criminal justice in the metropolitan district; and when he remembered what had been said upon this subject by the Criminal Law Commissioners, and by those who had had the best opportunity of watching the administration of criminal justice within the City of London, especially by the late Recorder (Mr. Stuart Wortley), who was no wanton innovator on the rights and privileges of the people, and than whom a more upright, honourable, and able judge never sat upon the bench, he came to the conclusion that some such measure as that now proposed ought to receive the sanction of Parliament. Under the circumstances he thought that the Committee should not reject the Bill, but that they should proceed with its consideration, and should endeavour to render it as efficient as possible.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, he felt bound to vote for the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk. It had been said that the opinion of Recorder after Recorder and Judge after Judge who had sat at the Central Criminal Court, was in favour of the abolition of grand juries there. That opinion, no doubt, was formed from what they had seen from time to time passing in the Central Criminal Court, but he imagined that those considerations, unconnected with the ordinary business of the Court, which, in the course of the present discussion, had been presented to the notice of the House, had not been brought under their attention, and that they had not regarded the question from an enlarged point, or weighed how far the abolition of the grand jury system would affect the liberty of the subject. The right hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down had not given the slightest reply to the objection of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Ayrton). The argument that the only remedy against an officer of the Crown would be removed by the abolition of the grand jury had not been answered. That was a grave consideration in connection with the Bill. He had also instanced a case where a person accused of a crime was discharged by a police magistrate, but subsequently the grand jury found a true bill, and he was tried and sentenced to a considerable term of imprisonment. Nor did he (Mr. John Locke) think that the clause providing against the abolition of grand juries in cases of treason and misprision of treason went far enough, for the interests of the Crown might come in collision with those of the subject in the most ordinary cases. He, therefore, maintained that the subject should retain the right of claiming that protection which he had hitherto enjoyed in the intervention of the grand jury.

MR. BRISCOE said, he had come to the consideration of this question perfectly unbiased, but having heard the arguments urged against the Bill, would vote in favour of the Amendment. The speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Stamford, and all the arguments in it, went to the abolition of grand juries generally. The hon. and learned Gentleman said the grand jury of London was unnecessary and obstructive, but then he had only proved his case by arguments which referred to grand juries generally.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL stated, that he was physically unable to say much, but he was extremely anxious to say that if the Bill had for one of its consequences the abolition of grand juries all over the country, as well as at the Central Criminal Court, he should feel bound to oppose it. But no part of the statement of the hon. and learned Member for Stamford warranted such an inference. The advantages of the grand jury system in the country were very great, particularly in bringing the gentry of the country into contact with the administration of justice; but the contrary was the case in the Metropolitan districts, owing to the different class from which Metropolitan grand juries were taken. He admitted that the Bill required Amendment, but he thought there could be no second opinion that public examination before a police magistrate would be far more advantageous to the prisoner, as well as to the public, than a private examination before a grand jury. Looking, therefore, at the principle involved in the Bill, he (the Solicitor General) considered it would be a serious evil if it was rejected in its present stage.

MR. HENLEY said, he had listened attentively to the arguments in favour of the Bill, but he had not heard any reasons assigned for making a distinction between the metropolis and the country with regard to the abolition of grand juries. Indeed, some of the arguments in favour of the measure told as strongly against the maintenance of grand juries in the country as in the metropolitan districts. For his own part, he did not think that because some abuses existed it was desirable to abolish an institution which was essentially beneficial. It had been said that grand juries might be dispensed with in a large town much more safely than in the country; but it must be remembered that the metropolis was parcelled out into districts which were under the jurisdiction of a small number of magistrates, and if grand juries were abolished, and for reasons of any kind these magistrates—to whom he did not intend to impute any corrupt or improper motives—should refuse to deal with cases submitted to them, there would be an absolute denial of justice. It was said that under such circumstances an application might be made to the Attorney General, but he did not think that in any case between the subject and the Crown it was likely recourse would be had to that official. As to the argument which had been drawn from the Summary Jurisdiction Bill, in favour of this measure, he must remind the Committee that that Act was voluntary, and not compulsory. The hon. and learned Gentleman opposite had said that grand juries in country districts were generally composed of country gentlemen, and he (Mr. Henley) was glad to find that that class—who did not usually get credit for having more wit than their neighbours—were so far at a premium; but he thought the great body of tradesmen in this metropolis were quite as fit to be trusted with the duties of grand jurors as any country gentleman. A London special jury was said to be the best tribunal before which a man could be tried, and who were they but the same class which composed the London grand jury. Besides, the cases which the magistrates had to decide were different from those decided by grand juries; for in the one case the magistrate had only to decide if there was evidence enough to warrant sending the accused for trial; whereas, the grand jury went a step farther, and decided if that evidence was sufficient to procure a conviction, and therefore one inconvenience which would result from the adoption of the Bill would be that in cases where magistrates were now accustomed to take bail on committal, they would be compelled to pursue inquiry much further, and defendants would be kept under remand for a considerable time before they were committed. It was further alleged that the Bill might be amended in Committee, but he could see on the paper no notice of any Amendment which would materially alter its main features. For these reasons, therefore, he felt it his duty to support the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk.

The Solicitor General

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 80; Noes 187: Majority 107.

MR. M'MAHON said, if the clause was allowed to stand as it was, no grand jury whatever could under any circumstances be assembled within the district of the Central Criminal Court, and he could conceive that under such an arrangement grave cases might occur in which there would be an entire failure of justice. In the case of a riot or some great public nuisance the magistrate before whom the charge was brought might refuse, on some ground or other, to commit; for instance, one alderman carrying on a naphtha manufactory in the City of London, might be complained of before another alderman carrying on a similar manufactory, and the result would be that there would be no satisfactory judicial inquiry into the matter at all. He thought it would be desirable that the clause should be amended so as to meet such cases by providing that a grand jury should be summoned at least once or twice a year within the district. As, however, the Committee could not then amend the clause, he should suggest that its consideration be postponed, with the view to such an Amendment being moved on the bringing up of the Report.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, the only argument urged in favour of the application of the Bill to the metropolis exclusively was the existence of the police magistrates; but it ought to be borne in mind that the whole of the metropolitan police districts were not under the control of the police magistrates. The grand jurors of London were a most intelligent body of men, and quite capable of coming to a just and fair, and right and discriminating decision upon any matters submitted to them in their capacity of grand jurors.

SIR FREDERIC THESIGER said, he must decline to postpone the consideration of the first clause in order to allow the hon. and learned Member for Wexford (Mr. M'Mahon), to introduce, at some future period, an Amendment which would violate the principle of the Bill. He did not think that such a retrospective proceeding would be a satisfactory manner of conducting their deliberations, and trusted that the Committee would adhere to the resolution which it had already pronounced by a large majority. The question which they were now called upon to determine was whether the first clause, which embodied the whole principle of the Bill, should stand part of the measure. He (Sir F. Thesiger) had been accused of having smuggled in the Bill; but he had no interest whatever in the measure; and in urging on the second reading at the unseemly hour to which the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets adverted, he had only availed himself of the sole opportunity afforded him, and done what any other private Member would have done. Should the Bill be passed into a law all parties would still have an opportunity of going before the grand jury of the Court of Queen's Bench—a fact which might remove many of the objections urged against the Bill. The Attorney General at the present moment, besides the power of filing ex officio informations, might enter a nolle prosequi, and prevent any prosecution. In the course of his own official existence he had occasion to enter a nolle prosequi upon an indictment under circumstances in which he thought there was an attempt to convert the criminal law into an engine of extortion, by keeping an indictment hanging over the head of the accused. It was not, therefore, such an unconstitutional course to say that, supposing a magistrate should refuse to entertain a complaint, and the parties should desire to have the matter investigated, they should have an opportunity of going before the Attorney General. In Ireland the Attorney General had the power of deciding whether accused persons should be sent to trial or not. Plausible and even unanswerable arguments could be advanced against any measure that might be proposed; but the question for the consideration of the Committee was whether the evils incident to the system of grand juries in the metropolis were greater than those which might be produced by his Bill. He did not believe that police magistrates, exercising their power in public, would exercise it corruptly on behalf of the Government. He should like to see them made entirely independent, by appointing them to their offices during good behaviour. Practically they were independent, because no Secretary of State would remove them while they honestly and satisfactorily performed their duties. The question was whether this clause should stand part of the Bill, and that question involved the principle in favour of which the Committee had decided by a large majority.

MR. AYRTON said, he had made no imputation of smuggling the Bill through the second reading against the hon. and learned Gentleman. All he wished to show was that no debate had taken place on the principle of the Bill. He would observe, however, that it was strange that the hon. and learned Gentleman should have complained of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Wexford (Mr. M'Mahon) making retrospective observations, and yet he himself immediately made observations of the same character, and, in fact, addressed himself to the principle of the measure. The question was properly raised, to what extent were they about to carry this destructive legislation? He thought the proposal of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Wexford was a most reasonable one; and if the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Stamford did not accede to it, he would continue his opposition to the measure on every clause and every word in the Bill. He was not disposed to pay much respect to a division in which twice as many hon. Members voted as were present during the debate, and he thought such a proceeding, although constitutional, added little to the dignity and character of the House. It was perfectly true that the Committee had affirmed by its vote that grand juries were to a certain extent to be abolished, and that the preamble of the Bill stated that it was desirable to dispense with the attendance of grand juries at the Central Criminal Court and at the courts of general and quarter sessions in the metropolitan police districts, except in particular cases. It was, however, a question of degree how far that legislation should be carried. The hon. and learned Gentleman said the groundwork of the Bill was that there were stipendiary magistrates in the metropolis who cautiously and carefully examined cases which were brought before them, and protected the interests of the people. What other inference could be drawn but that the gentlemen who acted as magistrates in this country could not be trusted to the same extent, and that they did not discharge their duties as well as the stipendiary magistrates in London? This was an indictment against the country magistrates, and those who wished to uphold the character of those gentlemen in the administration of justice were bound to vote against the Bill.

House resumed; Committee report progress; to sit again To-morrow.

LAMBETH ELECTION.

The Serjeant at Arms attending this House, informed the House that, pursuant to their Order of the 13th day of this instant July, he had taken Joseph Tredre into his custody.

Ordered, That the Serjeant at Arms do take the said Joseph Tredre to the Select Committee appointed to try and determine the matter of the petition, complaining of an undue election and return for the borough of Lambeth, when and so often as he shall be required by the said Committee so to do.

MAYO ELECTION—REPORT.

House informed, That the Committee had determined,—

That George Henry Moore, esquire, is not duly Elected a Knight of the Shire to serve in this present Parliament for the County of Mayo.

That the last Election for the said County, so far as regards the Return of the said George Henry Moore, esquire, is a void Election.

And the said Determinations were ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

BURY ST. EDMUND'S ELECTION.

REPORT.

House informed, That the Committee had determined,—

That Joseph Alfred Hardcastle, esquire, is duly Elected a Burgess to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Bury St. Edmund's.

And the said Determination was ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

Mr. Ayrton

THE AUSTRALIAN MAIL COMPANY.

QUESTION.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what is the number of steam vessels which the Post Office agreed with the European and Australian Mail Company should be placed on the line from Australia to Suez; was proper security taken by the Post Office before the line was opened that the proper number of vessels were placed on the station; did the number of vessels agreed upon provide against a contingency, or loss, or break down of one or more of the vessels?

MR. WILSON said, the contract between the Australian Mail Company and the Government provided that they should have at least six vessels engaged in the service, but they were bound to perform the service irrespective of this, and to have therefore in reserve a sufficient number of steamers to provide for breakdowns. The full number of packets was put upon the station in October last, but the Oncida, as the House was aware, broke down. The Government had called for the enforcement of the penalty for the non-performance of that voyage, but he felt bound to say, with regard to the rest of the service, that it had been performed entirely to the satisfaction of the Post Office, and that the arrivals had been within the time limited by the contract. Immediately on its being known that the Oncida had broken down, another steamer was despatched by the Company round the Cape of Good Hope. Everything, therefore, had been done which could be done by the company; and, on the other hand, the Government, as he had stated, had enforced the penalty under the terms of the contract for the non-performance of that particular voyage.

THE INDIAN MUTINY—QUESTION.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I wish to make several inquiries respecting the present state of affairs in India, and also to ask whether Her Majesty's Government will afford to the House a convenient opportunity to express some opinion upon this the most considerable event which has happened in India within the recollection probably of any of us. The House will bear in mind that nearly a fortnight ago, when the occurrence of these calamities was first notified, I addressed a question to the Government in the absence of the noble Lord. The main object I had in view in making this inquiry was, first of all, that we might know what measures the Government were about to take under these disastrous circumstances; and, secondly, that the House might obtain, if possible, some general idea of the Government of what they believed to be the cause of these calamities. The House upon that occasion was told that the Governor General had written home in great spirits, and we were allowed to infer that affairs were not of so serious a character as I fear it would be the greatest want of prudence on our part now to question. Since then we have had news of considerable importance, but it has been communicated to us only in outline by the electric telegraph. What I would wish to learn from the noble Lord is, first, whether the despatches which I suppose are in the possession of the Government will enable him to give more detailed and authentic information to the House as to the present position of affairs in India; and, secondly, whether he will assist the House by giving it the earliest possible opportunity of expressing its views upon the causes and probable consequences of the present state of affairs in India? The other night there were some observations made respecting the Indian Budget, which was expected shortly to be brought in, and I understood privately that there would be no objection to introducing it to our notice without loss of time. If Her Majesty's Government took that course it would afford a legitimate opportunity for the House dispassionately to discuss the present position of affairs in India. It would of course be open to me, or to any hon. Member, on going into Committee of Supply—on Thursday, for instance—to call the attention of the House to Indian affairs, but there are very important matters connected indirectly with those affairs which are already appointed for discussion on that day. The Persian and Chinese wars will be brought under our consideration on Thursday by the Votes to be proposed by the Minister, and it appears to me that it would be highly inconvenient to discuss indirectly the condition of matters in our Indian empire. I would ask then, first, whether the noble Lord will favour the House with what he believes to be the most authentic information that can be obtained on the exact position of affairs in India at the present time? I should be glad, in the second place, to hear from the noble Lord what are the steps which the Government, under the circumstances, are prepared to adopt; and, lastly, I would ask whether the noble Lord will permit the Indian Budget to be introduced to the notice of the House on Friday next, so that there may be afforded, upon the present serious condition of affairs, at least an opportunity for the expression of the opinion of the House of Commons?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Her Majesty's Government have received despatches the substance of which has been already communicated by electric telegraph from Marseilles, and I believe there are other despatches coming which will arrive by way of Southampton, and which may or may not convey further information. I should say, generally, that the despatches which have been received from Marseilles contain, only in more amplification and detail, the same information as to events in India, of which the substance was previously communicated by electric telegraph. Further, I should say, in general terms, that the intelligence which has reached the Government is not fuller than, and does not vary from, that which has been published through private sources in the ordinary channels of daily information. Her Majesty's Government, however, will, in redemption of the assurance which I gave yesterday, lay without delay upon the table of the House such portions of the correspondence now received, together with that received before, as may be sufficient to give the House the fullest information that we can afford with regard to the course of events. With respect to the question put by the right hon. Gentleman as to an opportunity for discussing these very important matters, it is, of course, exceedingly natural that there should be a desire on the part of leading Members of the House, like the right hon. Gentleman, to express their opinions upon the question; but I think that it would be desirable before doing so that they should first see the papers which I shall lay upon the table. When they are there, they may be considered to be either full or not full; but I think, at all events, that it would not be in accordance with the usual practice of Parliament to originate a discussion pending the production of papers which, perhaps to-morrow or the next day, may be laid upon the table of the House. With regard to bringing the subject on, therefore, upon Friday, I should think that the right hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members would find that they had not had the papers long enough in their hands to enable them to discuss the question satisfactorily on so early a day; but the Government have no wish to put off the discussion longer than is necessary to enable them to give full information on the subject, and when the papers are laid upon the table, which shall be without any loss of time, it will be for the right hon. Gentleman to fix a day for bringing the subject under the consideration of the House.

MR. DISRAELI: It is, I think, very important that we should have some general understanding from the noble Lord as to how far back the papers which he intends to lay upon the table will extend; because if they are to be confined to a mere narrative of events, which the noble Lord tells us we have already obtained accurately from other sources, their production will be of no great utility, and to defer the discussion on their account would only lead to an inconvenient delay at the present period of the Session. If, however, I understand from the noble Lord that we shall have despatches placed on the table which will give the House information as to the accounts which the Government received as to the state of India during the time that they were draining India of troops to send them to China or to Persia, I admit, at once, that they would be most important papers, without which we should be unable, probably, to form a fair opinion of the conduct of the Ministers; and I certainly should not wish to precipitate a discussion without those documents. But if I consent not to avail myself of the opportunity afforded by the forms of the House of bringing on the subject on the first supply night, it will be only on the understanding that we shall be put in possession of papers of a date so far back as to enable us to know what degree of information was in possession of the Ministry when they gave the counsels which led to the war with Persia, as well as to the recent revolt in India.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: We shall present such papers as we think best calculated to put the House in possession of the fullest information, and it will be for the right hon. Gentleman, when they are presented, if he does not think them full enough, to point out in what respects he considers them to be deficient.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: There is one point that I am more anxious about than any discussion that can take place. When my noble Friend was asked a question the other evening, he said that he would state what the Government were about to do in consequence of the intelligence which they had received. The statement which he made, however, was very general, and I am not surprised that it was so, as at that time only a telegraphic message had been received; but now that the Government are in receipt of the despatches, I confess that I am very anxious to hear a fuller and more specific statement upon that point. I hope that the reinforcements which will be sent to India will be sufficient, and I trust that the Government, when they have fully decided what they intend to do, will make a complete statement to the House of their intentions. Provided that the force to be sent out is adequate, I think that the House would not gather much more from a discussion than it would gain from such a statement as I have referred to.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The best answer, I think, that I can give to my noble Friend is this—that previous to the receipt of the despatches which arrived yesterday, Her Majesty's Government had made arrangements for sending, with the utmost promptitude, large reinforcements to India—in fact, that the reinforcements which they had determined to send were rather greater than Lord Canning stated to be essential and asked for. Of course, the House will not expect that I should enter into a detail of the regiments or their stations; but I may state generally, that, although the Government feel no apprehension or alarm as to the ultimate result of these unfortunate events, yet they feel it to be their duty to act as if there were real reason for alarm, and to leave nothing undone which is within the reach of administrative functions, in order to provide for any emergency that may happen, or might have happened, in India since the receipt of the last despatches.

SIR JOHN WALSH: There is one more question on this subject which I should wish to ask. Rumours are prevalent that for a considerable time past the late General Anson had made strong representations to the Government that danger was imminent in India, in consequence of disaffection in the Bengal army. I wish to ask whether the papers to be laid upon the table of the House will contain full extracts from the correspondence of General Anson upon that subject?

MR. MANGLES: If the House will permit me, perhaps I may be allowed, as the Chairman of the Board of Directors, to answer that question. When the same rumour was referred to on a former occasion I stated that I had never seen one single line on the subject in the shape of a warning in any official document from General Anson. The rumour, however, being so strong, and apparently so generally believed I made a more strict and special search at the India-house to-day, and I can now state positively, that we have not one single word of warning, or of notice, given by General Anson on the subject of the disaffection of the Bengal army.

Viscount Palmerston

MR. CHEETHAM: Perhaps the noble Lord at the head of the Government would inform us whether it is in his power to fix an early day for the renewal of the debate with respect to the productions of India, upon the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I am quite aware of the interest taken by the manufacturing districts in the question to which my hon. Friend alludes, and if I thought that in the present state of Indian affairs the debate could be confined to the production of cotton, I should be very willing to devote the morning of Tuesday next to the subject; but probably it would be better, under the circumstances, to postpone that matter for a little, until the debate to be raised by the right hon. Gentleman opposite on the general question shall have terminated.

SIR DE LACY EVANS: Although the reinforcements which the Government propose to send to India may exceed the number which the Governor General thought he should require, it is obvious, that the House of Commons, as well as the Government, has a duty to perform in this matter, and I should be glad if the noble Lord at the head of the Government could give us some definite idea of the time when the debate upon the general question may be expected.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: I think that it would have been more satisfactory to the House if an answer to the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Radnorshire (Sir J. Walsh) had been given by the Member of the Government who is responsible for the Indian Department in this House, instead of by the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Mangles). The question is a very important one.

MR. VERNON SMITH: My hon. Friend answered the question of the hon. Baronet the Member for Radnorshire, not as the Member for Guildford, but as Chairman of the Court of Directors of the East India Company. General Anson has had no communication with the Government, but with the Court of Directors, and if he had wished to point out any deficiency in the army of Bengal or elsewhere his course would have been, as a military member of the Council of India, to put a Minute upon record of his opinion. That Minute would have been taken notice of by the whole Council, including the Governor General, by whom it would have been transmitted home to the Court of Directors. No such Minute, so far as I am aware, ever was made by the late General Anson, nor do I know that he ever expressed any opinion with respect to the existence of disaffection in any portion of the Bengal army.

SIR JOHN WALSH said, that as some hon. Gentlemen near him were not satisfied that they had thoroughly understood the reply given to his question, he begged to ask whether any official communication whatever had been received by any department of Government from General Anson, calling attention to the existence of disaffection in the Bengal army?

MR. VERNON SMITH replied, that no such communication had been received.

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE asked whether any communication had been received from Sir W. Gomm on the subject?

MR. VERNON SMITH said, he believed not; but he was not at the Board of Control while that officer was Commander in Chief.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that while he was President of the Board of Control nothing of the kind was received.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES IN IRELAND. QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM VERNER said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland if the Bill for the regulation of Weights and Measures in Ireland, which was promised by the late Chief Secretary for Ireland, at the commencement of the Session, in a few days to be laid on the table of the House, is now ready, and when it may be expected to be presented to the House?

MR. H. A. HERBERT said, he was not aware that it had been contemplated to introduce a Bill for the exclusive object of regulating weights and measures in Ireland; but a Bill had been prepared, which he hoped to be able to lay on the table shortly, not with the view of passing it this Session, but for the purpose of circulation in Ireland, for the regulation of fairs and markets in Ireland. That Bill would contain a clause rendering the use of the imperial standard measure in all fairs and markets imperative.

SIR WILLIAM VERNER said, that that Bill had nothing to do with weights and measures.

CIVIL SERVICE.

RESOLUTION MOVED.

VISCOUNT GODERICH then rose to move the following Resolution:—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the experience acquired since the issuing of the Order in Council of the 21st day of May, 1855, is in favour of the adoption of the principle of competition as a condition of entrance to the Civil Service, and that the application of that principle ought to be extended in conformity with the Resolution of the House, agreed to on the 24th day of April, 1856."

He said, that the answer he had received a few days ago from the Chancellor of the Exchequer on this subject was so unsatisfactory that he had no alternative except to appeal from what appeared to be the present decision of the Government to the opinion of the House of Commons. He had observed with regret a material difference between the expectations raised by the Chancellor of the Exchequer at the end of last Session, and the course which appeared from the last Report of the Civil Service Commissioners to have been since followed by the Government on this subject. In July last the right hon. Gentleman, in stating his intention with regard to the system of admission to the Civil Service, divided the offices included in it into three classes. The first class contained officers in the position of tidewaiters, post-office messengers, and post-masters, and those who filled the lowest offices in the Civil Service of the Crown, to whose case, in the opinion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the system of competitive examination would be inapplicable. To save the time of the House, he did not on the present occasion intend to contest that opinion. The other classes into which the right hon. Gentleman divided the Civil Service were two in number—the one comprising those clerkships in the superior offices such as those of the Secretaries of State, who were appointed by the heads of their respective departments, and the other those in the Revenue Departments, the clerks in which were nominated by the Treasury; that was to say in theory by the First Lord, but in practice by the parliamentary secretary. With respect to the first of those two classes, the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated last July that it was the intention of the Government to extend to all those departments the system then followed in the colonial and some other offices, under which limited competition was introduced, and a certain number of persons nominated by the heads of departments competed together for the vacancies. Now, he had examined the last Report of the Civil Service Commissioners, and he found that instead of that system having been extended to all those offices, it had been adopted in only two departments of that description, which had not already adopted it in July last—namely, the Home Office and the Board of Works; and there was evidence in the Report to show that it had not been adopted in the Foreign Office, the Indian Board, the Board of Trade, the Admiralty, and the Exchequer. In the statement made the other night by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that right hon. Gentleman said that, though he individually approved of that mode of appointment, it was not the intention of the Government to lay down any general rule upon the subject, but that the matter would be left to the discretion of the heads of the different departments. With respect to the other class into which the right hon. Gentleman divided the Civil Service, his statement was still more unsatisfactory. In July the right hon. Gentleman told the House that he thought the mode of appointment to clerkships in the Revenue Departments required additional securities. Those were the right hon. Gentleman's precise words, and yet in the Report of the Civil Service Commissioners there was no evidence that any steps had been taken to afford such additional securities. He found that no change had been made in the mode of appointment to these offices, though the organ of the Government considered it capable of amendment, and when he addressed his question to the right hon. Gentleman the other night nothing was said on this point. Therefore an impression was left on his mind that, though the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman remained unchanged, it was not the intention of the Government to act in any way on that opinion. Under these circumstances he felt that, as there appeared to be no longer any hope of the promises held out last July being fulfilled, he had no alternative, if he did not wish to see this question retrograde, but to appeal from the decision of the Government to the opinion of the House of Commons. His object was to obtain from the House an expression of their approval of the competitive system as a mode of admission to the Civil Service, and he might almost be content to rest his Motion upon the facts which had been disclosed since this subject first engaged the notice of the public and of Parliament. In 1853, Sir Stafford Northcote and Sir Charles Trevelyan made a Report upon the reorganization of the Civil Service, which had since attracted very general attention. In consequence of that Report the Government of Lord Aberdeen introduced into the Speech from the Throne in 1854 a paragraph which clearly implied their intention to propose a Bill embodying the general principle which he (Lord Goderich) was now advocating; but owing to the war in which this country was then engaged, and the state of public affairs, such a measure was never laid upon the table. In 1855, however, the Order in Council was issued which at present regulated the mode of admission to the Civil Service. Reports had been presented by the very able Commissioners—Sir J. S. Lefevre and Sir E. Ryan—who were appointed to carry into effect the provisions of the Order in Council, which showed that those who objected to the previously existing system of appointment had had ample grounds for their opinions. The first of those Reports proved, upon the clearest evidence, that under the system formerly pursued a very large number of most incompetent persons had been admitted to the Civil Service, and that, although the questions put at the examinations were generally of the simplest description, one out of three of the persons nominated for appointments were rejected on account of the most ridiculous errors. He regretted that the second Report of the Commissioners, prepared when the new system had been in operation for two years, showed little improvement. The proportion between rejections and admissions remained the same, and persons nominated for appointments in the public service still spelt fingers “figures,” put only one n in the word government, and committed faults similar to those mentioned in the first Report. The evidence brought forward by the Commissioners went directly to sustain the proposal for an extension of the system of competition; and, indeed, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had admitted as much in the course of the speech he had delivered last July. The Civil Service Commissioners had since made a most interesting Report, which showed at once that the public were extremely ready to enter into the competitive system, and that the persons appointed under it were not less zealous in the discharge of their duties than those appointed under a different method. It used to be said that the advocates of the competitive system were mere theorists. But that argument could no longer be employed, for it was clearly proved in these blue-books that the competitive system, as far as it had been tried, had been attended with most satisfactory results. The fact was—and all experience proved it—that those who in early youth devoted themselves to study with an earnestness which ensured to them success in an intellectual competition were in the vast majority of cases persons on whose moral qualifications and zeal in the discharge of their duties reliance might safely be placed. He was prepared to rest his Motion on the facts he had already referred to, and to trespass no further on the House; but as the argument had been all on one side when the subject was formerly before them, he wished to refer to some objections which might possibly have weight in the minds of some hon. Members. He believed that he could show that the adoption of the system of competitive examination would be attended with many direct and indirect advantages. He conceived that the object of those who had the power of giving appointments in the public service ought to be to select the most fit persons to fill vacant situations. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had divided the offices in the Civil Service into two classes, and he (Lord Goderich) would apply the system of competition to both those classes. He would take first the class of clerkships in the superior offices. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said last year that the heads of departments exercised great care in making such appointments, and that it was their direct interest to select properly qualified persons; but he (Lord Goderich) doubted whether a Secretary of State, or the President of the Board of Control, or the heads of important departments, considering the duties of competing for vacant appointments in the Civil Service should rest with the heads of the departments in which the vacancies occur." Take the case of the revenue departments. Did his noble Friend mean that the right to nominate should be vested, as it was now, in the Secretary of the Treasury, or did he mean to vest it in the Chairman of the Board of Customs and the Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue? This point ought to be made clear. If the choice lay between nomination by permanent officers like the Chairman of those two boards and nomination by the Secretary of the Treasury, he (Viscount Goderich) would frankly admit that he thought it preferable that those nominations should be placed in the hands of the permanent heads of departments. But that arrangement would involve the introduction of a perfectly novel principle; and the noble Lord ought distinctly to show how he intended to carry it out. The Amendment would tie the hands of the Government more than his Motion, and in a much more objectionable manner. Having obtained a majority on this question in the last Parliament, he now appealed to the new Parliament because he could not help feeling that Her Majesty's Government had not fulfilled the hopes which they held out last year, but had retrograded, instead of going forward. Hon. Gentlemen were fresh from their constituents, by whom they must be aware that this subject was regarded with great interest; and he had the utmost confidence that he should that night receive their support. He did hope, however, that there would be no need to test the opinion of the House. Considering the moderate terms of the Motion which he was about to make, he entertained hopes that Her Majesty's Government would be induced to yield him their support; and it would give the greatest satisfaction to those who were interested in the subject if they thus showed—what, indeed, was all that any one had a right to expect—that they were anxious to extend the application of the competitive principle. He, for one, should deeply rejoice if the Government followed that course; but so much interest did he feel in the question, that if, unfortunately, they should be led to oppose the Motion, he should then feel it his duty to take the sense of the House. He should, therefore, conclude by moving—

Mr. H. A. Herbert

"That, in the opinion of this House, the experience acquired since the issuing of the Order in Council of the 21st day of May, 1855, is in favour of the adoption of the principle of competition as a condition of entrance to the Civil Service, and that the application of that principle ought to be extended in conformity with the Resolution of the House, agreed to on the 24th day of April, 1856."

MR. BYNG seconded the Motion.

VISCOUNT RAYNHAM said, that he could assure his noble Friend that he was fully as anxious as himself to take the competitive system as the guiding principle which should govern the admission to employments in the Civil Service. While, however, he agreed to a considerable extent with what had fallen from the noble Lord who had just sat down, still he thought that he had made an omission in his Resolution, and that it was desirable to add to it a few words expressive of their opinion that open competition was not altogether expedient. In reference to that point, he would endeavour briefly to answer the observations which the noble Lord had made with so much ability. In the first place, the noble Lord had said that it was almost impossible for the heads of any department of the Government to make very searching inquiries into the characters of the persons nominated. Now, he differed from him in that respect, because he considered that the heads of departments really were responsible for the character of persons whom they placed in official situations. It was true that it was desirable that there should be as little Parliamentary influence as possible in making these appointments, and that proposition formed one of the principal arguments in favour of competitive examinations. The House would agree with him that talent and ability, however desirable in a public servant, were not all the qualities that were required; it was necessary that the character of the person seeking to fill an office should be unimpeachable, and some guarantees ought be given that the candidate was in all respects an eligible person to be appointed to the Civil Service of the Crown. His noble Friend had inquired whether it would not be better if these examinations were placed in the hands of permanent officers of the Inland Revenue Department. He should be very sorry to see such a course adopted, because, while he admitted that the use of Parliamentary influence in the obtaining of such appointments should be discouraged as much as possible, yet there were so many serious objections in his view to unrestricted and open competition, that he thought it best to continue the power of appointment in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury. He considered that a very important principle was involved in the Motion, and although he did not object to its general terms in favour of competitive examination, he thought it better to add that it was not desirable that all appointments should be subject to competitive examination; and he should accordingly move to add at the end of the noble Lord's Motion the words—

Viscount Goderich

“And that it is desirable that the nomination of all persons desirous of competing for vacant appointments in the Civil Service should rest with the heads of the departments in which those vacancies occur.”

The Amendment was put, but fell to the ground for want of a Seconder.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER:—Any hon. Member who has listened to the perspicuous speech of the noble Lord the Member for the West Riding (Viscount Goderich), merely might have been induced to suppose that his Motion proposed to introduce some great and fundamental novelty in the mode of admission to the Civil Service. Now, I must be permitted to say, that a principle, not fundamentally new, but, nevertheless, of considerable importance, and in its extension and application novel, was introduced by the Order in Council cited by my noble Friend. Prior to that Order in Council, there was no test, except in a few cases, for ascertaining the fitness of candidates for the Civil Service; and in those cases in which a test existed, it was applied, not by any independent authority, but under the direction of Heads of Departments, who might be supposed to have some interest in finding that their nominee was qualified. By that Order in Council, a principle was established—that every candidate should undergo an examination into his fitness by an examination, not conducted by the Heads of Departments, but by independent Commissioners. This was a very important principle to adopt in regard to the Civil Service. Since that time, it has been proposed to set aside that Order in Council, to allow all persons to offer themselves as candidates, and to declare that there shall be perfectly free and open competition. Against that principle I have consistently contended, and I still entertain the objections I have before expressed in this House to that principle of perfectly open competition. But I have also stated that, consistently with the plan introduced by the Order in Council, a fair compromise might be made with the principle of open competition, by adopting, with respect to certain portions of the Civil Service, the principle of limited competition. By this plan the Heads of Departments or the First Lord of the Treasury would name a select number of persons who should enter into competition with one another for the vacant office. I stated last year that such a plan appeared to me to be well adapted to the chief departments of the Government, to the Treasury, the Secretaries of State's offices, and the other departments of that kind. With regard to a very large number of these departments, the principle has been already acted upon. So far, therefore, my noble Friend and myself were agreed at the end of last Session. I also stated that there was a large number of officers under the Crown who discharge duties that do not require a liberal education—duties, for example, of mere watch and ward—and that for duties which were little more than mechanical, it would be altogether absurd to demand the test of a literary examination. Of this kind were such posts as those of boatmen of the Customs, messengers, and village postmasters, with regard to whom there can be nothing like a general competition; it is necessary that a postmaster should have a house conveniently situate, and the number of competitors is, therefore, limited by conditions entirely different from literary examination. I think that my noble Friend, both in an address which he made in the Session before Easter and in what he has said this evening, has assented generally to the views I expressed with regard to that class of officers. The chief difference between us was as to that intermediate class of clerks and others who were said to require a liberal education in those departments in which the Treasury has the patronage. I stated last year, and I repeat it now, that I think it peculiarly desirable that the principle of limited competition should, wherever it is possible, apply to that class, inasmuch as these appointments are not made by the person who has an interest in the selection of efficient persons, which is the case where the Heads of the Department have the nomination; and whatever my noble Friend may say about the impossibility of the Heads of Departments making an examination, I think that, generally speaking, the Head of a Department will take care that the persons he appoints shall be able efficiently to discharge their duties. I think that under these circumstances the margin of practical difference between my noble Friend and myself is not very wide. I will ask my noble Friend to follow me in the statement I will now make with respect to those departments into which the plan of limited competition has been adopted as a condition for entrance. The principle has been applied to the following offices in England—namely, the Audit Office, the Board of Trade, the Civil Service Commission, the Colonial Office, the Education Department, the Home Office, and recently to the Customs and Inland Revenue Departments. I wish particularly to call the attention of my noble Friend to the circumstance, that it is the determination of my noble Friend at the head of the Government to introduce—I will not say as an invariable but as a general rule—the principle of limited competition in the case of the higher class of officers, as for example, landing waiters and gaugers in the two last-mentioned departments. Now, that I conceive to be an important statement with reference to the Resolution under our consideration, and to the speech by which it was introduced, in which my noble Friend asserted that no advance had of late been made by the Government in carrying out the principle of which he is the advocate. [Viscount GODERICH: When was the principle applied to those departments?] Recently. I may add that it has been further extended in England to the National Debt Office, the Office of Woods, the Office of Works, the Police Court, Bow Street, the Poor Law Board, the Treasury, and the War Office; while in Scotland it has been applied to the office of the Registrar General, and in Ireland to the Chief Secretary's Office, the Constabulary Office, the Loan Fund Office, the Lunatic Asylums Inspector's Office, the Public Metropolitan Police Office, the Receiver of Police Office, and to the Offices of Registrar General and Director of Prisons. To all these offices has the principle of limited competition been applied, and I may add that it will for the future be, as a general rule, extended to all those departments which are dependent upon the Treasury. I shall not speak of its extension to such a department as that of the Ecclesiastical Commission, inasmuch as, in my opinion, that cannot be regarded as a department connected with the general government of the country, and as its exemption from the operation of the principle cannot upon that account fairly be considered as a departure from the rule on which I have stated it to be, the disposition of the Government as far as possible to act. I may also state that it is the intention of my noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs to extend the system of limited competition, to the admission to clerkships in that department. I may further state that the only departments into which, so far as I am aware, the principle has not as yet been introduced, are the Admiralty, the Post Office, and the India Board. My noble Friend has called the attention of the House to a particular department,—I allude to the Exchequer Office, for the management of which I am supposed—but erroneously—to be personally responsible, and has observed that to that department the principle of competitive examination has not been applied. Now, I was not aware, until I instituted an inquiry into the matter, that a vacancy in that department was recently filled up, irrespective of all competition, upon the recommendation of the noble Lord who, as Controller, is at its head; and I can only repeat the assurance that the department is one for the management of which I am not personally responsible. Passing from that point, however, I feel confident that the House will agree with me in the opinion that the Government have not been standing still in relation to this subject, but that they have, upon the contrary, carried out, to a considerable extent, that principle of which the noble Lord is the advocate, and of which I, in the course of last Session, expressed my entire approval. But although I concur with my noble Friend as to the beneficial results which are likely to flow from the adoption of a system of competitive examination as a test of the efficiency of a candidate for the Civil Service, there are, I am bound to confess, no inconsiderable difficulties lying in the way of its general application. One of those difficulties consists in the circumstance that it is by no means easy to bring the candidates to one particular spot for the purpose of competition. If, for instance, you lay it down as a rule that all these examinations must be held in London, in Dublin, or in Edinburgh, it has been contended, and I confess with great show of reason, that you afford to persons living in one of those localities an advantage over those who reside in distant parts of the country. That such must be the case I think will be perfectly evident, if you consider for a moment that, inasmuch as the salaries attached to some of the clerkships, for which competition may take place, commence at a sum of only £80 per annum, you, by fixing upon London, for instance, as the place of examination, practically preclude a young man living 200 or 300 miles from the metropolis from undergoing the expense which travelling over that distance, as well as spending a few days here, would entail, in order to become a candidate at one of those examinations. The consequence would be that an undue advantage, amounting almost to a monopoly, would be given to those young men who happened to live in the neighbourhood of the place at which the examination might be held. I may, however, be told that it is quite possible to hold competitive examinations by sending the questions put at a particular place to different persons in different parts of the country, to be put by them to those who wish to offer themselves as candidates for the Civil Service. There would, I think, be found to be great difficulty in taking that course, and I am sure the House will concur with me in the opinion that it is no easy matter to lay down any inflexible rule upon the subject. Another obstacle to the adoption of any such rule consists in the circumstance that, whereas persons of different ages may compete at these examinations, they who are more advanced in years than their fellow-candidates will, ceteris paribus, possess an advantage which the latter will not enjoy, notwithstanding that the ability and general fitness for the public service of the younger candidates may be a thing beyond all doubt. At the Universities and at all our great public schools there is an equality of age among those who compete for honours, which leads to no such inconvenience as that to which I have just adverted; but in these examinations for the Civil Service no such equality would exist, and the consequence would be that the person who happened to be by three or four years the senior of another would have an advantage to which, so far as ability is concerned, he might not be at all entitled. These two difficulties, then, render it, in my opinion, inexpedient that this House should lay down any precise formula upon this subject of competitive examinations. I would, therefore, put it to my noble Friend—unless, indeed, he distrusts the assurances of the Government in this matter, and is dissatisfied with the explanation which I have just given—whether he would not act wisely in not calling upon the House to assent to the terms of the Resolution which he has proposed. That Resolution is very general in its terms. It calls upon the House to adopt the principle of competition as a condition of entrance into the Civil Service. Now, my noble Friend himself does not contend that all candidates for the Civil Service should be admitted upon the principle of competition. I do not think that with respect to a village postmaster, in whose case the position of his residence and his personal trustworthiness must constitute material elements for consideration, my noble Friend will maintain that a competitive examination upon the principle of testing the literary qualifications of the candidate would be desirable. Being of opinion, therefore, that the terms of the Resolution are wider than any to which we should be justified in assenting, and that it may lead to inconvenient consequences if passed by a vote of this House, I trust my noble Friend will not deem it to be his duty to press it upon the House for its acceptance.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Mr. G. A. HAMILTON said, he begged to be allowed to address a few words to the House with respect to the influence of the principle of competition on the cause of education in Ireland. The question of education in Ireland had been for many years a most difficult and delicate subject, probably from the circumstance that the education of the lower orders in Ireland had been too much pressed forward. But however diverse might be the opinions of hon. Gentlemen upon that point, he never heard a second opinion with reference to the necessity of some stimulus to the education of the people immediately above the lower orders in Ireland, and he looked upon the establishment of this system of competition for public offices as one which was likely to be extremely beneficial. Dr. Gray, Mr. Galbraith, and Mr. Horton, the distinguished and able men to whom the noble Lord had referred in the course of his speech, the leaders of the movement in the University of Dublin, had applied themselves with extraordinary diligence, energy, and assiduity, to the encouragement of education in Ireland; and with reference to the effect of the competitive system their statements were most satisfactory. He had himself observed with gratification that in the various competitions for the public service his countrymen had occupied a distinguished place; and it was acknowledged that a large number of them had turned out successful candidates. It was a mistake to suppose that the effect of the system had been to encourage the practice of cramming, for it had been stated to him by Mr. Galbraith and Mr. Horton that in several instances gentlemen had been chosen for their general knowledge; while, on the contrary, several candidates who had got up particular subjects had failed in obtaining good places, thus showing that a really good education was the best mode of ensuring success. He considered, therefore, that considering the evident desire which existed among the youth of Ireland to compete for the public service, such a Resolution as that of the noble Lord was calculated to produce the most important effects on that country as regarded general education. The gentleman to whom he had referred also stated to him that it was most important that the examiner, whoever he might be, should have the public confidence, and that it was essential for that purpose that the examination papers should be published in order to afford the public an opportunity of inspecting them. With regard to the proposition itself, he understood by it that the Government were not to be stringently bound, but that it was, if adopted by the House, to be considered rather as an intimation of the course they considered it desirable that the Government should pursue. He felt persuaded that if the noble Lord at the head of the Government concurred in the views now advanced, the necessary steps would be taken to apply the system of competition to all cases which fairly admitted of it; and if the principle were admitted, he saw no objection to a Resolution of this kind. Indeed, he should have thought that the Government would have supported it. He, therefore, trusted that the House would, by passing the Resolution, impose upon the Government a duty which he hoped the Government would have no disinclination to observe.

Mr. J. EWART said, that as far as he was concerned he had never asked, and never would ask, the Secretary of the Treasury for a single place for any one. When his constituents sent an application to him, he felt it to be his duty to send it to the Secretary of the Treasury; but he hoped that the time would arrive when no hon. Member of that House could under any pretence obtain from the Secretary of the Treasury or any one else any appointment whatever, but that all places would be filled up in consideration of qualification alone.

Mr. G. A. Hamilton

MR. ADAMS said, he should cordially support the Resolution of the noble Lord, and hoped he would take the sense of the House upon it, because there was certainly some distinction to be drawn between the view of the noble Lord and that of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The difference was this: the noble Lord would throw open the door of competition to all who might deem themselves fit to enter into that competition, and desired that offices should be filled by the best men, without regard to politics as a qualification. The right hon. Gentleman, on the other hand, said he was in favour of a limited competition—that a certain number of candidates should be selected, and that the competition should be confined to those ten or twelve persons. But, who was to have the selection of these ten or a dozen candidates? Why, the same parties, for the most part, as at present. Suppose that a vacancy in a Government appointment in any particular borough occurred, it was quite impossible that the Secretary to the Treasury or Head of the Department should know anything of the qualification of a candidate; he therefore referred to the hon. Member for the place sitting upon that (the Government) side of the House. The hon. Member might possibly have some little knowledge of the candidate. However, a fresh delegation of the power of selection took place. Reference was made to a political agent, who finally selected the son, or brother, or cousin of one of his most active and influential political friends. Of this person the agent perhaps knew little, and the Secretary of State still less. There seemed no reason why a political leaning should not equally prevail under the system proposed by the right hon. Gentleman as under that prevailing at present. He could not see, therefore, that the principle of limited competition advocated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be any very considerable improvement upon the present practice; while he could as little see that there was anything impracticable in the Resolution of the noble Lord, which did not lay down the principle that under no circumstances should an appointment be made except upon competitive examination, but simply called upon the House to affirm the principle that the system of open competition should be employed whenever it could properly and practically be done. Only two objections had been brought against the principle of open competition. One was the distance of London from many places where vacancies occurred, and from the residence of many of the candidates. Another was, that an unfair advantage would be given to those who were of more mature age than many who might present themselves. The first he (Mr. Adams) thought was not a very strong objection in these days of locomotion and cheap travelling. Besides, considering the spread of mechanics' institutes, he would never believe that the means would be wanting to a youth of promising ability to make a journey to London to be examined. As to the question of difference of ages, he did not think the example cited by the right hon. Gentleman was a happy one. At the University all the men might be considered to be at school together; and men of two years' standing would have an advantage over those of only one. But in a general examination it would be otherwise; and young men who had just left school would be very far more fit for a competitive examination than those who had left for several years. In such a case the youngest men would probably succeed best. But it was not merely that a system of competition would give the Government the service of the best men—it would give a greater encouragement to serious study and a more urgent stimulus to the spread of sound knowledge than all the Acts of Parliament ever passed, or than all the societies, whether of arts or for other purposes, which had been established by private benevolence. Often when he (Mr. Adams) had been addressing working men at mechanics' institutes and such places, he had been met with the exclamation, "What is the good of this knowledge to me? I have quite enough already for my business of a carpenter," and so forth. More would be gained by letting these men know that real practical advantage was to be gained from study than by all the lectures in the world. It was with the utmost possible pleasure that he supported the Resolution of the noble Lord, and he hoped that, in order to test the sincerity of the Government and the sincerity of the House, he would press his Motion to a division.

MR. CLAY said, that he would go nearly the whole length of the hon. Member who had just sat down, as an advocate for a system of open competition. That, however, was not the object of his noble Friend's Motion, and the difference between his noble Friend and the right hon. Gentleman was so slight that he confessed it had escaped his observation. His principal motive for rising, however, was because he objected to anything being painted blacker than it really was, and, consequently, to express his opinion that the present system of filling up the lower places in the Civil Service was not so bad as it had been represented to be by the hon. Member (Mr. Adams)—a fact which, he was sure, the hon. Gentleman would himself admit, when he had had a little more experience in these matters. It was true that the system of nomination by Members of Parliament was a most annoying one, and, so far from increasing, diminished the influence of hon. Members, because for every applicant who obtained an appointment, there were necessarily hundreds who were disappointed; but he did not see how it could be superseded, except by open competition. The members of the Government could know nothing of the persons who applied for appointments in different boroughs, but the hon. Members for those places were not equally ignorant of their qualifications, nor was it at all necessary that they should delegate the nomination to their political agents to be used for political purposes. He (Mr. Clay) did not profess himself to be more honest or better than his neighbours; but in the majority of cases in which he recommended persons to appointments he was acquainted with them, and considered himself responsible for them. Where he had no such knowledge he did not consult his political agent; he consulted gentlemen of the town which he represented, whom he believed would not deceive him; and this he did so impartially that he scarcely recollected making an appointment the candidate for which was not recommended by some of his political opponents as well as by his political friends. The nominations to situations in the Post Office had recently been withdrawn from Members of Parliament and given to the resident postmasters. While he rejoiced at this as relieving him from a great deal of trouble, he did not think that the new plan was at all superior to the old one. So long as the appointments in the Post Office were given through Members of Parliament, he made a point of consulting the postmaster before making a recommendation, and generally induced him to give a short trial to the person whom he intended to recommend to the Treasury. The postmaster of the borough which he represented (Hull) was one of the strongest Tories in the place, and though a personal, by no means a political friend of his. He trusted, therefore, that the hon. Member would in future look upon the House of Commons as less impure than at present he appeared to consider it.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I quite agree with my hon. Friend who spoke last, that the difference between my noble Friend who made this Motion and the Government is exceedingly small. Indeed, it is so small, that I hardly think it worth while to give the House the trouble of dividing upon the question. I accept the Motion of my noble Friend, however, according to his own interpretation of it, and not according to the interpretations which have been put upon it by other hon. Members. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Adams) is, in fact, though he does not say so in so many words, for the universal application of a system of general competition—that is to say, he desires that every vacant appointment under Government should be advertised, and that whoever knocks at the door and claims to be examined, should be examined for the appointment which he desires to obtain. We have often been told in this House, that Government ought to shape its course according to the example of private individuals, of merchants, of shipowners, and of railway and other great companies. Now, I have yet to learn that merchants, bankers, railway companies, or any other private associations fill up their appointments in the manner thus recommended. I may be misinformed, but I apprehend that they look out for persons who are not only qualified by their talents and attainments for the situation which they are to fill, but whom, from their position and connections, they may think trustworthy and fitted for the discharge of its duties. My hon. Friend who spoke last has clearly explained how the recommendations of Members of Parliament, to which a certain responsibility attaches, may be accepted as evidence of the respectability of the position and connections of persons who may be candidates for examination; but the House must run away with the notion, that all these appointments are invariably given upon the recommendations of Members of this House. The Government are open to applications from any other persons in respectable situations in life, who may, upon their responsibility, recommend persons as candidates for appointments. I so far concur with my noble Friend, as to think that the principle of competition is better than that of direct and single examination. All human efforts are liable to failure and to defects, and it is quite certain that the principle of competition does not always give you the man who is best fitted for the vacant situation, because there are qualities of character, of habits, and of temperament of mind, which cannot be tested by an examination as to mental attainments only. At the same time there is this to be said, that a young man, who, at the time of life at which candidates present themselves for clerkships, does not possess the knowledge required according to the prescribed plan of education, must be deficient either in natural capacity or in power of mind and application, and in neither case would he be a fit person to hold an appointment under Government. A system of competitive examination does bring out the character of young men, the presence of mind, and the power of application in a short space of time, better than the process of individual and separate examination. On that ground I have adopted in the Treasury, and I have recommended in other departments, a system by which, when an appointment is vacant, instead of nominating one individual, a number of young men are nominated, and the best out of that number is appointed to the vacancy. I think the system of examination has been attended with great advantage to the public service. In former times, for want of such a system, a great many young men were appointed, against whom there was no presumption of incapacity, nor any ground for supposing that they would be incapable of filling higher appointments when it came to their turn, but who, nevertheless, either by deficiency of natural ability or want of power of application, did not come up to the mark, and the consequence was, that the higher appointments in the public offices were filled by persons who, if there had been any choice in the matter, would not, perhaps, have been placed in situations of such responsibility, and where so much was required from them. I, therefore, augur well for the public interest from the establishment of this system. I certainly concur with my noble Friend, in thinking that the principle of running a number of young men one against the other, and seeing who wins the race, is much better than the walk-over of a single candidate. Upon these grounds, and taking the Motion of the noble Lord upon his own showing, I am not prepared to negative it. Had it not been for the explanation of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which showed to how great a degree this principle has been adopted by the Government, it must have been supposed that this was an attempt on the part of the House of Commons to force on the Government a system to which they were averse. But the explanation of my right hon. Friend proves that we quite go along with my noble Friend in approving the system which his Resolution lays down; and the Resolution, therefore, of my noble Friend will have the effect of strengthening the hands of the Government, and will enable us with a better face to carry out a system of which some persons might otherwise very loudly complain. I trust that it will have the effect of strengthening the hands of the Government, and that, at all events, it will satisfy those who are unsuccessful in the race that the Government are only acting on a system which is founded on a regard for the public interest, and that they are going along with the House of Commons in working out a principle which will enable the Government to obtain the best men for the public service.

Mr. Clay

VISCOUNT GODERICH said, there had been such an unanimous feeling in favour of his Motion that he only rose to express his best thanks to the Government for the course which they had taken with regard to his Motion. That course was most creditable to the Government. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had detailed to the House what the Government had already done in this matter, and he admitted readily that since he had last brought this subject before the House, a few months ago, the Government had taken several most important steps. The Revenue Department and the Foreign Office had both, to a certain extent, been thrown open to public competition, and there only remained the India Board and the Admiralty in which the principle had not been put into practice, but after the speech of the noble Lord at the head of the Government accepting his Motion, he could not doubt that the principle would soon be universally adopted. Of course he had not meant by his Motion that every appointment in the public service should be made on this principle, nor did he understand the hon. Gentleman the Member for Boston (Mr. Adams) to have maintained such an absurdity in his able and striking speech. The principle embodied in the Motion being in conformity with the ideas of the Government, he had only to say, that when he laid the Motion before the House he had no means of knowing the steps which had been taken by the Government—some of them, he believed, since he had placed his notice on the paper. The unanimity with which his Motion had been received must be a source of the greatest gratification to everybody interested in the subject.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the experience acquired since the issuing of the Order in Council of the 21st day of May, 1855, is in favour of the adoption of the principle of competition as a condition of entrance to the Civil Service, and that the application of that principle ought to be extended, in conformity with the Resolution of the House, agreed to on the 24th day of April, 1856.

PRIVATEERING.

PAPERS MOVED FOR.

MR. LINDSAY said, he rose to move an Address for copies of Mr. Marcy's letter to the French Government, in answer to the communication of the Resolution of the Paris Conference upon the subject of privateering; and of any other papers or correspondence that may have passed between the British Government and other Powers upon the same subject. Those papers related to a subject of some importance to England as a maritime nation. Certain Resolutions had been agreed to at the Conferences of Paris relating to the question of neutral rights and privateers. When these Resolutions were brought before the American Government they had readily consented to the majority, but had refused to give in their adhesion to that proposition which dealt with the rights of privateers, as it would be a surrender on their part of a strong arm of defence and aggression. He asked for papers with the view of putting hon. Members in possession of information on this subject; for the House would sooner or later be called on to decide whether we should stand by our present declaration or adopt the American view—that private property should be as much respected at sea as it was on shore. That was the question at issue; and he hoped to be able to bring it before the House in the course of another Session. In a state of war this country could not stand by the declaration which it had made. We must go forward having done so much, for at present a neutral flag covered neutral goods, except contraband of war. We had five million tons floating in ships, our exports were 100 millions, and our imports nearly the same; and therefore the question was of far more importance to us than to any other country. What would be the consequence if we were engaged in a war with America or France? The premium to marine assurances on ships not under convoy would be increased 10 per cent. For ships under convoy there would be 5 per cent war risk on British ships; and then the British merchant, whatever might be his patriotism, would not ship in British bottoms. What would then become of our five million tons of shipping? Why, they would remain locked up in port during time of war. The House should consider the position in which they stood, and it was for that reason he asked for the papers, in order that hon. Members might become thoroughly acquainted with the subject. All that he asked was, that Government should lay the papers on the table, and if he should be successful, he would then make a substantive Motion calculated to elicit the opinion of the House.

The Motion was seconded by Mr. C. GILPIN.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, copies of Mr. Marcy's Letter to the French Government, in answer to the communication of the Resolution of the Paris Conference upon the subject of Privateering:

And, of any other Papers or Correspondence that may have passed between the British Government and other Powers upon the same subject."

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I am sure that my hon. Friend and the House will feel that it is not usual to ask, and that it is not competent under ordinary circumstances for the British Government to grant the production of papers which have formed the subject of correspondence between two other foreign States. We have no right to lay before Parliament communications between the Government of America and that of France, or any correspondence which may have ensued thereupon. But, in point of fact, we are not officially in possession of that letter of Mr. Marcy's to the French Government. The document is one which does not exist in the Foreign Office in such a shape that it could be laid before Parliament, even with the consent of the French Government. But that is a mere technical objection. I apprehend what my hon. Friend means is, that we should lay before Parliament any correspondence between the British Government and the American and French Governments on this subject. Sir, what happened was, that the Resolutions of the Paris Congress were communicated by the parties to them to all the other maritime States, and amongst others to the United States. The Government of the United States gave to the French Government an answer exactly in the terms stated by my hon. Friend; that is to say, they were willing to agree to those propositions, including the cessation of privateering, provided that private property at sea should no longer be subject to capture. That communication was made by the last Government of the United States, and the matter was one which everybody will see was a subject which required the gravest and most deliberate consideration on the part of the British Government; as, whatever might be the opinions at the first blush, one way or other, no one could fail to see on reflection that the question is one deeply affecting all the great interests of the country, commercial, political, and naval; and it was clear that no answer could be given to such a communication without long and mature consideration. But in the meantime a change took place in the Government of the United States, and before any answer was sent by the British Government to America the new President came into office, and an intimation was made that the American Government did not wish that any answer should be sent to the proposition of their predecessors, and that, in point of fact, they wished to consider that communication as suspended, and the negotiation not going on. Under these circumstances, I trust that my hon. Friend and the House will feel that it is not desirable to lay before Parliament this communication. In this state of things I certainly shall not enter into any examination of the reasons for or against the proposition made by the Government of the United States; but there is one branch of the subject upon which I wish to make one qualified remark. My hon. Friend considers the question to be simply whether the practice which prevails with respect to hostilities by land should or should not be applied to hostilities at sea. If hon. Gentlemen will consider a little the historical facts as to what has been the practice pursued in war upon land, they will see that there is no very decided and absolute rule as to that matter, but that the practice has varied very much from time to time in different countries in respect to the manner in which armies have treated the property of individuals in a hostile country. It is difficult at once to apply to private property on the sea the same rule which has applied to property on land. I am sure, however, the House will feel that this is not a question which can be discussed incidentally on a Motion of this sort, when the negotiations are suspended between the two Governments at the express wish of the Government of the United States; and I trust that my hon. Friend, after the explanation I have given, will not press his Motion, part of which could not be agreed to, as there are not the materials, and the other part of which it would be inexpedient to assent to, as it relates to negotiations not only pending, but suspended, at the wish of the Government who took the initiative steps.

Mr. Lindsay

MR. BENTINCK said, that the subject was one of paramount importance, and he regretted that the noble Lord had not adverted to the important points raised by the hon. Member for Tynemouth, and more especially as to the intentions of the Government with regard to the maintenance of the declaration if this country were involved in a war with one of the great Powers of Europe. It was impossible to advance with regard to this declaration. It was a solemn farce, and moreover dishonest on the part of this country to make a declaration which it would be impossible to carry out. We must recede at any cost, even at that of the reputation of this country for integrity, as the carrying out of the present declaration in time of war would be tantamount to the destruction, not only of our mercantile marine, but of the maritime supremacy of this country. Foreign countries would be the gainers by this declaration, as had been proved by the course taken by Russia in the last war. Under such a declaration he defied any man to point out how any war could be brought to a termination. Hitherto England's strength in war had consisted in crippling the commerce of her enemies; and he hoped the Government would afford some explanation as to their intentions with regard to their persistence in the present declaration.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL:—I do not wonder that the Government decline to accede to the Motion, as it appears that the paper which is moved for is not in the possession of the Government, but certainly the question raised is one of the utmost importance. The hon. Gentleman says that, in the event of a war, all the goods sent in English vessels under convoy will require 5 per cent, and in ships not under convoy 10 per cent additional premium. The hon. Gentleman has naturally argued that, with such additional payments, the manufacturers of this country will send their goods in neutral ships, and thus the maritime trade of this country will, in fact, be destroyed. That is a very serious thing, and I really should like to hear some statement upon the part of the Government, of the grounds of their entering into this declaration. It appeared to me that, when we were engaged, in conjunction with France, in a war against Russia, we could hardly do otherwise than carry on the war upon the same principle as France. The principle adopted during the war was, that free ships cover free goods. But, at the end of the war, we were not under the necessity of making any concession of the opposite principle, which was certainly in conformity with the law of nations, and to which this country had hitherto adhered. There was no notice given to the people of this country, or to either House of Parliament, that any such question would be discussed. We all supposed that the Earl of Clarendon went to Paris with a view to make peace with Russia: but, with respect to a question of maritime right, there was no preparation in the public mind, and the people of this country must have been surprised that it was introduced. I hardly think the Government could consent to abrogate, as the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bentinck) proposes, a declaration which was solemnly agreed to by their plenipotentiary. I am afraid we must be bound by the declaration. I am afraid that the consequences are so serious as to show that such a declaration was very imprudent, and I cannot but agree with the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lindsay), that England ought to preserve her maritime superiority. The comparison between private property in ships and private property on land is not tenable. I do not think there is any real comparison between them. It is quite obvious that a farmer, cultivating a farm, and having its produce in the middle of France or the State of Virginia, has placed his property in quite a different situation from a manufacturer who has put his goods on board a large fleet in the British Channel, navigated by 7,000 or 8,000 mariners competent to man a fleet against this country. There is no comparison between the two propositions, and therefore I cannot but think that, in point of principle, the declaration of Paris ought to be altered. The whole matter is most unsatisfactory, and most grave in its bearing upon our maritime supremacy. I quite agree that the way in which we have been able to finish wars with great Powers, especially with France, has chiefly been by destroying the enemy's trade. We have brought the Powers with which we have been at war to such a state that their finances have become disordered. They have then been ready to listen to terms of peace, and thereby the wars have been terminated. But now, if we were at war with America or France, they could maintain their trade in full vigour, because manufactured produce throughout the world could be sent in neutral vessels in perfect safety. They would have no reason for making peace. They would not be distressed. We might gain naval victories, but our successes would not produce peace. We might drive all their vessels of war from the seas, but we should not thereby gain the end of all war, which is an honourable peace. The state of this question is to me very alarming, but I do not see that a breach of faith would at all mend our position.

MR. LINDSAY said, the noble Lord who had last spoken had misunderstood him. He did not say they should not abide by the declaration, but that, if they did abide by it, the whole carrying trade of this country would pass under a neutral flag. The consequence of that would be that, instead of maintaining our present position, as the first maritime Power in the world, we should become a sixth-rate Power; for there would be no employment for our ships, as the whole trade of the country would pass into neutral ships. He did not wish to throw aside a solemn declaration, but he said the people of this country would not abide by it, and would appeal to the House for its abrogation, and the House would be compelled to listen to, and give effect to that appeal. Having made this explanation, it was not his intention to press the Motion.

Lord John Russell

LORD JOHN RUSSELL observed, that he was very glad that the hon. Gentleman did not mean what he had supposed.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he had expected that some Member of the Government—the First Lord of the Admiralty—would have addressed the House after the speech of the noble Lord the Member for the City of London. He agreed with the hon. Gentleman who brought forward the Motion, that it was impossible we could remain in the position in which we were at present. The noble Lord said we could not break the engagement. He did not think we could. Diplomacy had drawn us into a very impolitic engagement, and it was for the noble Lord, or some clever diplomatist, to get us out of it. If they were determined to abide by the declaration of the Earl of Clarendon, and a war ensued, we must blockade every port which the enemy possessed. It must be not a mere paper, but an efficient blockade, and in the event of a war with France, such a blockade, with the navy we possessed, could not at the first start be established. Double or treble our navy would not be sufficient to blockade all the ports of France; and it must not be forgotten that seamen discharged from French merchant vessels would go into French ships of war, and increase their force, while our force in men would be diminished in consequence of our loss of trade.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SLAVE TRADE (AFRICA).

ADDRESS MOVED.

MR. BUXTON rose to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to employ all the means in Her power in order to put down the African Slave Trade, and to obtain the execution of the Treaties made for that purpose with other Powers."

He said that in doing so he was anxious not to embarrass the action of the Government on this subject, but if possible to strengthen their hands in dealing with other nations upon it, by a cordial expression of opinion on the part of the House of Commons. He was sorry to say that there had been a great increase of the slave trade between Cuba and the coast of Africa. In 1847 the number of slaves imported into Cuba was only 1,000; but in the last two years they had reached 12,000 or 13,000. As an illustration of the suffering of negroes in the course of this trade he might mention the case of a vessel of 150 tons, which was taken a few weeks ago by one of our cruisers, with no fewer than 500 slaves on board. The poor creatures were crammed between decks, where they could neither stand up nor lie down, and such were their sufferings from want of air, water, and food, that 140 perished in a few weeks. As a matter of humanity alone, he thought the House ought to require that this infamous traffic should be put down. But happily in this case humanity and wise policy went hand in hand. The greater was the increase of the slave trade the less would be the opportunities afforded of legitimate trade on the coast of Africa. That commerce promised an extraordinary development. A few years ago there were scarcely any exports from the coast of Africa, but, chiefly from our having maintained a strong squadron there, legitimate traffic had taken deep root, and the exports of palm oil and other matters to all parts of the world were now valued at £3,000,000. But the resources of the country were, in fact, boundless, and promised us a vast supply of gold dust, arrow-root, ivory, timber of all kinds, and many other commodities. The most important feature connected with this trade, however, was the prospect of our getting a large supply of cotton from that coast. It was ascertained only three or four years ago that cotton was to be had there in very considerable quantity and of the same quality as that we got from America. A gentleman interested in the subject had brought to England two intelligent negro lads, who had been trained in all the processes of cotton growing and cleaning, and then sent out to Africa. Agents also had been established for the purpose of holding out inducements to the negroes to engage in this species of industry. The plan pursued was to exchange cotton gins for so much cotton brought in, and in that way one or two hundred cotton gins had been bartered with the natives in the last year, and 10,000lbs. of cotton had been brought to Manchester and sold at the same price as that imported from America. It, therefore, became us, not only as a Christian country, but as leading the commerce of the world, to foster and encourage this trade, and the best way to do that was to act vigorously in putting an end to the slave trade. Indeed, a sense of our own dignity ought to induce us to take steps for its prevention, for we had been completely bamboozled on the question by Spain. The existing slave trade was carried on in direct violation of our treaties with Spain. In 1820 she pledged herself to abolish the slave trade, but she did nothing till 1835, when the Queen Regent Christina promised to pass a severe penal law against the traffic. Ten years elapsed before that law was enacted, and up to the present day Spain had refused to make the slave trade piracy. There was every possible connivance by Spain at this trade in Cuba, and it was notorious that from the Captain General down to the lowest official, every one of the Government officers in that island participated in the profits of the trade. Even when captured negroes were set free in Cuba they were brought back to slavery; for when they were emancipated by decrees of the Mixed Commission Court, they were handed over to slave owners on payment of certain fees, which were supposed to go to support the charities of Cuba. Spain had cheated us in every way, and done her best to foster this abominable trade. She had induced this country to give her £400,000 as a compensation for suppressing this traffic, and after taking the money she had done all she could to sneak out of her bargain. He could not use stronger language on that point than that used by the noble Lord at the head of the Government, in a despatch to Lord Howden. The noble Lord said :—

“ That for fourteen or fifteen years the engagements entered into by Spain with regard to the slave trade had been violated ; that slaves had been allowed to be taken into Cuba ; and those violations of treaties and engagements could not and would not have happened to any Government which was determined to prevent them.”

We need not be embarrassed by any feeling of delicacy towards Spain, or treat her with respect in this matter, for she had shown that she had no respect for herself. He wished to inquire from the noble Lord whether it would not be possible to adopt with regard to Cuba the same course which had been pursued with regard to Brazil. He knew that there were some hon. Gentlemen in that House of such original minds as to think that Brazil had not suppressed her slave trade in consequence of our interference. But how stood the facts ? Why, that when the British Government threatened to send our cruisers into the Brazilian waters, for a time the trade

House will do the Government the justice to believe that that Address only embodies the feelings and wishes of the Government. No doubt, the adoption of that Address by such an assembly as this will prove to the world how anxious England is for the completion of that work which so long engaged her attention. My hon. Friend has justly remarked that there is perhaps nothing more remarkable in the history of the world than the progress that has been made with respect to the question of the slave trade and slavery, by the exertion of this country throughout, I may say, the whole of Europe. There was a time when the general prejudice of this country ran in favour not merely of the existence of slavery, but of the slave trade. It was a few noble-minded men who originally started that view of the matter which has since prevailed, and who by their persevering exertions and the goodness of their cause won their way, first of all by procuring the abolition of the British slave trade, and next by enlisting the exertions of the British Government to procure from all other countries declarations and treaties for the abolition of the slave trade generally, and ultimately crowned their efforts so far as concerned England by the abolition of slavery itself in this country. Sir, that indeed would be a noble passage in the history of any country, and it would be truly mortifying if the exertions of the country to put an end to this abominable crime were defeated by the bad faith or a want of exertion on the part of a Government which has bound itself by solemn treaties to co-operate with us to the fullest extent in the extinction of the traffic. My hon. Friend has clearly pointed out some of the many advantages which have accrued to this country from the suppression of the slave trade. He has shown the great increase of legitimate commerce that has resulted from the intercourse between this country and the coast of Africa. He has pointed out the enormous increase in the importation of palm oil and other articles, and he has touched upon the trade in that article, of which we stand so much in need, and the importation of which might be greatly increased by a little effort—I mean the article of cotton for our manufactures. When it is remembered that almost the whole population of Western Africa and the people far in the interior are clothed with articles made of cotton, it is manifest that the cotton plant must be well adapted to the soil and climate of that part of the world. It is quite evident, also, that if pains were taken by the capitalists and merchants of England to obtain a supply of cotton from thence, Africa would in a short period become quite as prolific a source of supply as any other part of the globe. Therefore, regarding the matter merely in the light of national interest, and divesting it of those higher considerations which have hitherto governed our conduct, the House will see that the suppression of the slave trade, which is a sine qua non condition of the development of legitimate traffic in Africa, is well deserving the attention of this country. I regret that the Spanish Government have not been as alive as they ought to have been to the pledges which they gave for the suppression of the slave trade in their dominions. It is quite true they have forgotten too much the money payments we have made to secure their co-operation in that object. At the same time, we know that there are temptations in Cuba which it is very difficult for the Governor, or for any of the other officers there, to resist; and we also know that there has existed an apathy on the part of the mother country to fulfil the engagements he has undertaken. When the hon. Gentleman, however, says that we ought to apply the same measures to Spain as to Brazil, he must allow me to point out the difference between the two cases. Brazil had bound itself by a general agreement to put an end to the slave trade; but it refused, when the former treaty expired, to enter into any new treaty which should establish detailed arrangements for executing the general engagement. In that state of things the Government of England acted towards Brazil as it had before done towards Portugal under similar circumstances. A law was passed authorizing the capture of Brazilian slavers, and the adjudication upon those ships, not before a Brazilian Court, but before the Court of Admiralty of this country. But Spain has not refused to enter into treaty engagements. We have a treaty with her by which all Spanish slavers captured by our vessels should be taken before mixed Courts of Commission. Therefore, as long as that treaty remains, unless we can show that there has been a deliberate and positive violation of its stipulations, we have not the same ground of proceeding in regard to Spain as we have towards Brazil. I can only say that I thank my hon. Friend for having elicited from this House what I trust will be an unanimous vote in favour of the Address which he has moved; and I beg to assure him and the House that no efforts shall be wanting on the part of Her Majesty's Government to give full effect to his feelings and wishes.

Viscount Palmerston

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to employ all the means in Her power, in order to put down the African Slave Trade, and to obtain the execution of the Treaties made for that purpose with other Powers.

COUNTY AND DISTRICT SURVEYORS, &c. IRELAND BILL.

COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

MR. G. A. HAMILTON said, he rose to move for a Select Committee, to "inquire into the duties, functions, and mode of remuneration of County and District Surveyors, and Assistant Surveyors in Ireland, and also as to the best mode of examination to be henceforth adopted in reference to such officers, with a view to establish a system of competition, and secure to the public the services of the best qualified candidates." As his right hon. Friend the Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was good enough to assent to his Motion, it would not be necessary for him to trouble the House with more than a few observations. The object which he had in view was this. He remembered it to have been stated many years ago, by Sir Robert Peel, that a Session never passed without an Irish Grand Jury Bill, and an Irish Fishery Bill. Since that statement, he believed he might say the same practice had invariably obtained, and in the present Session there was one Fishery Bill and two Grand Jury Bills for their consideration; but while these annual attempts at legislation were regularly made, they invariably failed, and the old system remained unaltered. The truth was, that the Irish Members differed amongst themselves as to the basis on which the grand-jury system should be established. While some contended that the existing system, if amended, should be maintained; others were in favour of abolishing that system altogether, and no agreement could be come to. He was glad therefore to see in the present Session a Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Westmeath, the object of which was to remedy the defects of the existing system, without touching the principle, inasmuch as that was precisely the object which he (Mr. G. A.

Hamilton) himself had in view, in laying the foundation of this inquiry. The House might be aware that the establishment of county surveyors took place in 1830, under the 3 & 4 Will. IV., c. 78, and which was extended by the 6 & 7 Will. IV., c. 16. Those Acts provided for the appointment of a county surveyor in each county in Ireland, and as a condition precedent that such officer was to be subject to an examination by certain officers therein described. Now, the functions of those county surveyors were extremely numerous and important. Those duties were set forth somewhat in detail. He would give the House merely an outline of them, such as was contained in a letter addressed by a committee of the county surveyors of Ireland to the predecessor of his right hon. Friend the Secretary for Ireland, and given in the Report of a Commission appointed in Ireland in 1842, to consider the whole subject of the grand jury laws. Those county surveyors had to specify the work that was necessary, to select the parties that were to carry it out, to report upon the works when completed, to report upon the state of all bridges, &c., and to superintend generally all matters relating to the office of county surveyor. It was quite obvious, from the extent of the county works in Ireland, that no single individual could perform efficiently those various duties; and, accordingly, the law provided that it should be discretionary for the grand jury to appoint assistant surveyors with a salary of £60 a year to each. That power had been exercised in some and not in other counties. He was anxious to call attention to the results which had followed from the appointment of county surveyors. In the year 1834, the cost of the maintenance of the roads immediately after the institution of the county surveyors was, on an average, £17 10s. a mile. In 1854, the cost, notwithstanding the great increase of wages and drainage, was reduced to £8 13s. per mile—less than one-half what it was at the former period. The cost of superintendence in 1834 was also about double what it was in 1854. He would give an instance of the cost of two counties with the view of showing the effect of the system of surveyors that was in operation. He would take a county in the extreme north, Antrim, and a county in the extreme south, Kerry:—

ANTRIM COUNTY.

1834.—One surveyor, no assistant; miles of road maintained. 240; cost of maintenance, £19,628; cost of superintendence, £1,080—5.50 per cent.

1854.—One surveyor, twelve assistants; miles of road maintained, 1,020; cost of maintenance, £30,760; cost of superintendence, £905—2.94 per cent.

KERRY COUNTY.

1834.—One surveyor, no assistant; miles of road maintained, 608; cost of maintenance, £6,538; cost of superintendence, £350—5.35 per cent.

1854.—One surveyor, four assistants; miles of road maintained, 1,420; cost of maintenance, £12,666; cost of superintendence, £550—4.34 per cent.

TOTAL IN IRELAND.

1834.—Miles maintained, 13,191; cost of maintenance, £320,645; cost of superintendence, £16,976—5.29 per cent.

1854.—Miles maintained, 36,703; cost of maintenance, £410,689; cost of superintendence, £17,895—4.19 per cent.

He would submit that the remuneration of those surveyors who rendered such important services ought to be adequate. Their remuneration was, however, limited by Act of Parliament to a sum not exceeding £300 per annum. When their incidental expenses were deducted, their remuneration was little more than £200 a year. As to the assistant surveyors, the Act of Parliament provided that their salary should be only £50, although in their discretion they exercised duties of a varied and different character as would appear from the following facts:—In Antrim, 12 for 1,900 miles of road; Meath 1 for 1,700; Galway, for 957; Louth, 3 for 400. No system founded upon any one principle seemed to be adopted in reference to those assistant surveyors. In 1842 the Commission was appointed, of which his right hon. Friend Sir John Young was Chairman, and which collected a vast deal of information in reference to the grand jury system. That Commission recommended, as an improvement upon the existing system, that each county should be divided into districts; and that, instead of one surveyor, each county should have a certain number of competent surveyors, and that the assistant surveyors should be altogether abolished. He was not convinced that such a measure would be an improvement. By an inquiry of the kind for which he now moved, he thought it was possible, by an examination of a few competent witnesses, that a Committee would be enabled to arrive at such a conclusion as would form the basis of a measure for the improvement of the grand jury system, in the important matter of the supervision of the County Courts. There was another point he wished to notice; that was, the preliminary examination that was considered requisite. Although he was bound to say that the officers appointed were efficient and useful men, yet he was of opinion that the system of examination followed was not as satisfactory as could be desired. He thought the system of competitive examination peculiarly applicable to a case of this kind. He was an advocate for publicity as regards the examination papers, and the number of works which each candidate might obtain. By a system of competitive examination they would be opening the offices to an educated class above the lowest class, and they would be also giving a stimulus to an advantageous and a useful system of education.

Mr. G. A. Hamilton

MR. GROGAN seconded the Motion.

SIR DENHAM NORREYS said, he thought that the present grand jury system was so bad it would be impossible to improve it. The mode of examination of surveyors was disgraceful, and they were miserably paid, considering that they had the superintendence of the outlay of large sums of money in Ireland, and the importance of the duties they had to perform. He should accordingly support the Motion.

MR. GROGAN said, he also must condemn the present system of surveyors, and he thought that it was worthy of consideration whether by granting them higher salaries they could not have the duties much better performed.

MR. VANCE said, that there was great dissatisfaction felt at the mode of examination that was carried on. The Commissioners, it was stated, had in many instances appointed their own private friends. The people demanded that those examinations should take place publicly, that due notice of them should be given, and that the names of candidates, successful and otherwise, with the names of the examiners should be published. He thought also that no examiners ought to be permitted to examine their own pupils.

MR. M'CANN remarked, that he concurred in the Motion for a Committee as far as it went; but he thought that the question was surrounded with more difficulty than they imagined.

MR. H. A. HERBERT said, he readily concurred in the Motion of his hon. Friend, with whom he quite agreed that the subject was one of great importance, and that an inquiry of the nature proposed would be a useful—he might almost say an indispensable—preliminary to any attempt at reforming the grand jury system of Ireland. He also agreed with his hon. Friend (Mr. Grogan) upon the question of remuneration, and believed that it would be sound economy for each country to obtain a first-rate man, and have his undivided services. Further, he admitted that it would be a desirable thing that the parties who were examined should not be examined by those with whom they had been private pupils. He hoped, however, that his hon. Friend would take care and keep the Committee within the order of reference, because if they went beyond that it would be impossible for them to conclude the matter this Session, and the result would be, that he should not have the advantage of their Report to assist him in the recess in maturing a measure that would be satisfactory either to the country or himself.

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the duties, functions, and mode of remuneration of County and District Surveyors and Assistant Surveyors, in Ireland, and also as to the best mode of examination to be henceforth adopted in reference to such Officers, with a view to establish a system of competition, and secure to the public the services of the best qualified candidates."

RAILWAYS (IRELAND).

MR. BUTT moved for leave to bring in a Bill to enable baronies or other districts in Ireland to give guarantees for the construction of railways passing through such districts. He understood there was to be no opposition to his Motion; he should, therefore, reserve an explanation of the provisions of the measure until the second reading. On the present occasion he would content himself with observing that these guarantees had already been sanctioned in several districts in Ireland by special Acts of Parliament; but he proposed that his Bill should be a general one, enabling the ratepayers in any district to judge for themselves, and decide whether such guarantee should be given or not.

MR. H. A. HERBERT said, he did not rise to oppose the Motion; but in allowing the hon. Gentleman to bring in his Bill it must be distinctly understood that Government did not thereby imply a pledge to support even the principle of the measure. The subject was one which required the greatest possible consideration, and certainly, as at present advised, he thought the principle was full of danger, and that in almost all cases where a district was sufficiently important to require a railroad, and the railroad formed a legitimate subject of speculation, the usual course of coming to Parliament for an Act was the best mode of proceeding.

LORD NAAS agreed in every word that had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman, except where he expressed his readiness to give leave to introduce the Bill. The principle involved in the measure was a most dangerous one, and should be regarded by the House with the greatest suspicion. He disapproved entirely of the principle of mortgaging the public rates for the furtherance of private speculations. Besides, even if the Bill were brought in now, it was totally impossible that it could pass this Session.

MR. M'MAHON hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would consider well the difficulties which he would have to encounter in obtaining the consent of the ratepayers of the district. If it was meant to give the associated magistrates the power of taxing the ratepayers, he should oppose the Bill at a future stage, and he, therefore, hoped that the approval of the ratepayers would be made a necessary condition of the undertaking.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, that at that period of the Session when the majority of Irish Members would shortly be going upon circuit, there could be no hope of so important a subject being satisfactorily settled. He would not, however, object to the introduction of the Bill, because his hon. and learned Friend, if he were content with merely bringing it in, would be able to lay before the country a plan for arriving at a settlement of a question which involved important Imperial interests.

MR. BUTT said he would agree to this suggestion, but on the second reading, he would make a statement explaining more particularly the objects of the Bill, in order that that statement might go forth to the country with the Bill.

Leave given.

Bill to enable baronies or other districts in Ireland to give guarantees for the construction of Railways passing through such districts, ordered to be brought in by Mr. BUTT and Mr. BRAMISH.

PUBLIC HEALTH ACT (1848) AMENDMENT.

MR. COWPER, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Public Health Act, 1848, and to make further provisions for Town Improvement, said, that he should have brought the question before the House at an earlier period of the Session, but it was thought desirable that it should follow another Bill which was now before Parliament, for transferring the powers of the Board of Health to the Department of Education. The provisions of the Bill had been submitted to the local Boards of Health in the chief towns in the country, and he believed he might say, that those provisions had the concurrence and support of all of them. The main object of the measure was to remedy the defects which an experience of nine years had shown to exist in the Act of 1848—to give powers of cleansing and purifying towns, to renovate streets and highways, to audit accounts, and generally to improve the management. With regard to the central Board he proposed to repeal the power which, by the existing law, the General Board of Health possessed of applying the Act to towns without the consent of the inhabitants. This was a power to which considerable objection had been made, although it had rarely, if ever, been resorted to, because it was clear that, even if there were an advantage in the central authority being able to apply an Act against the consent of the inhabitants, there would be little result from it, since the execution of the Act must depend upon the voluntary use made by the inhabitants of the powers given them by the Act. He, therefore, proposed so far to alter the mode of adopting the Act, that it should no longer be applied by the action of the Board of Health, or other authority to whom those powers had been entrusted, but by a vote of the inhabitants of the town desiring to have the benefit of the Act. It also very seldom happened that a town wishing to avail itself of the Act had the proper boundaries which it was desirable it should have, and the Bill, therefore, gave the central Board power to interfere to settle the boundaries, of course with the consent of the inhabitants. Moreover, there was often a difficulty in applying the Act, in consequence of the existence of local Acts, and the Bill gave power to the central Board to make provisional orders which would be submitted to the House. There was a tendency in local bodies when they constructed works, to saddle future rate-payers with the burden of the expense, and power was given to the central Board to prevent that being done, unless the works were of a permanent character. At the same time, he might observe with regard to the powers now possessed by the

Mr. Cooper

General Board of Health, some of those powers were considered to be unconstitutional and arbitrary. Much ignorance seemed to prevail upon that subject, but if hon. Gentlemen would take the trouble to look carefully into the Act of 1848, they would see that there was nothing in that Act which vested in the Board of Health any power of a compulsory nature. In fact, the power of that Board was rather of a restrictive character than anything else. The object of the whole legislation upon this subject was, to enable the towns to execute necessary works, and to keep their localities in good order and sound sanitary condition. This Bill would afford the means of removing all the sources of disease which could be abolished by the action of local bodies, and which now existed to a large extent in almost every court and alley of large towns, while it was so framed that each could adopt so much of its powers as were necessary to meet its immediate wants. It would be strictly a permissive measure. He believed it was very much demanded by the towns themselves, and he therefore hoped it would not meet with any serious opposition.

Leave given.

Bill to amend the Public Health Act, 1848, and to make further provision for Town Improvement, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Cowper and Mr. Monckton.

CLERKS OF PETTY SESSIONS (IRELAND).

LEAVE.

MR. H. A. HERBERT then moved for leave to introduce a Bill to authorise the payment of clerks of Petty Sessions in Ireland by salaries instead of fees, and to amend the Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1851.

MR. WARE hoped that a similar Bill would be introduced with respect to England.

Leave given.

Bill to authorise the payment of Clerks of Petty Sessions, in Ireland, by Salaries instead of Fees, and to amend the Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1851, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Harcourt and Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.

RAILWAY TRAFFIC ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. GRIFFITHS said, he rose to move the second reading of this Bill, the object of which was to facilitate the means of obtaining justice in cases of dispute between private individuals and the railway companies, in connection with the traffic on existing railways. The measure dealt with a very large interest, and he presumed that the Ministry even could not disregard the claims of railway proprietors. He was himself a railway proprietor. He was desirous to know what authority it was the House recognized in such matters. In introducing this Bill, he was supported by the authority of the Committee—an authority which must be of the highest weight with the House. Under the former Act, a private individual who was injured by the traffic arrangements had no remedy against a railway company, except through the Court of Common Pleas, the expense of which was ruinous. He proposed to give the party injured a right of making a complaint to the Board of Trade, who would call on the company for an explanation, and if that was not satisfactory, they would then put the law in Motion, as provided by the former Act.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. LOWE said, that as the law now stood, any private person to whom a railway company denied proper facilities might appeal to the Court of Common Pleas to compel the company to afford him such facilities, or the Board of Trade might direct the Attorney General to commence a prosecution against the company for the same purpose. The Bill of the hon. Gentleman sought to retain to the private individual the power which he had at present of going to the Court of Common Pleas, and it gave him, in addition, the power of going to the Board of Trade, and of compelling them to investigate the complaint. He (Mr. Lowe) objected to the Bill as unfair to the railway companies, because it exposed them to the grievance of being twice vexed on the same matter. They would be first liable to be tried by the Board of Trade, and if the Board of Trade decided against them they might be tried again before the Court of Common Pleas; or, if the Board of Trade decided in their favour and dismissed the complaint, it would be open to the person to go to the Court of Common Pleas himself. He objected to the Bill also, because it was unfair to the public, by burdening the Treasury with the expense of prosecuting every man's private grievances. He objected to it also on account of the Attorney General, who had quite enough to do at present without being compelled to prosecute all the railway companies in the kingdom; and, finally, he objected to it on behalf of the Board of Trade, which, if it were fit for anything, was fit to exercise a discretion in matters of this sort, and ought not to be forced to enter into investigations and to institute prosecutions in cases where such proceedings were not necessary, and which had no judicial power, no machinery, and no aptitude to enable it to carry out such a duty satisfactorily. For these reasons he objected to the hon. Gentleman's Bill. The hon. Gentleman had made some reflections on the conduct of the Court of Common Pleas. He (Mr. Lowe) had read the decisions of the Court of Common Pleas, and he thought that court had decided with great wisdom and fairness. Undoubtedly, that court had not very easy machinery for the purpose; but it was the machinery which Parliament had devised, and the learned Judges seemed to have got it into working order with great fairness, and he was certain it would not be improved by burdening the court with the business which would be imposed on it by the present Bill. He moved that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN moved, that the House do now adjourn.

Motion made, and Question, "That this House do now adjourn," put, and agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter before
One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, July 15, 1857.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1<sup>o</sup> Clerks of Petty Sessions (Ireland); Loan Societies; Sale of Corn, &c.; Commons Inclosure; Land and Assessed Taxes, &c. (Scotland) Acts Amendment; Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act Amendment; Public Health Act (1848) Amendment; Turnpike Acts Continuance; Sale of Obscene Books, &c. Prevention.

2<sup>o</sup> Married Women.

3<sup>o</sup> Bill Chamber (Scotland); Militia Ballots Suspension; Glebe Lands (Ireland).

POOR LAW MEDICAL OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

MR. MOODY said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board, whether any intention is entertained of making an alteration in the law as regards the power of overseers, in ordering medical relief to persons not in the workhouse.

MR. BOUVERIE said, that under the Poor Law Amendment Act the overseer was entitled, in cases of urgent necessity, to give an order for medical relief to such persons as he thought required it. A case of the kind alluded to by the hon. Gentleman had occurred in the Somersetshire Union, but afterwards the guardians, not believing it to be a case of urgent necessity, refused to allow such relief. The medical officer, in consequence, brought an action against the overseer in the County Court, and the Judge decided that the overseer was not personally liable. As far as he (Mr. Bouverie) had the means of judging, that decision was right in point of law, nor had the Poor Law Board (though they had offered some advice to the guardians in the particular case referred to) any intention of altering the general law in that respect. Certainly medical officers of unions seemed exposed to some hardships in such a case, but, at the same time, those gentlemen had the power of protecting themselves, because they could judge whether the case which they were called upon to attend was one of urgent necessity, and if it was not they could decline to act upon the order of the overseer. Medical officers, however, should be very careful in exercising their discretion in such instances, because if, after all, the case turned out to be one of urgent necessity, they would be held responsible.

JUDGMENTS EXECUTION, &c. BILL.
COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.
House in Committee.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to ask what steps had been taken to obtain the decision of the law officers of the Crown for England, Ireland, and Scotland, on the subject of the Bill, according to the undertaking entered into?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the undertaking was not entered into, because the conditions under which it was offered had not been accepted. The Bill was approved of by the law officers of the Crown generally; but they had had no consultation since the Bill was last in Committee for the purpose of considering the question, as such a proceeding was unnecessary with regard to a measure to the general provisions of which they had already acceded.

COLONEL FRENCH said, his recollection of the facts was somewhat different from that of the Lord Advocate. He clearly understood that the Bill was to be considered by the law officers of the Crown of the three countries; and that their decision was to be communicated to the Committee. The Bill was not wanted in Ireland; and he (Colonel French) could see no advantage in wasting another day at this period of the Session, in an attempt to force it upon that country; especially as every Irish legal Member was inevitably absent on professional business. He thought it desirable to postpone the Bill for this Session, as it could not pass; and seeing that there were thirty-five Orders of the Day upon the paper, he should move that the Chairman report progress.

MR. HEADLAM observed, that he approved the principle of the Bill, and had supported it throughout. He could not help thinking, however, that the House had devoted as much time to its discussion as was due to its importance, or as was fair to other hon. Members whose measures were now pending. If there had been any reasonable chance of the Bill passing this Session, he might have continued to support it; but looking at the determined opposition offered to its progress, he thought no such chance existed, and he should therefore vote in favour of reporting progress.

Motion made and Question put, "That the Chairman do report progress, and ask leave to sit again."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 33; Noes 58: Majority 25.

MR. MAGUIRE said, that as an Irish Member, he wished to express his opinion that the conduct of the hon. and learned Member who had charge of the Bill was not what it ought to be. There was a strong feeling against the Bill amongst the legal and commercial classes in Ireland, and consequently, the Irish Members were prepared to take all the taunts and do everything—[An hon. MEMBER: Pay!] —to oppose its passage for this Session. He therefore would suggest, that the hon.

Member who had introduced it should submit it to the Lord Advocate for Scotland, the Attorney General for England, and the Attorney General for Ireland, to be by them considered and amended; then, if the hon. and learned Member would introduce it in an amended form next Session, he (Mr. Maguire) would support it: otherwise, he was prepared to occupy the attention of the Committee for the rest of the day, if necessary. Under the present circumstances, however, he should move that the Chairman do leave the chair.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he regretted that the Irish Members were so unanimously opposed to this measure, because he did not see how it affected Irishmen any more than Englishmen or Scotchmen. As there certainly was no prospect of passing it, however, during this Session, he suggested to his hon. and learned Friend that he should not further proceed with it at present, although he must express his regret that an opposition which, so far as he knew, had never been based on any intelligible principle, should have been successful in opposing the progress of the Bill.

MR. SPOONER said, that the opposition to this Bill was by no means confined to Irish Members; for many Englishmen objected to it on the ground that, under it, judgments obtained in the Scotch courts, by a procedure of which no one knew anything, might be entered in the courts of London, and would come into as full force as if they had been obtained by a procedure subject to all the guards and precautions which the English law threw round it. He (Mr. Spooner) had heard nothing to remove his objections, and, he therefore, hoped that the Bill would be postponed.

MR. M'CANN said, Irish merchants and men of business were informed, on the first law authority in Ireland and England, that fraudulent judgments might be obtained under the Bill, and therefore he should oppose the measure until he was satisfied on that point. That could be done only by referring the Bill to the law officers of the Crown for the three countries.

MR. WATKIN said, that although he had hitherto been consistent in supporting the Bill, he thought, considering the period of the Session, that it ought to be withdrawn for the present. He regarded the Bill as a step in the right direction, and he thought that if the hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd) magnanimously consented to withdraw it at this time, he ought to have an assurance from the Government that they would introduce it in an amended form as a Government measure next Session. He supported the Bill because it tended to produce uniformity in the law, and to prevent the anomaly of having one law for England, another for Ireland, and another for Scotland, when all were under the same Imperial Government. At the same time he must observe that if it were in the power of the hon. Members for Ireland to defeat this Bill by factious opposition, it would be equally in the power of any other hon. Members to oppose any other measure, and thus a stop might be put to all legislation. He thought the question should be decided by the balance of arguments and votes, and not by such threats as the hon. Member for Dungan (Mr. Maguire) used.

MR. MAGUIRE denied that he had used any threat. He had merely stated a fact, and if a fact was a threat, why perhaps he had made use of a threat. It was all very well to say that the question should be decided by argument, but when the bell rang for a division, hon. Members flocked into the House, and voted without hearing any arguments, or even knowing what the question was.

MR. CRAUFURD said, that, after the appeal which had been made to him by the Lord Advocate and by other hon. Members, he thought that he should best discharge his duty by not further pressing the Bill during the present Session. He must observe, however, that the Bill as it now stood had received the approval of all the law officers of the Crown, that it had now been proceeded with as far as the 9th clause, and that not a single material Amendment had been made in the framework or the phraseology of the measure. He saw no reason why the subject which the Bill contemplated should not be undertaken by a private Member, and he gave notice that next Session he should again address himself to it, and should re-introduce a similar measure upon the subject.

COLONEL FRENCH said, that the Irish Members were all but unanimous in their opposition to this Bill. He thought that they were perfectly justified in the course which he and others had pursued.

Motion agreed to.

House resumed.

[No Report.]

MARRIED WOMEN BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

SIR JOHN BULLER said, he rose to move as an Amendment, on behalf of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Wallingford (Mr. Malins), that the Bill be read a second time this day three months. He thought that the Bill went too far, and was calculated to introduce into families a great deal of discomfort and dissension. There was no greater source of dissension in married life than the existence of separate property, and this measure would add to those dissensions. It was not his intention, however, to enter into a detail of the difficulties which would be likely to arise under the Bill if it became law, because they were of too delicate a nature to be canvassed in that House; but he might state his belief that there were very few mothers of families, having the control of property which they ought to devote to the benefit of the whole of their children alike, who would have nerve and composure enough to refuse to grant pecuniary aid to any one of their children—say their first-born—who might stand in need of such assistance. Again, by the Bill as it stood, a married woman becoming possessed of property after marriage had the power of alienating that property and of dealing with it as she pleased. She might, with the best intentions, lay it out, without consulting her husband, in some worthless railway shares or in some unsound speculation, and the husband might find that the whole of that property, to which he had looked, perhaps, for the maintenance of himself during his lifetime, and for the benefit of his children afterwards, had been swept away. He believed that the Bill had been introduced to meet an exceptional class of cases, which ought to be dealt with separately—such as where a wife who lived apart from her husband entered upon some business by herself, and therefrom acquired property, which in the present state of the law the husband could take possession of. He did not attempt to defend that state of things, but he did not consider that such cases belonged to society at large; and he thought that, as a general measure, the Bill was uncalled for. Of course he could not be expected to enter into the legal and technical objections to the measure, but in the absence of his hon. and learned Friend he had no hesitation in moving, as an Amendment, that it be read a second time this day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."

MR. MONCKTON MILNES, whose name was on the back of the Bill, stated that he regarded the question far more as a social than as a legal one. The position of married women in this country was peculiar in this respect, that there existed with regard to them a law, which applied to all married women alike, unless they entered into an express contract for the purpose of modifying or avoiding that law. The object of the Bill, then, was to make that the law for all classes, which by custom it had become for the wealthy classes, for it very rarely happened that on the marriage of a woman possessing property her property was not made the subject of the most careful arrangement. This had produced the most striking conflict between the common law and equity on this matter; for while the former declared that the wife could hold no property, yet equity allowed her to hold property settled on her at the time of the marriage, and to bequeath it according to the terms of the settlement. Again, by the common law, the husband had a right to the earnings of his wife; but it was held in equity that the wife had an absolute right to all savings arising from the settled property. It was said that the cases quoted in support of a Bill like the present were peculiar cases, but he maintained that they were such as might happen at any time. Take the two cases mentioned by the hon. Member for Suffolk (Mr. Waddington). One was the case of a lady possessing considerable property who married a man by whom she was treated with great cruelty; she was deserted, and left almost penniless by him. The man died soon after, and then she discovered to her horror that she was left entirely penniless, all her property being bequeathed by her husband to an illegitimate son of his. Another case was that of a woman whose husband had committed a brutal assault on her, for which he was condemned by a court of law. In the meantime, her father dying, a considerable portion of property devolved to her. That property under the law went to the husband, and he being a felon, escheated to the Crown. Nothing but some such alteration in the law as was proposed by the present Bill could meet that state of things. The relations between husband and wife in France, with regard to property, were regulated either by the regime dotal, or the communauté de biens; the first resembled the marriage settlement in this country, and the latter, which was the practice followed in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, established the possession of property by husband and wife in common, no portion of that property being capable of alienation without the consent of both parties. On sufficient grounds, however, either party could apply for a separation de biens, and then the property of the wife would be secured to herself. Perhaps it might be said that this would be a more desirable state of the law than that which was now proposed to be enacted, but he did not think so, as it was not applicable to the state of domestic life in this country, and might tend to familiarize the people to an objectionable degree with the idea of separation between man and wife. At the same time, he believed that the rejection of a measure like the present would lead to the adoption of such a state of things as he had just described. It might be said that at this late period of the Session it would not be advisable to proceed with the consideration of the present Bill, particularly as another Bill, with some similar provisions, was likely soon to come under discussion. That other measure, however, was connected with the establishment of a new Court of Divorce; and as that Bill might not be carried in that House, he trusted that the second reading of the present measure would be assented to, so that it might go up to the other House and receive the consideration of the law Lords. Lord Brougham had placed a reform of the law in respect to this subject on a level with the abolition of the slave trade and other great measures of that kind, and those who talked of the chance of domestic peace being disturbed by such an enactment as the present should bear in mind that they would disturb that domestic peace much more by leaving the law as it stood. The present condition of married women was, in the respects to which the Bill referred, alien to our habits and feelings, and it would be ungenerous and unmanly not to attempt to improve it. He hoped, therefore, that his hon. Friend on the Treasury bench would approve of the measure.

MR. MASSEY said, he could not make a very favourable response to the appeal of his hon. Friend. It was more a question for the law officers of the Crown than himself. But as he understood from the hon. and learned Member for Devonport (Sir E. Perry) that he had communicated with the Attorney General on the subject of the present Bill, and that that law officer approved it, though he was desirous of introducing some extensive modifications into the measure, he (Mr. Massey) should support the second reading. There was a distinction in the mode in which the property of married women was treated by courts of common law and courts of equity, and as there was that conflict of jurisdiction, it might well be said that the matter was not at present in a satisfactory state. Whether the provisions of the Bill were in accordance with the state of the law recognized by the courts of equity and with the habits of society in this country was another question. Some of those provisions appeared to stand in need of careful revision, or they might disturb the whole of the relations of married life, and revolutionize all the principles which applied to the rights of property in this country. He admitted the great hardship which was suffered by a woman in not having, when separated from a profligate husband, the power of applying the proceeds of her own industry to her own subsistence or to the subsistence of her children. He did not believe that it was not possible for the Legislature to find a remedy for that evil, but the effect of the fourth clause of the Bill relating to the earnings of a wife in separate trade would be to set every creditor at defiance, and to drive the estate of husband and wife into the Court of Chancery. When he saw one particular and known grievance dealt with in a manner so loose and unsatisfactory, he could not give his assent to the proposed second reading, without the qualification that the Bill required the most careful consideration. He believed that such a Bill must undergo the careful revision of a Committee upstairs, composed of lawyers and others in whose judgment the House was likely to place confidence. The existing state of things called for legislation, but it must be cautious legislation, and he feared that at the present advanced state of the Session the hon.

and learned Gentleman would scarcely be able to induce a sufficient number of hon. Gentlemen to consent to act as a Committee to consider the Bill. However, the hon. and learned Gentleman would partly have attained his object by ventilating the question, and next year, whether taken up by him or any other hon. Member, it would be felt to deserve the attentive consideration of Parliament.

MR. HADFIELD said, the Bill required great care, because there were nice legal difficulties to be provided against. At the same time, no greater or more pressing evil existed than the position of married women in this country. If the Bill were sent before a Select Committee, he hoped a remedy might be found.

MR. SPOONER said, he trusted that the Bill would be withdrawn altogether. He thought the House was not prepared to adopt the principle laid down in the very first clause of the measure, which began by saying that a married woman should be capable of being sued as if she were a femme sole, without the slightest reservation that she should be sued only for matters arising under this Bill. That was a principle the House could not sanction even so far as to pass the second reading of the Bill. Again it was provided that no marriage solemnized after the passing of the Bill should make any change whatever in the property possessed either by the husband or the wife except in so far as it should be specified in any settlement made before marriage. How many marriages, he should like to know, in the middle classes took place in which settlements were not made? The higher classes would be exempted from the operation of this Bill, but what would be its effect on the lower classes? The moment a married woman acquired property after marriage the whole of the existing law in respect to such property would be suspended. He was prepared for some change in the law; and if the Bill were confined to the single object of protecting the wife's property against the husband, in cases where the wife was separated by decree of a court or by agreement, so that she might possess the means of livelihood for herself and family, he should not object to it, but he could not consent to send to a Committee upstairs a Bill like the present containing unsound and objectionable principles.

MR. BAGWELL said, he found the Bill did not extend to Ireland. He thought, however, that if such a measure passed it ought to extend to all the three kingdoms. If an Irishwoman were married to an Englishman she would stand in a very different position under the Bill from her sister, who might have married an Irishman. Such marriages were very frequent, and the more so the better for the interests of the kingdom.

Mr. Massey

SIR ERSKINE PERRY said, he had no objection to adopt that suggestion in Committee, but, as the Government assented to the second reading of the Bill, he could not follow the advice of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner), and withdraw the Bill. The Bill did not deal with an exclusively legal question, but with a general principle, of which any hon. Member might judge. That principle, however, was not to be found, as the hon. Member conceived, in the first clause or in a word of a clause, but in the preamble, which declared that the law of property, with respect to married women, was unjust in principle and grievous in operation, and ought to be altered. The first clause, to which the hon. Member objected, was intended to give to all married women the same rights as those only possessed now who had settlements. The common law of the land gave the whole of the property of the wife, whether acquired before or after marriage, to the husband. He contended that that principle was unsound, and that it behoved that House to amend it. He had not heard any objection of validity urged to the Bill. The hon. Under Secretary for the Home Department had objected to the fourth clause, respecting the earnings of a wife in separate trade; but the hon. Gentleman was not, perhaps, aware that in the City of London such a usage existed. A married woman living with her husband, but carrying on a separate trade, was there entitled by law to all the profits of that trade, and might be made bankrupt. That law had existed from time immemorial, and worked well. The objections which had been urged to the Bill were objections of detail, and he should be most willing to take them into consideration. The Bill was the result of years of attention to the subject by men of the highest learning, and had been approved by the Government draughtsmen; and, if it were now read a second time, he would readily adopt the suggestion of the Under Secretary for the Home Department to refer the Bill to a Select Committee—a course which he proposed some weeks ago to the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford (Mr. Malins), but which was rejected by him. The Attorney General for Ireland assented to his proposal that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee; and if the Government would give a pledge that that course should be adopted, he (Sir E. Perry) would not press the Bill this Session. He could not, however, consent to withdraw the Bill immediately, and for this reason: in a few days a very important measure, the Divorce Bill, would be brought under the consideration of the House. During the discussion which occurred with reference to that measure in another place, several clauses had been introduced with the object of protecting the interest of married women. It was very probable that the Divorce Bill would encounter great opposition in that House; and he thought it most desirable, if that Bill should be thrown out, that some of the clauses in the present measure should be discussed at a morning sitting, in order that the nature of the objections entertained to them might be clearly understood. The subject might then be referred to a Select Committee; and he hoped that before the end of the next Session of Parliament, those blots which now rendered the law of England on this subject a scandal might be removed. The course proposed by this Bill had been sanctioned by the Roman lawyers, who were masters of jurisprudence, and by our brethren in the United States, who had so far amended the common law of England.

MR. MILES said, he would recommend the hon. Baronet (Sir J. Y. Buller) to withdraw his Amendment. He thought many of the clauses would operate beneficially, and he hoped the Bill would be read a second time and go to a Select Committee, so that next Session it might be presented to the House in such a form that they would be enabled to give it their sanction.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he understood it was intended to propose the extension of the measure to Ireland, and he could, therefore, only assent to the second reading of the Bill under protest. He did not regard this Bill as one calculated to amend the law, but to effect a complete revolution in the law, which would disturb all the relations of husband and wife. He could not help saying that it was, in his opinion, a most rashly constructed measure, and one which was likely to lead to very mischievous consequences. He was far from maintaining that the law affecting husband and wife did not require amendment, but he thought it was a most dangerous experiment to attempt such a change as would be effected by this measure. The Bill would enable a married woman to contract what debts she pleased; to bind herself personally; to enter into litigation; to sue and be sued, without the knowledge or control of a husband or trustee; and the consequence might be, that a gentleman who was strongly attached to an extravagant wife might find her arrested at his dinner-table in respect of transactions of which he had no cognizance whatever. It had been said that married women were now liable to be sued. If a married woman was possessed of property settled to her sole and separate use which the husband could not touch, she was not liable to be sued; but if she entered into engagements under circumstances which the law considered pro tanto an appointment of her property, proceedings might be taken in Equity for the application of the property to the discharge of her liabilities. He thought this Bill would, in fact, afford the means of effecting a summary divorce between husband and wife. He would gladly assist his hon. and learned Friend in endeavouring in Committee to amend the law relating to husband and wife, but if this Bill were to be read a second time, he must enter his protest against its principle, which he regarded as far too large, and its details, which he thought would be found to operate most injuriously.

MR. ROEBUCK said, his hon. and learned Friend who last addressed the House had spoken of this Bill as an experiment, but he must be aware that its principle had been adopted in all those countries which were subject to the Roman law. The object of the Bill was to continue the wife as a legal entity after her marriage, whereas by the present law of England her marriage merged her existence in that of her husband. She could not acquire property, although she might contract debts; and it frequently happened, especially among the poorer classes, that when the wife of a profligate husband, who had deserted her, succeeded to property, the drunken rascal came in and seized everything she had acquired. He (Mr. Roebuck), therefore, hailed this exdeavour to remedy such a disgraceful state of the law with the greatest satisfaction, and he hoped the House would assent to the second reading of the Bill.

MR. DE VERE said, if he required any inducement to vote against the Bill it was afforded by the statement of his hon. and learned Friend that he intended in Committee to propose the extension of its provisions to Ireland. He was far from desiring the application of the measure to Ireland, and on looking over the Bill, the clause which struck him as least open to objection was that which provided that the measure should not extend to Ireland. He did not oppose the Bill because he considered that the law affecting husband and wife was not capable of very great improvement, but because he believed such improvements would not be effected by this measure, which would, on the contrary, have a tendency to interrupt and destroy the intimate and confidential relations which ought to exist between husband and wife.

SIR JOHN BULLER said, if he correctly understood that the hon. and learned Member for Devonport (Sir E. Perry) merely proposed to read the Bill a second time, and then to abandon it for the present Session, he was ready to withdraw his Amendment.

SIR ERSKINE PERRY said, that he did not entertain the slightest expectation of passing the Bill this Session; but if it should be read a second time, he hoped that, in the event of the Divorce Bill being thrown out, the House would consent to discuss, at a morning sitting, the principles embodied in this measure.

SIR JOHN BULLER intimated that, under the circumstances, he felt it his duty to press the Amendment.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided: Ayes 120; Noes 65; Majority 55.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>, and committed for Wednesday next.

SCIENTIFIC AND LITERARY SOCIETIES BILL—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause 1.

MR. HUTT said, he wished to take that opportunity of explaining the objects of the Bill, which, he feared, were not sufficiently understood. The object was to amend the Act 6 & 7 Vict., c. 106, by which the buildings occupied by scientific and literary societies were exempted from local rates; in consequence, however, of the narrow construction put on that statute by the courts of law, the intentions of its framers had been defeated, and its present effect was that only wealthy societies formed by the higher classes had obtained any benefit from it. All the popular institutions founded by the spontaneous exertions of the people for their own instruction and improvement, such as mechanics' institutes, derived no benefit from it, and were not exempted from the payment of local rates. It was to remove this anomaly that, at the request of the Society of Arts, he had taken charge of this Bill. He admitted it might be better if no such exemption at all was allowed, but so long as the principle of exemption was admitted, no bodies were better entitled to it than those which were devoted to the education of the people. It had been objected that if the Bill passed every club would be exempted from payment of rates; but the Bill was confined to societies established for scientific, literary, and educational purposes, and no club came within that description.

Mr. Roebuck

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 (Lands, &c. occupied exclusively by any Society instituted for purposes of Science, not to be rated to county or other local rates or cesses).

MR. SPOONER said, he rose to move the omission of the words "science" and "literature," as he thought that the exemption of institutions devoted to such purposes from local rates would, in towns where those rates were extremely heavy, increase the burden of taxation thrown upon hard-working mechanics and artisans. He was desirous of limiting the exemption to institutions established for strictly educational purposes.

Amendment proposed, "in page 2, line 14, to leave out the words 'Science, Literature.'"

MR. W. EWART said, the objections of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner) ought to have been urged against the old Bill, fourteen years ago. There was in these matters a Statute of Limitations in reason, if not in law.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, he objected to the clause on the ground that they had no right to tax parishes for the advantage of particular institutions. In Southwark, which he represented, there were a great number of literary institutions, schools, and other places for educational purposes, with which the parish in which they were situated had no more to do than any parish on the other side of the water. The parishes in Southwark were poor, and it was most unjust to take this money out of the rates to support institutions with which they had nothing whatever to do. It would be a very different thing if the money came out of the general funds of the country, but they had no right to exempt them from all the borough rates. The principle of the Bill was bad in itself, and the whole effect of it would be injurious. They might as well go to the parish and ask them to pay for the gas they consumed. He was happy to afford assistance to such institutions, but he did not think this was the proper way in which to do it. He should therefore support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Warwickshire, as it tended to narrow the effect of the clause.

MR. BOUVERIE said, that he thought it would be hard on the hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. Hutt), after the House had affirmed the principle of the Bill, to emasculate it in the way which the Amendment proposed to do. He agreed that it was undesirable to carry these exemptions from rating further than they had already gone, but the Committee would bear in mind that the exemption sought to be established by this Bill was one which already existed in some cases, and that this was only an attempt to apply that exemption to analogous institutions which it was doubtful whether the existing law intended to embrace. The real grievance was that Mr. Tidd Pratt certified all kinds of societies indiscriminately, receiving his guinea, and the ratepayers were exceedingly dissatisfied. Applications had in consequence been made to the Court of Queen's Bench, and the result was that in many cases the decisions of Mr. Tidd Pratt had been reversed. The friends of the institutions felt aggrieved that those decisions had not been final, and now wished Parliament to carry out their views. After the view which had been adopted by the House, he thought that the Bill ought not to be defeated by a side-wind.

MR. SPOONER said, that all the arguments on their side were in favour of education, and what he wanted was, that the dilettanti portion of science and literature should be left out.

MR. PULLER observed, that he thought that educational institutions were more entitled to exemption than scientific and literary institutions; but he was afraid that if the Amendment passed, many of the latter, which were in effect educational establishments, would be deprived of the benefit of exemption; he referred especially to mechanics' institutions, and other societies of a similar character. He trusted the hon. Member for North Warwickshire would withdraw his Amendment, the tendency of which would be, not only to reimpose on the wealthier societies a burden from which they had been exempt, but also to fix the same burden on mechanics' institutions.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he should support the clause as it stood, however anomalous it might be to include in it science and literature with purely educational establishments, for he contended that it was the duty of Parliament, and of all who wished to see the education of the people promoted, rather to stretch a point on the side of mercy and generosity than to seek to impose harsh and unnecessary restrictions on the enfranchisement and development of institutions and societies of the kind contemplated by this Bill. He wished the hon. Member for North Warwickshire had seen, as he had recently done, well-dressed mechanics visiting the literary and scientific institutions of Manchester and Salford. He would remind the Committee that with the divided opinions of the country on religious subjects a national system of education was impossible; and, therefore, it was desirable to fill up the existing gap as well as they could.

MR. RIDLEY remarked, that he considered that the Bill was simply a supplementary measure to an existing Act of Parliament, and was only meant to carry out the original intention of that Act on a point which had been ambiguously expressed. He should, therefore, support the clause as it stood.

MR. AYRTON said, that he considered that where a building was erected and an institution formed for the exclusive use of a particular parish, it had a good ground to claim exemption from rating; but where institutions were formed for the benefit of others besides the parishioners they had no claim to be exempted. The whole question turned upon that point, and the whole difficulty had arisen from that principle having been overlooked by the courts of law; if, therefore, the other points were got rid of he should take the sense of the House on the expediency of exempting those institutions only which were for the benefit of the parish. As the Bill stood, the old Rugby School would be exempt from rating, though it was designed solely for the benefit of the sons of the wealthy.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he could not consent to such a proposition, as much difficulty would arise in the case of schools and institutions established for distinct sects in the same parish.

COLONEL SYKES said, there had been conflicting decisions as to what literary and scientific institutions really were, but this Bill would set the matter entirely at rest. He believed that mechanics' institutions throughout the country were borne down by these difficulties, but that this Bill would remove those difficulties, and thus confer great benefits upon the working classes. He denied that it would apply to such an institution as Rugby School, for it would be a complete perversion of terms to call that school a literary and scientific society.

GENERAL THOMPSON asked if it was seriously intended to make the exemption for a building from parochial rates, dependent on keeping out any individual who was not of the parish. A clergyman drew a good deal from the parish; but would there be sense in making him forfeit it, if an outside barbarian, an extra parishioner, was found attendant on his ministry? Would it not be much better, that twenty neighbouring parishes should have twenty scientific institutions, and each allow free ingress to the others?

MR. PEASE said, that a general desire had been expressed in the Committee to promote the cause of education. They had seen the establishment in this country by voluntary efforts of many valuable institutions, and he was of opinion that they ought to give them all the support which could be legitimately bestowed on them. They all knew that there was no period of greater moral danger than that which came between childhood and manhood, and mechanics' institutions were precisely adapted to provide for that case. That which contributed to the improvement and advancement of the working classes was the truest economy for the whole community; and, therefore, he believed that allowing the exemption of rates in this case, would ultimately tend to diminish the rates which the metropolitan Members seemed so anxious to protect.

Mr. Ayrton

MR. PALK said, he thought that the opponents of the measure would be few and far between if it was solely directed to the improvement of education. But it stretched much further, and was rendered, by the looseness of its phraseology, dangerous to the very institutions which it was intended to benefit. The word "art" was a very broad term. Drawing was an art. Were they to afford the proposed boon to drawing academies? He thought there were plenty of those establishments in London already, without any encouragement by Act of Parliament. It was difficult, indeed, to say what the term "arts" would take in. He should support the Amendment.

MR. SPOONER said, that he should most certainly take the opinion of the Committee on the subject of leaving out these two words, the more especially as there was an intention on the part of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) to move the omission of the word "education," so that all their labours would be in vain.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE believed that extremely little benefit had arisen to any institution whatever by granting these exemptions. Nothing was calculated to create a greater feeling of illiberality to such institutions than granting them particular exemptions from taxes, while in nine cases out of ten the real benefit was received by the landlords of the houses in which they were located, who made the exemption of taxes a reason why an addition should be made to the rent. There was no justice in the present state of the law in reference to this matter, and he was satisfied not only of the injustice of exemptions as a general rule, but that they did no good to the institutions. Hon. Gentlemen argued the question as if the opponents of the Bill were the enemies of education, whereas the contrary was the fact. Believing that they would fail to accomplish the object sought by this clause, he should vote for the Amendment.

MR. COLLINS said, he objected on principle to the subsidizing of these institutions by Parliament against the wishes of the parishes themselves. There was a mechanics' institution in the town he represented, of which he was president, which was exempted from local rates; but that was by the wish of the inhabitants, and it worked extremely well. He disliked a compulsory exemption, however, as it tended to render these societies unpopular.

Question put, "That those words stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 131; Noes 81: Majority 50.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he should move the omission of the word "education" in the 14th line of the same clause. He would not have objected to exempt schools for the poor, but the word "education" was so general that it would exempt establishments of a very different kind.

Amendment proposed in line 14 to leave out the word "Education."

MR. W. EWART remarked, that he thought that the reasoning of the right hon. Gentleman went rather to the extension of the area embraced by the Bill than to its restriction.

MR. HARDY said, the object of the Bill was to overrule certain decisions of the Court of Queen's Bench. What was meant by "science," or "literature," or "education," or "art"? Would the word "art" include rope-dancing? The Judges would be placed under great difficulty in construing such words. It would be better to abolish all exemptions whatever. The societies spent in contesting their liability far more than the amount of the rates which could be claimed. He thought that while hospitals, churches, and other public buildings, were rated for the support of the poor, institutions like those comprised in this Bill ought also to be rated.

MR. PULLER said, he should support the principle of the Bill, as being already known to the law. He believed that the courts of law would so construe the clause as to avoid the difficulties which had been suggested by different hon. Members. With regard to the particular Amendment under consideration, it appeared to him that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie) ought, if he followed the just conclusion to be drawn from the observations with which he had introduced the Amendment, to give his support to the introduction of the word education.

MR. MILES suggested, that instead of the word "education," the words "places of instruction for the poor" should be inserted.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he should have been very willing to exempt such schools, but he was told it was impossible to bring them under the operation of this Bill, which contemplated societies having rules established for their management.

Question put, "That the word 'Education' stand part of the clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 82; Noes 111: Majority 29.

MR. HARDY then moved to insert the word "fine" before the word "art." The decisions of the Court of Queen's Bench had brought the law into a clear and intelligible state, and this clause without the Amendment would confuse it.

Amendment proposed, in line 14, after the word "the" to insert the word "Fine."

MR. HUTT opposed the Motion, on the ground that while it would exempt from the payment of rates galleries of painting and statuary, it would include institutions established for teaching reading, writing, and arithmetic, and for instructing the people in the art of chemistry and all branches of knowledge which might be illustrated by experiments.

MR. PALK said, he should support the Amendment. He had imagined the meaning of the clause to be in accordance with it, and that the insertion was unnecessary. But he now found that the words were intended to have a wider scope, and without the word "fine" the law would be evaded.

MR. W. EWART said, that the great object was to extend the study of the fine arts to art as applied to workmen. They wanted fine arts extended downwards.

Question put, "That the word 'Fine' be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 97; Noes 96: Majority 1.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE then proposed to insert the words "or elementary instruction." Such schools had an equal claim to exemption as any institution exempted by the Bill.

MR. BOUVERIE opposed the Amendment. The Committee had decided that exemptions should not be carried further than they were carried already.

MR. W. VANSITTART also opposed the Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HARDY said, he should move the addition of the word "exclusively" after the word "arts." As the clause stood, a large and exclusive luxurious building might be exempted by being associated with rooms devoted to the fine arts. There must be some limitation.

Another Amendment proposed, in line 14 after the word "Arts," to insert the word "exclusively."

MR. HUTT opposed the Amendment as unnecessary. The law already disqualified buildings of the kind alluded to. What the Judges would have to consider, would be the final object of the institutions which it was sought to exempt. They ought not to prevent their giving a cup of tea for the comfort of the members.

GENERAL THOMPSON said, he also opposed the Amendment. Surely it was not intended to do nothing for institutions which might be open only one day in the week, or one hour in the day. These were the very institutions of the poor; and if the House was sincere in its desire to promote such, some way would be found to give them the advantage of this Bill.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, that he also was in favour of some limitation. The Judges could not lay down a precise law, and it was impossible to say where they were to stop.

MR. W. EWART said, that the object of the Society of Arts, from which this Bill proceeded, was to get rid of the word "exclusive," because they found they could not extend the object of their institution under the actual law. The spirit of the proposed Bill would prevent any abuse.

MR. PEASE observed, that he hoped the House would not assent to an Amendment, the effect of which would be to exclude mechanics' institutes from the advantages of the Bill. If hon. Gentlemen objected to those institutions, or were opposed to the spread of education by such means, they should say so in terms. He must also deprecate those fine-drawn distinctions as being at variance with the principle established by repeated decisions of that House.

COLONEL SYKES remarked, that he wished to know whether, if the Amendment should be carried, the taking of a newspaper by a mechanics' institute would exclude it from the operation of the Bill?

MR. HARDY said, he thought it was unfair that those who objected to the form of this Bill, should be denounced as objecting to the spread of education. The Amendment was intended only to place the matter in the same position as it was in at present. Without the Amendment the clause would only give rise to incipient litigation. With the Amendment there would be no difficulty, as the law had been already clearly laid down by the Judges.

Question put, "That the word 'exclusively' be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 114; Noes 69: Majority 45.

Mr. Hutt

MR. HUTT said, after the decision of the Committee, which entirely changed the object of the measure, he did not think it would be of any use to proceed further, and he therefore should move, that the Chairman report progress.

House resumed.

[No Report.]

MEDICAL PROFESSION (No 1) BILL.

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Order for Committee read.

MR. HEADLAM, before moving that the Order for the Committee upon this Bill be discharged, wished to say a few words in explanation. After the House had assented to the second reading of the Bill, it became the duty of those who were charged with the conduct of it, to consider whether there was any prospect of being able to pass it during the present Session. It appeared to them that it would be useless to proceed at present. He wished, however, to call the attention of the Government to this important and difficult subject, and as the House had by a considerable majority sanctioned the measure he had introduced, he thought it would be the duty of the Government to bring in a Bill based upon the same principles. Should they do so, he undertook to give it his most earnest support; but if they should not do so, or should seek to legislate in the spirit of their recent Bill, he should offer his most strenuous opposition. With these remarks, he should now move, that the Order for the Committee be discharged.

Order discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

LAMBETH ELECTION—REPORT.

House informed, that the Committee had determined—

That William Roupell, esquire, is duly elected a Burgess to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Lambeth.

And the said Determination was ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

House further informed, that the Petition of Pattenou Nickalls and Robert Henry Bristowe is frivolous and vexatious.

Report to lie on the table.

It being Six of the clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House till To-morrow, without putting the Question.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, July 16, 1857.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1st Militia Ballots Suspension; Bill Chamber (Scotland); Glebe Lands (Ireland).

2<sup>d</sup> Prisoners Removal; Turnpike Trusts Abolition (Ireland).

THE INDIAN MUTINY—FINANCE.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords, I beg to call the attention of the noble Earl opposite to a notice which has been issued by the East India Company for tenders for steam vessels of not less than 1,000 tons burden each to convey troops to the number of 6,000 to Calcutta, the freight to be paid in India at the rate of 2s. 0½d. per rupee. About a fortnight ago I called the attention of the noble Earl to another notification on the part of the East India Company ordering a rate of exchange which would force remittances from India. It appears to me that the object of this proceeding is precisely the same, and I protest on the part of the Government of India and of the public service against any measure, the effect of which is to compel payment in India at the present time by the Calcutta Treasury of sums which might be better paid here. I know the difficulties in which that treasury must be involved. The Government of India is at present deprived of all financial resources from the North-Western Provinces. Madras pays for itself, but cannot help you. Bombay is subjected to heavy charges on account of the war with Persia, and will not pay more than its own expenses. The whole additional charges arising out of the military operations connected with the mutiny must be defrayed by the treasury at Calcutta, out of the revenues of Bengal alone. These charges will be enormous. I think the noble Earl is in error when he supposes that the Government of India will be capable for a considerable time to meet them. The noble Earl is in error when he supposes that there is a balance of £10,000,000, or anything like so large a sum in the Calcutta Treasury. The whole of that sum of £10,000,000, if it exists, is not in the Calcutta Treasury, upon which alone these expenses will fall; but in the treasuries of Madras and Bombay, as well as that of Calcutta. Some of the treasure which belongs to Bengal is scattered all over the Presidency, and a considerable portion is in that part of the Upper Presidency which is now in the possession of the insurgents. I believe, indeed, that three or four of these local treasuries have fallen into the hands of the mutineers in consequence of the delay in the advance of our troops, caused, as I stated the other night, by the heat of the weather, and by the want of carriage, but, as I now learn from authentic information, from the desire of General Anson to bring up a battering train. The whole of the treasure at Calcutta would not appear to be available for the purposes of the war. I understand that a large part of it has practically been appropriated, while another portion is in paper, and is, under present circumstances, of little or no value. The only fund really available is the coin, and that, I believe, forms no very considerable part of the entire amount. Now, very heavy charges have to be borne by the Bengal Treasury in respect of freight. I judge from this notice that the same system has been pursued in regard to other transmissions of troops; and in all cases it is agreed that this freight should be paid in India. First, there is the freight of 6,000 men, 3,000 of whom are of the Queen's service and 3,000 of the Company's service, who are going out as recruits to supply vacancies in the ranks of the army and not as reinforcements. Then there is the freight of eight regiments, which we are given to understand have already been ordered to proceed to India. Next the freight of the five regiments from China now comes due by India, to which has to be added the expense of conveying six regiments more. There will also be the freight of the artillery and the cavalry, if they are sent out, as I trust they will be. The charge for these different items will be enormous, and if they are all to be paid in India, and not here, depend upon it the Government of India will be perfectly unable to meet the heavy burden that will be thrown upon it for providing the means of transport for so vast a number of troops. This is a very serious consideration. The point of the most essential importance is, that the Government of India should have the means of making movable the force sent to them. If they cannot do that, the force might as well not be sent at all. I therefore trust this matter will engage the close and serious attention of Her Majesty's Government. For my own part, I feel satisfied that the moment is come when Her Majesty's Government must intervene with the credit of this country to enable the Court of Directors to pay their own expenses for a considerable period without any remittances from India. India is incapable of making those remittances without crippling her own resources—resources which it is absolutely necessary should be appropriated to furnishing the means of movement for the army, and for operations in the field. I hope Her Majesty's Government will afford that assistance without delay. It should be given to the extent of £5,000,000 sterling. The whole of that amount need not, however, be all paid down at once. If a loan of £5,000,000 were contracted for under the guarantee of Her Majesty's Government, it would only be requisite that a sum of £600,000 should be paid in the first month, the remainder to be raised by subsequent instalments of £400,000 each succeeding month until the entire amount is paid. It is my firm belief that a measure of this kind is indispensable, because it will be found that the draughts and remittances from India will cripple the power of the Government of that country, and render it incapable of doing that which is imperatively demanded by the interests of the empire.

EARL GRANVILLE, who spoke in a very low tone, was understood to say that he had had no opportunity of personally communicating with the authorities of India on the subject to which the noble Earl had referred. He was unable to state what was the exact amount in the Calcutta Treasury; he had, however, received information that the proposed mode of paying for the conveyance of these troops was in strict accordance with the usual practice; and he also understood that the Governor General had ample means at his disposal for defraying the charges for freight. The subjects to which the noble Earl had adverted were of the greatest importance, and he could assure their Lordships that they would receive the careful attention of the Home Government.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords, I do most earnestly hope that the noble Earl and the noble Duke opposite, who manifest so deep an interest in the affairs of India will take the trouble of looking into this matter themselves. They may depend upon it that they cannot safely trust to clerks either at the India House or at the India Board. Unless they examine into these affairs personally, and have before them a statement of the funds actually in the Treasury at Calcutta and in all the other treasuries of India at the very latest period at which the account was rendered; unless they ask questions with respect to those funds and ascertain how far they are really available for the purpose of military operations,—they may rely upon it that, with the best possible intentions, they will fall into the most grievous and fatal errors.

The Earl of Ellenborough

EARL GRANVILLE was understood to say that his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Control was not backward in fulfilling the duties imposed upon him by the present emergency; on the contrary, he was at that moment devoting his utmost energy and attention to the consideration of every measure adapted to meet that emergency.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords, that may be the belief of Her Majesty's Government; but I communicate very extensively with gentlemen connected with India, and I never meet one man among them who has not the most thorough distrust of the right hon. Gentleman now at the head of the Board of Control.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY (CAPITAL) BILL.

THIRD READING.

Bill read 3<sup>a</sup>, with the Amendments.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, he wished to refer to the circumstances under which this measure came before the House. The object of the Bill was, to settle from what fund the losses sustained by this company through the frauds committed by Leopold Redpath, lately one of its own officers, should be made up, and the proposal was, to throw upon the preference shareholders in the company the liability for a portion of the losses occasioned by the Redpath frauds. There could be no doubt that the directors of the company were well acquainted with the antecedents of Redpath, and aware of his extravagant habits; to such an extent was his extravagance carried, that, although he was only a clerk at a salary of £200 a year, he lived in most affluent style, and thought proper, at the Paris Exhibition, to compete with the Emperor himself for the possession of a work of art, which he succeeded in obtaining at a cost of 700 guineas. Yet this person was allowed to commit frauds to the extent of a quarter of a million of money—and those frauds were vast in number, and spread over several years; and during all that time the directors shut their eyes, and did not take even ordinary pains to inquire into and ascertain the state of their share list. What was a railway company but a large partnership? and what would be said of a partnership, the members of which did not know who were their partners, or to whom the dividends of profits were payable? The shares which Redpath had forged, it had been thought prudent by the company to acknowledge; but, as yet, he had not heard any argument to show that, in point of law, those shares were to be created at the cost of the preference shareholders. The chairman of the company was a gentleman of great respectability, whom he had the pleasure of knowing; and he (Lord St. Leonards) had impeached the conduct of that gentleman as a public director of the company in connection with his co-directors without the use of unseemly language; but that gentleman had acted otherwise, and in bringing his (Lord St. Leonards') name prominently forward at a recent meeting of the shareholders had spoken of him, though certainly much to the distaste of the meeting, in a most disrespectful manner. He actually stated, although he had an accurate report before him of what he (Lord St. Leonards) had said, that he (Lord St. Leonards) had himself advised the repudiation of the stock. Now, he begged to say, that he had never uttered a word of the sort. What he did say was, that as the company were not legally bound, it was merely a question of policy as regarded the Stock Exchange, whether the forged shares should be acknowledged or not. The question then arose, how these frauds should be met. The directors at first proposed to capitalize the amount of the loss, making it represent so much additional capital. He (Lord St. Leonards) had been charged with speaking from interest on this subject, but he had directed the whole of his interest in the company to be sold, and it was only because a small portion of it would not fetch near its value that it alone remained unsold. He was willing to sustain a loss rather than be exposed to this charge. No man, indeed, who valued his property, would choose to leave any portion of it under such a direction. His noble Friend the Chairman of Committees (Lord Redesdale) thought that, as there had been great neglect on the part of the directors, the proper way would be to withhold all dividends upon the stock which they held by way of qualification until the loss was made up. But the directors now proposed to meet the loss by appropriating the whole of the half year's dividend, amounting to nearly £250,000, to the extinction of the forged capital, by buying up so much of it as would reduce the capital of the company to the amount at which it stood before the forgeries took place. But, if such a proceeding could be equitably taken, the loss might have been thrown over several half-years, since there were many persons, including women, whose whole dependence was upon the dividends of this company; and the loss and inconvenience to such persons from cutting off an entire half-year's income could scarcely be overrated. The arrangement which the Bill proposed to carry into effect would, no doubt, operate very well upon the Stock Exchange, but it dealt with the interests of the preference shareholders in a manner which he trusted their Lordships would not sanction. He, for one, was prepared to maintain that, according to the correct view of the obligations into which the directors had entered with those shareholders, they were entitled to receive payment before the other shareholders, and he apprehended that no reasonable doubt could be raised by anybody as to the justice of the opinion that the Act of Parliament provided, that each year should be made to answer its own particular engagements. If that were the case, then the loss occasioned to the company by the frauds which had been committed ought, at all events, instead of being thrown over one-half, to be extended over the whole of the current year. He must warn their Lordships that, if they were to strike at the interests of the preferential shareholders by passing the Bill as it stood, they would, while conferring a benefit upon certain parties, do much damage to the railway interest in general. Upon public grounds, therefore, he should call upon their Lordships not to take that course. The Bill, as it came up to them from the House of Commons, simply provided, that the money in the hands of the company should be devoted to making good the defalcations which had taken place; but the interests of the preferential shareholders were left untouched—at least there was nothing in the Bill to negative them; but the Committee of their Lordships' House, to whom the Bill had been referred, instead of allowing the clause which had been framed with that object to continue as it stood, had added to it certain words to the effect that the payment should be actually binding and conclusive on all the shareholders. Now, the effect of that proposition, if carried out, would be, that no preference shareholder, whatever his right at law might be, would be in a position to prosecute that right either against the directors or against the company generally. Nothing, therefore, he should maintain, could be more unjust than the adoption of the recommendation of the Committee. The preference shareholders, in acceding to the Bill as it had been brought up from the other House of Parliament, considered that they were submitting to what was a very grievous burden; and their Lordships must bear in mind that, at the last meeting of the shareholders, a majority, although a small one, of those who were present were opposed to the measure as it stood. It must also be taken into account, that the number of ordinary was much greater than the number of preference shareholders, so that, of course, the latter were completely overruled by the former. As for the proxies, there was very little reliance to be placed upon them, inasmuch as those who had signed them had been told that they would not receive a dividend at all if the Bill did not pass. The subject was one in reference to which he had had a great number of letters addressed to him, and it had excited great public interest; and he could only say, in conclusion, that if their Lordships were to pass the Bill in its present shape, the infliction of a great hardship upon the preference shareholders would be the result. The promoters of the Bill, it was true, had the opinion of the Attorney General in their favour; but he had the opinion of other counsel to the effect that the preference shareholders were entitled to a full year's interest. Under these circumstances he should move that the words added by the Committee of their Lordships' House, and to which he had referred—namely, "And therefore the said sum of £243,923 5s. 8d. shall be considered to have been duly divided among all classes of the shareholders of the company," be omitted, and the Bill thus allowed to stand in the position in which it was when it had come up from the House of Commons.

Moved, To leave out from ("respectively") to the end of the clause.

LORD WENSLEYDALE said, that, like his noble and learned Friend, he unfortunately was a preference shareholder in this company, but not to a considerable extent. When he understood what the measure was which had been introduced into the House of Commons, he and the other preference shareholders petitioned against it. Their petition was not successful. When the measure came on for a second reading in this House, he thought he had a right, as a Member of Parliament, to express an opinion that the loss ought to come out of the annual profits. The effect of the measure as it now stood was unjust. He wished not to be precluded from any rights he might have at law by any decision of their Lordships.

Lord St. Leonards

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMINSTER said, the point they had before them at that moment was, whether they should consult the views and interests of the preferential shareholders, or the interest of the shareholders in general. The Attorney General had given his approval of the Bill, and it was then placed before the Committee of the House of Commons, and received their unanimous sanction. The noble and learned Lord opposite talked of the hardship of depriving the preferential shareholders of their dividends; but was it not also a hardship to deprive the ordinary shareholders of their dividends? And this ought also to be considered, that by the arrangement proposed by the noble and learned Lord, the preferential shareholders would receive the whole and the others get nothing; whereas, by the Bill as it stood, the preferential shareholders would not suffer as much as the ordinary shareholders, but would not receive the full amount of their interest. The Committee of the House of Commons and the Committee of their Lordships' House had come to the unanimous conclusion that this course ought to be followed, and he trusted it would receive their Lordships' support.

THE EARL OF STRADBROKE was understood to support the Bill as it stood. If the proposition of his noble and learned Friend was carried, the preferential shareholders would altogether escape from the loss.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, that he had not argued in favour of the preference shareholders; his only object was to restore the Bill to the state in which it came from the House of Commons.

LORD REDESDALE said, that when the first Bill was introduced upon this subject, it was proposed to capitalize the amount with which the company had been fraudulently charged. He conceived that that was a principle of a most dangerous character, and he added to his disapproval of this measure the expression of his opinion, that the directors were greatly to blame, and that if Parliament were applied to to permit the loss to be carried over a length of time, it would be very proper that the dividends payable on the directors' qualifications should be suspended during that time, and applied as part of the funds to make good this loss. As concerned the Bill as it now stood, he confessed he was disposed to adhere to the decision of the proprietors, who had come to the conclusion that the loss should be paid out of the dividend of a single half-year. The preference shareholders were by no means an unimportant minority of the proprietary, and, as this decision had been come to, he was not disposed to interfere with it.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, he was inclined to concur in what had been said by his noble Friend, and to regard these words as merely explanatory of what was the view taken by the House of Commons. A preference shareholder had no right to be relieved from his share of any burden imposed upon his brother proprietors, over whom he had no advantage except as to the priority of title to dividend when the receipts were not sufficient to satisfy the claims of all shareholders. The object of this Bill, which was approved by a large majority at a meeting of proprietors, at which the preference shareholders were well represented, was to prevent further litigation, and he therefore thought that their Lordships would do greater justice to all parties by allowing the Bill to remain as it had been altered by the Committee than by omitting these phrases, which were only supplemental words put in to carry out the intention of the other House of Parliament.

On Question, Whether the words proposed to be left out shall stand part of the Bill? their Lordships divided:—Contents 43; Not-Contents 7: Majority 36.

CONTENTS.

Newcastle, D.	Chichester, E.
Breadalbane, M.	Cowper, E.
Westminster, M. [ Teller. ]	Essex, E.
	Fortescue, E.
	Glengall, E.
Airlie, E.	Granville, E.
Beauchamp, E.	Harrowby, E.
	Lucan, E.

Romney, E.	Dacre, L.
Stradbroke, E.	De Mauley, L.
	De Tabley, L.
Bolingbroke and St. John, V.	Foley, L. [ Teller. ]
Falmouth, V.	Minster, L. ( M. Conyngham. )
Melville, V.	Mostyn, L.
Sydney, V.	Oriel, L. ( V. Massereene. )
Torrington, V.	Panmure, L.
Ripon, Bp.	Ponsonby, L. ( E. Bessborough. )
Aveland, L.	Redesdale, L.
Bagot, L.	Rivers, L.
Broughton, L.	Saye and Sele, L.
Byron, L.	Stanley of Alderley, L.
Camoy, L.	Sundridge, L. ( D. Argyll. )
Churchill, L.	Wrottesley, L.
Clandebye, L. ( L. Dufferin and Claneboye. )

NOT-CONTENTS.

Manchester, D. [ Teller. ]	Congleton, L.
Graham, E. ( D. Montrose. )	Saint Leonards, L.
	Wensleydale, L.
Dungannon, V. [ Teller. ]	Wynford, L.

On the Motion of Lord WENSLEYDALE the following proviso was added to Clause 5—

"Provided, also, that nothing herein contained shall in any way affect the right, if any, of the company or the proprietors of the shares therein to recover against their directors or officers of the said company for any neglect or misconduct on their part in the matters in the recital of this Act mentioned."

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

CROWDED DWELLINGS PREVENTION BILL.

COMMITTEE ON RECOMMITMENT.

House in Committee (on recommitment) (according to order).

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, that a justification of the additional powers which the Bill would grant to remedy the evils of crowded dwellings would be found in a Report of the Commissioners of Police on the subject. The Act of 1851 had been beneficial beyond expectation. A better class of lodging-houses had sprung up, and accommodation of a higher standard was provided without increased payment. A case that had occurred under the amended Act furnished an example of the nature and extent of the evils which arose in lodging-houses not controlled by law—

"At a house, No. 17, Lincoln Court, St. Giles's, in one room ten feet square, wherein three persons would be allowed by the regulations now enforced, seven men, nine women, and one child, were found huddled together in a most filthy state; the bedding dirty beyond description, no partitions or ventilation; and a few minutes before the visit of the officer one of the women had been confined. The keeper was summoned on the 24th of October, 1854, to Bow Street Police Court, and fined £4, or six weeks' imprisonment."

Not less than forty-eight medical men, being the metropolitan medical officers of their several districts, and living in the most densely crowded parts of the metropolis, attested the beneficial effects of the law. They stated that there had been a complete cessation of fever in these lodging-houses, that there had been a great diminution in other diseases, a disappearance of vermin, and an increase of cleanliness, decency, and order. Forty medical men from the provincial districts gave their testimony to the same effect. The Report of the Commissioners of Police issued a few weeks ago stated—

"The Act (says the Report of 1857) for the well-ordering of Common Lodging-houses has now been in operation since the year 1851, and has been attended by most beneficial results. Before this enactment the evils existing in the lodging-houses of the poor were beyond description. Crowded and filthy, without water or ventilation, without the least regard to cleanliness or decency, they were hotbeds of disease, misery, and crime. Under the operation of the Act the evils attending such houses have been in a great degree removed or abated. It must, of course, be a work of time to establish a complete system of supervision, and there will be need of constant vigilance to maintain it; but a vast amount of improvement, sanitary and moral, has been already effected. The houses are now much improved and daily improving, the keepers are of a better class, and, without increase of payment, the accommodation provided for the poor is, in all respects, of a higher standard. These results will, without doubt, follow in greater degree as the operation of the law extends itself and becomes more searching and complete."

He remembered the state of the lodging-houses of the metropolis before the Act of 1851, and he could assure their Lordships that the change approached the marvellous. Instead of dirt, impurity, and indecency, there was now cleanliness, decency, and order. He would take one sample. In Mint Street there was a lodging-house called "Jack Sheppard's house," which used to be frequented by such a desperate class of inmates that the police seldom dared to visit it even in the discharge of their duty. This House used to be a hotbed of vice, crime, and disease, but it was now precisely the reverse. He paid this house a visit not long ago, and he found in it eighty inmates in the common rooms, all peaceful and orderly, some engaged in cooking, others in eating, reading, or conversation. He next went upstairs, where he found everything sweet and clean, and when he spoke to the inmates they said that the change had been greater than they could have supposed it in the power of any Act of Parliament to produce. The Scripture readers and city missionaries now had access to these houses, and a great effect was produced by their ministrations. On the Sunday before last one of the missionaries went his round through one of the most populous districts of the metropolis, which used also to be one of the most degraded. He found every one of these lodging-houses vacant, the whole body of the inmates having gone to attend the evening service in Exeter Hall. He felt bound to express his deep gratitude to the Commissioners of Police for the manner in which they had carried into effect the provisions of the statute. The labour thereby imposed upon the police had been very great. The Commissioners stated in their Report—

The Earl of Shaftesbury

"In enforcing the provisions of the Common Lodging-houses Act, great care has been taken to impress upon the minds of the officers engaged in this duty the necessity of consideration and forbearance. The result of this system has been highly gratifying. During a period exceeding five years ending 1857, about 700,655 visits have been made, both by day and by night, among a class of persons deemed almost incorrigible, without the occurrence of one assault on any of the officers, and without one just complaint of intrusion into a 'private dwelling.'"

The weekly distance travelled by the police in carrying out this Act was 800 miles, exclusive of the labour of mounting upstairs, diving into cellars, going to fetch medical men, and making their reports. Every night from 40,000 to 50,000 persons slept in these registered lodging-houses, and whenever he had paid night visits to these places he had found the Act duly carried out, and the rooms strictly sweet, wholesome, and well ventilated. There was, nevertheless, something to be done, and it was necessary that a certain class of houses and rooms should be brought within the beneficial regulations of the Act. These were tenement houses or tenement rooms as they were called, which were occupied by a number of persons professing to be members of a single family, one of whom paid the rent. The principle of English law, that "every man's house (or room) was his castle," was here grossly abused. The magistrates, whom he did not blame, had ruled that although a single room might be tenanted by a vast number of people, yet that if the person who hired the house or the room, and who paid the rent, declared that all the persons living with him were members of the same family, that was a private room or house, and could not be brought within the Act. The Report of the Metropolitan Police for 1857 gave the following description of one of these tenement rooms—

“ In the occupation by families of single rooms all the evils incident to the crowding of persons together without regard to age or sex are produced. On visiting a house in Church Lane, St. Giles's, soon after midnight, there were found in a room, measuring 14 feet 6 inches by 14 feet 6 inches, no less than thirty-seven men, women, and children, all lying together on the floor like beasts, with scarcely any other covering than the clothes taken from their persons, which they had worn throughout the day. On opening the door leading into this loathsome place the heat was so great and the odour so offensive as to make it nearly unsupportable. No means whatever were employed to ventilate the room, except the chimney.”

Dr. Letheby, the able medical officer of the City Board of Health, said in his valuable Report for the present year that there were—

“ Numerous instances where adults of both sexes, belonging to different families, are lodged in the same room, regardless of all the common decencies of life, herding together like brute beasts; where all the offices of nature are performed in the most public and offensive manner, where every human instinct of decency is smothered—a woman suffering in travail in the midst of males and females of different families that tenant the same room, birth and death going hand in hand.”

A scientific man would tell their Lordships that “ in such a polluted atmosphere it was not surprising that epidemic and other infectious maladies should almost decimate the population.” These persons, occupying tenement houses or rooms, as he had stated, were excluded from the operation of the Bill, because they declared that they were all members of the same family. The definition of the word “ family,” as given in the Bill, embraced within its compass the relations of grandfather and grandmother, and must, he thought, be regarded as sufficiently liberal in its character. It would, in fact, leave a large number of homes which would be untouched by the law; and yet the testimony of the inspecting sergeants of police, as well as of medical men of the greatest eminence throughout the country, was to the effect that, unless those houses containing single families were brought under the control of legislation, the ravages which fever and disease committed among the lower classes could never effectually be put an end to. But, although he felt that the Bill did not go so far as it was desirable that it should, he had to a great extent paid regard to the dwellings of private families notwithstanding; but it was his opinion that no great hardship would be inflicted upon them if they were, as far as possible, brought under the operation of the Common Lodging-houses Act, and thus enabled to enjoy the advantages of an improved ventilation and greater cleanliness. The 4th clause of the Bill gave to the Commissioners of Police the power of calling upon the local authorities to put into operation the Nuisances Removal Act of 1855, section 29, and having stated thus much he believed he had put their Lordships in possession at least of the substance of the measure. It was one of a character very simple and very short. It conferred no new powers, although it assigned some new duties, and if it were permitted to pass into a law it would, he felt assured, conduce to the removal of many evils, the magnitude of which could be ascertained by personal observation alone. In making an effort of that kind their Lordships had to deal with a class of people who, however degraded they might seem, were good at the bottom, and who were animated by aspirations nobler than their position enabled them to carry into effect. In helping these persons, so far as to give them the power to help themselves, their Lordships would be conferring upon them a great boon, and he felt assured that every effort which was made in that direction would be amply repaid by the increased industry and comfort of which it would be productive, and by the gratitude which it would inevitably evoke.

Amendment made. The Report thereof to be received To-morrow.

JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES BILL.

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

LORD WENSLEYDALE moved the insertion of a clause to the effect that judgment creditors should not be deprived, as the Bill proposed, of that priority of claim which the fact of having obtained a judgment under the operation of the existing law conferred. His Lordship added that the creditors of the Newcastle Bank complained of the measure in that respect, and were the advocates of the Amendment which he suggested.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR opposed the clause. The Bill had received the approval of the other House, and was intended to remedy a defect in the existing law which enabled every creditor of a bank to bring an action against the company, and then to take out execution against each of the shareholders, thus multiplying the proceedings to an unlimited extent. This Bill now adopted the provision in the late Bankruptcy Act, by which five-sixths of the creditors could make an arrangement which would bind the other sixth, with a view to a settlement of their claims, and in such a case the whole assets would be placed in one common fund and distributed rateably among the creditors. He thought that the proposition made by the noble and learned Lord came somewhat ungraciously from the creditors of the Newcastle Bank, who had already received 2s. in the pound upon their debts, and he therefore trusted that their Lordships would not listen to it.

Amendment negatived.

Bill reported, without Amendment.

Amendment made ; and Bill to be read 3<sup>a</sup> To-morrow.

THE NATIONAL SURVEY.

MOTION FOR COMMITTEE.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH, in rising to move that a Committee be appointed to inquire into the question of what was the proper scale for a national survey, said, that he was inclined to bring the subject before their Lordships by what had taken place in the other House of Parliament. At one time the 1-inch scale, at another the 6-inch scale, and at another the 25-inch scale had been approved, and each in turn had been condemned, and he thought that it would be most desirable that the question should be finally set at rest by the Report of a Commission of persons whose experience qualified them to form a correct judgment on the subject. The national survey had been lingering on since the year 1827, when the southern counties of England had been surveyed on the scale of one inch to the mile. In 1824, when for the purpose of valuation of town lands in Ireland it was necessary that that country should be surveyed, a Committee of the other House of Parliament, presided over by Lord Montague, then Mr.

Lord Wensleydale

Spring Rice, had decided that a survey on the 1-inch scale would be useless, and they recommended, and the Government adopted their recommendation, that the survey should be on a scale of not less than six inches to the mile. The survey of England was therefore suspended ; and when resumed, the 6-inch scale was adopted for the northern counties, and for the whole of Ireland. In 1840 it was proposed that Scotland should be surveyed on the 6-inch scale. Now, the 6-inch scale was too large for military or geographical purposes, but was not large enough for other purposes, such as tithe computation or valuation, as had been proved by the survey of Ireland on that scale having been found useless for those purposes. In Ireland, for the purpose of valuation, a new survey had been made ; and if the original survey had been on the 25-inch scale, it could have been made at a less cost than had been caused by the 6-inch scale. He believed that the cost of a survey on the 25-inch scale was about 11½d. an acre, while that on the 6-inch was 10½d., so that the difference in the original expense was not very great. As to the idea that Scotch landowners wished to get their estates surveyed at the public cost, such an idea was absurd, inasmuch as their estates had already been surveyed ; but he felt that, for general purposes, a survey on the 25-inch scale would be most advantageous, as had been proved in France and other continental countries.

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to be graciously pleased to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the whole subject of the National Survey, and upon the Scale or Scales on which it should be made and on which it should be published."

LORD PANMURE said, he entirely approved the object of his noble Friend's Motion. It had been stated in another place that this survey was a job. He could not see upon what ground that assertion was made, because, in his opinion, a great national survey could be of no interest to any single individual so much as to the public at large, who were to benefit by it. The survey was originally commenced on a small scale, which was afterwards extended. It had proceeded to a certain length in England when it was stopped, in order that the survey of Ireland, which a Committee of the House of Commons had decided should be on the 6-inch scale, might be completed. The 6-inch scale had been found inapplicable to the national purposes of a survey, and, acting upon that experience, Colonel James, the able superintendent of these operations (than whom there was no one better qualified to direct them), suggested the adoption of a 25-inch scale for the remainder of England and for the whole of Scotland, the survey of which country had not been commenced. It had been said that the adoption of this scale for the north of England and Scotland was a job to satisfy the country gentlemen of that part of the empire. Now, he would undertake to say that there was not a landed proprietor in that part of the country who had not already been compelled to survey his estate for his own purposes. The maps so produced, however, were not maps by which the public could be guided, and if there were to be any national document at all, there ought to be a national survey of the whole country eventually carried out upon one scale, but which he would not take upon himself to say. The other House of Parliament had decided upon the scale three or four times, and each time it had pronounced a different opinion. He therefore thought that the course proposed by the Motion of his noble Friend opposite was the most sensible one which could be pursued in this matter. An hon. Member of the other House had said that he should have no confidence in any Commission which might be appointed by the Government. If a Commission was appointed, however, it should consist of such men as the Presidents of the Royal and Geographical Societies, joined with others eminent for scientific or legal attainments. It would then be for that Commission to decide, once for all, on what scale the national survey should be conducted, and for the House of Commons to say at what rate the public money should be expended for conducting it upon that particular scale. All he could do, pending the labours of the Commission, was to complete the survey on the 25-inch scale of such parishes as had already been begun; he could not undertake any fresh surveys upon that scale. He consented to the Motion of his noble Friend, and would take the greatest possible pains to form a satisfactory Commission.

After a few words from the Duke of Buccleuch,

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at Eight o'clock till Tomorrow, half after Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, July 16, 1857.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILL.—1° Police (Scotland); Canada and New Brunswick Boundaries; Chelsea New Bridge.
2° Assessments (Scotland); Loan Societies; Commons Inclosure; Dulwich College; Public Works (Ireland).
3° Fraudulent Trustees, &c.

HUNTINGDON COUNTY ELECTION.

The names of the Five Members appointed to try and determine the matter of the Petitions complaining of an undue Election and Return for the County of Huntingdon were called over; and Sir Edward Dering not being in the House, Mr. Speaker informed the House, that he had received a Letter from Sir Edward Dering, stating that his health rendered him incapable of a protracted attendance upon the Committee, and that Dr. Latham was prepared to give evidence at the Bar that his attendance from day to day would materially injure his health. Letter read, as follows:—

"House of Commons,
"July 14, 1857.

Sir,—I have been selected by the General Committee to serve on the Huntingdon Election Committee, and I beg to submit to you some reasons why I venture to hope that the House may be pleased to dispense with my attendance. I was sent abroad last year on account of my health, and the result is, that I am now quite competent to discharge the ordinary duties of attendance in the House, but as the Huntingdon Committee involves a scrutiny of a very protracted nature, I think it only fair towards the Committee, as well as to myself, to express my conviction that I am not at this moment physically capable of undergoing the labour attendant on a lengthened investigation. My medical adviser (Dr. Latham) is prepared to state at the Bar of the House that he is clearly of opinion that a close attendance from day to day for a considerable period would materially injure my health, and be likely to bring back those infirmities for which he sent me abroad last year. Under these circumstances, Sir, I beg to leave my case entirely in the hands of the House, and to express my entire readiness to abide cheerfully by their decision.

"I have the honour to remain, Sir,

"Your obedient Servant,

"EDWARD CHOLM. DERING.

"The Right Hon. The Speaker,
&c. &c. &c.

MR. WALPOLE said, he thought the best course would be to summon Dr. Latham to the bar and examine him, and he should move accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

Dr. Latham was called in and came to the bar; but afterwards, on the Motion of SIR GEORGE GREY, he was ordered to withdraw, and he withdrew accordingly.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he wished to ask his right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole) as the Chairman of the General Committee of Elections, whether he was satisfied that the House had the power now to entertain these objections. Ought they not to have been made to the General Committee and decided upon by them?

MR. WALPOLE said, the General Committee were bound to proceed according to the provisions of the 11 & 12 Vict., c. 98. After a Committee had been selected to try a particular election petition, it was the duty of the General Committee to give notice to each of the Members so selected. On the following day, hon. Gentlemen might attend the General Committee and state their reasons why they should not be required to serve. The only objections, however, which could be urged were those contained in the 56th section—namely, “by reason of having voted at the election, or by reason of being the party on whose behalf the seat is claimed, or related to him, or to the sitting Member, by kindred or affinity in the first or second degree, according to the canon law.” The usual course, when the objection was founded on the ground now taken, was to write to the General Committee previously to the selection, stating the facts on which the claim to exemption was based; the claim would then be recognized by the General Committee, if made before the Select Committee was chosen; but they had no power to do so afterwards, and, as the case of Sir Edward Dering was only submitted to them yesterday, all they could do was to report to the House the Committee as they had chosen it. The House, however, had the power of dealing with the subject under the 71st section of the Act, which enacted that “if on the day first appointed for swearing the said Committee sufficient cause be shown to the House, before its rising, why the attendance of any Member of the Committee should be dispensed with, the said Committee shall be taken to be discharged.” The case of the Huntingdon election was a peculiar one. There had been a double return, two of the candidates having polled an equal number of votes; it was likely to be a long inquiry, and it was extremely important that the members of any Committee appointed should be fully qualified to attend from the beginning to the end of the proceedings, in order that the scrutiny might be properly conducted. Now, if it appeared from Dr. Latham’s evidence that the health of one of the hon. Members was likely to break down before the Committee had terminated its labours, it would be very desirable that the Committee should be discharged and a new one appointed; therefore the best course they could now take was to call in Dr. Latham, and examine him as to the health of Sir Edward Dering.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, there could be but one feeling on this subject, and that was, to consult as much as possible the feelings of hon. Members in such a case; but when they were proceeding under an Act of Parliament it was essential that the course adopted by the House should be sanctioned by that Act. Now, the 69th section enacted, that if any Member of the Select Committee did not attend in his place on the day appointed for swearing the said Committee, or left the House before it was sworn, he should be ordered into the custody of the Serjeant-at-Arms for such neglect of his duty, and should be otherwise punished or censured at the discretion of the House, “unless it appeared to the House, by fact specially stated, and verified upon oath, that such Member was, by a sudden accident, or by necessity prevented from attending the House.” In the present instance, however, there was no plea of “sudden accident or necessity;” the words of the Act were strict and specific; Sir Edward Dering was in his place; and, that being so, it appeared to him (Sir George Grey) that the hon. Baronet must be sworn. The clause quoted by his right hon. Friend seemed only to give the House power, upon cause shown, to dispense with the attendance of any Member on the day fixed for swearing in the Committee.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, this inconvenience would follow if the course of the right hon. Gentleman were adopted: the Committee would have to go on in this important case with four Members. If the clause could be brought to cover the case, through the evidence of Dr. Latham, it would be the best course to discharge the Committee.

SIR GEORGE GREY: If it can be done legally I have no objection whatever.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, there was a sufficient reason why Sir E. Dering’s attendance should be dispensed with, if Dr. Latham’s evidence was sufficiently strong as to his ill health.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE said, he thought the clause might well bear the interpretation, that if the fact were stated to the House that the hon. Member in question could not attend to the duties of the Committee, that alone might be considered a sufficient cause for the House to dispense with hon. Members attending to be sworn at the table. He was of opinion that Sir E. Dering ought not to be called to the table to be sworn. Of course, the Committee of Elections only wished for the opinion of the House on the subject.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he concurred with his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Walpole) that Sir E. Dering having been once nominated, the Committee of Elections could not now entertain the objection made, and that it was for the House itself to deal with it. If Sir E. Dering was present at the table, and assigned such a reason as had already been assigned for his non-attendance, it would be competent for the House further to inquire and to examine Dr. Latham, and then, the evidence being sufficient, to dispense with his attendance. It was most important that the House should adhere to the words of the statute, or else the proceedings of the Committee might be afterwards held to have been coram non judice, and the whole inquiry fall to the ground.

SIR JOHN HANMER said, the same thing took place last year in reference to the case of Mr. Lascelles, when the medical man was examined. The Committee was, in that case, discharged and re-appointed, and he did not see why the same course should not be here pursued.

MR. WALPOLE said, that with a view to regularity in the discussion he should move that Dr. Latham be called in and examined at the bar.

SIR GEORGE GREY observed, that he would not offer any further objection to that course, having given his opinion as to what ought to be the course of proceeding.

MR. ROEBUCK said, it seemed to him that the House was about to subject Sir E. Dering to a system of torture. The right hon. Baronet (Sir G. Grey) appeared to think that Sir E. Dering ought to serve on the Committee until he broke down. Now, surely that was a course which the House in its humanity—to say nothing of its common sense—would not adopt. The House was the sole judge in this matter, and was free to determine whether upon the evidence of Dr. Latham it was probable that the hon. Baronet could serve upon the Committee.

SIR EDWARD DERING said, he was exceedingly sorry that his ill health should have taken up so much of the valuable time of the House of Commons, but he should be still more sorry if the House could, for one moment, suppose that any statement in the letter he had addressed to the Speaker was not true to the letter. He did not know that he could add anything to the statements contained in that letter. If this had been an ordinary Election Committee he should not have attempted to shirk the duty imposed on him; but hearing that it would involve a scrutiny and the investigation of 240 separate cases, he thought it was only right to express a conviction that he was at this moment physically incapable of serving upon such a Committee. However, if the House thought he ought to serve, he would do so as long as he had any strength; but if the House dispensed with his attendance, he should feel grateful. He would act according to the pleasure of the House, and submitted himself to their pleasure.

Question, that Dr. Latham be again called, put, and agreed to.

Dr. Latham was accordingly called in and examined upon oath, in relation to the health of Sir Edward Dering. In reply to questions from the SPEAKER, witness stated, that he had attended Sir E. Dering last year, and had advised him to go abroad during the winter. Had been consulted again within the last few days, and was of opinion that Sir E. Dering had begun to show the infirmity for which he sent him abroad in 1856. He greatly feared that Sir Edward's health would be likely to sink under a protracted attendance, day by day, on a Committee.

The witness was then ordered to withdraw.

MR. WALPOLE said, that after hearing the evidence of Dr. Latham there could hardly be a doubt as to the course which ought to be taken. He begged, accordingly, to move, that the attendance of Sir E. Dering on the Committee appointed to consider the Huntingdon County Election Petition be dispensed with, and that the said Committee be taken to be discharged.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the attendance of Sir Edward Dering upon the said Committee be dispensed with, and that the said Committee shall be taken to be discharged."

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he wished to point out that the Committee in question had not yet been sworn. There was no one in the House who must not assent to the wish that Sir E. Dering should be discharged, but he thought the course more conformable to the statute would be to swear him first, and to excuse him after. His sole object was to maintain the legality of these proceedings. He denied altogether the assertion of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Roebuck) that it was wholly in the power of the House to deal with such a question. The whole object of the 11 & 12 Vict., c. 98, was, to take it out of the power of the House.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL moved the following Amendment:—

"That it appears to this House that sufficient cause has been shown why the attendance of Sir E. Dering as a Member of the Huntingdon Election Committee should be dispensed with."

MR. WALPOLE said, he had no objection to withdraw his Motion in favour of that submitted by the hon. and learned Gentleman.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Resolved, "That, in the opinion of this House, sufficient cause has been shown to this House why the attendance of Sir Edward Dering, as a Member of the said Committee, should be dispensed with."

FALKIRK ELECTION—PETITION.

MR. COBBETT said, he rose to draw the attention of the House to the circumstances stated in the petition of James Merry, esq., as they concerned the privileges of the House, and at the same time he would express a hope that the House would accede to the Motion that the General Committee of Elections appoint a Select Committee of five Members to inquire into this petition, and to have power to send for papers, persons, and reports. To this subject he had yesterday adverted, when he presented the petition, but he must now enter upon it at some further length. A petition had been exhibited to Mr. Rickards, the examiner, with recognizances on the 19th of May, but between that time and the 21st either a totally different petition had been substituted, or the original petition had been so far altered by erasures and interlineations, as to be wholly different from that filed in the first instance. He had inquired closely into the facts, and he would state the nature of the evidence to be given before the Committee for the appointment of which he asked. It was thought at first this petition concerned some informality as to recognizances, which informality was cured; but the defect was not a mere informality, and a question arose whether or not there was a petition at all subsisting, regarding the Falkirk district of Burghs. There could be no doubt the recognizance was entered into in this case on the 19th of May last, before Mr. Rickards. Mr. Rickards would prove this. Mr. Rose, agent for the petitioner, would prove that after the petition had been shown to Mr. Rickards, as it appeared to have been in some respects objectionable, it was sent back to Falkirk, and another petition sent back and presented to the House on the 21st of May—but there was this extraordinary fact that the signature of Mr. Rickards was alleged to be to both petitions. He did not impute any fraud, but only mistake. It was proper, however, in order to prevent the recurrence of such inconveniences in future, that investigation should be made. It ought to be ascertained whether or not the petition now existing was not wholly invalid, inasmuch as no recognizances had been entered into in the subsequent or second petition.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That it be an Instruction to the General Committee of Elections, that they do appoint a Select Committee, consisting of five Members, to consider the case of the Petition of James Merry, esquire, relative to the Falkirk Burghs, presented on the 15th instant, and to whom the said Petition shall be referred."

SIR GEORGE GREY observed that, assuming all the facts in the petition to be as stated by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Oldham, the objection arose that there were no recognizances at all. If, then, such were the case, the Act prescribed a clear and distinct course—namely, that within ten days after the presentation of the petition, the parties ought to have had their complaints before the examiner of recognizances, who was bound, within five days, to inquire and examine witnesses on oath; and the decision of the examiner of recognizances, as to their validity, was, under the Act, final and conclusive. No reason had been assigned why the parties had not taken this course; the events referred to had taken place two months ago; and yet no complaint had been made till the very day when the Committee was to be sworn. It was quite clear the petitioners should have followed the course pointed out by the Act of Parliament, and the House could not now entertain the matter. Such was his deliberate opinion, as the provision of the Act making the decision of the examiner final and binding had been passed purposely to keep inquiries of this kind out of the House.

Sir George Grey

MR. WALPOLE asked the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Oldham not to press his Motion to a division. The parties who petitioned or complained had not complied with the requirements of the statute, and the House would not be justified in acceding to the Motion. The remedy was clearly before the examiner. The case had been decided four or five years ago. The Act specially provided that if the parties did not take their objection in time, the decision of the examiner should be binding to all intents and purposes, and that costs might be recovered under such recognizance. He hoped the House would set its face most strenuously against this sort of objection being taken—by giving them no encouragement.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE said, he concurred entirely with his right hon. Friends (Mr. Walpole and Sir G. Grey), and denied there was any valid ground for the Motion. The question was as to the recognizances, and this objection was disposed of by mere lapse of time under the words of the statute.

MR. COBBETT said, the parties had not ascertained what the facts were until the very day before the petition was presented. This was a question not of recognizances, but of petition or no petition—a genuine or a spurious petition. His reason in bringing forward the matter was that the sitting Member could not within the ten days have objected to the recognizances, because he was unaware of the actual facts. He would not, however, persevere with his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Ordered, That the said Petition do lie upon the Table.

SLIGO BOROUGH ELECTION—PETITION.

MR. BUTT presented another petition from John Patrick Somers, esq., Member for Sligo, and moved that it be read by the clerk at the table—

It stated, that in his Petition presented on the 15th instant, he alleged as fact that an Action had been brought in the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland by Charles Sedley against John McGowan, Returning Officer of the Borough of Sligo, for unfairly rejecting the Vote of the said Charles Sedley at the last Election for that Borough; that the Petition complaining of the Return of that Election, alleges that the Mayor of Sligo did at the last Election unfairly reject Votes which ought to have been received; that he has seen a Copy of the Plaint filed in the said Court, and that it appears that the Action was brought as stated; that at the trial of the said Action the whole proceedings at the Election were made matters of discussion and evidence; that at the trial the Attorney for the Plaintiff stated that he had brought the Action at the expense of the Right honourable John Wynne, and that he had received £100 from him to cover his expenses; and that the Petitioner has this morning received information that application has been made to the Judge at Sligo for liberty to send up Bills of Indictment against the Mayor and some of the Poll Clerks for a conspiracy to procure his Return, and prays for inquiry.

SIR G. GREY said, the facts of the petition were so different from those in the petition presented the day preceding, that he would ask whether it would be right to ask the House to come to a vote on the two petitions without the second petition having been printed?

MR. BUTT said, he did not intend to press the consideration of the second petition, but he proposed to move a preliminary Resolution that the proper officer of the Queen's Bench in Ireland should make a return of all the proceedings in the action mentioned in the petition; and he should first move that the Resolutions of the House of 1703 (26th January), be read from the Journals.

Entry in the Journal of the Proceedings of the House of the 26th day of January, 1703, in relation to the Aylesbury Election, read.

MR. BUTT said, he now rose to move that the proper officer of the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland, should make a return of the copies of the documents in question as regarded these actions at law, which had been commenced in the case of the Sligo election. He (Mr. Butt) was no party to the election, but about two years since he had presented a petition from the sitting Member for Sligo, which resulted in a prosecution of several persons; and felt, therefore, that he should be wrong in refusing to present the present petition. He thought, moreover, that the House would approve of the course taken by the hon. Member for Sligo, in not bringing forward his own case. In the last election, Mr. Somers was elected for the borough of Sligo, against which return Mr. Wynne petitioned. That petition was still pending; but two actions had, nevertheless, been brought in the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland against the returning officer for not receiving certain votes, and also a criminal prosecution for conspiracy had been commenced for the same. He (Mr. Butt) therefore, as they bore upon the question now at issue, had moved that the clerk should read the Resolutions come to by the House in 1703 in what was known as the Aylesbury case. In that year a person brought an action against the Mayor of Aylesbury for refusing his vote. Three Judges thought the action did not lie; Chief Justice Holt thought otherwise, and the House of Lords was of the same opinion. Thereupon the House of Commons came to the Resolutions just read. In the next Session of Parliament, new actions having been brought by other electors against the same returning officer, the House interposed with a high hand, upon which a memorable contest ensued, ending in what might be called a drawn fight. The House of Commons committed the parties who had brought these actions. An attempt was made to release them by habeas corpus, and the Commons committed the parties who brought the writ. The House of Lords then interposed; long conferences were held between the two Houses, in which the Commons steadily maintained their privilege that no other tribunal should decide upon questions of this kind; reasons of great weight were adduced on both sides; but at last a prorogation of Parliament put an end to the imprisonment of the parties, and so far the authority of this House was defeated. From that hour to the present, however, the Commons had never surrendered the privilege which they then claimed, and had never assented to the right of any Court of law to try the claims of persons to vote at elections. If the House now assented to the principle contained in the Resolutions it was necessary that they should stop the proceedings commenced against the Mayor of Sligo. The facts were still stronger than those in the Aylesbury case. There it did not appear that any election petition was pending, while in the present instance not only was an inquiry about to be made, but the petitioner (Mr. Wynne) was the very man who had been the means of bringing the question before another tribunal. No doubt the decision of the House of Lords in the case of "Ashby and White" established the right of a party to bring an action against a returning officer for refusing his vote. But he thought there was an analogy between this case and the injunctions of a Court of Equity. A man had an unquestionable right to bring an action in a court of law; but then Equity interposed and said, "If you bring such an action we will treat it as contempt." Again, Equity would not allow an action to be brought against its officers without its leave, because they were subject to the authority of the court which could punish them if it thought necessary. In like manner the House in 1703 justified its exclusive jurisdiction over returning officers, assuming the power of committing them to Newgate if it thought proper; but on the other hand it considered that it was bound to protect them against a multiplicity of suits and the insupportable expense to which they might thus be put. It was evident that if these questions came before other tribunals while pending in this House the most conflicting decisions might be arrived at. A jury might determine one way, and mulct a returning officer for doing one thing, while a Committee of this House might commit him to prison for not doing the very same thing. The mayor of Sligo might be a material witness for the sitting Member, and how could he come before a Committee of that House if, in the meantime, a jury sitting in the very county where this election had taken place, and where the excitement and party bitterness engendered by it still, perhaps, prevailed, branded him with the stigma of a conviction? He contended that until this petition was disposed of the proceedings taken before other tribunals were a direct interference with the privileges of that House, and an attempt to prejudice and influence the case. He should therefore move that the proper officer of the Queen's Bench in Ireland return to the House a copy of all the proceedings in the actions mentioned in the petition, and that the further consideration be postponed until Monday next, when he should propose the appointment of a Committee on the subject.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the proper Officer of the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland do forthwith return to this House, Copies of the Summons and Plaint, and other proceedings in the Action that now is or was lately depending in that Court, in which Charles Sedley is plaintiff and John M'Gown, mayor of the town of Sligo, is defendant; and also Copies of the same in the Action in which James Ferguson is plaintiff and the same John M'Gowan is defendant."

Mr. I. Butt

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he thought this a very proper subject for consideration by the House, but it ought to be very cautiously and solemnly considered, so that they might not commit themselves to the assertion of exclusive jurisdiction and privileges without full knowledge of all the circumstances. He was far from saying that the Resolutions of January 26, 1703, did not still embody the deliberate opinion of the House, but it should be remembered that since then several Acts of Parliament had been passed regulating the proceedings upon controverted elections, and he was not prepared to say that the case brought under notice by the hon. and learned Gentleman might not fall within the exceptions referred to in these Resolutions, which merely affirmed the general right of the House, subject to any exceptions which might be created by special Acts of Parliament. It would be premature to assume that these actions involved a breach of privilege before a preliminary inquiry had been instituted. He should therefore move, by way of Amendment, that Mr. Somers' two petitions should be referred to a Committee, who should inquire into the facts of the case and report to the House, after looking into precedents and examining the state of the law on the subject, whether, in their opinion, the facts as ascertained by them involved any breach of privilege. At the same time, he did not propose that they should delegate to any Committee the decision of the question whether a breach of privilege had really been committed.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the words "That the" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "Petition of John Patrick Somers, esquire, presented upon the 15th and 16th days of this instant July, be referred to a Select Committee to inquire into the matters stated therein, and to report their opinion, how far there are any circumstances in the case affecting the privileges of this House."

MR. HILDYARD said, it was a most inconvenient course to encourage these applications, and he thought it desirable to deal with them at once. He entertained objections to referring a question of privilege to a Committee, as it was a matter with which the House itself ought to deal. He contended also that the Resolutions of the House in "Ashby and White" did not apply in this case, and that, even assuming them to be in accordance with the law—an opinion to which he by no means subscribed—the hon. and learned Gentleman was incorrect in stating that that House had never abandoned the principle of these Resolutions. Lord Holt laid down that every one who possessed a right of necessity had a remedy, and that therefore a person obstructing an elector in giving his vote, whether maliciously or not, was liable to an action for damages. At the same time the Resolutions were passed, there were as many kinds of franchises as there were boroughs, and the House of Commons saw that if every one had the right of action as against the returning officer, it would make the courts of law the arbiters of the return of Members of Parliament. Since then, however, the whole reason for these Resolutions had ceased, for the right was exercised under the statute law of the land, and the House had recently delegated to the Court of Common Pleas the right of determining who was entitled to vote. Moreover, for nearly a century the House of Commons had abandoned the principle of the Resolutions come to in 1703—at all events to this extent, that it would not interfere to prevent these actions being brought wherever malice on the part of the returning officer was alleged. In the case of the "Mayor of Hastings" the plaintiff obtained a verdict for £200, the defendant's malice being a part of his case. The case came on for discussion on a writ of error in Easter Term, 1786; but the Judges would not hear any objections taken to the action, declaring that the case of "Ashby and White" was conclusive on the subject. The House of Commons acquiesced in that decision, and took no steps to assert its privileges, nor, though such actions had been more than once brought since that time, had the House interfered. In the present instance, malice was of the essence of the action brought; the returning officer was declared to have acted unfairly; and there was thus no analogy between the case and that of "Ashby and White." Then, again, this very right was established by statute. The 76th section of the English Reform Act laid down that if returning officers wilfully contravened its provisions, they should be liable to an action and a penalty of £500, there being a proviso that the remedy thus given against the returning officer should not supersede any remedy or action against him according to the law heretofore in force. Here, then, was a distinct recognition of the right of action against a returning officer, and the Irish Reform Bill contained a similar provision. There was also a similarly distinct recognition of the right to institute a criminal proceeding, it being enacted that every returning officer who should by due course of law be convicted of having acted corruptly or partially in the execution of his duty should be adjudged guilty of a high misdemeanour, and imprisoned for a period not exceeding three years. This was under the 1 Geo. IV., c. 11, s. 25.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he believed that in the present instance the indictment for a conspiracy against the Mayor of Sligo was a proceeding at common law.

MR. HILDYARD replied that the Legislature at all events recognized the right of bringing these actions. There was, then, no pretence for the assertion that the privileges of the House were in jeopardy; and as to the statement that these proceedings were taken while a petition was pending, there was no limitation in the Act as to the time of instituting such actions.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman had only confirmed him in the impression that the course proposed by the right hon. Baronet (Sir G. Grey) was the best course to be pursued in this case. He, therefore, should give his assent to that course, always on the understanding that the House, in referring the question to the Committee, was not relinquishing its right in the matter.

MR. M'MAHON said, he hoped the House would agree with the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Whitehaven and decide the matter at once. All the Committee could do would be to ascertain the fact of actions having been brought, which was sufficiently known to the House. Unless malice was alleged and proved as the ground-work of the action, the verdict against the returning officer might be set aside in the courts of law. Why then should the House interfere? The proceedings at law would not at all affect the decision of the Election Committee; for the indictment against the mayor could not be tried till the next spring assizes. In 1847, an action was brought against the mayor of Abingdon for refusing a vote ("Price v. Fletcher," 3 and 4 C. P. Rep.); the most eminent counsel were engaged; the case went from one court to another; but it was never once suggested that such an action was stopped by the Resolutions of that House in "Ashby v. White." The so-called privilege of the House was one which every right-thinking man would be glad to get rid of, instead of raking up a string of Resolutions of 1703 to support it. The public would never tolerate the re-enforcement of those Resolutions, whereby parties might be sheltered from the due punishment of their crimes. Had the defendant in this case chosen to do so, he might have applied for a postponement of the action, on the ground that the matter was about to be inquired into by a Committee of that House. Most likely he had wished to take the advantage of a verdict in his favour, if he got one.

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN said, that the question decided in the action, and the one to be decided by the Committee, were essentially different. On that and other grounds he thought it desirable not to proceed further in the House, but to refer the matter to a Committee.

MR. BUTT said, he should offer no objection to the reference, but thought it most desirable that the proceedings of the proposed Select Committee should not clash with those of the Sligo Election Committee, but ought to be concluded before the latter sat. He acquiesced entirely in the suggestion of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department. He might remind the House, however, that if a Committee were appointed, they would still require copies of the proceedings in the Irish Courts. He also would beg to ask the hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland whether the statement was true that the Crown would proceed by indictment against those concerned in the election for the borough of Sligo?

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD observed, that he had no official knowledge of the matter to which the hon. and learned Gentleman alluded. All his information was derived from what appeared in the Irish correspondence of the papers of that morning. In the papers which had been laid before him regarding the Sligo election he directed that there should be no prosecution by the Crown pending the election petition, and had so directed the Crown Solicitor, except in breaches of the peace. He did not think the statement in the papers was correct that prosecutions were instituted by the Crown Solicitor; but, probably, indictments had been preferred by private parties. In reference to the general question, he thought the house was about to take the proper course in following the recommendation of his right hon. Friend (Sir G. Grey), and in abstaining altogether from discussing the merits of the case. As to the criminal prosecution, it raised some grave and important questions; as, for instance, first, whether, pending an election petition, such an indictment could be prosecuted, and whether persons who would be witnesses before the Committee could be the subject of that prosecution. That was a question for the grave and serious consideration of the House. He hoped his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Youghal would agree at once to the course recommended by his right hon. Friend the Member for Morpeth.

Mr. Hildyard

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE remarked that he hoped the Amendment of Sir G. Grey would be acceded to, and that the discussion might for the present be allowed to drop.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and negatived; Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That the Petition of John Patrick Somers, esquire, presented upon the 15th and 16th days of this instant July, be referred to a Select Committee to inquire into the matters stated therein, and to report their opinion, how far there are any circumstances in the case affecting the privileges of this House.

LUNATICS (SCOTLAND) BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read; House in Committee.

Clauses 1 to 3 agreed to.

Clause 4,

MR. BAGWELL said, he wished to call attention to the abominations which the evidence showed existed in the Scotch private lunatic asylums—a state of things disgraceful to a nation of Christians. In one asylum a poor insane female was found lying in a dark cell, perfectly naked.

MR. CUMMING BRUCE remarked, that he entirely agreed with the hon. Gentleman in his observations upon the private mad houses in Scotland, which were utterly disgraceful to the country, but not to the Board of Supervision, which had pointed out the evils which ought to be remedied, and this, too, upon more than one occasion. Private lunatic asylums ought to be subjected to a very vigilant and sharp supervision, which would well and faithfully discharge its duty. He did not place entire credence in the Reports of the Lunacy Commissioners, and thought it was quite necessary in this case to bear in mind the maxim "audi alteram partem."

MR. BAGWELL explained.

MR. BAILLIE said, he should be glad to see a clause introduced, rendering illegal the confinement of pauper lunatics in private asylums.

MR. MACKIE said, he would enter his protest against the creation of a new Board, and the new and expensive machinery contemplated by this Bill.

SIR WILLIAM DUNBAR observed, that he also thought the constitution of a new board unnecessary, and uncalled for. He would assert, that though there were instances where lunatics had been treated with peculiar cruelty, yet that was the fault of the Legislature, and the Scotch people were, upon the whole, not by any means to blame for the isolated cases which had taken place. No country had subscribed proportionately more liberally than Scotland for the care and good treatment of lunatics, and the existing system in that country was sufficient to ensure all that was required.

SIR JOHN OGILVY said, a strong feeling existed in Scotland that the Board of Supervision furnished an efficient machinery capable of supplying all the defects of the present system without the creation of any new Board.

MR. HOPE JOHNSTONE remarked, that he also had representations made to him from every quarter in opposition to the appointment of a new Board.

MR. DRUMMOND said, that the question was not so much what would be the most expensive as what would be the most efficient machinery. There were plenty of representatives of the ratepayers in that House, but no representatives of the lunatics of Scotland. They seemed to have no friends there, while really they were the persons who stood most in need of being represented.

COLONEL SYKES observed, that as regarded the female found in a lunatic asylum naked, he could wish that it should be ascertained whether or not this female had not shortly previously torn off her clothes, as was often the case?

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 5 to 16 were then agreed to.

House resumed. Committee report progress to sit again this day.

FISHERY BOARD (SCOTLAND).

QUESTION.

LORD JOHN HAY said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury what course Her Majesty's Government intended to pursue with regard to the Report of the Commissioners on the Fishery Board (Scotland)?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON was understood to say that he would on Monday next state what course was intended to be pursued.

TROOPS FOR INDIA—QUESTION.

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE said, he wished to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if the ships are taken up for the conveyance to India of the additional troops required for service there; and, if so, what amount of tonnage of both sailing and steaming?

MR. VERNON SMITH said, that advertisements had been issued for tenders for ships to convey the additional troops. As soon as the tenders should be accepted, he would present a return of the amount of tonnage.

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE said, he would then give notice, that as the ships were not yet taken up, he should to-morrow call the attention of the First Lord of the Admiralty to the best means of transporting the troops.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he would now beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if, in the event of the Government deciding to send troops to India by steam, he has one screw ship in either Sheerness, Portsmouth, or Plymouth in commission, fit to carry troops, and ready for immediate service.

SIR CHARLES WOOD: Certainly not. We have not a single screw ship of the line in commission fit to carry troops to India. The ships in commission at home are calculated for home service.

SUPERANNUATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL—QUESTION.

LORD NAAS said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government will give a day for the discussion on the Superannuation Act Amendment, and whether the noble Lord will allow the Second Reading to be taken pro forma to-night, and the discussion to take place in Committee at a morning sitting. He believed that such an arrangement would be productive of considerable convenience.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that it was impossible to assent to the proposition to read a second time, as a matter of form, a Bill, the principle of which must be discussed, more especially as he was not prepared to agree to the Bill of the noble Lord. He might, perhaps, be able to give the noble Lord a morning sitting, when the more urgent business at present before the House should be disposed of, but he could not, in the existing state of business, consent to postpone any Government measure to make way for it.

LORD NAAS said, that under those circumstances no other course was open to him than to move the second reading of the Bill that night, and he gave notice that he should do so at whatever hour it might come on.

INDIA—AMNESTY—QUESTION.

MR. W. VANSITTART said, he would beg to inquire whether it is true, as reported in the Indian newspapers just received, that the Lieutenant Governor of the North Western Provinces of India has issued a proclamation, in which he offers an amnesty to all the mutineers who will lay down their arms; and that on the Governor General of India expressing his severe displeasure at that proclamation, and issuing an order for its immediate withdrawal, the Lieutenant Governor tendered his resignation.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, he believed it was substantially correct that the Lieutenant Governor of the North Western Provinces did issue such a proclamation. The Governor General of India, with that promptitude and vigour of mind which distinguished him, immediately disapproved it, and issued an order, withdrawing it, except for the interval between the issue of the order and the proclamation, which exception was necessary for the maintenance of good faith. He had not heard that the Lieutenant Governor had resigned in consequence, and he saw no grounds for his resignation. The Lieutenant Governor's conduct had generally, except in this single instance, been marked by judgment and decision, and he trusted that the report of his resignation was not true.

EDUCATION—NOTICE.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he wished to give notice of the course he intended to pursue with regard to national education. At that period of the Session he did not think, after the discussion on the subject which had already taken place, that he should promote the object he had in view by moving such a Resolution as that of which he had given notice, and therefore it was his intention, whenever the noble Lord at the head of the Government placed a day at his disposal, to move an Address to the Crown for a Commission of Inquiry into the state of national education.

GALWAY TOWN WRIT.

COLONEL FRENCH moved, that Mr. Speaker do issue his warrant to the clerk of the Crown in Ireland to make out a new writ for the electing of a burgess to serve in this present Parliament for the town of Galway, in the room of Anthony O'Flaherty, Esq., whose election has been determined to be void.

LORD LOVAINE said, that in the absence of the Chairman of the Galway Election Committee, he should move that the issue of the writ be suspended till Thursday next, in order that the evidence might be in the hands of hon. Members, who would then be able to judge whether or not it would be advisable that a further suspension of the writ should take place.

. Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, "the Writ for the Town of Galway be suspended until Thursday next," instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

COLONEL FRENCH said, he concluded that if the Committee had thought it desirable that the writ should be suspended, they would have reported to that effect. Galway contained a population of 30,000, and a constituency of 1,300, and the Committee had reported that only seventy voters had been bribed by small sums. Under these circumstances the borough ought not to be left without representation, for the suspension of the writ would be contrary to the constitution of the country, according to which the representation of the country ought to be maintained in as complete a state as possible.

SIR GEORGE GREY observed, that he thought this was just one of the cases alluded to the other night, when a Resolution was carried requiring the suspension of the issue of writs in cases where the seats were vacated for bribery. It was then stated, that this suspension would give an opportunity to Members of the Committee to state whether or not it would be desirable that the House should be in possession of the evidence before the issue of the writ. He thought it desirable that that course should be followed in the present instance, especially as he understood that the noble Lord spoke for the Committee in the absence of the Chairman.

LORD LOVAINE believed that hon. Members would find, when the evidence was printed, that there was sufficient reason for the short delay proposed.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he would not in that case persist in his Motion.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL remarked, that he thought that before the Motion was withdrawn they ought to understand that the writ would not be moved before Thursday.

LORD LOVAINE, at the suggestion of Sir G. GREY, then moved that the issuing of the writ be suspended till Thursday next.

MR. WALPOLE suggested that the better way would be for the noble Lord to give notice of such a Motion.

Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Ordered, That the Writ for the Town of Galway be suspended until Thursday next.

MAYO WRIT.

MR. SCHOLEFIELD said, he rose to move, "That Mr. Speaker do not issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland to make out a new Writ for the electing of a Knight of the Shire to serve in this present Parliament for the County of Mayo, before Thursday next." As there were stronger reasons for the suspension of the writ in the case of Mayo than in the case of Galway, he need not further occupy the time of the House. He was not, however, without some fear that the evidence given before the Election Committee would not be delivered in sufficient time before Thursday for full consideration by the hon. Members, but in that case he felt confident he should be supported in asking for a further suspension of the Writ.

COLONEL FRENCH said, that after the decision of the House in the last case, it was not his intention to oppose the Motion; but there were facts connected with the case to which he wished shortly to call the attention of the House in addition to some facts which it was already in possession of. The Election Committee, towards the end of the proceedings, thought it necessary to acquaint the House with a letter, stating that certain persons had made an attack on witnesses examined before the Committee. The Committee stated that a letter, duly verified, had been placed before them, representing that a witness named Gannon, who had given evidence before the Committee, had been seriously injured by a mob led on by John Sheridan; and he (Colonel French) complained that without proper inquiry such an imputation was thus thrown upon a most respectable gentleman, for the allegation respecting Mr. Sheridan was wholly untrue. On seeing the statement, Mr. Sheridan immediately came to London, and presented himself before the Committee, who told him they had nothing to say to him, and referred him to the House. Mr. Sheridan then came to him (Colonel French), and produced to him a letter from Mr. Kearney, a magistrate of the district, addressed to the Chairman of the Committee; and, as the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Scholefield) had not referred to that communication, he (Colonel French) might perhaps be permitted to read it to the House. The letter was as follows:—

“Ballinvilla, Castlebar, Mayo,
“July 11, 1857.

“Sir,—As the magistrate who investigated the case of Gannon (a witness examined before your Committee) against several people for riot, and against one in particular for stabbing him in the eye with a rod of iron, I take the liberty of addressing you. I have held to bail the parties charged with the riot, and I have committed to prison the boy charged with the latter offence.

“Having heard yesterday that Mr. John Martin Sheridan was reported as the instigator of this outrage, I considered it my duty to call at the county infirmary and see Gannon upon the subject; and I beg to give you, from memory, the conversation that took place between us.

“I said to Gannon I heard there were some parties (not included in his sworn information) who had taken part in the attack upon him on the evening of the 7th instant. He answered that there was a boy named Murphy who struck him with a shovel on the right arm, and whose name he did not recollect when swearing his information.

“I then asked him if there was any person in a higher rank of life whom he could accuse of instigating the mob, or pointing him out to them.

“He answered not (no), and added that he was very sorry to hear a report that morning that he had accused Mr. Sheridan; that the report was a false one; that Mr. Sheridan was the most active in bringing the offenders to justice; had called to see him in the infirmary after the occurrence; and ended by saying that Mr. Sheridan was his best friend. I have in addition made inquiries among the constabulary and others, and I find that a more unfounded and audacious charge was never made than the present accusation against Mr. Sheridan; and, in justice to that gentleman, I have the honour of addressing you upon the present occasion.”

He (Colonel French) believed the Attorney General for Ireland had investigated the facts, and would confirm his statement that there was not the slightest ground for the charge against Mr. Sheridan.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he had read the informations in the case to which the hon. and gallant Gentleman had alluded, and could state that no person named Sheridan was mentioned in them, or was charged with being a participator in the offence. He might observe, however, that a man named Sheelan was charged with being concerned in the assault, and that circumstance might, perhaps, have occasioned the mistake.

COLONEL NORTH said, that, as a Member of the Committee, he wished to state, with reference to the statement of the hon. Member (Colonel French), that they had not made sufficient inquiry before bringing this subject under the notice of the House, that they had done all they could do to satisfy themselves of the truth of the matter. A letter was produced before them, and the gentleman to whom it was addressed proved its receipt upon oath. The Committee had just learned that one of the witnesses who had been examined before them had been insulted the day before in the lobby outside the Committee-room by the Rev. Peter Conway, and they were considering whether it was not their duty to bring that circumstance under the notice of the House when they were informed that a witness named Gannon, who had given evidence, and who had returned to Ireland, had been assaulted and seriously injured. As he had stated to the Committee his apprehension that as soon as he returned home he should be insulted on account of his evidence, they felt that not a moment should be lost in reporting the fact to the House, in order that means might be taken for insuring to the other witnesses the protection to which they were entitled.

MR. BOWYER said, he had been requested to make a statement to the House, on the part of one of the persons inculped by the Report of the Committee, who was charged with conduct derogatory to his character as a clergyman. He referred to the Rev. Father Conway, who requested him to state to the House that it was utterly untrue that he ever used any sort of curses, or any such expressions against those who voted for Colonel Higgins, from the altar, or anywhere else.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he rose to order, and to submit to Mr. Speaker whether, as they were not now discussing the Report of the Committee, the hon. and learned Gentleman was entitled to enter into statements which appeared to be in contradiction to that Report. If the hon. and learned Gentleman wished to afford any explanation on the part of Mr. Conway, or any other person, he apprehended the proper time for making such statements would be when the Report of the Committee came regularly under discussion.

MR. SPEAKER said, it certainly would not be regular for hon. Members to refer to a Report which was not at present before the House, and the contents of which could not therefore be accurately known.

MR. MAGUIRE wished to say, that on a future occasion he would be prepared to show that the Report of the Committee contradicted itself; and he would endeavour to prove that there were what he considered marked—and what some persons might call gross—omissions on the part of the Committee.

MR. SPOONER rose to order.

MR. MAGUIRE resumed his seat.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered, That Mr. Speaker do not issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland, to make out a new Writ for the electing of a Knight of the Shire to serve in this present Parliament for the County of Mayo, before Thursday next.

Order for going into Committee of Supply, read.

COLONEL MUNDY'S PENSION.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary for War a question with regard to the retiring allowance of Colonel G. C. Mundy, late of the Department of the Minister for War.

SIR JOHN RAMSDEN said, that

Colonel Mundy had been Secretary to the War Minister; but his office was abolished when a consolidation of the Departments of the Army was effected. It was considered, however, that as Colonel Mundy had held a permanent office under the Crown he was entitled to receive compensation; and a pension of £1,000 a year was awarded to him, on condition that if he received any appointment under the Crown, whether military or civil, and his emoluments from such office amounted to £1,000 a year or upwards, his pension should remain in abeyance; and also that if the emoluments amounted to less than £1,000, he should only receive so much of his pension as would make the whole amount which he drew from the public purse £1,000 a year. Colonel Mundy had recently been appointed Governor of Jersey, and, as the emoluments of that office amounted to more than £1,000 a year, of course he did not receive any portion of his pension.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he wished to know how long Colonel Mundy had served in the War Office?

SIR JOHN RAMSDEN: Two years, I believe.

THE MILITIA—QUESTION.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, an Order in Council appeared in the Gazette on Tuesday last suspending the calling out of the Militia during the present year. That Order is dated the 25th of June,—a date, as the House will recollect, previous to the arrival of the disastrous news from India. I wish to inquire of the noble Lord at the head of the Government whether the publication of that Order in Council, dated the 25th of June, but which appeared in the Gazette on the 14th of July, was a matter of inadvertence, or whether it was sanctioned by Her Majesty's Government?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, that order was issued by no means inadvertently, but upon full consideration, and upon reasons which I think perfectly good. The greater part of the militia were assembled during the last two years of the war, and it was therefore deemed unnecessary to call them out for training this year with any view of maintaining the discipline of the regiments. It was thought they had received sufficient training to admit of their not being called out during the present year. Another very strong reason for not adopting that course arose from financial considerations. The House is aware that, "cutting our coat according to our cloth," Her Majesty's Government were compelled to make very great reductions in the effective service of the country for the purpose of bringing the expenditure of the year within its income. Before the unfortunate accounts arrived from India, it was therefore determined not to call out the militia during the present year. I presume the right hon. Gentleman means to ask whether the news from India ought not to have caused a change in our intention. I reply that there seems to be no reason why that intelligence should cause any change. If anything had happened in Europe which had threatened to involve this country in a war with any European Power, and which rendered it probable that we should have occasion to provide for the defence of the country, it might undoubtedly have been necessary to call out the militia, as a great number of our regular forces must be sent to a distant station; but as, fortunately, Europe appeared to be perfectly tranquil, and as there was no apprehension in any quarter that we were likely to be involved in any European dispute, unless the Government saw reason to change their minds from considerations arising out of the state of things in India, they did not think it desirable to call out the militia. The chief purpose to be answered by calling out the militia at present would be with the view to facilitate their volunteering into the line, but that would have been a most expensive method of raising any given number of troops. It would have been a wasteful expenditure of the public money, and would not have at all assisted the objects we have in view.

THE ASSIZE CIRCUITS—QUESTION.

MR. WARREN said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Commission for Inquiry into the arrangements for taking the assizes in England and Wales are likely to make their Report, and whether any proposed redistribution of the circuits will be effected by Act of Parliament. The House was aware that a Commission had lately been issued to inquire into the state of business in the Superior Courts of common law, and especially the distribution of the circuits. He had just returned from attending the Northern Circuit at York, and was able to speak from his own knowledge of the strong feeling of curiosity which existed among the members of the bar on that circuit, and, indeed, he might say of all persons interested in the welfare of the county of York, in reference to the proposed redistribution of the circuits. He knew, also, that a similar feeling prevailed in Lancashire. He had been told, for instance, that York was to be taken from the Northern Circuit and united to the Midland, or rather, he should say, that the Midland Circuit was to be united to York. He also understood that various other alterations were in contemplation, such as that Manchester was to have an assize of its own, and that Liverpool was to be transferred from the northern to some Welsh circuit. Seeing that at present the grand juries and the members of the bar belonging to the different circuits were collected together in the various assize towns, he hoped the Home Secretary would be able to give the House some authentic information as to the conclusions at which the Commission had arrived.

Viscount Palmerston

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that not being himself a Member of the Commission to which his hon. and learned Friend had referred, he had communicated with one of the Members of it, and had been informed by him that the Commissioners were now considering their Report, and that they hoped to be able to present that Report at a very early period. He had no doubt that when that Report was presented he should receive Her Majesty's commands to lay it before Parliament, and he thought under those circumstances he was not at present justified in saying more on the subject.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, as he was a Member of the Commission in question, he might be permitted to state that his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Warren) had evidently received very erroneous information in reference to what was likely to be the nature of the Report of the Commission. The Commission had agreed to the substance of the Report, but it was not yet drawn up, and he was sure the House would not think it necessary or desirable on his part to enter into any details on the subject.

EAST INDIAN RAILWAYS.

POSTPONEMENT OF RESOLUTION.

MR. WATKIN, who had given notice of a Resolution on the subject of railways in India, said he did not wish to detain the House from the important question before them—although he was prepared to show that if proper energy had been displayed railways might have been long since completed to the scenes of the recent mutiny; and if they had been it would have been crushed at once. With the permission of the House he would postpone his Resolution.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE PERSIAN WAR.

RESOLUTION.

MR. ROEBUCK: I wish, Sir, the Resolution I am now about to move had fallen into more able hands than mine; for it appears to me that never in the whole history of the House of Commons was a more important subject submitted to its consideration. Sir, we are now about to consider the conduct of an Administration with regard to the House of Commons, and I am prepared to say, Sir, that this conduct has been such that, if allowed to pass without comment, it will go far to jeopardize the authority of this House and to diminish its influence with the country, on the very matters which are peculiarly within its province. It may be said that the prerogative of the Crown is to declare war and to make peace. With that proposition, Sir, I entirely coincide; but I say that this House has a privilege with regard to that prerogative which it ought not to abandon. The Crown may declare war when it pleases, and if the Crown can carry on that war without application to the House of Commons it is perfectly justified in doing so; but the moment it comes to this House to ask us for money to enable it to maintain that war, then the whole war and everything connected with it become subjects of consideration for the House of Commons. It appears to me that this is peculiarly the mode by which the House of Commons has arrived at its present position, and if England is now distinguishable from the nations around her by one thing more than another it is by this very power of the House of Commons. To that power we owe our liberty, to that liberty we owe our laws, and to those laws we owe our happiness. If the House of Commons should ever be depreciated in the eyes of the country—if its power should ever be diminished, then, indeed, the power of the country will be diminished also; and the charge I bring against the noble Lord at the head of the Government is this—that he, being a so-called Liberal, has done that with regard to the House of Commons which no Minister has ever yet dared to do; that the two Pitts, in the plenitude of their power, did not dare to do what the noble Lord has done. And what is that? I will shortly describe what I conceive to have been the conduct of the noble Lord. He has laid upon the table of this House a book containing papers regarding our relations with Persia. Those papers begin as early as the year 1851, and the very first of those papers refers to the conduct of Persia with reference to Herat. In proceeding in the investigation of those papers we soon learn that the British Government supposed that the Persian Government had designs upon Herat which were inimical to English interests. From 1851 to 1857 negotiations were carried on with the Persian Government, but not until December, 1856, did the English Government think it requisite to take such steps with regard to the Government of Persia as should lead to war. In December, 1856, this House was not sitting, but in that month the Governor-General of India issued a proclamation equivalent to a declaration of war. No means were taken to call this House together, and things went on. War was declared against Persia, and then began a system which has led, as I believe, to the disasters we are now suffering in India. Our forces were taken from India and directed against Persia. I am told—I do not know how correctly—that the Government was warned on that occasion that denuding India of the forces of England would endanger the very existence of our Indian Empire. I must call to the recollection of the House and of the noble Lord the prophecies—if I may so call them—of the late Sir Charles Napier many years ago upon this matter. He pointed out to the Government of India, and through the Government of India to the Government of England, that there were causes which should alarm all far-seeing Ministers with regard to the army of India, and he took such steps as he thought precautionary to prevent mischief arising on that occasion. Those steps incurred the displeasure of the then Governor General, Lord Dalhousie. Sir Charles Napier resigned, but his warning remained. Lord Dalhousie returned home, and Lord Canning went to India as his successor. I am told—I do not know how correctly—that the demands made on him for forces to be directed towards Persia raised in Lord Canning's mind such alarm that he communicated that alarm to the Government of this country; and not only did he do so, but I am told that the Commander in Chief in India did the same, so that the Government of this country was fully aware of the danger likely to arise if India were denuded of troops. Now, I appeal to this House, if there be a shadow of truth in that statement, whether this was not a very important matter. This House has certainly been called together on less important occasions; for let me say for this House, that the empire of India is in fact the empire of England; that we should not allow our empire in India to slip from our grasp without making every effort which a people can make to preserve it, because, if conquered in Asia, we are reduced to nothing in Europe. This, then, was a very vital question to the empire of England, and if the Commons of Parliament were ever to be called together in an extraordinary manner, that was an occasion when they ought to have been so called together. But the noble Lord at the head of the Government, having that confidence in himself which a long series of successes in life has enabled him to obtain, disregarded altogether the existence of Parliament, and determined, without consulting us, to wage war upon his own account. He therefore directed that troops should be sent from India to Persia. They were sent. War was undertaken. War was prosecuted. A battle was fought, and the Persians were so reduced that they thought of peace. Peace was concluded in March, 1857. In February, 1857, this House met, but no communication was made to this House. The noble Lord, still holding on in that course which has distinguished his career—fully confident in himself, and prepared to conduct this matter without the House of Commons—determined to and did conduct it to a peace without the House of Commons. And the first real intimation that we have had of these transactions is the Bill which is this night to be presented. What is that Bill? We learn for the first time that it amounts in the whole to £1,800,000.

Mr. Roebuck

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, with that dexterity which belongs to all Chancellors of the Exchequer, began by assuming it at £500,000, but the last paper laid on the table of the House shows that our share of the Bill will be at least £900,000. But it does not stop there; £900,000 is only an instalment, and I believe it will be found that the expense of the war with Persia will amount to at least two millions of money. Now, I cannot help thinking that if ever the House of Commons had a right to complain it is upon this occasion. A war has been undertaken. A war has been prosecuted. Engagements have actually been taking place between our troops and those of Persia. Peace has been concluded, and all without consulting this House. And this very night the Chancellor of the Exchequer gets up and asks you, Sir, to leave the chair, in order that he may present the Bill to the House of Commons. I ask the House of Commons, did anything of that sort ever take place before? I recollect being in the House upon a solemn occasion. The war declared against Russia was declared in this House, and I shall not forget my own emotions, nor the appearance of the House on that occasion. When the person who officially made that declaration made it at the bar, the countenance of every hon. Member wore a solemn expression. They felt that England was entering into a contest which involved great interests, which might lead to disastrous consequences, and they felt that it was a solemn, and, if I may use the phrase, an awful occasion. But the war with Russia was not a more awful or more solemn event than the war with Persia. Persia, indeed, was an inferior power to Russia, but the consequences we now see. The mutiny at Delhi may be traced to denuding our Indian empire of forces on that occasion, and when Her Majesty's Government declared war and determined on that expedition to Persia, they undertook the risk of losing our Indian empire, and undermining for ever the power of England in Europe. I say that these two occasions are equally important, and if the war with Russia were important, and should be communicated to this House so was the war with Persia, considering events which followed it, and of which I say the Government had notice. I have no doubt the noble Lord, if he deigns to answer me, will say that all this is past, that the war with Persia has come to an end, that peace has been made, and that our relations with that country are upon the best possible footing. I am not going to enter into the question of our relations with Persia. That is not my cause of complaint. My complaint is, that the House of Commons, upon this occasion, has been entirely passed over; that the House of Commons, exercising the privilege of providing for the expenses of an expedition, has an undoubted right to inquire into the principles upon which the expedition is undertaken and the expenses are incurred. I say that a more contemptuous course than this was never pursued towards the House of Commons. We are now called upon in the coolest manner possible to supply nearly a million of money. The House is called upon, on the ipse dixit of the noble Lord, to furnish sums, and no explanation is offered of the expenses incurred. I say, if the House of Commons is prepared to undergo this insult—for insult it is—we had better shut that door and go back to our constituents. I know the power of the noble Lord. I know that he has—God knows how!—obtained in the country a wonderful dominion. Why the people concede to him that dominion I cannot for the life of me imagine, but I fully acknowledge that he is allowed to do things which others dare not do. Fancying I have a duty to perform, I will, however, raise my voice, feeble as that voice is, and call upon my countrymen to point their finger at the conduct of the noble Lord. I point my finger at the conduct of the noble Lord, and I say no conduct since the House of Commons has been a House of Commons was ever so insulting as that which the noble Lord has pursued on this occasion. When Charles I. came down to the House in order to seize five of its Members, he certainly did commit a breach of its privileges. Since that time many changes have been gone through in our constitution, but the great result of all the revolutions connected with this House has been, that no course of conduct can be pursued by the Government over which we have not an immediate control through the finances of the country. I am not at all surprised at the conduct of the noble Lord. It is the result of the great confidence which he has in himself, but I think late events ought to have served as a warning to him. I regard the state of India at the present moment as one of the most striking evidences of the mistakes of the noble Lord. Events are occurring there which involve the interests of England. If we lose our empire in India—and we may lose it—[Cries of "No, no!"—I understand that exclamation, it is a thoroughly English "No!"] No man can join in the feeling which dictates it more heartily than I do. You believe yourselves able to meet even this great emergency, but you will not deny that it is a great emergency. I have that confidence in my countrymen—in their indomitable spirit—that I have no doubt, in spite of the error—I use a mild word—of the noble Lord, they will overcome the present difficulty. Nevertheless, I say the noble Lord has made a great mistake. I may even use a stronger word. India is now the opprobrium of the noble Lord's administration. He has reduced India to its present position, and we must not forget that if we lose India we lose the world. My charge against the noble Lord, therefore, is not a small one. First, I say that he has insulted the House of Commons—that he has pursued the course of utterly passing it by—that he has declared war, undertaken an expedition, and made peace without asking your approval or consulting your wishes. He has acted as if you were not in existence. The House of Commons is, in the opinion of the noble Lord, an utter cipher. Such is the first charge I bring against the noble Lord. The next is, that he has chosen an occasion for thus treating the House of Commons the most dangerous to England that has occurred since the Declaration of Independence by America. By a want of care, by a want of foresight, by that sort of rashness that constant success engenders, he has denuded India of her defences, and thus led to all the dangerous consequences that have occurred. Far be it from me to take up the time of the House by unnecessary observations. I move the Resolution which I have placed upon the paper with a full knowledge of its importance, with a full knowledge, too, of the vituperation and sarcasm to which I may subject myself; but, having before my eyes my duty as a representative of the people, I say that upon this question of the Persian war the noble Lord has been an enemy of the House of Commons and of England. I shall therefore conclude by moving, as an Amendment—

"That the war with Persia was declared, prosecuted, and concluded without information of such transactions being communicated to Parliament."

while expensive armaments were equipped without the sanction of a vote of this House.

"That it is the opinion of this House that such conduct tends to weaken its just authority, and to dispense with its constitutional control over the finances of the country, and renders it requisite for this House to express its strong reprobation of such a course of proceeding."

Mr. AYRTON seconded the Resolution.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words—

"The War with Persia was declared, prosecuted, and concluded without information of such transactions being communicated to Parliament; while expensive armaments were equipped without the sanction of a vote of this House," instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman has, with one remarkable exception, been confined strictly within the limits of the notice which he has placed upon the paper. His Motion refers simply to the mode in which the war with Persia has been conducted—to the course of conduct pursued by the Government, and not to the merits of the war itself. In the course of his speech, however, the hon. and learned Gentleman has introduced a question to which I shall presently advert, founded upon the alleged connection of the Persian war with the late disastrous transactions in India—a connection which would not have occurred to him if the Motion had not been so long postponed. I shall begin by stating, that having come to the House prepared to hear the policy and justice of the war questioned—prepared to defend the policy and justice of the war—prepared, if necessary, to state in detail the grounds upon which hostilities were undertaken against Persia, I do not think I should be justified now in going into that part of the question, inasmuch as the hon. and learned Gentleman not only has not questioned the policy of the war, but by his silence has appeared to approve it. [Mr. ROEBUCK: No, no!] Well, Sir, all the papers relating to the Persian war have been for some time upon the table of the House, and full opportunity has been given to hon. Members to found a Motion upon them. It was not necessary to wait until a vote was proposed in Committee of Supply before calling upon the House for the expression of its opinion on the subject. Without, therefore, going at length into the policy of the war, I shall, with the permission of the House—as the hon. and learned Gentleman states that he did not by his silence admit the justice of the war—shortly state the grounds upon which it was undertaken. It is well known to those who have followed the transactions in Central Asia for some years past, that it has been recognized as a cardinal point in our Asiatic policy, that the town of Herat should not fall into the power of Persia. That question excited great interest at the time when the affairs of Central Asia occupied so large a share of the attention of the people of England; when events scarcely less disastrous than those which now occupy our attention were about to occur in Afghanistan. At that time it was recognized as a matter of national policy, about which all political parties were agreed, that it would not be safe with reference to our Indian Empire to allow Herat to fall into the hands of Persia. It is unnecessary for me to remind the House that Persia is a weak power—that it borders upon the great military monarchy of Russia, which overshadows all Northern and Central Asia—and that the territorial position of the two countries necessarily places Persia in a state of semi-dependence upon Russia. In fact, it is no disparagement of the weakened monarchy of Persia to say, that it is a vassal kingdom of Russia.

Mr. Roebuck

SIR JAMES GRAHAM: What! Persia a vassal of Russia! Do you really mean to assert that as a fact?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Well, I shall not insist upon the word, but the power of Russia is so preponderating in central Asia that Persia is necessarily guided in its foreign relations by the influence of its mighty neighbour. We have lately been engaged in a great conflict with the Russian empire. Unhappily, that conflict led to a fearful struggle, but most happily that conflict has now been terminated, and it is far from my wish to say anything which might revive asperities that have passed away, or which might even seem to indicate an unreasonable jealousy of the influence and power of Russia. Still, it is necessary for us to bear in mind that, as far as regards Central Asia, England and Russia have not coincident but to a considerable extent rival interests, and that it is as much as ever important that we should maintain the cardinal point of our Asiatic policy—namely, the independence of the territory intervening between Persia and our Indian boundary. It was on that account that, acting upon a principle recognized in 1838, when the siege of Herat took place, acting upon the principle which led to the naval expedition that occupied the island of Karrack, on the coast of Persia—an expedition which may be regarded as the forerunner and type of the recent war—acting upon the principle subsequently recognized by Lord Malmesbury when he broke off diplomatic relations with the Persian Minister in this country, on account of the threatened occupation of Herat, and, acting upon the principle embodied in the engagements entered into between Colonel Shiel and the Persian Government, Her Majesty's Government, when they saw that the independence of Herat was threatened, called upon the Persian Government to give an explanation of that movement, and either to withdraw their troops or to incur the perils of war. Such was the main ground upon which the war with Persia was undertaken. Undoubtedly, there had been during the war with Russia certain differences of opinion between our Minister and the Persian Government, which may have produced feelings of bitterness between the two countries; but those differences, to which I need not now allude in detail, could not of themselves have given rise to hostilities, though they might at the time have led to a continued suspension of diplomatic intercourse. Those were the grounds upon which the war was commenced. Now, Sir, the hon. and learned Gentleman says that, without disputing the policy of the war, into which question he would not enter, the course which was pursued was unprecedented, that it was an insult to Parliament, and that no Government before had ever entered upon a war without first calling Parliament together. [Mr. ROEBUCK: No, no!] I understood the hon. and learned Gentleman to say that no previous Government had entered upon a war without first giving notice to Parliament, or, at least, not without giving such notice as soon as circumstances permitted. The hon. and learned Gentleman says we violated the majesty of Parliament by applying the public money for the conduct of a war without obtaining the consent of Parliament to such a course. Let us consider how far precedent and practice justify those statements. If we look back to the case which furnishes the closest comparison with the recent expedition—I refer to the occupation of Karrack and Bushire in 1838—we shall find that no such communication as the hon. and learned Gentleman desires was made to Parliament. I have looked carefully through the printed correspondence of that period, and I am scarcely able to find, even in the declaration of the Governor General, any distinct allusion to that transaction. Lord Auckland made a declaration respecting the war in Affghanistan, which was afterwards adverted to in the King's Speech to Parliament, but no special communication was made upon the subject, nor was Parliament assembled at any unusual period upon that account. The hon. and learned Gentleman does not impugn the right of the Crown in declaring war; indeed, I believe we are all agreed that there is no doubt as to the prerogative of the Crown in that respect. Supposing, then, that the course which the hon. and learned Gentleman censures the Government for not adopting had been adopted, what object would have been gained by a mere communication to Parliament of the fact of the expedition having been sent? Parliament was not called upon then to vote any money on that account. The cost of the expedition was, in the first instance, defrayed from the Indian treasury, and the only effect of following the hon. and learned Gentleman's suggestion would have been, that Her Majesty would have informed Parliament of the expedition a few months earlier; in fact, in December, instead of in February. Beyond that, nothing could practically have been done by the Government. The declaration of the Indian Government was, I believe, made public at the time, and therefore was known in this country. The hon. and learned Gentleman compares this war with the war against Russia, the announcement of which, he says—and most justly says—was received with awe by this House; but not only morally is there a vast difference between a war with a great empire like Russia, and one with an Oriental monarchy like Persia, but also constitutionally is there a difference. The funds for carrying on the war with Russia were to be supplied in the first instance by this House, whereas in the other case the cost in the first instance, and to a great extent ultimately also, came from the Indian treasury. I presume there is no doubt of the power of the Governor General of India to declare war without making any communication to Parliament. There is no doubt that Lord Wellesley's wars and numerous others were begun, continued, and ended in India without any communication to this House. W them. These men said that their business was to fight, not to work; and it was not easy to bring them to a state of due subordination. Another great cause of this mutinous spirit was the extreme paucity of European officers in the native regiments. At present, officers were employed all over the country upon civil services, and too much of the work of Government rested upon them. Although it was true that they were recalled to their regiments in time of war, yet this practice was most injurious; as the direct consequence of their absence was, that the soldiers did not know their officers, nor the officers their soldiers. He had, however, known regiments go into action with only six officers, most of whom were mere boys. The fact that this insurrection broke out at Meerut, where there were European troops at the time, showed that the presence of a European force was not sufficient of itself to prevent the recurrence of mutiny. The system of withdrawing officers from their regiments and appointing them to civil situations ought to be abolished. A regiment of Sepoys required as many and even more officers than a Queen's regiment, and true wisdom would dictate the diminution of the Native army by one-half and the doubling the number of Europeans.

MR. BAILLIE said, he would express a hope that the question before the House would not be converted into an Indian debate. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made an able defence of the policy of the Government in reference to the Persian war; and that defence had proved all the more effective because it so happened that the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield had never once attacked that policy. The subject under consideration might be divided into three parts:—First, there was the constitutional question whether any Minister was justified in spending the public money without the cognizance or consent of Parliament? The second question related to the object of the Persian war, and to whether that object had been attained. The third question involved our past policy with respect to Persia, and what ought to be our policy for the future. With regard to the first point, no one could doubt for a moment that the public money had in this case been spent without the consent or the cognizance of Parliament. It would be in the recollection of the House that in the month of February last he had put a question to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Control—namely, whether it was true that the order for the expedition to the Persian Gulf was issued in the course of the July preceding, at a time when Parliament was sitting, and without any communication being made to Parliament on the subject. The answer was, that provisional orders were sent out to Bombay in July last, but the order for the expedition to sail was not sent out till September. Now, he found that those provisional orders, as they were called, were given by Lord Clarendon on the 19th of July, 1856, and that they were to this effect:—

Mr. Nisbet

“Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that the Shah has clearly shown that he is determined to persevere in the policy on which he has rashly entered as regards Herat; and as the success of that policy would be opposed to the interests of Great Britain, it appears necessary to lose no time in providing means for compelling the Shah, by coercive measures, to desist from his present schemes of aggrandizement. Her Majesty's Government, therefore, consider that instructions should at once be sent to the Governor General of India to collect at Bombay an adequate force of all arms, and provided with the necessary means of transport, for occupying the Island of Karrack and the city and district of Bushire; and to hold such force in readiness to depart from Bombay at the shortest notice. But the Governor General should be informed that the expedition is not actually to set out until the receipt of further orders from Her Majesty's Government.”

Those orders, then, involved the expenditure of a large sum of money; they comprised the hiring of transports, the purchase of stores and provisions, the embarkation of those stores, and the withdrawal of troops from Bombay; and there was no reason why the House of Commons should not have been informed of it, because the House was sitting at the time. The Minister might have said that the Government found it necessary to make a demonstration against Persia, and he might have explained the measures which he was about to adopt. It had been said by an hon. Member that the idea of the House of Commons being the guardian of the public purse was all moonshine, and he (Mr. Baillie) was really inclined to think that, according to the practice of modern times, it was so; but certainly that was not the opinion of the constituent body, who sent their Representatives to that House to look after their interests, who regarded them as the protectors of the public purse, and who no doubt would think that they merited censure if they failed in their duty in that respect. It might be asked what was the utility of bringing forward Motions of this sort when the noble Lord at the head of the Government had such a majority to support him. He (Mr. Baillie) knew perfectly well that the noble Lord was very powerful in that House. He did not know, however, that the support, which the noble Lord received, was of so servile a nature as to enable him to dispense with all the forms of Parliament and of the constitution. If it were so, all that he could say was, that he would rather live under an acknowledged despotism—such, for example, as that which existed in France or Russia—than under such a system; for there the chiefs who were acknowledged to be supreme acted at least under a deep sense of responsibility, whereas the noble Lord, who was practically supreme in this country, contrived, while following the bent of his own inclinations, to throw all the responsibility of his acts upon the Parliament which supported him. But he did not wish to dwell longer upon this subject; he had rather leave it in the far abler hands of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth (Sir F. Baring). The House would remember that a few days ago that right hon. Gentleman called to task the First Commissioner of Works because he had ventured to appropriate the sum of £11,000 without the consent of Parliament to effecting what every one must admit to be a great benefit to the citizens of London. He could not doubt, therefore, that upon this occasion the right hon. Baronet, with his accustomed eloquence, and the weight of his long official experience, would denounce an act which he (Mr. Baillie) was certain that he must regard as most unconstitutional. He came now to the second question—namely, what was the object of the Persian war, and had that object been attained? They had often been told in that House that the object of the war was to compel the Persians to evacuate the city of Herat; but since the papers had been laid upon the table by command of Her Majesty he found that that was not the sole object of the war, and that there were many other demands made upon the Persian Government. He would state to the House what the real demands were. It seemed that in the autumn of last year, Ferukh Khan, the Ambassador of Persia, was on his way to Paris. He stopped at Constantinople, and there entered into communication with Lord Stratford de Redcliffe. His overtures were received in the first instance with some haughtiness, but ultimately he induced Lord Stratford to tell him what were the demands made upon Persia by the British Government. Those demands were embodied in the following declaration which Ferukh Khan was to sign:—

“1. Persia engages immediately to withdraw all the Persian troops from Herat and its territory, and to pay compensation for all damages done by them therein.

“2. Persia shall enter into a formal treaty with England, by which Persia will renounce all pretensions of any kind to interfere in the affairs of Herat, or of any portion of Affghanistan; will engage not to receive at any time overtures to interfere in their internal affairs; will recognize their absolute independence; and will agree to refer to British mediation any differences which Persia may hereafter have with them.

“3. Persia shall negotiate and conclude a new treaty of commerce with England, by which all questions which have hitherto given rise to discussion between the two Governments shall be settled, and the right be conceded to England of appointing consuls in any part of Persia.

“4. All debts due to British subjects shall forthwith be paid, and an understanding come to on disputed claims.

“5. Persia shall make an arrangement respecting Bender Abbas, satisfactory to the Imaum of Muscat, the friend of England.

“6. His Majesty the Shah, in consideration of the part taken by the Sadr Azim in the late differences between the two countries, shall dismiss him, and replace him by a Minister more likely to maintain a good understanding between England and Persia.”

Those were the terms demanded at Constantinople before the war began, and to every one of those conditions Ferukh Khan consented, with the exception of the one which demanded the dismissal of the Sadr Azim, or Prime Minister; and he said that it was impossible for him to agree to that, because the actions of that Minister had been in accordance with the directions of the Shah, and it was impossible for the Shah to dismiss a Minister for obeying his orders. To everything else, however, Ferukh Khan agreed. But it seemed that Lord Stratford was bound by his orders—he could not dispense with the dismissal of the Persian Prime Minister, and on the 12th of December, 1856, he wrote to Lord Clarendon—

“All my endeavours to prevail on Ferukh Khan to redeem his pledges have failed. Before sending to Tehran by express, and consenting to stay for the reply, he requires a promise that no expedition shall meanwhile land in Persia, and that nothing shall be added to the present ultimatum, not even a demand of indemnity. I undertook if he would do without more hesitation whatever he had offered or accepted, to submit the conditions of his stay to your Lordship by telegraph. He now insists on my writing home first, and I send him word that I have nothing to add. The terms of the ultimatum continue to tie me down. The Sadr Azim's dismissal is a great obstacle."

Four days after that was written, but, of course, before it had been received, there was a despatch from Lord Clarendon, dated December the 16th, which put the matter beyond doubt. It ran thus :

" Nothing will be added to the present ultimatum, provided that its conditions are complied with, but delay will give rise to more stringent demands. The Ambassador's request that our expedition to Persia may be delayed cannot be listened to. We must insist upon the dismissal of the Sadr Azim."

It was quite manifest, therefore, that the war had been undertaken for the dismissal of that Minister, because every other term was agreed to, and not for the evacuation of the city of Herat. The negotiations were then broken off, and the Persian Ambassador, after stating that he withdrew all his concessions, proceeded to Paris; but in the meantime the war was begun, the expedition was sent out; it arrived in the Persian Gulf; success followed its operations, Bushire was captured, and those events took place with which they were all familiar. Arrived in Paris, Ferukh Khan entered into communication with Lord Cowley, and negotiations were again commenced; but Ferukh Khan made none of the concessions at Paris which he had offered at Constantinople. The war having been begun, and we having been, as we had been told, successful, were yet obliged to give up every one of those conditions which had been offered to us at Constantinople—at least, all those which were offensive to Persia. We gave up, for example, all compensation to the people of Herat; we abandoned the question of the dismissal of the Prime Minister; we gave up our friend the Imaum of Muscat; and, after a great sacrifice of money in the Persian expedition, and after the loss of many valuable lives, we ended by obtaining much worse terms than we could have had before the war was undertaken. That was the way in which this successful Persian war was brought to a conclusion. Now, he would read what Lord Cowley stated with respect to the negotiation which took place in Paris. He said,—

" The undersigned comprehends from the note of His Excellency Ferukh Khan, coupled with the verbal explanations which the undersigned has had the honour to receive from his Excellency, that the King of Persia makes it a personal request of the British Government that the first of these conditions should not be insisted upon; that with regard to the second his Excellency has learnt, that since the engagement which he contracted at Constantinople considerable sums of money had already been sent by the King of Persia to Herat, and that consequently more profit than loss has accrued to the inhabitants of that town from its occupation by Persian troops, and he hopes, therefore, that he may be released from the promises which he made on this point at Constantinople. With respect to the mediation of Great Britain in the matter of Bender Abbas, his Excellency Ferukh Khan observes that the question is already satisfactorily settled between the parties interested, and that consequently no mediation is necessary. The undersigned cannot but regret that his Excellency Ferukh Khan should not have repeated in writing that which he has so often given the undersigned to understand while conversing on these matters, namely, that if these conditions were persisted in by Her Majesty's Government, and agreed to by the Persian Government, the King of Persia's dignity and independence would be greatly compromised in the eyes of his subjects, because it is for this reason that Her Majesty's Government have determined on desisting from them, being most unwilling, by insisting on obnoxious stipulations, not absolutely necessary to the attainment of peace, to do aught that would either influence the sentiments of the Persians towards their sovereign or injure the power and welfare of the Persian dominions. It is the desire, as it is the policy, of Her Majesty's Government that Persia should be strong, prosperous, and independent, and they cannot give a greater proof of their sincerity in this respect than by the moderation of their demands while in possession of a valuable portion of the Persian territory. The undersigned has, then, the pleasure to inform his Excellency Ferukh Khan, that Her Majesty's Government will not insist on his acceptance of the three conditions to which his Excellency's note refers."

Mr. Baillie

It appeared to him that if those stipulations were not just and reasonable they ought not to have been proposed, but having been proposed, and war having been declared because they were not complied with, it was contrary to the character and honour of this country to accept, under the circumstances which occurred, less favourable terms. So much for the second part of the case as regarded the object of the Persian war, and the way in which it had been attained. Now he would go to the third part of the question—namely, the past conduct and policy of this country with respect to Persia, and what ought to be the policy of this country towards her for the future. It was impossible to reflect on the past conduct of the country with respect to Persia without some degree of humiliation. It was very well known that previously to the last Persian war with Russia, England was on terms of the greatest friendship and alliance with Persia. Previously to that war England had made a treaty with Persia, by which she bound herself specifically to defend Persia, if Persia should be attacked by Russia. Well, the day of trial arrived during the Administration of the Duke of Wellington. Russia declared war against Persia, and invaded the Persian territory. Of course, she found some pretence for war, the wolf was never without that; but England stood tamely by, and allowed Russia to deprive Persia of her fairest provinces without lifting a hand in the defence of Persia, or raising even a remonstrance. How could any one be surprised that Persia, under such circumstances, lost all confidence in England, and threw herself into the hands of a Power which she was totally unable to resist? That was the natural consequence of the conduct of England on that occasion. Since then there had been more or less of estrangement between this country and Persia, and that estrangement had been increased by the bungling diplomacy of this country. England thought it necessary to take part in all the quarrels of the Affghans and Persians on their frontier. For years those countries had always had disputes of the kind, and whenever Persia attempted to resist the insults of the Affghans, by marching to the city of Herat, England interfered, and said that if the Persians went there she would be prepared to declare war against them. This state of things had been going on for some fifteen or twenty years. The importance attached by the British Government to the city of Herat arose, he imagined, from a supposition that it might some day or other be made the base of Russian operations against India. Therefore the great object of England was to prevent Herat falling into the hands of Russia; but then the question arose, was the course taken by England the best to attain that object? Three courses were open. England might have given Herat to the Persians or to the Affghans, or have given it, as she had done, into the hands of an independent prince. Let the House consider the expediency of the three propositions. England had said that Herat should be put into the hands of an independent prince, together with a small territory around it. Well, suppose that accomplished, and suppose an immense Russian army, well equipped and capable of invading India, had, with the aid and assistance of the Persians, marched through the Persian territory and arrived at Herat. Did any one believe that the independent prince of Herat could resist such an army? Then, where was the great object in quarrelling with the Persians and Affghans in order that this petty prince might be placed in that city? That was the question as it now stood, and now let the House consider the case of Herat being given to the Affghans. He thought that in discussing this question they might fairly assume that both the Affghans and Persians, being semi-barbarous people, were not likely to maintain either treaties or friendly relations with this country for a moment longer than their interest or inclination dictated. If Herat were given to the Affghans, would it be the inclination or interest of the Affghans, in the event of Russia invading India, to take part with the British? He would show that it would be both their interest and inclination to take part with the Russians. It was known that they entertained the most vindictive feelings towards the British, who had laid waste their country, burnt their territory, and destroyed their crops. This, as naturally might be expected, was exemplified in the last Punjab war; when our general appeared in some difficulty about the time of the battle of Chillianwallah, the army of the Affghans descended from the mountains and joined their hereditary enemies, the Sikhs, against the British; and when Dost Mahomed was accused of treachery, he declared that it was no fault of his, but a spontaneous act on the part of the people, which he was unable to prevent. He believed that Dost Mahomed stated no more than the truth; and so much for the inclination of the Affghans towards England. Now, let the House consider what would be their interest. The British held at the present time the Affghan city and fortress of Peshawur, with a certain territory, which they were incessantly demanding to be restored to them. In case, then, of a Russian invasion of India, the first thing the Russians would do would be to promise the restoration of Peshawur to the Affghans, and therefore it would be the interest of the Affghans to side with the Russians. Consequently it would not be advisable to give Herat to the Affghans. Now, the Persians were the only people in the world mainly interested in the maintenance of the British power in India. It was only by the existence of that that the Persian Empire could be maintained for six months, for Russia might march and take possession of it without any European Power being able to prevent that catastrophe. The Persians, therefore, were the people to whom naturally the British should have given Herat, and he believed that the inhabitants of Herat would much rather be under Persian than Affghan rule, for many of them were Persians; the city having formerly been Persian. If that course were pursued, the Persians would be found to continue on the most friendly terms with England, and if at any time the Russians should be anxious to invade India, they could only accomplish the object by marching through one of the most barren and difficult countries on the face of the earth. Concurring, therefore, neither in the policy which had led to the war, nor in the manner in which it had been concluded, and conceiving also that Her Majesty's Government had not acted towards the House in a manner accordant with the spirit of the constitution, he should support the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, though he very much regretted to be obliged in truth to support any Motion likely to embarrass the Government at the present time.

VISCOUNT BURY said, he did not think the present a proper time to throw any difficulty in the way of the Government, when a great portion of the Indian empire was in arms against the British. He felt that the Government ought to have every aid afforded them, so that their hands might be strengthened at a time when the prestige of their power was shaken in the East. Therefore he could not concur in a Resolution condemning the Government, though, at the same time, he could not think it a right course that a war should be begun and finished without the House being allowed an opportunity of expressing its opinion. He was one of those who altogether entertained objections to diplomatic relations with semi-barbarous people, for he thought such relations never tended to the interest or honour of the country. As a representative of one of the great commercial cities of this country, he condemned the war in toto, because he thought it was not based upon a just cause, that it could not serve any good purpose, and that it involved a waste of England's blood and treasure. He could not see how the interference of this country could be justified, even on the ostensible ground of securing the frontiers of India from foreign invasion. Previously to 1814 France, and since that period Russia, had been the objects of our fear. He thought our mission to Teheran had been proved by history to be a mistake, diplomatically and financially, and that the danger against which it was intended to guard was extremely chimerical. In the reign of James I. a Persian ambassador presented his credentials for the first time at the British Court, but he was followed by a second Minister, who declared the credentials of his predecessor forgeries, and kicked him down stairs. The diplomatic intercourse between the two countries then ceased for a century and a half, and was renewed by Lord Wellesley, who seemed to fear that French intrigues were carried on at Teheran, and that Napoleon might lead an army against our Indian frontier. A mission was sent to Teheran, which succeeded in inducing the Persian Government to issue a proclamation forbidding all Frenchmen from entering Persia on pain of death. In 1808, another mission was sent to the Persian Court, and from that time until 1814, Sir John Malcolm and Sir Harford Jones were engaged in arranging the preliminaries of a treaty with the Shah. The treaty now in force was eventually concluded. Sir Harford Jones was a somewhat choleric gentleman, and was accustomed from his age, and from his experience at the Court of the Shah, to indulge in a freedom, both of language and action, which was not usual in civilized society, and especially in diplomatic intercourse. After the treaty had been ratified, the Vizier said something that offended Sir Harford Jones, who, to use his own words, "punched the Vizier's head against the wall," kicked out the candle which was on the floor, seized the treaty, sprang upon his horse, and galloped off before any one could stop him. By the ninth article of that treaty it was provided that in the case of a war between Persia and Afghanistan, the British Government should not interfere unless requested to do so by both the belligerent States. Something had been said of a convention which had abrogated that treaty, but the Shah—one of the contracting parties—declared that such convention was never signed; and he (Viscount Bury) thought, therefore, they must conclude that the treaty of 1814 was still in force, and that England had no business to prevent Persia from going to Herat. Without, however, pretending to unravel the knot, into which this question had been worked, he would shortly call the attention of the House to the possibility of an invasion of India from that quarter, upon which question alone the importance of Herat was rested. He had always thought the fear entertained of such an invasion chimerical. Russia was the power from which, since 1814, encroachments had been apprehended; but the ability of Russia to invade India was easily tested. Some years ago, a picked army of 20,000 Russian troops, under General Petrovski, attempted to march to Khiva, but they encountered the Turcomans, and were compelled to retire into the mountains near the Caspian Sea, with a loss of nearly a third of the invading force. The Russian people were very indignant at this repulse, and the subject was referred by the Czar to the late Duke of Wellington, who said General Petrovski could not have done otherwise than retire, and that by sacrificing one-third of the army he had saved the remainder. On the western side of the Caspian, the Russians had been engaged for fifty years with the mountaineers of the Caucasus, but had never been able to reduce them to submission. Now, the distance from the shores of the Caspian Sea—of which Russia had full command—to the nearest point of our Indian empire was at least 1500 miles, the greater part of the intervening country consisting of an arid desert, where neither provisions, water, nor fuel could be obtained, and it would be utterly impossible to convey artillery through the rocky mountain passes. But, supposing the Russian forces to have an ample supply of food, fodder, water, and fuel, and roads upon which artillery and ammunition could be moved, it was not likely that they would progress more rapidly than our Indian army; and when General Harris marched upon Seringapatam over 137 miles of country, chiefly British territory, under favourable circumstances, the journey occupied twenty-seven days, so that the troops proceeded at an average rate of five miles a day. It would, therefore, take a Russian army about ten months to move over the distance of 1500 miles to the nearest point of our frontier, and they would then have to encounter a British army. During this march, too, the Russians would have to meet more than seventy nomad and barbarous tribes, not including the Affghans, who would dispute every inch of ground. When the House remembered that in little more than a month after news of the Indian mutiny reached this country a number of troops sufficient to quell it had been despatched, and that in four or five months a large army could be conveyed to India, he thought they would admit there was no reason to apprehend any danger from Russia with regard to our Indian empire. He considered that the Government deserved great credit for the prompt and efficient measures they had adopted to quell the disturbances in India; he did not think the present was a time when the House should express an opinion adverse to their policy; and therefore he could not vote with the hon and learned Member for Sheffield.

Mr. Baillie

Mr. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he believed the opinion of the noble Lord (Viscount Bury) that the present was not a time for embarrassing the Government, would meet with the concurrence of a large majority of the House. A crisis had occurred in India, which he hoped would have no serious consequences; and it had been admitted that Her Majesty's Government had taken most vigorous measures to afford aid to the representatives of British authority. The question was, whether the Government were right in proclaiming war with Persia without communicating their intentions to the House; but he would ask how the Government could have been expected to call Parliament together at so unusual a time of the year, and to give an opinion on a war that was essentially an Indian war; for the war was not undertaken on account of any mere minor questions, but because Persia chose to take a course that was in direct hostility to our empire in the East. All the minor points at issue might have been arranged, had it not been that Persia sent an army to invade Herat. The hon. Member for Inverness-shire (Mr. Baillie) had told them that in the event of a Russian invasion of India the Affghans would side with Russia, and not with this country; but such an idea was contradicted by history, and by what were the true interests of Affghanistan itself. The Affghans had felt and knew our power; they knew that we had conquered their country, and that but for an unforeseen disaster we might have retained it. It was a poor country, which it was not our interest to retain, as the Affghans readily admitted; but with its natural strength and its warlike population it was just such a country as we should wish to see placed between the two greatest countries in the world. Were the Affghans favourable to Russia during the late war? Did the attitude of Dost Mahomed during that war look like partiality towards her? Did he send an ambassador to St. Petersburg, or offer to join the Russians in an invasion of India? No! He showed himself the friend of India. He met a distinguished Indian officer on the frontier, and even gave his consent to the passage of English troops through his territory. It was known that, before the fatal invasion, Dost Mahomed and all the Mollahs were favourable to England, and although we then committed acts which were indefensible, they still retained a wholesome reverence for our courage and our power. The hon. Gentleman said the Persians were the only people interested in the preservation of India, but in that he wholly disagreed with him. The people of Afghanistan were as much interested in the maintenance of the present position of affairs in the East as those of Persia could possibly be. Persia held the same position in the East that Austria did in Europe. She was an internal State surrounded by other Powers, and, though not what she once was—though she had greatly shrunk within the limits that anciently belonged to her—she still possessed no small amount of prestige, and her power was great even in countries that did not belong to her. It was no doubt the interest of Persia to cultivate the friendship of the large States by which she was surrounded; but when the two greatest empires in the world went to war, when she attempted then to take advantage of her position—when, assuming an attitude of neutrality, she proceeded to break that neutrality, insult our Ministers, and violate her solemn engagements, by advancing upon a city which was prohibited to her troops, what in such a case was the proper attitude of the great empire she had insulted? Surely it was not to give in to that weak Power, but to say to her, “Distant as you are, you shall be made to feel the power of our arms.” Such was the course taken by the Government in the case of the Persian war. Persia had grossly violated her engagements, and she was at once told that, though we were at war with Russia, we still had the power to look after her, and compel her to fulfil all her pledges. It was not till all the means of negotiation had been exhausted that the Government resorted to force, and succeeded in establishing a peace which he trusted would be long maintained. The moment Parliament assembled the papers were laid on the table. China and other matters had certainly occupied the attention of the House, but why should the affairs of Persia have been neglected till now? Why should an increase in the Estimates make any difference? They were told in the first instance that the estimated cost of the war was £250,000, and at that time no fault was found, but a tacit assent was given to the course which had been pursued; but now, when they had a larger bill to pay, the question was taken up and discussed, though the principle which was involved could not in the least degree be affected by any increase of the Estimates. The time for calling in question the propriety of the war had passed; he could not but regard it as unfair and ungenerous to the Government to raise the question now, and he trusted that the House would not sanction by its vote such a mode of transacting public business.

Mr. Danby Seymour

MR. WILLOUGHBY said, he must express his surprise that there was any difference of opinion with respect to the maintenance of the independence of Herat. The policy pursued towards Persia had been the same in all Administrations for many past years, and, though he concurred generally in the wisdom of that policy, he differed from the Government as to the mode in which they, in 1838, attempted to carry it out. They were, however, now only following up the policy laid down by the Government of the Earl of Derby. It would be seen by the papers on the table that the Earl of Malmesbury, Foreign Secretary under the Earl of Derby's Government, inculcated on our ambassador at Teheran a course which ended in a convention with Persia, in which that State solemnly agreed to abstain from sending troops to Herat. In these circumstances what course could the Government take when Persia declared that Herat was no longer to be left inviolate? In his (Mr. Willoughby's) opinion, the moment the Sudar Azim informed Lieutenant Colonel Shiel that the Persian Ministers considered Herat, not Afghanistan, to be a province of Khorassan, and the protection of Herat, and the people of Herat to be their duty, immediately following up this declaration by despatching a military force to occupy it, Her Majesty's Government had no alternative but to adopt vigorous measures for frustrating their design. Of course, with regard to the mode in which the Government had carried out its policy in this matter, opinions might vary. Some might think it would have been better to advance directly to the object in view, others, to make the demonstration which has been made on the coasts of Persia. Be that as it might, he should certainly not discuss the merits of either of these modes of proceeding; but the course pursued by the Government had at least the merit of success, and he thought it a matter for congratulation that the Government had obtained a stipulation by which, in future, Persia renounced all claim to the occupation of Herat. He submitted, however, that the present was not the time for arraigning any course of action which Her Majesty's Government had felt it their duty to pursue with respect to Persia. A great crisis had arisen in India to which no man at all acquainted with that great empire could be indifferent; still he thought it afforded no cause for despondency or anything like unmanly alarm. At the same time it was the duty of every one at this particular time to do all that in him lay to strengthen the hands of Her Majesty's Government, and to enable the authorities in India to put forth their whole energy in crushing the rebellion. It would be premature to attempt to enter into a consideration of the causes which might have combined to bring about the present crisis; but he could not refrain from observing, that the discussion the other day, founded on a memorial from certain Missionaries at Calcutta, was most injudicious. He yielded to no one in his respect for the gentlemen from whom that memorial emanated, but he thought they would have done wisely had they acted on the principle which they avowed in 1843 in an exceptional case—relating to the Gates of Somnauth, namely, the principle of never interfering in matters of State policy, or with the measures of the Supreme Government; and that ought to have been the answer to the memorial in question, when it was brought under the notice of the House. With respect to the charge brought against the covenanted servants of the East India Company, in reference to the abominable system of torture, he should not then attempt to show that that charge was utterly unfounded, though he had the fullest proof within his own knowledge and experience that it was so. Torture in India is denounced as a crime and punished as a crime whenever detected; and at a more convenient season he would prove from the Report of the Madras Commissioners that the charge preferred against the Company's European Officers in this House, and echoed by a portion of the public press, is altogether without foundation. He begged to thank the House for the patience with which they had listened to the few remarks he had ventured to address to them.

SIR FENWICK WILLIAMS said, he could not on the present occasion reconcile it to his conscience to give a silent vote on the Motion before the House. For ten years he had been employed in a public capacity in various parts of the East. He was engaged for five years in negotiations at Erzeroum relative to differences between Persia and Turkey, and for five years subsequently he travelled in all parts of the Persian territory. He had, therefore, many opportunities of becoming acquainted with the opinions of almost all classes of the people, and he could assure the House that in his communications with Persian princes, Turkish dignitaries, and the peasantry of both those countries, the relative position of Russia and England was the constant theme of conversation among them. They weighed the military power of Russia against the naval power of England, and they talked almost continually of the possibility of Russia going to India. That idea was also inculcated on the minds of the people by every Russian agent who visited their territory, and it was said by those emissaries that Russia would establish herself in India step by step, and that one of the first of those steps would be the capture of Herat. That being the case, he thought the House might safely affirm the policy of the war with Persia. The war with Russia ensued, and every one knew what had taken place in Asia. After the fall of Kars, he (Sir Fenwick Williams) went as a captive into Russia, and there, as in Persia, he found the invasion of India through Persia to be the universal and favourite topic. Under these circumstances, he was firmly convinced of the policy of the Persian war. With respect to the expedition to the Persian Gulf, which had been admirably arranged, in his opinion it was the best move ever made by England. For ten years, to obtain the transfer of Mohammerah from the Turks to the Persians had been the object of ceaseless negotiations, and therefore it might be inferred that to the latter people the place was of great value, and when he (Sir W. Fenwick Williams), in the course of his duty, placed Mohammerah in the hands of the Persians from the Turks, he little thought that he should have witnessed its being taken by British troops. It was said, that the finger of Russia was seen in the capture of Herat, and in the same way it might be affirmed that the finger of England was seen at Mohammerah, and the House might depend upon it that for one hundred years to come its speedy capture would not be forgotten by the Persians. It was said that the Persians would not give up Herat. He should like to see them retain it, as we should then retain Mohammerah, which, being seated on an embouchure of the Gulf, was the great entrepôt of their trade. He mentioned these circumstances to justify the policy of the war, and to show how successful and wise had been the negotiations for peace.

MR. LYGON said, they were not there to discuss the policy of the war with Persia, but the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in dealing with that House, and he must observe, after all he had heard from the Ministerial Benches in the nature of defence, that he was left completely in the dark as to the motives which had prompted the treatment of the House by the Government in reference to the conduct of this war. They had heard from that quarter of the House some valuable historical accounts of the way in which England had dealt with Persia in previous times, but nothing about the question really before them—namely, the attempt to deprive that House of its constitutional control over the finances of the country. He ventured to express a hope that, during the remainder of the debate, hon. Members would keep more strictly to the question under consideration. They were not called on to discuss historical subjects, but, as he had already said, a great constitutional question, which was especially dear to every Englishman, and indissolubly bound up with the privileges, the dignity, and the honour of the House of Commons.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, in the event of the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) dividing the House on this occasion, he should be constrained to vote in favour of the Motion. His reason for that course was not at all influenced by the policy which dictated the Persian war, but solely by what he considered was the unconstitutional course pursued on that occasion by the Government. He had entered that House perfectly unfettered, and had heretofore given his support generally to the Government; but this was a case in which they had committed an oversight; for he thought, in all instances where large sums of money were to be expended, the representatives of the people should be summoned and consulted on the subject. He did not mean to say that the prerogative of the Crown did not give the Government power to declare war, but he would remind them that Lord Kenyon had laid down the maxim that the prerogative of the Crown should always be exercised for the benefit of the people.

Sir Fenwick Williams

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said: There are two questions before the House. They have both been discussed with great moderation, and I certainly do not wish to alter that tone. The one question is that to which the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) almost entirely confined himself—namely, the control over grants of money by this House; the other question is, the policy of the Persian war. With regard to the first of these questions, I think the hon. Gentleman who spoke last, and several other hon. Members who preceded him, even the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, who spoke with so much ability, have a little overlooked the precise facts connected with the delay. I may say that, with regard to the latter part of the delay, from the month of February to the production of the papers, this House was, in my opinion, a consenting party. I believe that, on the 3rd of February, the very day when the late Parliament met, a communication took place between Lord Cowley and Feruhk Khan, the Persian Ambassador, which was made the basis of negotiation. It then became a question with Her Majesty's Ministers whether it would be conducive to the success of that negotiation to produce, at that time, papers explanatory of the causes of the Persian war. They stated to the House very fairly and temperately that, in their opinion, the production of papers might embarrass that negotiation; but it would have been in the power of this House, if this House had thought otherwise—it was in the power of any hon. Member, if he had thought otherwise—to make a Motion for papers, and if that Motion had been successful, the papers would no doubt have been produced. It was, I think, the wisdom of this House which induced them to refrain from pressing for any such papers. They concurred in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, and no such papers were asked for during the course of the negotiation. That accounts for the whole period, from the beginning of the Session until the signature of the treaty of peace. It may be that the Government carried their reserve too far, in not producing the papers until the treaty was ratified: but every one knows that the moment the signature of the treaty took place, the late House was menaced with dissolution. Every one was thinking much more of the elections which were about to take place than of the affairs of Persia, and no great good would have followed their production. As soon as the ratification took place, the papers were produced. This explanation with reference to time explains the greater portion of the delay. With regard to the former portion of the delay, I do not think that the Ministers were altogether justified in not calling Parliament together at an earlier period. I do not think it would have been wise, it would not have been expedient, with a view to the success of any operations, that, immediately the orders were given for the collection of troops and ships at Bombay, Parliament should have been called together, and notice thus given of the exact operations which were to take place. But I think that when the 1st of November came, and Ministers were informed that the Governor General of India had, by desire of this Government—not of his own proper authority, but by the desire of the Government at home—declared war, they ought to have called Parliament together. When I reflect, however, that the charge is now made in the middle of July, and that the deficiency of Her Majesty's Ministers—the delay in performing their duty to Parliament—took place during some six weeks before the 3rd of February. I cannot think that it amounts to such a grave charge as makes it at all necessary for this House to come to a Resolution upon it. I cannot concur in the opinion that Ministers are altogether without blame, yet, considering the long time that has elapsed, and considering, moreover, the gravity of the circumstances in which we are at present placed, I do not think we should be justified in coming to the strong Resolution which we are asked to adopt. With regard to the second question—the policy of the war—I shall be very brief. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Inverness-shire (Mr. Baillie) has gone into details with respect to the negotiations, and I own I cannot see that it is at all true that we might not have had as good a settlement as we have obtained without any declaration of war. Lord Clarendon repeatedly declared, not perhaps in the very words, but to the same effect, that the sine quâ non of peace was the dismissal of the Persian Minister. That, I think, was an extravagant demand, and it was not persevered in. But if that demand had not been persisted in at Constantinople, Lord Stratford had in his hand powers of complete compliance with all the demands which were then made, and the hon. Member for Inverness-shire has shown that, under that compliance the advantages would have been fully as great, if not greater than were afterwards obtained. Admitting for the moment, and I am quite ready to admit, the importance of the affairs of the East, I cannot see that we should not have obtained all the advantages which we have obtained without the extremity of going to war. I cannot think lightly of any war. I do not think that the Government is justified in going to war without being thoroughly satisfied that objects essential to the interests or to the honour of the country cannot be obtained by other means. The Secretary of the Board of Control said, that all means of negotiation were exhausted. He did not attempt, however, to prove that proposition, and I do not think it is a proposition which can be proved out of the papers which are laid before us. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Calne (Sir F. W. Williams) says, he found on the frontiers of Russia, of Persia, and of India, the notion prevalent and much favoured by Russian speculators, that it was the intention and destiny of Russia to conquer from us our possessions in India; therefore, he says, our policy towards Persia was right. I must say, I never saw so short a cut in logic as that of my hon. and gallant Friend. I am quite ready to admit all that he has asserted of his own knowledge and authority with respect to general speculation in the East—a very natural speculation for ingenious and political theorists—upon the future destiny of India, but that he should thereby conclude that our policy towards Persia has been justified, and has been dictated by sound views is rather too sudden a leap for me at once to take. I should have thought from the premises that, supposing that the Russians had designs of advancing to India, it would be our object to conciliate as far as possible the Government of Persia. To be sure, it is said that the Persian Government had violated treaty engagements in its proceedings with regard to Herat. There was a very vague and undefined convention with regard to Herat, with many loopholes in it of which the Persian Government could take advantage. There was one thing, however, tolerably clear—that we never could pretend that Persia was always to neglect her own interests with regard to Herat; that if the ruler of Herat made continual invasions, seized Persian subjects, and destroyed Persian property, the Shah was always to remain passive; that if Dost Mahomed advanced from Candahar and threatened Herat, the Shah of Persia could overlook that circumstance with a due regard to his own interests. The Prime Minister of Persia said, that the Persian Government were ready to act upon the same policy which the English Government approved. They were ready to allow an independent prince to rule over Herat. They did not insist that he should be a Persian. That is exactly what we say ourselves. We do not choose that the Governor of Herat shall be a Persian prince, or that Herat shall be brought under the sway of the Governor General of Afghanistan, and therefore, if it had not been for a trumpety quarrel which had arisen between the mission at Herat and the Persian Government, the probability is, that by the usual diplomatic means—by means of explanation, by stating fairly what it was we wished, by asking the Persian Government to state fairly what they wished, by telling them what we considered essential to our interest, and hearing patiently what they considered essential to Persian interests, we should have come to an understanding, and this war might have been avoided. I say again, I consider this war no matter of indifference. You may tell us that it is only a question of a million, or at most of two millions of money. I do not undertake to say, as the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield does, that the mutiny of the army of India is owing to the taking away of those troops. At the same time these wars disturb men's minds, and tend to put into men's heads speculations upon conquest to which Eastern imaginations are prone, and disturb that quiet in India which it ought to be our policy to maintain. Let me say generally, and I hope I am not saying anything quite contrary to the wishes and views of Her Majesty's Government, that it does seem to me that last year—when we had obtained peace with Russia, when we had obtained by that peace, according to the declaration of the Government, in which the House concurred, all the objects for which we contended—was a time to bear in mind a policy of peace, to conciliate all the great Powers, to consider Russia, after she had made peace, as much a friend as any of the Powers of Europe, and not to be endeavouring for ever to raise up jealousy and suspicion, but to endeavour to tranquillize the world, which had been disturbed by a contest not of our seeking. It was a contest which we did not seek, but which was necessary, though not, as the President of the Board of Control would seem to insinuate, for the sake of India. I should say it was not at all for the sake of India that we went to war with Russia. It was for the sake of England—it was for the sake of Europe, of which this country forms so great a part, and is so great a power: and, having concluded that war, I cannot but think it was our interest that pacific sentiments should be cultivated, and peace established throughout the world. We have interests all over the world. There is no part of any sea, to the east or to the west, to the north or to the south, in which we have not some interest or other, and in which we have not some agent—occasionally not very fortunately chosen—in whose hands a great deal of power is placed. It is impossible to avoid little disputes, trifling quarrels, in some parts of the world. The only way in which we can keep at peace is, by telling our agents, in all cases, to endeavour to come to some rational conclusion, and, while they do not sacrifice any of our treaty rights, or any of our great interests, to recollect that it is neither our interest nor our wish to inflame these petty quarrels, but to smooth them down. These are the views which I entertain. I venture to hope they are not altogether adverse to the sentiments of this House, or to those of Her Majesty's Government. However much we may regret that the war with Persia and the hostilities with China ever took place, we must all, of course, be ready to vote the sum of money which is now asked; but I do hope that it will be the desire and object of our Government to do all in their power, without sacrificing the honour and the interests of the country, to keep that peace which we have obtained at such cost.

Lord John Russell

CAPTAIN SCOTT said, that he rose with the usual diffidence of a new Member, who addressed the House for the first time, and with more diffidence than the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Lygon) had reason to feel, for he spoke clearly and well. He intended to support the Government upon the present occasion, thinking that, instead of finding fault, they ought to put all their shoulders to the wheel in these troublous times in India. We had brought the present difficulty upon ourselves. Having resided in India from 1827 to 1842, and mixed much with the natives, he knew their feelings very well. He had, therefore, no hesitation in saying that hogslard and cartridges had nothing to do with the mutiny in the Bengal army. That plea was what the natives called "shuma shum," in our language "humbug." The Sepoys saw that we intended to take possession of all the territory in India, and hence their disaffection, which was still further increased by a restriction of the privileges which they formerly enjoyed in respect to furloughs.

MR. KER was understood to say that he should vote against the Resolution, believing that the Government had adopted a wise course in dealing with Persia. Asiatics were so untruthful that it was more difficult to treat with them than the noble Lord the Member for London seemed to imagine.

MR. WALPOLE: The noble Lord the Member for the City, has very properly recalled the attention of the House to the only two points which are really before us—namely, the policy of the war, and the conduct of the Government in withholding from this House information which it ought to have received. With respect to the first of these questions—the policy of the war—I am inclined to agree with almost everything that fell from the noble Lord, and I, therefore, shall not repeat what he has said in much better language than any I could employ. But I own that upon the other question—the constitutional question raised by the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield—I was somewhat disappointed at the tone taken by the noble Lord, for I have always been accustomed to look up to him as one of the greatest authorities upon such subjects, not only of those who are alive now, but of those who have preceded him in this House. If we were lightly to pass by the great constitutional question, which the conduct of the Government during the past year has raised for the first time, we should not only be guilty of a gross neglect of duty, but establish a precedent which, if once recognized, could not fail to lead to very dangerous and lamentable consequences. Upon that question there are some things which the House ought to bear in mind. The only justification of the conduct of the Government which I have heard, consisted of a statement by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to the effect that in former Indian wars, no announcement was made to Parliament, and that in the late war with Persia the Government had followed these precedents. But I defy the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or any other Member of the Government, to point out to me a time when that course was adopted in the case of a war which was not, in fact, an Indian war, for which the instructions proceeded from the Home Government, and of which the proclamation, when made by the Governor General in Calcutta, was expressly stated to be made pursuant to directions from England. Why, the very agreement which you said had been violated was not entered into by the Indian Government with Persia, but by an accredited agent of the mother country; and it may be asserted, indeed, that every circumstance connected with the late war takes it out of that class of cases in which Indian wars have been undertaken for Indian purposes, by Indian authorities, and at Indian expense. Before the prorogation of Parliament last year, we had an Indian budget from the President of the Board of Control. Upon that occasion the right hon. Gentleman intimated to the House, but in the most cursory manner, that it was possible there might be hostilities commenced by Persia against Herat, and that, if so, means would be taken by this country to deal with the difficulty when it arose. I believe that the right hon. Gentleman had, at the time that speech was made, in his possession a despatch which had been sent to him by the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office, and which contained, not a vague intimation that hostilities might possibly be commenced by Persia against Herat, but a distinct announcement that he was to take means for suppressing them. The despatch even pointed out the course which he was to pursue. But let me first mention that that despatch was preceded by one written by the Earl of Clarendon to the Persian Minister, dated July 11, in which the very aggression is noticed, and in which it was stated, means would be taken to resist it.

Then comes the communication from the Earl of Clarendon to the President of the Board of Control, dated July 19, in which this strong intimation appears:—

“Her Majesty’s Government, therefore, consider that instructions should at once be sent to the Governor General of India to collect at Bombay an adequate force of all arms, and provided with the necessary means of transport for occupying the Island of Karrack and the city and district of Bushire; and to hold such force in readiness to depart from Bombay at the shortest notice. But the Governor General should be informed that the expedition is not actually to set out until the receipt of further orders from Her Majesty’s Government.”

Now, I think that when so strong an intimation had been given by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, something more ought to have been told to the House than the vague intimation which fell from the President of the Board of Control, especially as in September it was followed by a further announcement from the Earl of Clarendon to Mr. Consul Stevens, that a naval and military expedition would be immediately despatched, with a view to operations against the Persian territory, for which preparations had been some time in progress. It is perfectly clear that the Government had at that time decided upon entering into the war, and were even incurring expenses long before any intimation of the fact was given to Parliament or the country. It is quite true, as the noble Lord the Member for London has told us, that in the Queen’s Speech, delivered in February, we were told, not that the Indian Government had entered upon a war, but that British forces had been sent on an expedition against Persia. It is true that from that time Parliament had a knowledge that war was going on, and that expenses would be incurred, but it was not until a question was put by my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness-shire (Mr. Baillie) as to by whom these expenses were to be borne, that we had any particular mention made of the matter by any Member of the Government. My opinion is, if these expenses were partly to be borne by this country, Parliament ought to have been called together as soon as those expenses were resolved upon; and unless you look upon the matter in some such light, you will have other wars undertaken at future periods, involving this country in, perhaps, greater expenditure, without Parliament knowing, until it is too late, either the causes or the circumstances in reference to which those expenses will be incurred. Sir, I must say this is a constitutional question of the gravest character, which is now raised for the first time, and which does require that we should seek from the Government some more satisfactory explanation than we have hitherto received. There is one other point to which I would address myself, and to which I desire to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer—I mean the amount of the expenses incurred. There was an unfortunate announcement contained in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman in the Committee of Ways and Means, which seems to have kept Parliament in ignorance of the amount they would be called upon to pay. In the Committee of Ways and Means my right hon. Friend said—

Mr. Walpole

“I think that portion of the expense of the Persian war which is by agreement with the East India Company to be charged upon revenue, and which agreement was that the Exchequer should pay half the expenses of the war, will amount, for the Estimate I propose to take of expenses incurred up to the 30th of April next, to £265,000. That is all I intend to ask for on account of the extraordinary expense in the ensuing year.”

That was all he intended to call for that year, but when the Estimate is laid on the table—the agreement between the Government and the East India Company being that the former should pay one-half the expenses—I find that already those expenses amount to nearly £2,000,000. I find, also, that the Vote which is asked is only one-half of the moiety—namely, £500,000, and I therefore conclude that another moiety will be asked for hereafter. Putting all these things together, I think the Government ought to give us, even before we go into Committee, some further explanation as to the expenses which this country will ultimately have to bear, and also whether the Estimate now before us is or is not all we shall be called upon to pay. Sir, as to the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman, it is very difficult to deal with it. For the reasons I have given, I certainly am glad that this Motion has been brought forward. I should have extremely regretted to have been, as a Member of this House, a party to establishing a precedent which—from everything I have seen or heard—and I have given to the question the best consideration in my power—I believe to be fraught with the greatest danger, unless the House, at least in discussion, at once declares against it. At the same time, I am by no means insensible of the great danger, in the present state of affairs, of making divisions in this House which are not necessarily forced upon us. I am not insensible to the wisdom of the policy which proposes to strengthen the hands of the Executive Government whenever a great danger threatens them, and I am not one who looks upon the peril as now passed away. I wish, indeed, I could be as sanguine as the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer with reference to the mutineers in the Bengal army; but, believing as I do, the peril to be great, then, I say, this House must raise itself to the level of the magnitude of the serious difficulties with which it is surrounded, and if the Government will give us an intimation that this case is not to be drawn into a precedent, it is our duty, under such circumstances, not unnecessarily to press upon them, and afford anything like a manifestation of a diversion or division of opinion in this House. How, then, can we deal with this question? We are asked whether we will go into a Committee of Supply, or whether we will adopt the Resolution of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield? The question that Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair will be first put, and in voting for that we shall not be negating the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman. We shall simply be saying that we are not prepared to go into that question at the present moment. If we do this, we shall avoid a difficulty; but I shall only do this upon the distinct understanding that I, for one, will never consent, and think this House ought never to consent, that the Government shall be permitted to involve this country in expenses for a war without calling Parliament together to know whether it will sanction and support those proceedings.

COLONEL SYKES said, the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield confined itself to a single and definite object—namely, a censure of Her Majesty's Government for having acted unconstitutionally in having carried on a war and spent the resources of this country without the sanction of Parliament. It did not at all embrace the policy of that war, or the present lamentable state of India. It would be impolitic to embarrass the plain and simple question before the House by entering upon these two other questions. The question raised was, whether Her Majesty's Government had done wrong in what they had done—that was to say, whether, inasmuch as on the 19th of July a communication was made to the India Board that there was a possibility of a war between Persia and India in consequence of the aggressive policy of the Shah of Persia, the House ought to have been consulted, or should have continued to sit, until it was ascertained whether there was any necessity to order an expedition to counteract that aggression? In the first instance, a simple notification was sent to the Bombay Government, warning it to prepare for an expedition against Persia. It was not until the 22nd of September that final orders were issued for the sailing of that expedition. In the meantime the Bombay Government was perfectly prepared for the result of those orders, and when they arrived that Government showed what the Government of India was always able to show, that when called upon to display the resources of India for aggressive or other purposes, it was able to perform efficiently what it was called upon to do. That expedition was despatched from Bombay with all its accompaniments of ordnance, commissariat, troops, cavalry, and transports, without the slightest let, hesitation, or difficulty, and it landed upon the shores of the Persian Gulf without the loss of a single man and without the slightest difficulty. It would be well if England had manifested the same efficiency on an occasion nearer home. Why should Her Majesty's Government be blamed because it had not appealed to the House of Commons on the 22nd of September, when it was found necessary to give orders for that expedition? The House of Commons was not sitting at that time—it had been prorogued. And suppose the House had been summoned, was it likely that hon. Gentlemen would have left their grouse-shooting parties to discuss such a question? He thought that such a summons would have produced but a very thin House. But Her Majesty's Government did call Parliament together when it was absolutely necessary to act with promptitude and energy. And what had been the result of the promptitude and energy displayed by us in the Persian war? Continued success, until the war was brought to a termination equally honourable to this country and advantageous in its results, because, whereas Persia before the war suspected our policy towards her, she now felt that the only friend on which she could rely for her defence was the British Government. He had that statement from the mouth of the Persian Ambassador himself. After the treaty was despatched from this country doubts were very generally expressed whether the Shah of Persia would ratify it, in consequence of the influence of Russia. He had a long conversation with the Persian Ambassador, and himself raised that very objection. The Persian Ambassador's reply was, "We are thoroughly satisfied, from the manner in which you have conducted this war, that our only hope of preserving the integrity of the Persian empire is the friendship of the British Government." The war was brought to a successful termination almost before Parliament could be brought together again after its prorogation last year. Was it at all necessary, in the midst of an uninterrupted success, to consult the Members of that House as to what ought to be done? To have done so would have been more prejudicial than otherwise, for "quot homines, tot sententiæ," and the debate in that House might have produced dissensions which would have weakened our cause. At the head of the expedition was placed a man (Sir James Outram) in whom confidence might well be reposed, and who had given ample proofs of the excellence of the choice. Every minute particular of his plan was laid down before he started on the expedition. He (Colonel Sykes) would not touch upon the policy of the war, but he would say that he entirely concurred in the propriety of a measure to prevent Persia from taking possession of Herat, which had been known for ages as the key of India. Whatever Power possessed Herat had a passage open to the purple plains of India. It, therefore, had always been our policy that there should be a kind of buffer between Affghanistan and Persia, so as to make them innocuous to each other. That policy had been established by our recent treaty with Persia. He should, therefore, vote for going into Committee as against the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield.

MR. VERNON SMITH: Sir, the tone of this debate has been so much more of gentle remonstrance than of violent objurgation with reference to the conduct of Her Majesty's Government that I should not have thought it all necessary to rise on the present occasion if it had not been for the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole). The subject, as he says, has been very properly divided into two questions; first, the constitutional question raised by the hon. and learned

Colonel Sykes

Gentleman the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), namely,—whether Her Majesty's Government were justified in going to war without having first given information to Parliament; the other question is one that regards the policy of going to war with Persia at all. Now, so far as regards the policy of going to war with Persia at all, I cannot help thinking that even my hon. and learned Friend, old as he is in Parliamentary experience, has shrunk from discussing that policy; for otherwise he would not have confined himself to presenting the mere constitutional question to the House, but would have discussed the higher question as to the policy of the war. My noble Friend the Member for the City of London (Lord John Russell) has defended Her Majesty's Government in the course they have pursued with so much ability and with so much greater weight than I could possibly hope would attach to anything that I might say, that it would, perhaps, have been needless for me to enter upon any defence myself, had not my noble Friend made one or two little omissions. As regards the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in not having called Parliament together, and consulted it on the policy of the war; I beg to state that Her Majesty's Government are most anxious to submit to the opinion of Parliament all acts which they constitutionally are bound to submit to them; but I cannot go the length of saying, with the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, that it is the duty of any Ministry to consult Parliament before they go to war, or to consult Parliament before they make peace. At all events, I have not so read the constitution of my country, and I do not believe that any constitutional lawyer or statesman will venture to say that such are the relative positions of the legislative and executive part of our institutions. It is the duty of the executive to declare war and to make peace. It is certainly their duty as soon as possible after that declaration of war to submit to Parliament the question of the expenditure connected with that war; and upon a declaration of peace, and a ratification of that peace, to submit the treaty to Parliament. Now, let me say how Her Majesty's Government have complied with the first part of this duty. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge hardly went far enough back when he mentioned the interrogatories that were put to me. The hon. Member for Inverness-shire (Mr. Baillie), was not the first person who put a question to Her Majesty's Government as to who was to bear the expense of the war. My right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone) put that question to me in March, 1856, after I had answered a question put to me by Mr. Layard. My answer was that it would have to be decided thereafter, and that the proportions in which it would have to be paid would depend upon whether it was an Indian war, or an Imperial war, or a mixed war—Imperial and Indian. It is evident, therefore, that the House must at that moment have anticipated that there would be something like a war with Persia. That question was again asked more distinctly, when the knowledge came to this country that the Persians had advanced upon Herat. My noble Friend (Lord John Russell) very properly says that Parliament made itself responsible by its silence on this subject. I am not responsible for the inaction of Parliament on that occasion. Nothing was said or asked for; no papers were asked for; no questions were put; no Motions were made. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge says, that a few days after I received a letter from Lord Clarendon calling upon me to send out provisional instructions as to a declaration of war against Persia, I brought forward the Indian budget, without making any statement to the effect that it was probable such a war might occur. On the contrary, I did so advisedly. There were very few hon. Members present on that occasion. I have no hope of arresting very much the attention of the House on the Indian budget, because it never has been the good fortune of any gentleman who has brought it forward to arrest the attention of more than a very small portion of the House. But it did so happen that an hon. Gentleman, not in the Present Parliament, who always took a great interest in these questions, Mr. Otway, rose and said that my speech contained warlike indications. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge is therefore in error on that part of the subject. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Inverness-shire (Mr. Baillie) says that immediately upon the provisional declaration of war going out to Bombay we ought to have called Parliament together in order to give them information of the war, and to ask them to make provision for the expense.

But does the hon. Gentleman mean to say that we are bound to give the enemy information of every step we take even before we make war? I must say, I am surprised at the position assumed by the hon. Gentleman, seeing that he was, himself, Secretary of the Board of Control, under the Government of Lord Derby, the Members of whose Administration certainly held a very different opinion. In 1852 there is a letter from Lord Malmesbury, who held the office of Foreign Secretary to the then President of the Board of Control (Mr. Herries), in which he distinctly intimates that the island of Karrack ought to be occupied by our troops as secretly as possible, in order that fortifications might not be made by the Persians against the invasion. Now, Parliament was sitting at the time Lord Malmesbury wrote that despatch, and it was written on a remarkable day, and may be considered in some degree as a testamentary document, for it was written on the 15th of December, and on the 16th of December the defeat of Lord Derby's Government took place, upon which they went out. [Mr. BAILLIE said that Mr. Herries refused to act upon that despatch.] Yes; but it shows what opinion the Foreign Minister of Lord Derby's Government had upon the assertion that you ought not to take your enemy by surprise, and that you ought to come to Parliament and make an announcement as soon as you have sent out a provisional declaration of war. The orders of Her Majesty's Government with respect to the expedition, went out on the 26th of September, 1856, and arrived in Bombay in October; and on the 1st of November the Governor General issued his proclamation declaring war against Persia. When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge says that there is no similar instance of a Governor General declaring a war out of India, I say that the same course was followed in declaring war against Affghanistan. On the 1st of October, when Parliament was not sitting, Lord Auckland issued his Simla proclamation declaring war against Affghanistan. The right hon. Gentleman will find that the two cases run on all fours, except that in Affghanistan the war was not, although it ought to have been, followed by a Vote proposed to Parliament for bearing part of the expenses of the war. That expense ought to have been partly thrown upon Parliament, and I say that we have behaved with much greater deference to Parliament than the Ministry in office upon that and previous occasions. I thought it would be an undue stretch of power that Parliament should not have knowledge of this Anglo-Indian war, and I recommended that the expense of the war should be divided, in order that the House of Commons might have an opportunity of expressing its opinion upon the matter. Well, the Governor General declared war against Persia on the 1st of November, and on the 17th of December, 1856, the proclamation arrived in this country. Parliament then stood summoned to meet on the 3rd of February. I do not entertain the opinion that Parliament ought not to be called together before the usual period, if it be convened upon grave occasions; but there are great inconveniences in the sudden meeting of Parliament without sufficient occasion, and a hasty proclamation that Parliament was to meet before the usual period would affect not merely the Ministers and Members, but the public—it would affect the funds and commerce of the country, and ought not to be done unwisely, hastily, and unwarily. The constitutional question, therefore, is reduced to this,—whether Parliament ought to have been called upon to meet between the 17th of December and the 3rd of February, or whether my noble Friend at the head of the Government was right in leaving it to meet at the natural time. Parliament did meet on the 3rd of February, and it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government that the matter should be referred to in the Queen's Speech, and that the papers should be promised to be laid on the table. That, however, was not done, because the negotiations were resumed at Paris. Papers were not laid upon the table; and the House acquiesced in the opinion that while negotiations were pending it would be unadvisable to call upon the Government to produce despatches which might have invited discussion and prevented an amicable settlement of the differences at issue, and Parliament itself thus took upon itself the defence of Her Majesty's Ministers. The papers were produced as soon as the treaty was ratified. My noble Friend says they ought to have been produced as soon as the treaty was signed. That is a matter of minute detail, and I do not think it is a question in which Parliament will take a great interest. The papers were produced in due time; and from that time no notice was taken of the matter, and I am inclined to think that no notice would have been taken of it now even by the hon. and learned Gentleman, but for the improper course which he has pursued in connecting these transactions with recent events in India. Such an opinion is utterly unjustifiable, for there is not the slightest reason to suppose that there has been any connection between them—they have not the slightest bearing on each other. The mutiny at Delhi and the expedition to the Persian Gulf no astuteness of reasoning can connect together. On the contrary, our successes in the Persian Gulf were calculated to put an end to any tendency to mutiny, and disorder, if any had existed, either in Bengal or elsewhere. As regards the Persian war itself, it must not be supposed that Her Majesty's Government undertook it lightly. My noble Friend (Lord J. Russell) says we went to war too soon. But the whole conduct of the Persian Government to us was one series of aggression and insult. I will not enter into the detail of these differences, but of late years the Persian Government has always been dealing with us in a manner that required notice, if it were not so insolent as to require redress. There has not been a single Minister sent from this country of late years whom Persia has not insulted. The Persian Minister, in a statement he prepared for the perusal of Europe, said that Colonel Sheil's conduct was harsh and barbarous, that his predecessors, Mr. McNeil, and Mr. Thompson, were as bad, and that Mr. Murray was worst of all. There is not one of our Ministers that Persia has not quarrelled with and insulted. My noble Friend, who says we went to war with Persia too soon, cannot, I think, have read the blue-book, the first half of which is entirely occupied by negotiations in which Her Majesty's Government sought every means to avoid war, and it was not until Herat was taken that war was declared. My noble Friend does not perhaps recollect that in 1854, when he was himself in office, and when the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone) were in office with him, the same stereotyped course was followed, and the Government desired the island of Kar-rack to be seized. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] I have the letter in my hand. It is not in the blue-book. It is dated January 9, 1854; but, if the right hon.

Mr. Vernon Smith

Gentleman does not wish me to read it, I will not do so: but I will leave it to the right hon. Gentleman's recollection whether, in January, 1854, an expedition was not ordered to take possession of the island of Karrack, in the same manner as had been done in the present instance. From 1830, when Sir. J. M'Neil struck his flag, to the dispute with Mr. Murray, in 1857, there was always the same menace of the seizure of the island of Karrack and Bushire. We extended the expedition to the occupation of Mohammerah. I am surprized to hear, for the first time, the opinion expressed by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Baillie), who said the best course would have been to give up Herat to Persia, for that nothing would please her so much. Very likely; and there are other Powers, much more powerful and important, which would be delighted to see Herat given to Persia. That would be an easy solution of the question; but I affirm, and no Indian authority will question, that Herat ought to be in the possession of an Affghan chief, chosen by the Heratees themselves. My own belief is, that our best defence on that frontier is, that Affghanistan should be in the possession of its several tribes: and it would be the height of impolicy to allow Persia to gain a footing there. I do not think very highly of the power of Persia; but if the power of Persia extends to Herat, that city will be more or less in the hands of Russia. I do not feel any excessive alarm about Russia either, and I rather believe, with the noble Lord the Member for Norwich (Viscount Bury), that too much has been said on this subject; but we cannot disguise from ourselves that Russia has shown an intention of contemplating an attack upon India by way of Affghanistan. But that is not my opinion alone. It is the opinion of Sir John M'Neil, deliberately given, that Herat is the gate to India, and that it is through Herat alone that any formidable invasion of India can take place, and that the first step of any invading Power must be the seizure of Affghanistan. I therefore maintain that we ought always to look with considerable jealousy upon the occupation of that city by any other Power. If Persia, for instance, were to retain possession of it, what would be the consequence? Why, the diminution, if not the total destruction, of our glory in the East. The point is one which, for a considerable length of time, has been held to be of the highest importance. Do you not imagine, then, that to yield Herat up to Persia, and through her to Russia, would be deemed by those possessing the quickness by which the inhabitants of Eastern nations are characterized as the result of inability upon our part to prevent such an occurrence? Yes, they would immediately come to the conclusion that you had abandoned it from cowardice, and I think the House will agree with me in thinking that it is by no means desirable that such an impression should be produced. But, to pass from that point, I may observe that the hon. Member for Inverness-shire (Mr. Baillie) is the only person who has this evening entered into the question of how a peace with Persia might have been more rapidly concluded. He pins his faith upon the movements of Ferukh Khan, and contends that we ought to have made peace upon his arrival at Constantinople. The hon. Member must, however, bear in mind that there was strong reason to suppose that Ferukh Khan, when at Constantinople, was not in possession of full powers to treat, and that he signed no written declaration in answer to the demand which was made by Lord Stratford de Redcliffe as to his intentions. That noble Lord was prepared to go further than he did, if Ferukh Khan had verified his powers, and if he had not demanded that the Persian expedition should be withdrawn at the moment when Sir James Outram had arrived in the vicinity of Bushire. Now, when Ferukh Khan reached Paris, he did verify his powers, and we had the advantage of the assistance of a most able Company's servant—I mean Captain Lynch, who, owing to his great powers of conciliation, was mainly instrumental, under the guidance of Lord Cowley, in bringing about the treaty into which we have entered. That, I maintain is a very good treaty, and I deny that one of an equally advantageous character could have been obtained at Constantinople. The hon. Member for Inverness-shire has also alluded to the demand for the dismissal of Sadr Azim, as a sine quâ non, and has observed that we receded from that demand at the solicitation of the Shah. Well, it is true that we did give up that point; but I deny that it was a sine quâ non—the sine quâ non was the evacuation of Herat. We were right in making the demand in the first instance, and we receded from it at the solicitation of the Shah; and I think the House will be of opinion that, in doing so, we took that course which it was most desirable to adopt. The hon. Gentleman asks in what position with respect to Persia do we now stand? My answer to that question is, that our position is a very good one. All parties are satisfied with the arrangements which have been made, and I confidently entertain the hope that Persia will come to the conclusion that in this country, and not in Russia, she will find her most natural ally. I believe Persia has much more to fear from Russia than from England; and Persia would do well to place her reliance on us. We can attack her only from the south, while Russia can march against her from the shores of the Caspian; and an adherence to us would therefore, in my opinion, be the best policy which she could adopt. My noble Friend the Member for London says we entered into this war too soon; but that is a statement in the justice of which I, for one, cannot concur—inasmuch as it was quite evident that delay was the object of Persia, and that she had no intention of entering seriously into negotiations. The preliminary negotiations were mere oriental rigmarole, and there was no serious intention of offering redress until the war was actually entered upon. I should be the last man in the world to maintain that our policy towards Eastern, should be different from that which in the case of European nations we pursue. On the contrary, I am of opinion that we should, in dealing with the former, exercise a stricter supervision over our acts than in the case of the latter would be necessary. The inhabitants of the East are comparatively false and ignorant, and our conduct in their regard should be proportionately modified by truth and knowledge. But while I entertain that sentiment, I am prepared to contend, that when you come into contact with a people so situated you must exhibit, with respect to them, a greater degree of vigour and firmness than in your proceedings in reference to more polished nations you would be called upon to exercise. By the inhabitants of the East conciliation is looked upon as cowardice; the calm clemency of conscious power is construed into timidity. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) has, indeed, observed that it is the policy of England to trample upon the weak and to yield to the strong. I shall not enter further into that question than to remark that if we had acted towards one of those Eastern nations as we acted towards America, in not sending away Mr. Dallas when our Minister was dismissed from that country, our conduct would have been attributed to the influence of poltroonery, instead of to the dictates of a spirit of magnanimity, as it was felt to be by the people of the United States, such as the mighty and nobler country could alone afford to pursue. I may now say a word or two with regard to the question of the expense of the war. It has been observed that several different statements have been made upon that subject. I must remark that the estimate could only be an approximate calculation, and not a minute statement of expenditure. I am, however, happy to be enabled to inform the House that the expense attendant upon the prosecution of this war is likely to be rather less than the calculations which have been made would seem to indicate. At the end of the papers which were presented to the House this evening, it is stated that the Indian Government found it to be impossible to arrive at an accurate estimate at once of those expenses which had been incurred; but, as a larger number of troops have been despatched from the Persian Gulf than was anticipated at the time when the Estimates were drawn up, when it was supposed that they would remain there until the evacuation of Herat had taken place, and as the European troops have all been sent to Bombay, and as the cavalry under General Jacob is about to proceed to India, already there is every reason to suppose that the expenses of the war will be less than was originally contemplated. Now, as it has been intimated that this Motion is not likely to be pressed to a division, I shall abstain from entering so fully into details as I might under other circumstances have deemed it desirable to do. I have, I may add, felt so much anxiety since the intelligence of the recent occurrences in India has reached this country that I have not had time, to use the language of my right hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle, "to potter over blue books." I can only say I am no advocate of war, and think the policy of England ought to be to settle her disputes with other nations by means of negotiation rather than by a resort to arms. My great ambition has been since I entered upon the discharge of the duties of the office which the good opinion of my noble Friend at the head of the Government rather than any merits of my own has called upon me to fill, to contribute, as far as lay in my power, to the diminution of the deficiencies in revenue and the improvement of the moral and social condition of the people of India. But, while such are my sentiments, I contend that the war with Persia was one into which it was necessary to embark for the protection of our Indian empire. It was my belief that that empire would be open to invasion if the Czar of Russia was allowed to possess himself of Herat with the paw of Persia; and, believing that to be the case, I deemed it to be my duty to forego that peace, and that prosperity the result of peace, to which I had with so much pleasure looked forward. In this contest the Indian army has distinguished itself in the most eminent degree, and the glory it has achieved in the Persian Gulf will long be remembered in the East. Long will the rapidity with which the Persian expedition was fitted out be sung in story on those shores. Long will the inhabitants of India bear in mind the gallantry with which the work which it had to execute has been performed. When Persia is again disposed to offer us an insult, she will pause before she does so, when she reflects upon the renown of those few gallant soldiers whom her own thousands were unable to resist. She will call to mind the victories which General Outram has achieved, and the bravery which upon the part of the youngest lieutenants in the service has been so conspicuously displayed. The result of these victories and of that bravery will, I trust, be beneficial to the country; and I have, in conclusion, simply to express a hope that the explanation which I have just given is satisfactory to the right hon. Gentleman opposite and to the House. I can only add, that the course which has been pursued by Her Majesty's Government, in reference to this war, was entered upon without the slightest intention on their part of acting in derogation of the authority of Parliament, and in the confident supposition that they were not exceeding those powers which by the principles of the constitution belong to the Executive.

Mr. Vernon Smith

MR. GLADSTONE: The question which has been submitted to us to-night by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield is, in my mind, one of extraordinary gravity and interest. I am not disposed to exclude from the view which I take of this question the verdict which I admit has recently been given by the constituencies of this country with reference to the Administration of the noble Lord at the head of the Government. On the contrary, I feel that he is entitled to urge before this House that the acts for which he is now arraigned were acts which took place during the existence of the last Parliament, and which, therefore, must be presumed to have been under the review of the people of England at the time when the late Parliament was dissolved. I, however, for one, am thoroughly convinced, even in the middle of the nineteenth century, when, as it appears to me, the principle of constitutional liberty has greatly retrograded, of the value of the privilege of this House, and of its control over the Government through the medium of the finances. Not only is that privilege of importance, but it is of such overwhelming importance that without it, in my humble judgment, we have no guarantee for the liberty, the glory, nay, for the very safety of this country. I must frankly say that, as far as my feeble judgment is concerned, I take an unfavourable view of the policy of the Persian war. I am sceptical as to the doctrine laid down and so dogmatically pronounced by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Board of Control; I am sceptical as to the enormous, the world-wide importance which has been attached to the possession of the city of Herat. Recollecting what the position of Persia is, recollecting that that empire is heir to the most ancient traditions of the world, I am not surprised that she should be disposed to urge doubtful claims of supremacy over neighbouring territories. I think it easy, therefore, to find another explanation for these claims with respect to sovereignty over Herat, than that which has filled Her Majesty's Government with so much alarm, when they refer them to intrigues against our Indian Empire, whether on the part of Russia or Persia. I cannot express how much I regret portions of the language which has to-night been used by Members of the Government; and I trust—I confidently trust—that the noble Lord at the head of the Government when he rises to speak will do something to qualify that language. Surely it is not wise for a Member of the Government to rise in his place and maintain that which really is not true, and which, even if it were true, it would be unwise thus to assert, that Persia is a vassal kingdom of Russia. It is not wise, I say, to proclaim that the object of Russia is the destruction of our Indian Empire by encroachment through Afghanistan. It is not by modes like these, if I have the least understanding of the act of right Government that that power is to be maintained and consolidated. The power of England is great—I at least think it is so great, and so firmly based, that we have nothing to fear as long as we exercise that power with moderation and justice. But if, on the other hand, we allow ourselves to become the dupes and victims of vain chimeras—if, by putting the worst construction on every act of those we may suspect, we encourage extravagant theories—if we raise imaginary dangers, those dangers, from being imaginary, may become real, and may assume gigantic dimensions; and then, indeed, the difficulties and dangers created by our own folly may be such as may exhaust the almost inexhaustible resources of this country. Let me, however, come to the question which is now individually before the House. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield has proposed two Resolutions, in the first of which he recites certain acts which are not denied, and in the second of which he states that the conduct which is described in the first deserves the strong reprehension of this House. Now, the hon. and learned Gentleman in the course of his speech, and other hon. Gentlemen who have taken part in this debate, have mingled with the constitutional question, to which alone the Motion relates, other subjects of the greatest importance. The hon. and learned Gentleman sees an immediate connection between the deplorable events which have recently occurred in India and the policy pursued by the Government in China and elsewhere. Such a connection may be in some degree presumable, but whether presumable or not, it forms no part of the question now before the House, and I do not think that we can be called upon to affirm the Resolution now under discussion upon entirely extraneous grounds. Again, with regard to the policy of the Persian war, that is a subject of vital importance, but at the same time it is not embraced in the terms of the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman. I should have been content, therefore, not to touch upon that subject, but, as that policy has in the course of this debate been assailed by some hon. Gentlemen and vindicated by others, and as it has taken a prominent place in the discussion, I must venture to record respectfully, but determinedly my disapproval of the course which has been pursued by Her Majesty's Government. I do not believe in the necessity of proceeding to such extremities. I do not think that their views were sound as to the importance to be attached to the possession of Herat; but at the same time I am willing to admit, that they did not act upon any novel idea of their own, but that they only gave effect to a theory which may, in a greater or less degree, be regarded as traditional to this country. I cannot follow the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Vernon Smith) into the peculiar defence which he has made with regard to the proceedings connected with the commencement and termination of the war, but the facts before us are simple and broad enough. It stands upon record, and I think is beyond all doubt or question, that we have made peace in the month of March upon terms decidedly less favourable to us and less unfavourable to Persia than those which Persia herself offered some time before. Now, the right hon. Gentleman has made the anxiety which he feels in connection with present events in India—events which I deeply deplore—an excuse for his imperfect recollection. [Mr. VERNON SMITH: No.] Well, the modesty of the right hon. Gentleman modifies my statement, and I will not enter into a discussion upon that point, but I wish the House to understand—and it is a most material feature in the case—that the right hon. Gentleman, whether from the pressure of present anxiety or from some other cause, has not given an accurate representation of the state of the case on a most vital point. What, I ask, were the objects for which we went to war? What did we propose, and what was it the refusal of which rendered necessary an appeal to arms? What is it we have gained by making peace that we could not have gained without resorting to the last extremity? These questions do not admit of any answer, because, as the case stands, we went to war for objects which were withdrawn, and which it was not considered expedient to pursue when we came to negotiations for peace. The right hon. Gentleman has stated that the dismissal of the Persian Minister was not a sine quâ non in the negotiations before the war. [Mr. VERNON SMITH: No.] I hope I do not misrepresent the right hon. Gentleman, but I am in the recollection of the House, and I think that he stated, that the dismissal of the Persian Minister was asked for, but that it was not made a sine quâ non. Now, I might quote many sentences from the blue-book in refutation of a statement thus lightly made, but I shall content myself with referring to one from which I find that in December, 1856, not only was an ultimatum hung over the head of Persia, but that Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, who in vain manifested his reluctance to proceed in the matter, was directed by the Earl of Clarendon to insist on the dismissal of the Persian Minister. Lord Clarendon, in a despatch dated December 16, 1856, thus writes to Lord Stratford de Redcliffe:—

Mr. Gladstone

“Nothing will be added to the present ultimatum provided that its conditions are complied with, but delay will give rise to more stringent demands. The ambassador's request that our expedition to Persia may be delayed cannot be listened to. We must insist upon the dismissal of the Sadr Azim.”

That, Sir, is the despatch of the 16th of December. Then, says the right hon. Gentleman, it was Ferukh Khan who broke off the negotiations. They were proceeding, but he, after having in many ways given grounds for suspicion of the bona fides of his acts, took advantage of the commencement of hostilities to desist from pursuing his diplomatic communications with Lord Stratford de Redcliffe. Turn to page 223 of the blue-book, and observe what Lord Stratford de Redcliffe says upon the receiving the lines of the 16th of December, which I have just read:—

“On the receipt of your Lordship's instructions of the 16th inst., I could not fail to perceive that my communications with Ferukh Khan had reached their final term.”

“On receipt of your instructions of the 16th of December.” What instructions? Those which I have just read containing the remarkable words, “We must insist upon the dismissal of the Sadr Azim.” But who was it that urged the breaking out of hostilities—I don't say unfairly or unwisely urged it—as a reason for waiving the prosecution of the negotiations? Not Ferukh Khan, but Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, for after saying that his functions were virtually brought to a close by the receipt of the instructions of the 16th of December, he continues—

“This conclusion was the more evident, as the latest newspapers received from India had published the Governor General's formal declaration of hostilities against Persia, issued on the 1st of November, under instructions from Her Majesty's Government.”

As far as the information conveyed to us in this book throws light upon the history of this singular case, it appears that in the month of May, 1856, certain terms were placed in the hands of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe as necessary to be conceded by Persia, and that with the exception of the stipulation with regard to Sadr Azim Khan, which was ultimately withdrawn by Lord Stratford on his own responsibility, these terms had been accepted by Ferukh Khan at the period when we broke off the negotiations. They were broken off because, instead of adhering to our stipulations of the month of May, we had at the close of the year framed a new document by way of ultimatum, containing six heads, which it is not necessary to mention in detail, but several of which were entirely novel as being beyond the purview of the terms required in the month of May. The state of facts upon which the negotiations with Ferukh Khan were broken off were, that he had then conceded more than we had now obtained, because not only had he promised the evacuation of Herat, but he had conceded the principle of compensation to the people of that town for whatever injury they might have suffered from the Persian invasion. The negotiations were broken off, war was made, and no sooner had the war commenced than, owing to some happy change of counsels, with the result of which I am too well satisfied to be careful in investigating its cause, an entire change took place in the views of Her Majesty's Government with respect to the conditions necessary to be obtained from Persia, and a treaty was concluded in March which might with greater facility have been concluded in the preceding month of November. So much, Sir, for the Persian war, with respect to which I won't enter further into details which might trouble the House and occupy its time at too great length. But, then, there remains the constitutional question; and here, so far as I understand the case, the facts alleged by the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman have not been disputed. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer adverted to certain precedents. He sought, and not unnaturally sought, to find in the previous passages of our Indian history cover and authority for the recent proceedings. Now it appears to me, that if cover and authority adequate to the justification of the recent proceedings could be extracted from that history, the plea might greatly avail towards the excuse of Her Majesty's Government; but instead of showing that the system was sound and safe, it ought rather the more to waken our jealousies and to render us alive to the fact that we have erected in India a vast and powerful machinery of government, armed with and supported by a splendid army, and that the liberties of this country and of its Parliament are, indeed, greatly curtailed, if we are to be told that, although war cannot be made with the Queen's army except under the immediate sanction of Parliament, yet that whatever can be done by the Minister, through the medium of the Indian army, of Indian finance, and of the Indian Executive, may be begun, continued, and concluded without the assent, either express or implied, of this House. Why, Sir, no doubt there has been a practice, and it has been an absolute necessity of our Indian empire, that powers of war and peace should be exercised by the Company under the control of the Government, and with reference to purposes strictly Indian. In a country enclosing, as British India does, the territories of many native Sovereigns with whom we have constant relations and numerous points of contact and irritation, it would no doubt be absurd, when by our Acts of Parliament we have established for Indian purposes a principle of government separate from a Parliamentary system, to say that that Government, with reference to every Indian purpose of peace and war, should be subject to the immediate and direct control of the House of Commons. But is there any fair or candid man who will tell me that the war which has been waged against Persia is in any proper sense an Indian war? On the contrary, is it not plain that this important question is one of that great group or family of questions which relate to the position of Russia in the East? The relation between them is not to be denied. It is not a mere local war. Persia is not a frontier Power; you go beyond your own borders; you travel to a great distance from them with your Indian forces, and the purpose for which you do so, whether rightly or wrongly, is not an Indian purpose in a narrow, local, and municipal sense. It is, without doubt, a portion of the purpose and the policy upon which you act in the conduct of your relations with foreign States. Therefore, I entirely protest against the doctrine that such a war as this which has been waged against Persia ought to be considered a war exempt from the control of Parliament. If I had any doubt upon the question that doubt would at once be removed when I find that in the month of October last communications passed between the Government of Her Majesty and the East India Company, which is the most direct and unqualified fact—that the Persians are of British, and not of Persian, consideration. I guard myself against admitting that you carry on at the India Company is a the sense of having from the control of converse I most certainly think that when you by your own acts about to wage is not it is to be paid for part out of the English sequence of a Vote motion, you then clearly divides the doubtful ground is the subject of no you bring that war the jurisdiction of Parliament a war waged upon the or upon the soil of the question is, what take? We have at with the second Reading and learned Gentleman which you have put simply to a recital of the fact that the matter is this:—Do we which has arisen in Parliamentary notice altogether to pass in own to the House in of my own mind. I the derogation of the British House of taken place words might be justified. advertent to the fact material in the circumstances occurred previously may, for my own part the pressing home of only I can secure the privileges of the House guaranteed against those which are involved in has been set. Upon I entertain the greatest to the House to-night Her Majesty's Government been disposed to rather upon the subject which made it difficult, to obtain the of rather than upon the principle that, without stances of extenuation or circumstances of difficulty, the course which they have pursued can be vindicated upon its own merits, and involves nothing that tends to disparage the dignity or to endanger the prerogatives of the House of Commons. To my mind it seems so clear as to be beyond argument that that dignity is disparaged—that those liberties are endangered by the making of war at the charge, in whole or in part, of the British Exchequer, at the uncontrolled discretion of the Ministers of the hour; without the observance of that great security which we always have that the charges of these wars and the preparation of the force necessary for conducting them should be submitted to our free judgment, not after the fact, when everything is in the past, and when no question remains except that of pronouncing our opinion upon the conduct of the Government, but before the fact, when the operations have not yet been undertaken, and when the policy about to be pursued may fall within our view, and may be dealt with according to our independent judgment. Therefore, while I am not at all convinced of the necessity of recording our censure upon the Government, I must yet frankly own that I think it would be inconsistent with the character of this House—if I may presume to give my opinion of what its character requires—and inconsistent, also, with that jealousy with which this House has always held it to be its first duty to watch the preservation of the liberties won for it by so many generations of glorious predecessors, were we to permit these circumstances to pass without notice, and to remain as matters of indifference, wholly unworthy the vote of this Assembly, either by way of censure of the past or of security for the future. I, for one, should have been satisfied had the declarations of the Government amounted to this:—“While defending our own motives and proceedings, we grant that there is danger to the public weal in this precedent, unless it is strictly noted and marked out as a matter not to be extended or even followed, but as requiring special justification, and in the absence of such justification to be condemned.” Had they given us this door of escape, I should have thought it expedient to leave the case where it is, and should have advised the hon. and learned Gentleman to withdraw his Motion. But if we are told—as I think up to the present stage of the debate we have been told—that everything has been right, that the course of regular precedent has been observed, that the Government have not stretched the discretion of the Executive, have not impaired the rights of the popular branch of the Legislature; if that ground is taken, then, reserving my own freedom as to the second Resolution of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and as to the terms in which it may be proper to characterize these transactions, I, for one, whether few or many agree with me, cannot, by negating this Motion, affirm a principle so detrimental to liberty and to the English character as this, that the House of Commons is willing to see the produce of the taxes of the people, which it is our exclusive right to vote, disposed of in the East for the purposes of a warlike policy, at the discretion of the Minister of the Crown, and without the knowledge, assent, or control of the representatives of the British nation.

Mr. Gladstone

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I cannot approve either the constitutional doctrine or the constitutional conduct of the hon. and learned Gentleman who has moved these Resolutions. If I understand the doctrine which he has endeavoured to lay down, it is this—that the Crown has no right either to make war or to make peace without previous communication with, and without the previous concurrence of, Parliament. Now, Sir, I deny that that doctrine is any part of the British constitution. I contend, on the contrary, that our constitution wisely and properly vests in the Crown the prerogative and the discretion of declaring war and of making peace, with this reserve, however, which I readily admit, that when the advisers of the Sovereign have deemed it their duty to counsel the Crown either to engage in or to put an end to war, it is incumbent on them to lay before Parliament, if it is sitting, the grounds upon which the one course or the other has been adopted; or, if Parliament is not sitting, when the interests of the country are deemed to be such as to require recourse to be had to war, I frankly and freely admit it to be their duty to take the earliest opportunity of calling Parliament together in order to submit to it their reasons for resorting to hostilities. I should be the last man to deny that general proposition. I maintain, however, that in the case to which the Motion alludes, there were circumstances which rendered it a special case, and excepted it from the moment from the application of that general rule. And here I must observe, that there is a wide distinction between the doctrine of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Roebuck) and the doctrine of the right hon. Member for Oxford University (Mr. Gladstone). The hon. and learned Gentleman declared, if I understood him, that when a war is undertaken in which the co-operation of this House is not required, and of which no part of the expense has to be paid out of the revenues of this country, the matter is one with which Parliament has no particular ground to interfere; whereas the right hon. Gentleman holds that even in the case of an Indian war, confined within the peculiar limits of Indian operations, and in respect of which no charge would be thrown on this country, the principle to which I have adverted would apply. I leave it to the hon. and learned Member and the right hon. Gentleman behind him to settle between them which of those conflicting doctrines they would wish the House to adopt. With regard to this particular case itself, I freely admit that it does involve a question which Parliament is well entitled to have explained to them, and which, if left open to any interpretation that might be put upon it, would perhaps be turned into a precedent which might be attended with injurious consequences in future. But the right hon. Gentleman who spoke last—who cannot, I think, have been present in the course of this evening—is quite mistaken in saying that no explanation has been given by any Member of the Government of the peculiar circumstances which make this case an exception to the general rule. My right hon. Friends the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the President of the Board of Control have both stated in great detail the reasons why Her Majesty's Government thought this an instance in which the immediate convocation of Parliament was not required. Some have contended that Parliament ought to have been called together when the first order was sent to Bombay for the preparation of a force to be ready in case it should be wanted. The answer given to that by my right hon. Friend appears to me quite conclusive. It would have been the height of absurdity to proclaim through Parliament to the world that we were making preparations which in a certain event would be carried into effect, with a view of either preventing or repressing a wrong which the Government of Persia might have in contemplation. Then it is said Parliament should have been summoned later in September, when the order was forwarded to the Governor General to send the expedition. But even then such a step would have been premature, because it was impossible for the Government to know whether circumstances might not occur in India which would prevent the Governor General from immediately acting on the orders so communicated to him. The earliest moment at which it would have been right to call Parliament together with the view of stating to them the course of proceeding with regard to Persia was the 16th of December, when it is acknowledged that the declaration of war was actually issued. Parliament then stood summoned for the 3rd of February. The Christmas holidays were approaching, and the earliest period at which it could have assembled would have been the first or second week in January. Therefore the only laches, if laches it was, would refer to the short interval between the middle of January and the 3rd of February, on which day Parliament met. If the war had been one with a European Power, involving great and serious consequences, and likely to require the immediate co-operation of this House, I admit that even that brief delay ought to have been avoided. But, considering the remoteness of the scene of action—considering that no immediate requisition was necessary to be made to Parliament for the purposes of the war, we thought it would be attaching more importance to the matter than it intrinsically deserved to anticipate the period for which Parliament stood convoked, and to issue a proclamation calling it together a fortnight sooner for the purpose of announcing to it that operations were going on in Persia. But we did in the Speech from the Throne at the opening of the Session communicate to the Legislature the fact of these disputes with the Shah, as well as the naval and military operations which had taken place. Why, Sir, where was the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield then? Where was his constitutional jealousy—where was the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford—where was the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge—where were those constitutional champions? Silent as the grave! Where was the vote of censure—where the reprobation which the hon. and learned Gentleman wishes now to call down upon us from this House? There are some things, Sir, which are said, like the oak, to require a long time to attain to maturity; but when they do attain to maturity, their strength, vigour, and substance, are proportioned to the length of time they take to develope. So it is with the indignation of the hon. and learned Gentleman. He might have risen with boiling blood on the first or second day of the Session, and said, "Why, here you have got us into a war with Persia, and you did not call Parliament together a fortnight ago. I will call the attention of the House to the circumstances, and move a vote of censure upon you." He might have recorded, in a Resolution couched in the mild and gentle terms for which he is so distinguished, the sense of the House upon this flagrant violation of its privileges. But he has thought well on the matter, he has brooded over his indignation from February to July, and he comes forth now, not with a vote of censure, but with a vote of reprobation, the strength of his Resolution having increased in a degree proportionate with the time that it has been suspended and with the heat of the weather which has intervened. But, Sir, if I know anything of constitutional principles, I think that the country will not applaud him much for his constitutional conduct; and the delay which he has permitted to elapse between the original wrong and the moment chosen for redress, shows that he is not a very safe and ready champion of the constitutional privileges of England. But what is the moment which the hon. and learned Gentleman has selected for his Motion? He has waited until the feelings and anxieties of the country have been roused and agonized by the accounts received from India; he has waited till the time when he thinks that the Government are engaged with all their mind and all their thoughts in providing for the difficulties of the moment; and then he has not even given to the House that notice of his Motion which it is usual for hon. Members to give when they are about to propose any measure which they consider to be of great importance. No, Sir, the hon. and learned Gentleman suddenly bethought himself at six o'clock yesterday afternoon, that he would draw the attention of the House to the illdoings of the Government at the end of last year, and he gave notice then of what he was going to do at five o'clock this afternoon. I say that that also was a departure from the ordinary custom of Parliament, because, if he proposed to call the attention of the House to a matter of great importance, it was due to the Members of the House—I do not talk of the Government, because, of course, we are ready at all times; but it was due to the House, and especially to the new Members of the House, that he should have given them an opportunity of reperusing the papers on the subject, which had probably been laid aside by everybody, thinking that the matter had gone by. The hon. and learned Member did not do that, and I think that in omitting to observe that practice, he failed somewhat in proper respect to the Members of the House. I come now to those who have contended that the only question before us is the course which the Government have pursued. That is, no doubt, the main point of the Resolution—of the reprobation which the hon. and learned Gentleman wishes to call down on the Government. But the hon. and learned Gentleman has mixed up other topics with his speech. He has been pleased to say, that he does not much anticipate the success of his Motion, because the Government and the person who is at the head of it have acquired—unduly, as he thinks, and why, he cannot imagine—the general confidence of the country. Sir, I can tell the hon. and learned Gentleman one thing, which has given us the confidence of the country. His Resolutions, his votes of censure; and I am very sure that the Resolution which he now proposes will not have any greater effect in shaking the confidence which the country has in the Government than that celebrated Resolution which led to so signal an exhibition of popular and national feeling upon a recent occasion. The hon. and learned Gentleman was interrupted during his speech when he was anticipating the possibility of the overthrow of our power in India by a cry of "No!" from hon. Gentlemen on the other side. "Aye," he said, "those are British noes." Sir, I wish that I could say that the hon. and learned Gentleman's speeches and resolutions were British speeches and British resolutions; but it is because the country has felt that the spirit which animates the hon. and learned Gentleman in these matters is not a British spirit, and that his thoughts and feelings are not the thoughts and feelings of the people of England, that his votes of censure have recoiled upon himself and upon those who have been found ready to support him. Many hon. Gentlemen have made light of the causes of the war that we entered into with Persia, and I am surprised at the language which some Gentlemen have held upon the subject. Were we the only Government that attached importance to Herat as a position the independence of which from Persian authority was essential to English security? Why, every successive Government for a length of time has held the same opinion—the Government of the Earl of Derby, the Government of the Earl of Aberdeen, the Government of Viscount Melbourne did so; in fact, there is no Government of late years that has not felt that Herat in the possession of Persia was a great additional danger to our Indian empire. Then the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford has deprecated the allusions which have been made in the course of the debate to Russia, as instigating Persian aggression in the direction of our Indian frontier. Well, but is that a matter of opinion or of inference? Does not he recollect that on a former occasion, when a Persian army besieged Herat, and was only prevented from taking it—first by the heroic defence which was made by Major Eldred Pottinger, the gallant British officer who directed that defence; and afterwards by our entrance into Affghanistan—does he not recollect that the person who conducted that siege was a Russian general, General Simonitch, and that another Russian agent, Lieutenant Vico-witch, was sent on a mission to Cabul and Candahar, to organize a combination against the British power in India? We wish to be on the best terms with Russia. The war is over, and I trust that the animosity arising from that war will be effaced from the minds alike of Englishmen and of Russians; but it is one thing to wish to encourage friendly relations with a foreign Power—it is one thing to forget the asperities of war—it is another thing to blind yourself to the great and important interests of your country. If there were no Russia on one side of Persia, and no British India on the other, it would be a matter of the most perfect indifference to us whether Persia occupied Herat, or Herat were an independent State; but knowing that Herat is a great fortress, which leads by Candahar and Cabul to India; knowing that Persia, a weak Power, stands next door to Russia, a greater Power; knowing that the possession of Herat by Persia would facilitate its occupation at any time by Russia, whenever the political relations between Russia and England should lead Russia to contemplate an invasion of British India; knowing that the existence of Russian Power in Herat would so shake that public opinion in the East on which our authority so much depends; knowing all that, I say that any Government which shut its eyes to that danger, and which tamely permitted Persia to get possession of Herat would be guilty of great neglect, or of an utter disregard to the interests of the country. Then, admitting that, it was said that we might have obtained the evacuation of Herat by means of negotiation. I say that the course of events proves the contrary. When the Shah issued a proclamation annexing Herat to the Persian territory, when he boasted openly that he would take it and keep it, and that nothing should induce him ever to surrender it, I say that negotiation had failed to accomplish the evacuation, and that it was necessary to resort to force. Then it was said, "Your negotiations at Constantinople might have come to a successful issue if you had been content with the terms which Ferukh Khan was prepared to agree to." But in the first place Ferukh Khan never signed those terms in a manner to bind his Government to anything which he consented to adopt; and in the next place he made it a condition that we should suspend the expedition that was going forward. Hon. Gentlemen have said, and I think my noble Friend fell into the same mistake, "You made war because Ferukh Khan would not agree to the dismissal of the Sadr Azim." That assertion, however, assumes a totally different condition of things between the two parties from that which existed. If the declaration of war and the order to send the expedition had not been made before Ferukh Khan's negotiations at Constantinople had commenced, if the question of peace and war had depended upon the issue of those negotiations, and if, on account of his not agreeing to the whole of the terms which we proposed, we had sent the order to Bombay for the troops to proceed to Herat, then I admit that it might be urged that war or peace depended on the acceptance or refusal by Ferukh Khan of the conditions; but that order had been sent before, and it was the knowledge that Ferukh Khan acquired at Constantinople of the declaration of war by the Governor General, and of that which had taken place, which made him break off the negotiations; because he said, "It is now no use to go on negotiating; you have declared war, and it is for my Government to say whether the altered state of things does not render all that has passed of no value." Therefore it is a total misrepresentation of the facts to say that peace or war depended on the acceptance or refusal by Ferukh Khan of the conditions offered to him. Undoubtedly, if he had stated that he had full powers, then the treaty of peace would have been signed at Constantinople instead of at Paris; but war would equally have taken place before that treaty was signed, because the war took place before the negotiations with Ferukh Khan came to an end. But we are taxed with having made a worse treaty of peace at Paris than we might have made at Constantinople; and why? Because we relaxed certain conditions, which we found on communication were likely to be peculiarly painful to the Shah. Thus, at one time we are accused with being too exacting in our terms and too harsh in our conduct to the weaker Powers, and at another time we are reproached with making concessions to soothe the feelings and save the pride of a weaker Power, with whom we wish to be on friendly terms. I say that those who contend that we ought to be friendly towards Persia, and that the alliance and friendship of Persia is of value to England, ought to approve of our conduct in waiving terms not essential to our perfect security—terms which we were perfectly justified in demanding in the outset, but which were not absolutely necessary, and were at the same time grating to the feelings of that Power we were desirous of making our friend by a treaty of peace. I repeat that we ought to be praised rather than censured for making such concessions. The hon. and learned Gentleman has now found out that this Persian war is one of the causes of the calamities which have broken out in India. Why, I say the very contrary is the truth. In the first place, no man in his senses can maintain that the mere detachment of 5000 men from Bombay could at all weaken the British military power in the presidency of Bengal and the North Western Provinces, where those troops were not. But if it be true, as I think it is, that the power of England in Asia depends upon opinion, what, I ask, would have been the effect on opinion in the East if it should have been seen that England, after making great efforts in 1838 to prevent Persia acquiring Herat—after having, under successive Governments, protested against a Persian occupation of Herat—after having at one time prevented it by our forces, and at another by negotiations—at last, after having measured swords with Russia, and when all the nations in the East knew that these demonstrations of hostility by Persia arose from the efforts of Russia to create embarrassments to England during a time of war, shrank from the position which she had so long assumed, and tamely acquiesced in the possession of Herat by Persia, in despite of all our remonstrances and treaties with that Power? That would have had the most fatal effect on the reputation of England throughout the whole of the East, and so far from the mere detention of 5000 troops in Bombay being of any advantage, we should have suffered a loss of character highly injurious to the country. On the other hand, the effect of the war in Persia must be greatly advantageous to British interests throughout the East; for when the Asiatics see that we are capable of despatching so rapidly an expedition to Persia, which has been attended with such great and signal success that even on the extremity of the Persian territory we have been able, by that expedition to coerce the Persian Government to evacuate Herat, and to agree never again to occupy it; that, I say, is a triumph of British arms and diplomacy over Persia. Persia, however, we are told, is liable to be swayed by Russia; well, then, over Persian aggression and, if you will, over Russian instigation. This must be of the greatest value to the reputation and power of England among the Asiatics. Therefore, so far from admitting the justice of the hon. and learned Gentleman's observation, that the Persian expedition had contributed in the remotest degree to bring about those unfortunate events which we all deplore, I maintain that its tendency was to have prevented rather than to have accelerated them. But the hon. and learned Gentleman's own argument deprives him of the power of taking up that position, for he represents those events in India as the result of long previous combinations. In that case, they could not have arisen in consequence of the simple detachment of 5000 men from Bombay. Those 5000 men have returned, and for some time have been again on the shores of India; and, therefore, if the British forces were weakened by the original detachment of those troops, they are now strengthened, not only by their simple return, but by the glory they have accomplished, by the character and honour their arms have acquired, and by their distinguished performances on the Persian territory. There is, then, no ground for the Resolution moved by the hon. and learned Gentleman. There is no ground on constitutional principle, because we do not dispute that principle, but we contend that in this particular case to have followed it would rather have been a piece of pedantry than a substantial compliance with the rights and privileges of this House. There is no ground for the Resolution on account of the policy which led to the expedition to Persia, because that policy has been consecrated by the unanimous opinion of every successive Government which has conducted the affairs of this country. It was the policy of the Earl of Malmesbury as well as of the Earl of Clarendon. Therefore I say, that for this House to agree to a Resolution which directly or indirectly asserts it to be a bad and insufficient policy on the part of the British Government to maintain Herat free from Persian authority would be a fatal mistake, and might be productive of the most injurious consequences to our Indian interests. On these grounds I trust that the House will pass to the Committee of Supply, and if the hon. and learned Member, on full consideration and after the discussion which has taken place, should still think it necessary to divide the House, I hope the House will deem it not to be a Motion expedient to be carried.

Viscount Palmerston

Viscount Palmerston

MR. DISRAELI: I hope the House will permit me for a few moments to trespass on its time while I explain the course which on this occasion I think it my duty to adopt. I will at once dismiss all that vexed question of Persian politics, with respect to which I still venture to believe that I entertain more accurate impressions than appear to prevail on the Treasury bench. According to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Persia is the vassal of Russia; according to the President of the Board of Control, it is with great difficulty that he can prevent Persia from falling into the hands of England, her natural ally. With dogmas so discordant, and opinions so contrary, maintained by two eminent Members of the Cabinet on the vital question as to what led to the war and caused the expenditure, Her Majesty's Ministers must excuse me if I do not place implicit confidence in their views of Persian politics. But the opinion of the House on Persian politics is not, I believe, the question which to-night engages our attention, nor do I think it necessary to enter into the other question, which, borrowing the epithet used to-night, I may call the "awful" question of the present state of India, though it has been adverted to by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and dwelt on by the First Lord of the Treasury. We at least have this advantage from this discussion, that we have received the mature and solemn opinion of the Government on the cause of the present condition of our Indian empire. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has informed us that India at the present moment is suffering only from a momentary and unexpected impulse arising from superstitious causes. This insurrection, which extends from the Punjab to Calcutta, is, according to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the creation of a sudden impulse. Sir, I have heard, but I can hardly believe that such grave consequences have arisen from so accidental a cause. I can hardly believe that that class, of all others, in our Indian empire which, by its education and interests, and by every motive which can influence the loyalty of men, ought to be most devoted to our Government, should be suddenly found in a state of open insurrection, from the cause alleged by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I must be permitted to say that I believe the cause of the present state of India to be much graver and deeper than appears to be conceived by Her Majesty's Ministers. I believe the present state of India has been occasioned by long years of misgovernment; and if it be the opinion of Her Majesty's Ministers that the condition of India is attributable to such temporary and unexpected causes as alleged by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I should have much less confidence than I would willingly entertain with regard to the remedial measures they have proposed, and the further measures which I trust they are prepared to submit to Parliament. But, dismissing Persian politics—dismissing also the grave question which must soon engage our consideration—let us consider the real question we have to decide to-night—namely, the course which, independently of passion or of party, we ought to pursue. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield has proposed some Resolutions by way of Amendment to the Motion for going into Committee of Supply, in order to provide for the expenses of the Persian war. Those Resolutions may be couched in strong language. That is of course a question of degree of little moment, but no hon. Gentleman will pretend that they do not embody a constitutional principle, or that that principle is not expressed in proper and Parliamentary style. Whether the Resolutions apply to the circumstances of the case—whether the inference which the hon. and learned Gentleman has drawn is sufficiently sustained by the premises, are questions meet and fit for Parliamentary discussion; but for proposing these Resolutions, which assert the privileges of Parliament and express a constitutional principle acknowledged even by Her Majesty's Ministers to-night, the hon. and learned Gentleman is assailed in tones of vituperation, and is told he is taking an un-English course. The First Lord of the Treasury, speaking of the Shah of Persia, said he had a habit of boasting in his Durbar. Well, there are other great men who have the same habit, who boast in places which we were once fain to hope were almost as august as the Durbar of a Persian king of kings; but if the policy the noble Lord recommends were pursued, I think the influence of Parliament would be so much diminished that we might perhaps have to veil our glories before the superior authority of a Persian sovereign. The noble Lord, having been accused of being a most popular Minister, yields to the soft impeachment, and in the Persian style says, "True it is, I am most popular; true it is that I possess the confidence of the country, but what is the cause? I know why I possess the confidence of the country. It is," said the noble Lord to the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, "in consequence of your Resolutions." ["Hear, hear!"] Of course, hon. Gentlemen opposite will cry "Hear!" and in making this remark I intended they should cry "Hear!" Now, what were the Resolutions of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield? I remember several memorable occasions on which the hon. and learned Gentleman, unsupported by any personal following in this House, has proposed Resolutions. I need scarcely remind the House of what was, perhaps, the most memorable occasion on which the hon. and learned Gentleman brought forward a Resolution. It was a Resolution for an inquiry into the state of the English army before the walls of Sebastopol. Was that an un-English Resolution? Was it an unconstitutional Resolution? Why, the noble Lord, who was one of the guilty Ministers, yielded to the vote when that Resolution was carried. Another Resolution, almost equally memorable, and which I am sure the noble Lord cannot have forgotten, was also proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman. The occasion was when the "turbulent and aggressive policy" of the noble Lord was properly brought under our consideration by an eminent Member of this House, and when a large and powerful party, asserting, as I believe, sound principles of policy, called upon the House of Commons to seal with its strong reprobation the injurious policy of the noble Lord. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield then came forward with one of his un-English Resolutions, and by the aid of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and by a scant majority, the mischievous career of the noble Lord was continued. Now, as the noble Lord has alluded to the younger Members of this House, I think they may learn from this instance what gratitude they will experience if, in future moments of delusion, desirous to save a Minister from a difficulty or to extricate him from a scrape, they come forward and propose Resolutions to assist the policy or to vindicate the conduct of the noble Lord. A few years will pass, and they will then be held up to the scorn and ridicule of the House as the movers of un-English Resolutions. Those who vindicate the privileges of Parliament—[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]—aye, many of the hon. Gentlemen who in their present zeal utter those murmurs, and who I dare say are now only too eager to come forward to vindicate the noble Lord, will learn from the lesson of to-night the future that awaits them. Now, let us see whether the premises of the hon. and learned Gentleman justify the conclusion at which he asks the House to arrive. Seriously speaking, that conclusion is a very grave one. ["Oh!"] Why, surely, you would not have me speak seriously of light matters? I have been answering the light part of the noble Lord's speech, and I am now about to address myself to what ought to have been the grave portion of it. The conclusion suggested by the hon. and learned Gentleman is one of great gravity, and I am not prepared to say that if that conclusion were established—grave as it is—I, for one, should shrink from the responsibility of voting for it. I think we should place ourselves in a very false position if we asserted our belief that the privileges of this House had been violated by the Ministry, and yet shrunk from the responsibility of condemning their conduct; but at the same time it is necessary that we should scrupulously look to facts, and see whether the conclusion we are called upon to adopt is justified by the circumstances or premises alleged. What is the language of the Resolution? It calls upon us to say—

Viscount Palmerston

“That the war with Persia was declared, prosecuted, and concluded without information of such transactions being communicated to Parliament.”

Now is that the fact? I perfectly agree that the House has not been treated in this matter with that candour which I think it would have been wise if the Minister—however popular and however powerful—had exhibited towards us. I cannot, however, get over the fact that on the meeting of Parliament, which might have been too long deferred, and after an ambiguous silence had, perhaps, been too long maintained on the part of the Government, there was an announcement in the Speech from the Throne of a war with Persia. I feel that that was the occasion—at the time the Address was moved—when this question ought to have been mooted. It is impossible not to feel the force of that argument. I do not at all agree with the Chancellor of the Exchequer or other hon. Gentlemen, who maintain that this or any other Indian wars do not require notice from Parliament; but the fact that at the commencement of this war an appeal was immediately made to the Exchequer of this country, marks it out from usual Indian wars. I cannot, however, agree that, as a general principle, all Indian wars are to be taken from the control of this House, even if an immediate appeal is not made to the British Exchequer. The basis of Indian finance is the credit of England; and at this moment, when we hear of the treasures of India being plundered, when no one can tell by what machinery the revenue of India can for some time be collected, we should have acted in a most indiscreet manner—even if this had been purely and strictly an Indian war, without any immediate appeal to the English Exchequer—if we had allowed the war to pass without criticism and discussion. There is, then, before us the important fact, that at the beginning of the last Session of the last Parliament we were apprised that this war had been undertaken. I cannot under these circumstances agree to a Resolution which alleges, “that the war with Persia was declared, prosecuted, and concluded, without information of such transactions being communicated to Parliament.” I think the Government acted unwisely and erroneously in not communicating their policy to Parliament at an earlier period; but I cannot agree that the late Parliament was itself free from blame in allowing the conduct of the Government to pass so long unnoticed. Does it, then, become an assembly that has been backward in the fulfilment of its duty to agree to a Resolution of so uncompromising a character as that proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman? I confess I cannot but feel that the hon. and learned Gentleman is right in calling the attention of the House to this subject. I wish he had done so in a manner which would have allowed the expression of our opinion to be of an unanimous character. I cannot suppose that, whatever may happen, this debate will be without profit to our privileges, but I wish the hon. and learned Gentleman would not call upon us to divide upon this issue. It is not for me to counsel the hon. and learned Gentleman, but I shall follow the course which I think it is my duty to follow. I do not think the premises in this case justify the severe and sweeping conclusions at which he has arrived, and therefore my course will be to vote that the House do go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. Disraeli

Question put.

The House divided: Ayes 352; Noes 38: Majority 314.

List of the AYES.

Adams, W. H.	Baring, T. G.
Adderley, C. B.	Barnard, T.
Akroyd, E.	Bernard, hon. W. S.
Alexander, John	Bass, M. T.
Anderson, Sir J.	Bathurst, A. A.
Annesley, hon. H.	Baxter, W. E.
Antrobus, E.	Beach, W. W. B.
Archdall, Capt. M.	Beale, S.
Bagwell, J.	Beaumont, W. B.
Baines, rt. hon. M. T.	Beecroft, G. S.
Ball, E.	Bentinck, G. W. P.
Baring, rt. hon. Sir F. T.	Berkeley, hon. H. F.
Baring, hon. F.	Berkeley, F. W. F.

Bethell, Sir R.	Dutton, hon. R. H.	Howard, Lord E.	O'Connell, Capt. D.
Biddulph, R. M.	Ebrington, Visct.	Hudson, G.	Ogilvy, Sir J.
Black, A.	Egerton, E. C.	Hughes, W. B.	Osborne, R.
Blake, J.	Ellis, hon. L. A.	Hutt, W.	Ossulston, Lord
Blakemore, T. W. B.	Esmonde, J.	Ingestre, Visct.	Owen, Sir J.
Boldero, Col.	Evans, T. W.	Ingham, R.	Paget, C.
Botfield, B.	Ewart, W.	Ingram, H.	Paget, Lord A.
Bouverie, hon. P. P.	Ewart, J. C.	Jackson, W.	Palmer, R.
Bovill, W.	Fagan, W.	Jermyn, Earl	Palmer, R. W.
Bramley-Moore, J.	Farnham, E. B.	Jervoise, Sir J. C.	Palmerston, Visct.
Bramston, T. W.	Farquhar, Sir M.	Johnstone, hon. H. B.	Patten, Col. W.
Brand, hon. H.	Fenwick, H.	Jones, D.	Paull, H.
Bridges, Sir B. W.	Ferguson, Col.	Keating, Sir H. S.	Pechell, Sir G. B.
Briscoe, J. I.	Finlay, A. S.	Kendall, N.	Pennant, hon. Col.
Brocklehurst, J.	FitzGerald, rt. hon. J. D.	Ker, R.	Perry, Sir T. E.
Brown, J.	FitzRoy, rt. hon. H.	Kershaw, J.	Philips, R. N.
Bruce, Lord E.	Fitzwilliam, hn. C. W. W.	King, J. K.	Philippa, J. H.
Bruce, H. A.	Fitzwilliam, hon. G. W.	King, E. B.	Pigott, F.
Buchanan, W.	Foljambe, F. J. S.	Kinglake, A. W.	Pinney, Col.
Buller, J. W.	Forster, C.	Kinnaird, hon. A. F.	Platt, J.
Bunbury, W. B. M'C.	Foster, W. O.	Knatchbull, W. F.	Portman, hon. W. H. B.
Burke, Sir T. J.	Fortescue, hon. F. D.	Knatchbull-Hugessen, E.	Potter, Sir J.
Bury, Visct.	Fortescue, C. S.	Knight, F. W.	Price, W. P.
Butt, I.	Freestun, Col.	Labouchere, rt. hon. H.	Pryse, E. L.
Buxton, C.	Gallwey, Sir W. P.	Langton, W. G.	Pritchard, J.
Buxton, Sir E. N.	Galway, Visct.	Langton, H. G.	Pugh, D.
Byng, hon. G.	Gard, R. S.	Legh, G. C.	Puller, C. W.
Calcraft, J. H.	Garnett, W. J.	Lewis, rt. hon. Sir G. C.	Ramsden, Sir J. W.
Calcutt, F. M.	Gaskell, J. M.	Locke, Jno.	Ramsay, Sir A.
Campbell, R. J. R.	Gifford, Earl of	Lockhart, A. E.	Raynham, Visct.
Carden, Sir R. W.	Gilpin, Col.	Lopes, Sir M.	Rebow, J. G.
Castlerosse, Visct.	Glover, E. A.	Lowe, rt. hon. R.	Repton, G. W. J.
Cavendish, Lord	Glyn, G. C.	Luce, T.	Ricardo, O.
Cavendish, hon. C. C.	Glyn, G. G.	Macarthy, A.	Ridley, G.
Cayley, E. S.	Greenall, G.	Mackie, J.	Robartes, T. J. A.
Cheetham, J.	Greenwood, J.	Mackinnon, W. A.	Roupell, W.
Child, S.	Greer, S. M'C.	M'Clintock, J.	Russell, F. W.
Cholmeley, Sir M. J.	Gregory, W. H.	M'Cullagh, W. T.	Russell, Sir W.
Clay, J.	Gregson, S.	Mainwaring, T.	Rust, J.
Clifford, C. C.	Grenfell, C. P.	Malins, R.	Sandon, Visct.
Clifford, H. M.	Grenfell, C. W.	Mangles, R. D.	Schneider, H. W.
Clive, G.	Grey, rt. hon. Sir G.	Mangles, C. E.	Scholefield, W.
Close, M. C.	Grey, R. W.	Marjoribanks, D. C.	Sclater, G.
Cobbett, J. M.	Grosvenor, Lord R.	Marsh, M. H.	Scott, Capt. E.
Cobbold, J. C.	Gurdon, B.	Marshall, W.	Seymer, H. D.
Codrington, Gen.	Gurney, J. H.	Martin, C. W.	Shafto, R. D.
Colebrooke, Sir T. E.	Hackblock, W.	Martin, P. W.	Sheridan, R. B.
Colville, C. R.	Hall, rt. hon. Sir B.	Martin, J.	Sibthorp, Maj.
Coningham, W.	Hanbury, R.	Massey, W. N.	Smith, M. T.
Cowper, rt. hon. W. F.	Handley, J.	Matheson, A.	Smith, rt. hon. R. V.
Coote, Sir C. H.	Hankey, T.	Matheson, Sir J.	Smith, A.
Corry, rt. hon. H. L.	Hanmer, Sir J.	Melgund, Visct.	Smith, Sir F.
Cowan, C.	Harcourt, G. G.	Merry, J.	Smyth, Col.
Craufurd, E. H. J.	Hardy, G.	Miles, W.	Smollett, A.
Crawford, R. W.	Harris, J. D.	Miller, T. J.	Somers, J. P.
Curzon, Visct.	Hastie, Arch.	Mills, T.	Somerville, rt. hn. Sir W.
Dalglish, R.	Hatchell, J.	Milnes, R. M.	Spooner, R.
Dalkeith, Earl of	Hay, Lord J.	Milton, Visct.	Stafford, A.
Damer, L. D.	Headlam, T. E.	Moncrieff, rt. hon. J.	Stapleton, J.
Dashwood, Sir G. H.	Heathcote, hon. G. H.	Monsell, rt. hon. W.	Stephenson, R.
Davey, R.	Heneage, G. F.	Montgomery, Sir G.	Stirling, W.
Davie, Sir H. R. F.	Henley, rt. hon. J. W.	Morris, D.	Stewart, Sir M. R. S.
Dering, Sir E.	Herbert, H. A.	Mostyn, hn. T. E. M. L.	Stuart, Lord J.
De Vere, S. E.	Hill, hon. R. C.	Mowbray, J. R.	Stuart, Col.
Disraeli, rt. hon. B.	Hodgson, K. D.	Napier, Sir C.	Sullivan, M.
Dodson, J. G.	Holford, R. S.	Newark, Visct.	Sykes, Col. W. H.
Du Cane, U.	Holland, E.	Nisbet, R. P.	Talbot, C. R. M.
Duke, Sir J.	Hopwood, J. T.	Noel, hon. G. J.	Tancred, H. W.
Duncan, Visct.	Hornby, W. H.	Norreys, Sir D. J.	Taylor, S. W.
Duncombe, hon. A.	Horsfall, T. B.	Norris, J. T.	Tempest, Lord A. V.
Dundas, G.	Horsman, rt. hon. E.	North, F.	Thorneley, T.
Dunlop, A. M.	Hotham, Lord	O'Brien, P.	Thornhill, W. P.
Du Pre, C. G.	Howard, hon. O. W. G.	O'Brien, Sir T.	Tollemache, hon. F. S.

Tollemache, J.	Westhead, J. P. B.
Tomline, G.	Wickham, H. W.
Townsend, J.	Willcox, B. M'G.
Trefusis, hon. C. H. R.	Williams, M.
Trueman, C.	Williams, Sir W. F.
Turner, J. A.	Willoughby, J. P.
Vansittart, W.	Wilson, J.
Villiers, rt. hon. C. P.	Wingfield, R. B.
Vivian, H. H.	Wise, J. A.
Vivian, hon. J. C. W.	Wood, rt. hon. Sir C.
Waddington, H. S.	Woodd, B. T.
Walcott, Adm.	Wood, W.
Waldron, L.	Wyld, J.
Walpole, rt. hon. S. H.	Wyndham, Gen.
Walter, J.	Wynn, Col.
Warburton, G. D.
Warre, J. A.
Weguelin, T. M.
Western, S.

TELLERS.

Hayter, rt. hon. W. G.
Mulgrave, Earl of

List of the NOES.

Baillie, H. J.	Maguire, J. F.
Biggs, J.	Nicoll, D.
Blackburn, P.	O'Donaghoe, The
Bowyer, G.	Pevensey, Visct.
Bruce, Major C.	Salisbury, E. G.
Burghley, Lord	Scott, H. F.
Burrell, Sir C. M.	Sheridan, H. B.
Christy, S.	Smith, J. B.
Clive, hon. R. W.	Thompson, Gen.
Cox, W.	Trelawny, Sir J. S.
Dillwyn, L. L.	Warren, S.
FitzGerald, W. R. S.	Watkin, E. W.
Gilpin, C.	White, J.
Gladstone, rt. hon. W.	Williams, W.
Graham, rt. hon. Sir J.	Willyams, E. W. B.
Hamilton, Lord C.	Willoughby, Sir H.
Hildyard, R. C.	Wortley, Maj.
Hope, A. J. B. B.
Hume, W. F.
Lennox, Lord H. G.
Liddell, hon. H. G.

TELLERS.

Roebuck, J. A.
Ayrton, A. S.

MR. DISRAELI asked if the papers relating to the mutiny in India would be laid on the table to-morrow.

MR. VERNON SMITH was understood to say they would be laid on the table on an early day.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

House in Committee; Mr. FITZROY in the Chair.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he should not at that late hour (a quarter to one o'clock) ask the House to agree to the two Resolutions which stood on the paper in his name. He should move them to-morrow evening in a Committee of Supply.

House resumed; Committee report progress; to sit again To-morrow.

SUPPLY—CIVIL CONTINGENCIES.

On the bringing up of the Report of the Committee of Supply,

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he was not aware the other night that the Civil Contingencies were coming on, and he should, therefore, avail himself of the bringing up of the Report to make a few observations. There had been a great increase in the amount of the Civil Contingencies which had been spent, and this year it had reached £94,000. But he wished to ask a question of the Secretary to the Treasury; he wished to know what was done with the balance of the Civil Contingencies, whatever it might be. In the last four years, £100,000 had been voted every year for Civil Contingencies, a large portion of which, amounting to £148,000, had not been expended. He would beg to ask, therefore, what was the practice with regard to that part of the Civil Contingencies which was not spent? Was it returned into the Exchequer, or was it retained and expended on the authority of the Treasury in loans and grants? If so, it was a most objectionable outlay of money voted for one purpose which was applied to another, as, in his opinion, all expenditure of money ought to be authorized by a vote of that House. He wished also to know if the expenditure of the Civil Contingencies was subject to any audit, and if not, why not? He also wished to know if the Treasury claimed or exercised any power to expend this money without any examination at all?

MR. WILSON, in reply to the first question, said there could be no doubt that there was an annual Vote of £100,000 for Civil Contingencies, and as the expenditure on that account had not in any year reached that amount, there was a large accumulation of balance out of the Civil Contingencies. The hon. Gentleman would recollect, that in the Committee on public moneys last year it was shown that the Treasury did not draw any of the balance of these Votes of £100,000, but that he (Mr. Wilson) had returned them into the Exchequer as a saving of £70,000, and a Return had been laid on the table, showing an account current for the last ten years of the amount voted and used for the Civil Contingencies. Last week he laid a similar Return for the past year on the table, and that practice he intended to follow every year, showing the state of the accounts for ten years. In answer to the second question, he said that the Treasury did not assume or exercise any right to appropriate the Vote for Civil Contingencies to anything which did not appear in the accounts, or to which Parliament had not given its sanction; any expenditure of the money voted for Civil Contingencies was to be found in the accounts annually presented to Parliament. With regard to the third question, the hon. Gentleman was aware that under the present system the Civil Service accounts were not audited by the Audit Board, which was a fault in the system which he hoped would now be amended.

Resolution agreed to.

JUSTICE AND POLICE FORCE (DUBLIN) BILL—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD moved that Mr. Speaker leave the Chair in order to go into Committee upon this Bill.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. VANCE objected, as he had only just received some Amendments from Dublin.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD offered to postpone proceedings on this Bill to another day, if all the orders of hon. Members which followed were also postponed.

MR. GROGAN moved the adjournment of the House.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON remarked, that he agreed that it was unreasonable at that hour (one o'clock) to expect the House to go on with opposed Bills; but if they were to sit, and there were to be debates, it was only fair the debates should be on the subjects as they stood in order on the paper.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and negatived.

Committee deferred till To-morrow.

SUPERANNUATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

POSTPONEMENT OF SECOND READING.

LORD NAAS said, that he objected to postpone the order for the Second Reading of this Bill, on the ground that Government were in a very different position from private Members. The Government could fix the business as they pleased, but a private Member had no such advantage.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the House would meet again to-day at twelve, and it was rather hard, after sitting at twelve yesterday, to keep hon. Members there until two or three in the morning. It was only reasonable that after twelve o'clock they should not proceed with Bills which were likely to be opposed.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, that the Civil Service Superannuation Bill was viewed by the country with deep interest. He hoped that an opportunity would be given for its discussion.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER remarked that the Government were disposed to give a day, but they were unable at the present moment to fix any time.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD hoped that the noble Lord would not be content unless the Government named a particular day for the discussion of his Bill.

VISCOUNT GALWAY suggested to the Government that they might easily get over the difficulty by agreeing to the second reading.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that as Thursday morning next seemed to be unoccupied, the discussion on the Civil Service Superannuation Bill might be taken then.

Second Reading deferred till Thursday next, at twelve o'clock.

The House adjourned at a Quarter before Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, July 17, 1857.

MINUTES.] Took the Oaths.—The Marquess of Abercorn.

PUBLIC BILL.—1<sup>a</sup> Fraudulent Trustees, &c.

2<sup>a</sup> Constabulary Force (Ireland).

3<sup>a</sup> Representative Peers (Ireland); Joint-Stock Companies.

ORDNANCE SURVEY OF SCOTLAND. QUESTION.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET rose to put a question to the noble Lord at the head of the War Department with reference to the Ordnance Survey. He understood, from what had taken place last night, that the Government were prepared to issue a Commission to reconsider the whole subject of the survey in Scotland. He (the Duke of Somerset) had supposed that the whole of that question was set at rest by the previous decision of the House of Commons. It now appeared, however, that that decision was to be set aside, and that the subject was to be reconsidered. As this was a matter involving several millions of money, he wished to ask his noble Friend what instructions were to be issued to the Commission regarding the survey? According as the map required was for military, geological, or sanitary purposes, these instructions would necessarily be different. He, therefore, wished to know what the instructions were, and whether his noble Friend would agree to lay a copy of them upon the table of the House.

LORD PANMURE said, he could not undertake to give a categorical answer as to what instructions would be issued; but he thought he had last night clearly stated the spirit in which the Commission would be appointed. The survey had taken place in England, Ireland, and Scotland upon different scales, and the House of Commons had more than once interfered with those scales, and had come on different occasions to different conclusions respecting them. No decision of the House of Commons in regard to the scale on which the survey should be conducted was therefore likely to be final. The object of the Commission would be to ascertain on what scale the survey should be made—not on what scale a large map should be published. If the survey was conducted on a given scale, it could afterwards be easily reduced by a new scientific process, and copied on any scale that might suit the convenience of the public. The general effect of the instructions to be issued to the Commissioners would therefore be that they should inquire, in conjunction with scientific men and men connected with the law, what would be the most convenient scale to adopt for the survey, so as to secure perfect accuracy in all the reductions to be made from it.

NATURALIZATION BILLS.

STANDING ORDER MOVED.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR moved the following Resolution;—

“That no Naturalization Bill will be read a second time unless the consent of the Crown has been previously signified.”

The noble and learned Lord said that the previous assent of the Crown ought to be required in the case of Bills of this description as well as in the case of Bills for reversing attainders. Any fit person might, without cost or trouble, obtain from the Secretary of State a Certificate equivalent to an Act of Naturalization; and, therefore, there was no absolute necessity for the introduction of Acts of that nature.

The Duke of Somerset

Resolution agreed to; and ordered to be added to the Roll of Standing Orders.

HER MAJESTY'S CORONATION— SIR GEORGE HAYTER'S PICTURE.

QUESTION.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON rose to call attention to the propriety of a painting of Her Majesty's Coronation being placed in the House of Lords; and asked the President of the Council whether it was in contemplation to purchase for that object the original painting of that event by Sir George Hayter, now on sale. It would be generally agreed that their Lordships' House was a very proper receptacle for those works of art which recorded events in the history of the country which were more than ordinarily interesting; and it had occurred to him that it would be most desirable and appropriate that the painting recording the Coronation of Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen should have a place found for it within some one at least of their Committee-rooms. The original picture of that splendid subject, by Sir George Hayter, was now for sale; and when they remembered that many of the illustrious men who took part in that State ceremonial had since been removed from among us, this great work of art became one of additional historic interest. Moreover, the new palace of Westminster having been erected in the reign of the present Sovereign, it was only fitting that a pictorial representation of the Coronation of Her Majesty should adorn its walls. He wished to ask the President of the Council whether it was in contemplation to purchase for the House of Lords the original painting of the Coronation by Sir George Hayter?

EARL GRANVILLE said, that the Government had nothing to do with the decorations of the Houses of Parliament. That was a subject which had been referred to a Royal Commission, of which the Prince Consort was President, and to which several distinguished Members of both Houses belonged. He was not one of those Commissioners, and he could not, therefore, give the noble Viscount any information. At the same time, he thought it undesirable that the Commissioners should be called upon to explain the reasons why they did not purchase any particular pictures that might happen to be in the market.

THE AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE—EMIGRATION OF NEGROES.

RESOLUTION. ADDRESS.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE, who had a notice upon the paper of his intention to present a petition from Guiana praying for the removal of certain impediments to the importation of free labourers into that colony, said, that he would give way to his noble and learned Friend, believing that the discussion of this subject would be favourable to the views of the petitioners.

LORD BROUGHAM: My Lords, I rise to move a Resolution, which I propose to follow up by a Motion for an Address on the subject of an apprehended revival of the African Slave Trade. My Lords, when I consider the very great importance of the question which I am about to bring before your Lordships, I cannot avoid expressing my surprise—my agreeable surprise—at finding so many of your Lordships now present; for the subject has nothing to do with party—it has nothing personal to recommend it—it has none of those qualities that generally create a gathering together—I will not say in both Houses, but in your Lordships' House of Parliament. It rather belongs to that class of questions of which Mr. Canning once said, "Vital questions, as they are called, are those questions which nobody cares two straws about." I cannot say, however, that the present question comes within that description, for there is both in Parliament and out of it a very strong feeling, as well as a deeply rooted conviction, of the importance attaching to the subject which I shall now proceed shortly to bring before your Lordships.

My Lords, it was with very great pain, and no little astonishment, that I first heard of the measures which have been lately adopted in Paris. I felt then, as I feel now, perfectly assured that the Sovereign of that country is wholly incapable of lending his countenance to any measures which would tend to revive the African slave trade. I say so, in the first place, on account of His Majesty's family connection with him who first in France abolished that execrable traffic. The "Most Christian Kings" had, one after another, allowed that traffic not only to continue, but even to flourish, and had, indeed, all the while encouraged instead of suppressing it. It was reserved for the First Napoleon to do that act of his life which reflects the most honour upon him—I will say, indeed, the only act of his life in which he showed himself the friend of human rights and human liberties—it was reserved for him at once and for ever to abolish the African slave trade. I cannot, therefore, believe that he who so naturally prides himself upon his near relationship to that celebrated individual will take a retrograde course, and lend his countenance to a system which his eminent predecessor abolished, and by a measure as to which he has probably been not only ill-advised and misled, but deceived. The Emperor of the French, no doubt, believed that the project in question had none of that tendency to the revival of the slave trade which, I think, I can prove to your Lordships, without doubt or question, it possessed: I cannot believe it possible that His Imperial Majesty has been otherwise than misinformed and deceived. There is another reason why I take this view. When I consider those by whom he is surrounded, and to whom he gives in ecclesiastical matters so much of his confidence—namely, those ministers of religion to whose policy his Imperial Majesty seems inclined to lean, I feel certain that they must have told him of the offences committed by slave traders being ranged in the denunciations of Holy Writ with the most hateful and disgusting crimes of which man can be guilty; crimes to which I dare not in this place even allude except to say that they are not worse than slave trading. When this shall have been well represented to His Imperial Majesty, and especially when he finds that your Lordships and that the Government of this country view with great suspicion all that is now doing or attempting to be done—when that shall have been represented to the Emperor, I trust that His Majesty will view these transactions with the same jealous suspicion of their possible consequences, and that he will be thus furnished with a sufficient answer to the importunities of his colonial subjects, to which, for the present, and under a misapprehension of the facts and consequences, he seems to have given way.

My Lords, without further preface, I will proceed to state how it is that licences have been given to certain mercantile adventurers, or to certain agents as it has even been said of the French Government, to import a limited number of "free negroes," as the phrase has been, into the French West Indian colonies. Now, such a scheme as that must end in a renewal of the infernal African slave trade. From the representations which have been made to me by a learned Friend, Mr. Fitzpatrick, who filled the important office of judicial assessor on the Gold Coast for a period of six years, and who was thoroughly acquainted with the Messrs. Regis, of Marseilles, as well as their representatives upon the Gold Coast, he had ascertained that those gentlemen were most respectable merchants; so that in the information which I have received in reference to them from Mr. Fitzpatrick, prejudice against them cannot be said to have a share. What, then, is the proposition which, according to Mr. Fitzpatrick, was made upon the part of those gentlemen? Why, that the Africans, being slaves in their own country, should be induced to emigrate to the West Indies; that care should be taken that the contracts which might be entered into with them should be faithfully observed; that they should have the security of the Government officers for their proper treatment on the voyage to the West Indies; that upon their arrival in that quarter they should have Government security for the exercise of kindness towards them upon the part of the masters to whom they were to be bound apprentices by indenture; and that if they at any time desired to return to their native country, they should be allowed to do so, and should be conveyed back to the coast from which they had been taken at the charge of those by whom they had been carried to a foreign land. Thus, it was proposed to do for them, in short, everything which humanity could suggest. But I will beg your Lordships to bear in mind that we do not this evening hear for the first time of Africans being slaves in their own country, or of the great benefits which must result to them from their transmigration to the western hemisphere. On the contrary, I can recollect the assurances of a blessed change to be effected by such a transmigration which were in former times so confidently made. Looking back over a period of sixty years, during which time I have had my share in promoting the abolition of the slave trade, and during which I have laboured, more or less actively, more or less successfully, but always to the utmost of my power for the attainment of that great object, I cannot name a single discussion upon the subject in which language precisely similar to that to which I have just called your Lordships' attention was not made use of. I shall not trouble the House with any lengthened quotations in proof of this statement, but it is important that I should produce two or three instances in order to show how identical are the arguments which in years gone by were advanced in favour of the slave trade and the reasons which are now put forward in support of the proposed system of free emigration. The advocates of slave trading then and the advocates of free emigration now use identically the same arguments. From the year 1787 down to the abolition of the slave trade in 1807, the reasons which were urged in opposition to the measure bore to those used a striking similarity. In 1811, four years afterwards, I introduced into the other House of Parliament, the Bill declaring that the conveyance of Africans from their own country and their sale in other lands was in law, as it had always been in fact, a crime and not a traffic. But, up to that time, and during the whole period of the controversy from 1787, in all the debates upon that question, General Tarleton, who was then Member for Liverpool, asserted that the Africans themselves entertained no objection to the slave trade. He moreover complained that those who held contrary opinions were led away by a mistaken humanity. He indignantly denied even the misery which it was said had been inflicted upon those unfortunate negroes in the middle passage, and contended that only five out of 500 of them died upon an average, while 10½ per cent of our own troops perished on board the West India transports. General Tarleton further cited in support of his views the authority of one governor, two admirals, one captain, a commodore, and a large number of naval officers, whom he represented as friendly to the slave trade, and as willing witnesses to the benefits which it conferred. Sir William Young, himself a planter, in the course of the same debates, stated that he did not regard the commerce in African slaves in the light of an inhuman commerce. Not only did he defend the traffic in these human beings on the ground that they were slaves in their own country, and, in addition to being slaves, were there subjected to various tortures, and, in many instances, to murder itself; from all of which he maintained they were saved by the slave trade; but he described their happiness in the West Indies, and even on board of ship, in romantic terms. According to him, a slave estate was a most delightful spectacle. He spoke of the slaves dancing and singing, and enjoying every indulgence. Alderman Brook Watson, Lord Mayor, took the same view. He held that those who had brought them from their own country had brought them to happiness, and wound up by telling the House that there could not be a more delightful scene than that presented by the dancing and other amusements of the happy slaves on a well-managed estate. These quotations will probably be sufficient to show your Lordships that the arguments now brought forward in favour of the negro emigration scheme are by no means original, but had been brought forward very freely in defence of the execrable slave traffic from 1787 to 1811. This plan of free emigration has indeed an ominous resemblance to the scheme in which the slave trade had its origin. Soon after the discovery of America, it was thought that the miseries inflicted by the avarice and cruelty of the Spaniards upon the native Indian tribes might be terminated, if their place was supplied by the importation of negroes from Africa. That scheme arose from the union of short-sighted benevolence with far-sighted self-interest. This unnatural union it was which first produced that monstrous progeny—the African slave trade. The greatest cruelty ever perpetrated in the history of the world, has been ascribed, I hope untruly, to one of the most eminent philanthropists that ever lived, Bartholomew Las Casas, the protector of the Indians. In accordance with that plan, to which Cardinal Ximenes would not listen, a licence to take out 4,000 negroes from Africa was obtained from Charles V., who granted it inconsiderately—a licence which was afterwards annually renewed. It is quite true that slaves had been carried over from Africa previously; but that traffic was only an insignificant trading of the Portuguese. The foundations of the slave trade were laid by the Emperor Charles and his Flemish councillors. Between that plan and the scheme now proposed there is the closest resemblance; for what is the pecuniary arrangement offered by the French Government? The terms proposed to those negroes are 9s. a month, and it is said that negroes having been purchased and liberated on the African coast will immediately have their minds opened to the nature of an indenture of apprenticeship, will immediately enter into such indentures and go on board ship to be conveyed to the West Indies at wages of 12 francs, or 9s. a month, with an allowance of provisions. Now, the negro nature is completely misunderstood by those who defend such a scheme. The negroes are naturally simple-minded and innocent—but they are possessed almost, as were the ancient Egyptians, with an absolute horror of the sea. That feeling was always rooted in their nature, even before the commencement of the slave trade, and it had gathered additional strength from that infernal traffic and the middle passage connected with it. To propose, therefore, to free negroes to emigrate from Africa and cross the ocean is one of the wildest schemes which ever a perverted imagination conceived. It is said that the Kroomen, who are free negroes, eagerly offer their labour; and that therefore it is natural to presume other negroes will be ready to leave their country. But what are the inducements which must be held out to those Kroomen before they would consent to go on board ship? Upon that subject I have the benefit of information both from Mr. Fitzpatrick, who has had great experience in Africa, and from the paymaster of one of Her Majesty's ships upon that coast, and from their statements I can inform your Lordships what wages are necessary to tempt the Kroomen to go on board ship. Why, their engagements are only temporary; they are paid 19 or 20 dollars a month, or something like 2s. 6d. a day, and not 3d. or 4d., as M. Regis offers; and then they will only ship themselves upon condition that they shall only work upon the coast, that they shall be allowed to land when they please, and when the ship leaves the coast the Kroomen invariably leave the ship. When my noble Friend (Earl Grey)—whose absence on the present occasion I very greatly regret—was in office, he was very much pressed to sanction some scheme of negro emigration; much stress was laid on the benefits which would accrue to the Africans themselves by such an emigration; the Kroomen were quoted, and great stress was laid upon the want of labour in some of the colonies. My noble Friend was much disposed to countenance a scheme having for its object the promotion of the emigration of free labour, provided it could be carried into effect without danger of the revival of the slave trade in another shape. Accordingly, his Lordship employed a very intelligent officer to proceed in a steamer to the coast of Africa, and to make inquiries whether it were possible to procure really free emigrants. Earl Grey found it was impracticable to try the experiment, and although the colonists were very anxious for what they called "the removal of obstacles to the emigration of free labourers," his Lordship must have perceived that as what they desired under this phrase was buying slaves, in order to liberate and transport them, it was neither more nor less than the suspension of the Abolition Act, which made the purchase of negroes, even for the purpose of liberating them, an offence punishable by transportation, and he most properly refused to listen to any such proposition. Now, with regard to the alleged want of hands in the colonies, what is the real cause of it? I will read to your Lordships an extract from a letter written by Mr. Clark, a gentleman who has lived in Jamaica for twenty years, relating to that subject. Mr. Clark in that letter, which is dated June the 4th, 1855, states:—

Lord Brougham

"Agriculture and commerce are now looking up. The proprietors of estates who were wise and able enough to carry on their estates during the season of low prices are now getting large returns; and (he goes on to say) still, notwithstanding the price of produce having more than doubled, the labourers are almost everywhere compelled to work at the same rate as when it was at the lowest ebb—9d. and 1s. a-day. The papers have, however, taken the matter up, and I hope that ere long 1s. 3d. and 1s. 6d. will be paid, without any agitation or strike on their part. There is again the old cry for immigration, especially from Africa; whereas our planters, who treat the people fairly and kindly, are getting all the labour they require, and if more be wanted they have but to increase the rate of wages, and their wants will be supplied more abundantly than by the importation of thousands of immigrants."

In reply to the question as to whence those negroes were to come, we are at once informed that there are many at present working on the provision grounds or on small farms and gardens, in raising produce for the market, who would work on the plantations if their wages were increased to 15d. or 18d. a day. As to obtaining negroes from Africa, I at once admit that there would be no difficulty on this head. Only let it be known that so many pounds sterling will be given for each slave in order to liberate him—only let it be known to the native chiefs that any captives taken in war will be ransomed, and I will answer for it that numbers of slaves will be brought for purchase, and that then, under the pretence of an indenture of apprenticeship, they will be carried across the sea to the new world. Captives, as well as home-born slaves, there will be in plenty. In order to supply a sufficient number of captives to be ransomed, wars will be undertaken by the native chiefs for the express purpose of taking prisoners and bringing them down to the coast for sale to the "emigration" companies. It was said by Mr. Pitt—and God forbid that ever again there should be cause for its being repeated—"Alas! you treat human beings as merchandise, and yet you do not give them the common benefit of the principle of all commerce, that the supply suits itself to the demand." Would that the voice of that great man could now ring through those walls, and put down each attempt to revive the African slave trade! "Ubi, Pansa, illa tua vox quæ populum Romanum monere solebat, nihil homini foedius servitute!" Although the natural character of the negro is simple and innocent, yet all who have visited the country agree in saying that the African princes, and chiefly on account of this execrable traffic, have been inured to blood in a degree confined, I really believe, to that quarter of the globe. But the abolition of that abominable traffic has been attended with the best results on the African continent. Mr. Fitzpatrick tells me, "that on the death of the Queen Mother in one of those States, some seventy years ago, 150 persons were murdered on her grave," while, as if showing the softening effect of the suppression of the slave trade, when her son died a short time back there was a notification that there would be no human sacrifice at all. Mr. Fitzpatrick congratulating the reigning Prince on this salutary change in African customs, which he attributes to the abolition of the slave trade, received a friendly answer with a present. Nor is this the only change. To the criminal traffic, or rather to the felony, has succeeded legitimate and innocent commerce. Great and even rapid progress has been made, and the exportation of produce from Africa to this country now amounts to above £2,000,000 sterling; that is to say, such is the value of the goods sent from this country to be exchanged against the produce of legitimate industry. In the article of palm oil, the principal article of that commerce on the Gold Coast, the export is upwards of £1,500,000. This is the industry, this the commerce we are called upon to interrupt; this is the scene we were desired to darken; this is the prospect which we are told it was our duty to cut off—the prospect of improvement in trade, in the arts of peace, and in civilization. It is this we are asked to stop, by sending men to purchase slaves under the pretence of ransoming captives taken in the wars which must of necessity be caused by the inducements which we hold out for the express purpose of making those captives, in order that they may be sold to us and carried away. I have cited the authority of Mr. Fitzpatrick, I will now read a letter from him, which more than confirms the opinions which I have expressed. That gentleman says:—

Lord Brougham

“The Africans are not a migratory people. If they were free to-morrow, and capable of understanding this contract for ten years’ expatriation and servitude,” which I need not tell your Lordships the poor African can no more comprehend than he could a problem in the higher geometry, “they would much rather become slaves in their own country than enter into it. The Kroomen, though fond of earning money to take back to their own country after a short absence, and though tempted on board our cruisers by pay amounting to from 8 dollars to 12 dollars per month, with full rations or their money value equal to 7 dollars more per month, and employment on the element on which they are at home, will not enter into lengthened service; and to suppose that they would be induced by a promise of 12½ francs per month to go to a distant country for ten years is absurd. The MM. Regis, however, propose to purchase the slave’s freedom on condition of his at once emigrating for ten years’ service in the French West Indies, and thus to establish a system of free emigration. It is difficult, I think, to discover in this plan the punctum temporis in which the subject of the operation is free. It merely provides a change of masters, with this peculiarity, that the new master and his country are to be far away in regions of which the African never dreamed; and to slavery, I apprehend, it is honours not enchantments which are lent by distance. It is idle to suppose that a poor African slave will look forward to his freedom and a return to his country after ten years’ service. It is a theory far too complex for his simple understanding. The slave then will not contract for a new and strange master in a distant land. But I am free to confess the master will; and, moreover, he will perform his part of the contract. When his own stock is exhausted he will prey upon his neighbours; he will steal and kidnap and panyar, and those who have the requisite establishments will go out a-hunting. The King of Dahomey will take out both his packs—his male and female ‘dogs of war’—and every petit chief will do the like.”

Mr. Fitzpatrick then states that great improvement has taken place among the African princes, and, adding that the most difficult of all things was to teach the natives a regard for truth, says—is that it has all the appearance of a false pretence. No African will believe that a depôt to receive emigrants at Whydah is anything but a barracoon for slaves.”

“One of the objections to this emigration scheme

I have received similar testimony from Mr. Forster, a highly respectable person connected with the African trade. He takes precisely the same view of the subject, and has printed his opinions in the newspapers. Having complained that he had been misrepresented on account of having mentioned the probable fate of a slave who refused to go voluntarily on board ship, he continues:—

“What I said referred to his treatment in the hands of the native slave dealer before he is shipped, after he has been brought to the coast and sold.

“I deny that the native African is cruelly treated at home before he is sold. The natives of Africa are not a cruel people in their natural and social relations. I will undertake to say there are fewer murders among them in proportion to the population than there are in this country.

“If the slave trade is to be revived in this new form, it may just as well be revived in its old shape. The consequences will be quite as bad—nay, in some respects, worse. A limited demand in the way proposed would bring more slaves from the interior than were wanted, and they would be starved in barracoons, while it would unsettle the minds of the people, and disturb and destroy legitimate trade as much as an unlimited traffic under the old system.”

I have not dwelt upon that which presents itself as an insuperable difficulty in the way of this scheme for the emigration of Africans,—I mean the impossibility of taking precautions which shall give us a chance—I do not say a reasonable prospect, but even a chance—of preventing the occurrence of the grossest abuse, the most cruel evils in the course of the transport of the negroes. When we remember that no person, no free English subject is allowed to embark on board a vessel going to Canada, or any other of our own settlements, without the greatest care being taken to examine her fittings, her stowage, her accommodation for the number of passengers proposed to be received on board, her provisions, and the medical attendance which has been provided, and, above all, to see that no more than the specified number are taken on board; and when we find that so strictly is this guarded by law that the severest penalties are inflicted in the case of any shipment of free English subjects on board an English merchant vessel, except at a port where there is a custom-house and a staff of officers to make these preliminary investigations, we must at once perceive the uselessness of any attempt to conduct on the coast of Africa a traffic of this sort, and to transport not intelligent Englishmen, but half-civilized, or less than half-civilized Africans from one distant country to another.

I do not think that I have anything to add upon the general question; but I cannot conclude what I have to press upon your Lordships in behalf of the claims of Africa, without recalling to your recollection the opinions and the feelings of Mr. Pitt on this subject. Great as his authority is with some of you on many subjects, on this it must by all be admitted to have peculiar weight, and to deserve the greatest attention—I may say the most profound respect. Of all the speeches marked by his majestic eloquence—of all the speeches with which he astonished and delighted his hearers, his celebrated oration upon the abolition of the slave trade, delivered in 1791, holds the first place. Some persons may think that his renowned declamation upon the breaking out of the war in 1803 equals, but it certainly does not surpass it. In that speech Mr. Pitt sums up the atonement which he trusted we were about to make for our long and cruel injustice to Africa. He expressed his hope that in the evening of her days she was about to enjoy those blessings which had descended upon us at an earlier period of the world's history, and he closed with these memorable words:—

"This great and happy change to be effected in the state of her inhabitants is of all the various and important benefits of the abolition, in my estimation, incomparably the most extensive and the most important."

Some years later I heard him upon the question of a grant to the colony of Sierra Leone, to which objections were taken on a false principle of economy, express his earnest hope and even confidence that the day would come when Africa would take her place in the scale of nations, and enter on a new and splendid career, free in herself and freed forever from the curse of that execrable traffic which had wasted her energies and destroyed her peace. My Lords, I now move my Resolution:—

"That the Encouragement of Emigration of Negroes from the African Coast to the West Indies by the Purchase or Liberation of Slaves or the Ransom of Prisoners taken in War, even when this may not be held illegal, has a direct Tendency to promote the Internal Slave Trade of Africa, and to obstruct the Progress of its inhabitants in the Arts of Peace and the Course of Civilization."

Motion agreed to, Nemine Dissentiente.

Then it was moved—

"That a humble Address be presented to Her
Lord Brougham

Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to withhold her Countenance from all such Schemes among her Subjects, and will use her best endeavours with Her Majesty's Allies for engaging them to discontinue all Project which have a Tendency to promote African emigration by any Means directly or indirectly connected with the Purchase of Slaves or Ransom of Captives taken in War."

Agreed to, Nemine Dissentiente.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON said, he would not attempt to follow his noble and learned Friend through all the details of the able speech with which he had prefaced his Motion, but he need scarcely assure him and all men that he concurred in every word that had fallen from his noble and learned Friend in deprecation of any attempt calculated to promote the revival of the slave trade. His noble and learned Friend had accurately stated the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, as traced with great correctness the course of the proceedings which had taken place in this transaction. He thought that his noble and learned Friend had done more than justice to the Emperor of the French, and he must add to the French Government also, who, he was convinced were as incapable of intentionally giving encouragement, direct or indirect, to the revival of that abominable traffic as we were ourselves. But he rejoiced that his noble and learned Friend had brought forward the Motion in the eloquent and impressive manner which had marked his noble and learned Friend's address, because, as all the world knew, his noble and learned Friend had for a long series of years—sixty years, as he had himself told their Lordships—been the indefatigable friend of the African negro and the successful champion of the natural rights of that race. Therefore any opinion of his noble and learned Friend on this subject would necessarily be received with respect and attention abroad, as well as at home, and there as well as here it would be felt that he would not have brought the question before their lordships in the solemn and formal manner of asking them to concur in an Address to the Crown, if he had not seen some cause for apprehension and alarm in the proceedings to which he had called attention. He (the Earl of Clarendon) hoped their Lordships would agree to the Address for which his noble and learned Friend had moved, because it could not but strengthen the hands of her Majesty's Government; though he could assure their Lordships that that was not required as a stimulus to them, for—so far from the subject having escaped their attention—so far from there being any intention on their part to lend themselves to the project his noble and learned Friend so much deprecated—he assured his noble and learned Friend that it had been a matter of constant and confidential communication between the two Governments, and that no effort of her Majesty's Government would be wanting to prevent the establishment of such a state of things as his noble and learned Friend had shadowed forth, and to check the slave trade by every means in their power. But France, like ourselves, having abolished slavery in her colonies, had experienced, as we had, great inconvenience from want of labour, and she now proposed to supply that want by the importation of negroes as free labourers—but without renewing the slave trade, or giving any encouragement either to the kidnapper or the slave dealer. The French Government had been perfectly frank in all their proceedings—they had never disguised either what they intended to do, or what they had done. So long ago as 1853 they informed her Majesty's Government that it was their intention to purchase slaves from the West Coast of Africa—emancipate them immediately, and then introduce them as free labourers into their colonies, where they were to earn wages, and their lot would be greatly superior to that in which they had been previously placed. But we at once represented to them, that before slaves could be sold they must be made, for it was altogether a mistake to suppose that slavery was the general condition of the African race—that it was true slavery existed, and slaves were employed by the African chiefs for their own purposes, but not in greater numbers than was sufficient for those purposes; and that if slaves were sold by them, the additional number must be provided by kidnapping or internal wars, waged by one tribe against another. And we pointed out also that it would be difficult to make the chiefs understand where the difference would lie between selling slaves to French speculators for exportation to the French colonies, and selling them to the slave trader, to be afterwards sold to the planter at Cuba—and to explain to them why the one transaction was to be encouraged and the other punished with the penalty of piracy. The French Government always contended that they would only import free labourers—because slavery having ceased to exist in the French territory, all negroes imported there must be necessarily de facto free. But in answer to that argument we observed, that if France established the system she contemplated, other countries in which slavery was not abolished might have recourse to it—they might pretend to import Africans as free labourers; and if the system were adopted by France with our concurrence, we should lose the right and the power to protest and prevent its being acted upon by those other countries of whose institutions slavery was still a part. The French Government then said that they would endeavour to make an experiment of the immigration of free labourers; and, in the first attempt that was made, we saw great reason to fear the consequences my noble and learned Friend has suggested, and we again brought the subject before the French Government, and they informed us of all the precautions they were taking to prevent it. They told us that the persons who had got the licence from the French Government, MM. Regis, would have to deal only with the negroes born freemen, or such as had been free for a long time—that they had ascertained that such persons might be obtained, who were willing to labour for wages, and for a limited time; and that one condition of the contract was, that they should be restored to their native country when the period of service was expired. And they further said, that the system they proposed would be guarded by the same precautions as had been taken by the English Government, when they sought to introduce free labour into their West India colonies. That was, no doubt, perfectly true; but then we informed the French Government that we had abandoned the practice, and considered the continuance of it impossible, for the reasons which my noble and learned friend has quoted; that we found on all those parts of the coast of Africa where slavery did not exist, so few negroes disposed to emigrate, that it was utterly futile to depend upon labour from that source; but a greater reason for abandoning the system was, that we found it gave rise to erroneous impressions abroad, and amongst the Africans themselves it was supposed that we were about again to give encouragement to the slave trade; and, in one instance, a chief actually made war upon a neighbouring village, and captured the inhabitants, in the hope and expectation that he could dispose of his captives to us. Another case occurred on the coast of Mozambique, and that place being under the French flag we brought the matter to the knowledge of the French Government, by whom peremptory orders were sent out. Ten minutes ago he (the Earl of Clarendon) had received a communication from the Admiralty, containing a despatch from Commodore Trotter, which contained a passage confirming the view of the Government as to the course proposed by the French Government, and stating that the French consul at Mozambique not only thoroughly objected to the system as a revival of the slave trade under another form, but as contrary to the orders he had received. He (the Earl of Clarendon) mentioned these facts to show that the subject had had the constant attention of her Majesty's Government, and that it was the intention of the French Government to inform them fairly and openly of all their proceedings. With regard to the Kroomen, the experiment had been tried by us and had failed; but he did not know that he was therefore entitled to say that it would not succeed with the French people. He had in his hand a placard which the gentlemen who first undertook the speculation had caused to be very extensively placarded in Sierra Leone, containing the conditions on which the Kroomen were to be engaged, and he must say that if those conditions could be honestly carried out, he could see no objection to them. This placard stated that the labourers were to be provided with clothes, proper food, medicines, and medical attendance during the voyage—a certain quantity of water per man—that they were to be employed for six years at stated wages, and that at the end of that period they were to be sent back to their homes free of expense, unless they preferred to remain under a new agreement. But though we were not entitled to say that this project, as regarded the Kroomen, must necessarily be a failure, or protest against it on that ground, he nevertheless entertained the same doubt and apprehension with regard to it as his noble and learned Friend did to the proposal for importing labourers from other parts of the African coast. He had never yet heard that there was any disposition on the part of the Kroomen, or the Africans of other parts of the coast to leave their country for the sake of employment. If, then, the system was to be carried out, it would require the greatest caution and watchfulness on the part of the French Government as well as of our own. And, in conclusion he would renew the assurance that, if it should be found to be attended with the consequences which his noble and learned Friend expected, Her Majesty's Government would not hesitate to bring the fact under the notice of the French Government, and he could not doubt that that Government, judging from the course they had already pursued, would never consent to the prostitution of the French flag to cover any proceeding which would have a tendency to revive the slave trade or slavery in any form.

The Earl of Clarendon

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, that it would be wasting their Lordships' time if he were to occupy it by proving that our illustrious ally, the Emperor of the French, was not likely to evade the treaties made with this country in respect to the slave trade, and that he was sure to follow on this subject the example of the illustrious man the first of his name. It would be equally a waste of their time if he was to say that he thought that any attempt like that described by his noble and learned Friend opposite would not be fraught with danger; or that if it were carried out in the manner stated, it might not re-open the trade which we had just put down at so great a sacrifice of time, money, and blood. But while giving all the admiration possible to the noble and learned Lord, who had devoted a long life to purposes of humanity and usefulness, he thought it was natural that he should be carried away more than any other man by apprehensions to a certain degree on this point. But he must remind the House that those who had had experience of the coast of Africa, whether as governors of colonies or as commanders of Her Majesty's ships, did not entirely agree with the statements made by the noble and learned Lord. They agreed that if any attempt were made to purchase slaves on the southern coast of Africa that would lead to slavery; but they did not agree that the experiment would be equally hopeless if it were tried with Kroomen. These people inhabited a tract of country 500 miles in length, extending from Cape Palmas to Sierra Leone, and to their capabilities as emigrants he had his attention called only the day previously by Sir Henry Huntley, who had been for several years governor of Gambia, and had also for several years commanded one or other of Her Majesty's ships engaged in suppressing the slave trade. That gentleman felt, as he (the Earl of Malmesbury) did, what a boon it would be to America and Africa if we could devise some scheme by which an outlet could be provided for the inhabitants of the latter, and their progress in civilization could be promoted by bringing them in contact with superior races, while the millions of acres we possessed on the former continent could at the same time be brought into cultivation. Sir Henry Huntley, he need hardly say, had no less horror of the slave trade than any noble Lord present, but he believed that by promoting emigration amongst them we ran no risk of reviving its horrors. In this view he was confirmed by the evidence given by Captain Denman before the House of Commons, in which it was stated that the Kroomen never made slaves nor dealt in them, and that the Spaniards alleged that they would die rather than be made slaves. He would read to their Lordships some portions of the statement with which Sir Henry Huntley had furnished him upon this subject:

"The Kroomen come in small canoes from their country, 500 miles, to Sierra Leone, in search of labour. They are employed up the river Sierra Leone, Mellacoree, and other rivers, by the merchants to cut and prepare timber for shipping to England. They enter also on board merchant ships trading along the coast, and also those trading in the rivers for palm oil. They frequently assist in navigating vessels, which have lost men by fever, &c., to England. I know an instance of thirty going to England in a leaky vessel to help at the pumps. At Fernando Po upwards of 350 were employed by an English company to cut timber—very fine teak wood—stipulating to be sent home every third year; their wages varied from 3*d.* to 10*d.* per diem. They received pay in merchandise. Ships of war always have Kroomen on board on the coast of Africa; so many, according to the size of the ship. They are paid in the Royal navy as sailors. Kroomen are employed, I believe, at the Island of Ascension, about 900 miles from their country; they never object to go to the Cape of Good Hope in ships of war. Captured slaves, called by us the 'liberated Africans,' with very few exceptions, have been found useless when employed on board ships of war; merchant ships will not take them; they are lazy, and demand high wages."

That gentleman had also furnished him with the following suggestions for regulating the employment of Kroomen in the British West Indies:—

"1. Kroomen to be shipped at no place in Africa but Sierra Leone.

"2. Kroomen shipped for the West Indies must be registered at Sierra Leone, and also in the West Indies upon arrival.

"3. Certain ports in the West Indies to be named for the reception of Kroomen.

"4. Kroomen never to be taken to the West Indies upon speculation of being employed.

"5. Before a ship can sail to get Kroomen for the West Indies, the owners to make application for a licence at the ——— office in England, showing a demand for a certain number, and naming in it the property upon which they are to be employed in the West Indies. Copy of the demand and licence to be sent to the registrar at Sierra Leone.

"6. Ships intended to carry Kroomen to the West Indies to be fitted with propeller, and apparatus for obtaining fresh water from sea water.

"7. Tonnage of ship to regulate number of Kroomen carried on board.

"8. Kroomen in no case to be subject to corporal punishment—(magistrates or registrars should regulate between employer and man).

"9. No registrar in chief to be appointed but from England—he may appoint deputies with the sanction of the ——— office in England.

"10. Kroomen not to be transferred or let out on hire in the West Indies, nor allowed to work upon any property excepting that named in the licence, without the sanction of the registrar in chief and consent of the Kroomen."

Considering the respect due to the authority of Sir Henry Huntley, he had thought it right to put the House in possession of his opinions; because, although it would be superfluous to say that he was as much alarmed at any project like that described by his noble and learned Friend as he could be, still he should consider the subject in every light, and turn it over again and again before he despaired of opening Africa to communication with the more civilised quarters of the globe and abandoned it to its present barbarism.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY believed that if the proposed emigration were confined to the Kroomen it would be perfectly safe; but it was very difficult to induce the Kroomen to leave their own country. They were a people who never made slaves of others, and who were unwilling to be made slaves themselves; and it was their habit to go away from home, but not for more than two years at a time. One result of the investigation before a Select Committee of the other House of which he was a Member was, that this was the only race of Africans who could be transferred to our West Indian colonies without the danger of an immediate renewal of the slave trade. To show the light in which this system was likely to be viewed by the native chiefs in Africa, he would take the liberty of reading the copy of a very curious letter sent by the King of Calabar in answer to a British merchant who had written to His Majesty to know whether any of his people would engage themselves as free labourers. The letter was as follows:—

“ Old Calabar, June 5, 1850.

“ Dear Sir,—I received your kind letter by the Magistrate, through Captain Todd, and by your wish I now write you to say, we be glad for supply you with slaves. I hav spoken with King Archibury, and all Calabar gentleman, and be very glade to do the sam. Regard to free emigration we man no will go for himself. We shall buy them alsam we do that time slave trade bin. We be very glad for them man to come back again to Calabar; but I fear that time they go for West Indies he no will com back her. We have all agreed to charges four boxes of brass and copper rod for man, woman, and children, but shall not be able to supply the quantity you mention. I think we shall be able to get 400 or 500 for one vessel, and be able to load her in three or four months, for we cannot get them all ready to wait for the ship. She will have to com and tak them on board as they com. We have no place on shore to keep them. The ship will have to pay convey to me and Archibury, but no other gentlemen—say, 10,000 copper for earch town in cloth or any other article of trad. I shall be very glad if the term I mention will suit you, for we shall not be able to do it at a less price, and man to be paid for with rods. I shall be very glad when you write me again to mak arrangements with your captain what tim the ship must come, hoping you are quite well, beleave me to be,

“ My dear Sir, your humble servant,

“ Eyo HONESTY KING.”

This letter showed that the system would be but another form of the slave trade, and that the so-called free labourers would be bought and sold. No doubt the horrors of “the middle passage” could be prevented by the proper regulation of the vessels employed in conveying the negroes; and after the labourer arrived in a colony in which slavery had been abolished he would no longer be the victim of oppression. Yet, on the coast of Africa the effect of the plan would be to revive the gambling spirit engendered by the slave trade, together with all the atrocities connected with the capture of slaves in the interior, while the course of peaceful commerce and agriculture, now extending rapidly over the shores of Africa, would be entirely arrested.

LORD BROUGHAM briefly replied, quoting the favourite organ of the slave party in the Carolinas, to show that the slaveholders in America regarded the example proposed to be set by England and France in the matter of the exportation of “free” negroes from Africa, as an encouragement and a justification for them to procure as many slaves as they chose for the Southern States. The enforcement of any contract for wages would be entirely within the jurisdiction of the slave state in which the negro was located; and it was easy to see what would become of the “freedom” of the African emigrant in the event of any legal dispute arising.

The Earl of Harrowby

Motion agreed to, Nemine Dissentiente.

JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES BILL.

THIRD READING. BILL PASSED.

Bill read 3<sup>a</sup> (according to order), with the Amendments.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that while he was opposed to giving priority to any judgment creditor of joint-stock banks, which it was the object of this Bill to prevent, yet his attention had been called to the question of registered judgments in Ireland, which operated as mortgages on the estate. A creditor in Ireland on obtaining a judgment and registering it, became a mortgagee, and it appeared hard to take his mortgage from him. To meet this case he proposed that the rights of such creditors should be preserved unless they chose to give up their judgments, or that the mortgage should be taken in full satisfaction of their debt, so as not to enable them to compete with other creditors. He proposed, therefore, that there should be a clause inserted after the 10th clause to the effect “That nothing in the Act should apply to or affect the rights of creditors, unless with their consent, who had obtained judgments in Ireland which had been duly registered.”

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, that the operation of the clause would unjustly affect the interests of those creditors who in the case of the Tipperary Bank, having found that the Winding-up Act was powerless to bring about a compromise, had sought the only remedy which was open to them, and had registered judgments against individual shareholders. That proceeding upon their part had been pronounced by the Court of Exchequer in Ireland to be perfectly legal, and it was therefore manifestly unfair that they should be called upon to pay back into the common fund the dividend of 2s. which they had succeeded in obtaining.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that no doubt this was ex post facto legislation, and deprived some parties of rights which they might have acquired; but it was intended to put an end to an interminable system of litigation, and the only question now was whether these registered judgments should have priority over others. On the face of it that was somewhat doubtful; but in consequence of the peculiar state of the law in Ireland, which made these judgments act as mortgages on an estate, it would be unjust to deprive those who had obtained these judgments of them; but it was also equitable and just that if they had this advantage, those registered judgment creditors ought not to have the advantage of the dividend which had been paid.

Amendment agreed to; clause added to the Bill; Amendments made; Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

House adjourned at Eight o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, July 17, 1857.

MINUTES.] NEW WRIT.—For Woodstock, v. The Marquess of Blandford, now Duke of Marlborough.

PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Oxford University.

2° Turnpike Acts Continuance; Land and Assessed Taxes &c. (Scotland) Acts Amendment; Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act Amendment; Illicit Distillation (Ireland).

LUNATICS (SCOTLAND) BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read. House in Committee.

Clauses 17 to 93 agreed to.

Clause 94 struck out.

Clauses 95 to 107 agreed to.

Clause 108.

MR. STIRLING said, he must object to the manner in which this Bill, containing 109 clauses, was presented to the House. It ought to have a tabular index and table of contents, as it would greatly facilitate reference and perusal by hon. Members.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he would give the necessary directions for that purpose when the Bill was reprinted.

THE LORD ADVOCATE then proposed the following supplemental Clause:—

“If it shall appear to the Secretary for the Home Department to be necessary for the discharge of the duties imposed by this Act, he shall have power to appoint, for such period as he shall think fit, one or more medical persons, not exceeding two in all, to be Deputy Commissioners under this Act; and such Deputy Commissioners shall receive a salary not exceeding £500 per annum each, to be paid in like manner, and out of the like fund, as the other salaries payable under this Act; provided always, that no such appointment shall subsist after the expiration of five years from the passing of this Act, and such Deputy Commissioner shall have such of the powers and perform such duties as the Board may direct.”

MR. BUCHANAN said, the intended appointment of these persons was quite unknown to the Scotch Members. He thought that, altogether, the passing of this Bill had been too much hurried. There was no unanimity as to the machinery of the measure, but some pressure seemed to have been put upon the Scotch Members in respect to legislation on the subject.

THE LORD ADVOCATE observed that, instead of proceeding too hurriedly, they had been more than ten years employed in the work of legislation. He should have thought that the House had greatly failed in its duty if some attempt had not been made in the present Session to remedy the evils at present existing in the system.

MR. BLACKBURN observed that he thought the House had delayed too long and hurried too much at last in legislating upon this subject.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he quite agreed with the Lord Advocate. The neglect that had taken place with regard to lunatics had brought reproach upon Scotland, and if something had not been done this year, he believed there were Members in the House who would have compelled legislation in the matter.

MR. SCOTT remarked that he thought the subject required early legislation and mature deliberation, whereas there had been late legislation and very little consideration.

MR. BUCHANAN explained that he had not meant to say that no legislation ought to have taken place this year; he only contended that the House had been too much hurried at last.

Clause agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

MR. STIRLING said, he begged to give notice that he would move the omission of the proposition for the exemption of Shetland on the bringing up of the Report.

House resumed; Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Monday next.

BURIAL ACTS AMENDMENT BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause 16 agreed to.

bring the authority of the House in collision with the authority of the law. He wished to ask the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) to what day he meant to postpone his Motion, because so long as it remained upon the paper, it must occasion some anxiety.

VISCOUNT GALWAY said, he had inadvertently made use of the expression two hours, but he meant to imply that had the Committee sat for two hours longer on Thursday, they might have finished the business, whereas by the postponement, they had to examine another witness, who was not present on that day, and was only produced this morning.

MR. CHEETHAM said, his right hon. Friend had stated to him his reason for wishing that an adjournment should take place, and the counsel engaged in the case expressed their willingness to accede to the suggestion.

MR. ROEBUCK : I wish to notice an observation made by the noble Lord (Viscount Galway). He said if he had known the object with which the adjournment was proposed, he would have divided the Committee. It is clear, therefore, that the division would have taken place, not on account of the parties concerned, but on account of the feeling of the noble Lord with regard to a particular question. Not knowing the precise object for which the adjournment was desired, the noble Lord made no difficulty in assenting to it ; but if he had been aware of that object, he would have opposed the proposal. It is clear, therefore, the object of the meeting would have been the only ground on which the noble Lord would have opposed the adjournment. It is clear, for the fact is ascertained, that when the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Horsman), the chairman of the Committee, proposed the adjournment, he did so in the hearing of the counsel and the parties. The noble Lord (Viscount Galway) has insinuated—for he has not openly stated—that counsel assented to the adjournment for their own private interests. I say the noble Lord has cast a slur upon those counsel which he had no right to cast upon them [A laugh]. This may be a laughing matter to the noble Lord. You pelt frogs ; it is an amusement to you, but it is death to them. [A laugh]. It may be an amusement to the noble Lord to cast reflections upon honourable men who get their bread by intellectual labour. I say the imputation of the noble Lord was not justified. I don't know the names of any of the counsel engaged in the case. I say that it being clear the parties to the inquiry were present when the adjournment was suggested, that it was made in their hearing, and in the hearing of their counsel, that they assented to it, and that, as has been stated by the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Horsman), neither party has been subjected to one shilling's expense in consequence of the adjournment, the noble Lord's assumption that the adjournment was improper, is wholly attributable to his having subsequently discovered the object of that adjournment. He was not careful of the interests of the parties until his own feelings were concerned.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD : I do not think it is either the interest or the wish of the House to prolong this discussion, but as a member of the Committee I wish to state, that I believe the facts are these :—The right hon. Gentleman communicated to the members of the Committee, who sat near him, the object for which he desired an adjournment. All I heard passing in the Committee, and all my noble Friend heard, was, that the right hon. Gentleman addressing us said, " It is quite impossible for me to attend to-morrow." The right hon. Gentleman repeated that statement with considerable emphasis. I must say, when that language was used, I for one supposed there was some insurmountable obstacle to the right hon. Gentleman's attendance. I supposed he had some engagement in connection with public business in this House, or at least of extreme importance, and that he therefore felt it necessary to the parties and to his colleagues to adjourn under the peculiar circumstances of the case. I do not think that anyone would have anticipated from the right hon. Gentleman's language, that his only object was to preside over a public meeting. I may further say that while under any circumstances I should be unwilling to put parties to the extreme inconvenience and expense which the adjournment of an inquiry must occasion, I certainly would not have consented to the adjournment in this case, if I had known the ground upon which it was proposed, whatever the object of the public meeting might have been. It is perfectly true that the parties to the inquiry, as well as my noble Friend and myself, consented to the adjournment ; but it was put to us almost as a matter of impossibility that the right hon. Gentleman could attend. I should not have troubled the House with these observations, if I had not felt that we are to a certain extent culpable for having assented to an adjournment upon such a ground.

MR. HORSMAN : I trust I may make one remark upon the extraordinary statement of the noble Lord. I trust the House will permit me to do so, because it is very painful to be at issue as to a matter of fact with gentlemen who ought to be so well informed as the noble Lord (Viscount Galway) and the hon. Gentleman (Mr. S. FitzGerald). I am, however, fortified by the presence of two other members of the Committee, and by my own distinct recollection and positive knowledge, when I say there is not the very smallest foundation in fact for the assertion that I stated that it was impossible for me to attend on the day in question. On the contrary, it was not until after the adjournment had been agreed to that I came out of the Committee-room, saw my friends, and consented to take the chair at the meeting, and if the slightest objection had been made to the adjournment I should not have been able to attend the meeting at all. I stated to the counsel three times over that, if it was quite for their convenience, a suggestion for an adjournment might be made, but I said not one single syllable about my attendance next day. I gave neither the counsel, the agents, nor the parties the least reason to know whether it was for my convenience, or for that of the noble Lord, or the hon. Gentleman (Mr. S. FitzGerald), or any other member of the Committee, that the adjournment should take place. I can only account for the statement now made by supposing that the hon. Gentleman and the noble Lord, after sitting so long on a scrutiny, have brought into the House a great deal of the confusion as to facts which had been displayed before the Committee.

LORD JOHN MANNERS : Is the right hon. Gentleman confining himself to an explanation ?

MR. HORSMAN : The confusion as to facts to which, after a lengthened sitting upon a scrutiny, we are very liable—I make no charge against hon. Gentlemen, but I say that such confusion as to facts may lead to assertion for which there is not the smallest foundation. No person in the Committee-room, except two hon. Gentlemen now sitting near me, knew that it was for my convenience that the adjournment took place. I feel how unfair and unjust it is to the parties that inquiries before Committee should be protracted one day longer than is absolutely requisite, or that they should be subjected to a shilling of unnecessary expense. I should be extremely sorry and unwilling to subject them to any inconvenience ; and when I stated to the parties in this case, that an adjournment might be proposed, I took care to say there was no strong wish on the part of the Committee on the subject. I told them three times over that we consulted their convenience, and their convenience only.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON then rose and said, that he thought the House could have no wish that this discussion should be continued ; and he therefore begged to put a question to the Secretary to the Treasury.

COLONEL KNOX also rose to address the House, with the apparent view of continuing the discussion, but gave way when SIR GEORGE GREY rose to order, and submitted that it was irregular on the part of the hon. and gallant Member, (Colonel Knox) to interpose between the House and the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Pakington), after the Speaker had called on the right hon. Gentleman to proceed with the question which stood on the paper in his name.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he had risen to ask his question under the full impression that it was the wish of the House to put an end to the discussion. The question to which he wished to direct their attention was one in which the convenience of hon. Members was involved to no small extent. He understood a rule had lately been made on the recommendation of the Printing Committee, by which papers presented by command of Her Majesty were no longer to be distributed to hon. Members of the House in the usual way, but were to be accessible to hon. Members on application at the Vote-office. No hon. Member could be more anxious than he was to see the expense of printing the papers of the House lessened, but he was still of opinion that if there was one thing of more importance than another in the performance of their functions as Members of that House, it was that all possible information should be accessible to them on all occasions. The hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe), had lately given notice of his intention to move for leave to bring in a Bill to repeal the existing laws respecting vaccination. The Government, on the other hand, had given notice that they were about to introduce a Bill to amend the existing law on that subject, and a most important paper in reference to the prevention of the spread of smallpox had recently been presented to the House by command of Her Majesty. Under the new rule, however, to which he had referred, that paper had not been distributed to Members in the usual way, and he himself had only heard of its existence in an incidental way. He believed, certainly, that the fact that papers had been presented was to be set forth in the Votes, but hon. Members could not, in the present pressure of public business, daily examine the Votes for the purpose of ascertaining whether they contained that particular information. He wished, therefore, to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, whether he (Sir J. Pakington) had been correctly informed as to the nature of the rule in question?

MR. WILSON said, that the rule in question had been adopted in consequence of a Report of the Printing Committee. It had not, however, been adopted on the sole authority of that committee, but in pursuance of a recommendation of a Committee of the House, of which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole) was Chairman. The object of the rule was to prevent an unnecessary outlay of public money by the distribution of papers which were in many cases never read; but if hon. Members should think that the new arrangement was productive of inconvenience it would of course be proper that it should be re-considered.

CONVEYANCE OF TROOPS TO INDIA.

OBSERVATIONS.

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE said, he wished to call the attention of the First Lord of the Admiralty to the policy of re-considering the determination as announced by him not to employ any of the screw line of battle ships in conveying a portion of the troops about to be sent to India. The subject had been alluded to a few nights ago by the hon. and gallant Admiral the Member for Southwark (Sir C. Napier) and upon that occasion the gallant Admiral and himself had exchanged broadsides; but he hoped that as that affair was over, and the smoke had blown away, neither of them would think any more about it. He (Admiral Duncombe) found we had now lying idle in harbour ten such magnificent screw line of battle ships as the Algiers, the Cæsar, the Cressy, the Duke of Wellington, the Exmouth, the Hannibal, the James Watt, the Majestic, the Nile, and the St. Jean d'Acre, together with several first-class frigates; and as, with one exception, the whole of those ships were at war, and therefore in perfect order and condition, he imagined that it would be required to conveyance of troops which he thought it and proper to employ that the number of ships proceeded to India would be required in the Admiralty deserved a purchase of the Arm they had five or six had not he would say that it would be a score of economy, a screw line of battle ships had suggested. But ships would take an arrangement in even more convenient than sending in different sailing would also be much to room and other the long voyage. such a squadron would have a great strong body of sea might be made a agency. He had attention of the First to this subject, in the hon. Baronet might consider the determination by him, and employ an experiment.

MR. BENTINCK take this opportunity of the House with a few of two answers given, by the noble the Government and the Admiralty. The answers combined was about to be left state by sea and state of things was occurred in by the question to which his hon. and gallant for Southwark (Sir First Lord of the Admiralty) were any steam or troops to China, I said there were not say there was not ship of the line in troops to India. I added that "He had stated on more than one occasion that he had given up the idea of maintaining a home squadron. The ships in commission were all calculated for home defence, and not for the conveyance of troops."

Sir John Pakington

Now he (Mr. Bentinck) ventured to assert that the ships in commission at our ports at home were as ill-adapted for the purposes of defence as for carrying troops; and he, therefore, contended that the country possessed no adequate maritime defences at the present moment. The other question was put by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli). The right hon. Gentleman asked the noble Lord what were the intentions of the Government with respect to the calling out of the militia in the present year. The answer was one of the most remarkable ever given by a Prime Minister. He (Mr. Bentinck) thought some of the sentences so remarkable that he took them down, and he should no doubt be corrected if he did not quote them correctly. The noble Lord said that there was no intention of calling out the militia this year, because he considered the two previous years' training rendered it unnecessary for the purpose of maintaining the discipline of those corps. But the noble Lord then went on to say—

MR. SPEAKER called the attention of the hon. Gentleman to its being contrary to the rules of the House to refer to answers given by hon. Members on a former evening, and to read those answers in the House in the same Session.

MR. BENTINCK said, he would bow with the utmost deference to the Speaker's decision, but he was very much mistaken if he had not frequently heard the rule infringed. He must throw himself upon the indulgence of the House to allow him to state the substance of what fell from the noble Lord. He would not attempt to read what the noble Lord said, but the substance was that, although he was not prepared to call out the militia in the present year, if anything had happened in Europe which had threatened to involve this country in a war with any European power, and which rendered it probable that we should have to provide for the defence of the country —

MR. SPEAKER again reminded the hon. Member that he was infringing one of the rules of debate in referring in so direct a manner to passages of former debates. It was contrary to the established rule of the House.

MR. BENTINCK said, he was at a loss to know how he was to introduce the subject, which was one of the utmost importance, if he were not allowed to advert to anything which had fallen from the noble Lord. He did not see how he could possibly go on unless he were allowed so far to refer to the statements of the noble Lord, as to call attention to what he conceived to be objectionable and dangerous doctrines promulgated by the noble Lord.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the hon. Member could state his opinion upon anything which had fallen from the noble Lord.

MR. ROEBUCK: Suppose he said "so and so."

MR. BENTINCK, for the purpose of putting himself in order, then, he would imagine that the noble Lord said that, "If anything had happened in Europe which had threatened to involve this country in a war with any European Power, and which rendered it probable that we should have occasion to provide for the defence of the country, it might have been necessary to call out the militia." The noble Lord went on to say—[Cries of "Order!"] If the noble Lord went on to say, as he conceived it possible he might, that he imagined there was no probability or possibility of any such contingency of European disturbance, and if the noble Lord gave that as a reason for not calling out the militia this year, he contended that the noble Lord would have held doctrines most dangerous to the safety of the country. He assumed, for the sake of argument only, that the noble Lord had held such opinions, and he appealed to the House whether such opinions, coupled with the answer of the First Lord of the Admiralty, did not substantiate his statement that this country was to be left without defences by sea or land? The noble Lord rested his case solely upon the ground that there was no apparent probability of disturbances in Europe. It would be extremely indiscreet to go into details as to the various causes which might lead to collision between this country and a great European Power. But he thought the House would agree with him that, whatever the apparent security, the snap of one pistol might destroy that security and place this country in hostile collision with one of the most powerful antagonists with whom she could have to contend. He asked the House whether it was reasonable to leave the country totally without the means of defence both by sea and land—whether it was rational for the Government to trust to the chapter of accidents for security? He would place it on a mere commercial basis, and ask whether it was not perfect insanity to leave the country at the mercy of the first comer who might choose to assail her, when by a trifling outlay the country might be placed in a state of security? He did not think that by such false economy as that the noble Lord would retain the support of the House and the good opinion of the people. The matter was one which required the serious consideration of the House; and he hoped that Her Majesty's Government would be able to assure them that the country was not left in the defenceless condition which their own statements would lead people to suppose.

MR. HORSMAN said, that he was told that an expression had fallen from his lips which, if left unexplained, might be liable to misconstruction. It seemed to be supposed that in something which he said he reflected upon the conduct of two hon. Members of the Bath Election Committee. He was sure that the House would at once acquit him of any such intention. What he meant to say was that there must have been some mistake or slight defect of memory on the part of the noble Lord and the hon. Gentleman, arising from the long and tedious nature of the inquiry in which they had been engaged, but he had not the slightest idea of casting any reflection upon them, and he regretted that any words of his should have been so interpreted.

MR. DILLWYN said, that he wished to state in reply to the question of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) that he could not name the day on which he should bring forward his Motion relative to the oath of abjuration, because it depended very much upon the fate of the measure which the noble Lord, the Member for the City of London (Lord J. Russell) intended to introduce that evening. As he should not be allowed to address the House again, he might take that opportunity of asking the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in pursuance of the notice he had given, whether the manufacture of pulp parchment is allowed to continue, pending the decision of the Court of Exchequer as to whether or not it is paper; and, if so, under what conditions?

SIR CHARLES WOOD observed that he hoped that the state of confusion into which the House had now got upon the simple question of adjournment would induce them in future to avoid the inconvenient practice of raising debates upon important subjects in such a desultory and unsatisfactory manner. The defences of the country involved a question of the greatest possible interest and magnitude, and ought not to be discussed incidentally, but with becoming calmness and deliberation. He felt bound however to make some observations in reply to the statements of the hon. and gallant Admiral and the hon. Member for West Norfolk, (Mr. Bentinck.) In the first place he begged to assure the hon. and gallant Admiral that the determination of the Admiralty not to employ screw line-of-battle ships for the conveyance of troops to India had not been adopted without careful consideration; and he should add that he saw no probability that they would, on further inquiry, be induced to alter that decision. It was perfectly true, as he stated on a previous occasion, that none of the ships of the line now in commission at home were fitted to carry troops to India or China, although admirably adapted for the defence of our own coasts. Most of them were blockships which served in the Baltic. They were steamships powerfully armed, capable of moving about the coasts of England or even those of a neighbouring country; but they were not calculated for long voyages to distant places. Two of them, it was true, had been sent across the Atlantic in fine weather; but all of them were vessels of small steam power, and he did not think we should be justified in trusting to them for the conveyance of troops to distant parts of the world. No doubt there were lying in ordinary a great number of line-of-battle ships which might be employed as transports if it were thought advisable so to use them. But there were other services to be performed of at least equal importance. He had stated before that the number of men employed had not been reduced to the number voted by Parliament, and later in the evening he proposed to ask the House to vote 2,000 more. But all the men voted were already employed, nearly all of them on foreign stations, and if he were to commission ten or a dozen line-of-battle ships he must raise an additional number of men before he could send them to sea, which would require several weeks to do. The 2,000 men whom he proposed to ask the House to vote that evening were intended to man a squadron to send to the Indian Ocean ; and, when he was called upon to commission line-of-battle ships for transport purposes, he begged to ask how he was to provide them with crews? On the other hand he could employ the Queen's ships for war purposes, and at the same time call upon the merchant service to furnish vessels for the conveyance of our troops to India or China—a division of labour which he thought would be productive of far more efficiency than if we employed ships of war in the transport of troops. It had been said that we ought to have large vessels like the Himalaya for the transport of troops. Now, in point of fact, there were eight ships—not all so large as the Himalaya, but nearly so—in employment at the present moment. One of them, the Transit, had been often mentioned in that House, and he might mention to her honour that she had made the voyage to St. Vincent in a shorter time than the Himalaya. Six of these vessels were now actually employed in conveying troops to India. Perhaps he might be allowed in reference to this transport question, to make a further statement to the House. It had been said that a good deal of injury had been done to the public service by sending our forces in sailing vessels rather than in steam ships. This, however, was a mistake. It was perfectly true that in short voyages steam vessels were far more rapid in performing the passage than sailing ships ; but before any particular case could be decided, we must look at the particular circumstances. Long voyages at certain periods of the year were accomplished quicker or as quick by sailing vessels as by steam vessels, and the particular case now under consideration was one of them. Steam power was dependent upon a supply of coal, which must be sent from this country to various stations ; now it was not always that an adequate supply could be obtained ; while, when it could be obtained, the delay of coaling prolonged the voyage to the time occupied by a sailing vessel. He had recently inquired of the Secretary of Lloyd's what was the average time occupied by sailing ships to India, and he was informed that taking the average of the last three or four years, fast-sailing vessels despatched from this country, at the present season of the year, performed their voyages in from 90 to 101 days, which was pretty much the same time as was occupied by steamers. Some of the Peninsular and Oriental Company's steam vessels had performed the voyage in less time, but those vessels were built for speed, carried little cargo, and consumed much fuel. Steam vessels carrying troops would not be able to take on board so much fuel, on account of the space which would be occupied by the necessary provisions and water for the troops, and the numerous places at which they must call to replenish those stores would cause a delay greater than that which the employment of sailing ships would cause. He found from a statement which had been prepared, that of four steamers which had belonged to the hon. Member for Tynemouth, (Mr. W. Lindsay), and which had been employed under contract to convey mails to Calcutta, the contract time was 74 days, whereas the actual time occupied was respectively 107 days, 121 days, 100 days, and 90 days, making an average of 104 days. Another matter for consideration was, that there had been very heavy demands made lately upon the store of coal collected at the Cape of Good Hope, and although fresh supplies had been sent out, yet they could hardly be expected to arrive in sufficient quantities and with sufficient regularity to meet the requirements of the large number of steam vessels which would be required to convey all the troops now under orders for India. Many troops were going in steam vessels, but he did not believe that any delay would arise from part of them being despatched in sailing vessels to Calcutta.

Mr. Bentinck

ARTILLERY FOR INDIA.—QUESTION.

COLONEL NORTH said he wished to ask the Under Secretary for War what force of artillery was to proceed to India, and whether or not they are to take guns, ammunition, and horses, and if not, to state the reasons ; also what staff of artillery is to command and direct this force ?

SIR JOHN RAMSDEN said, it was intended to send out to India six companies of foot artillery and two troops of horse artillery. They were not to take out either guns or ammunition, as the arsenals of India were amply supplied, and it was desirable that the men should be sent out as speedily as possible, without the delay which would be caused by sending out guns and ammunition with them. With regard to the latter portion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman's question, it referred to a matter of military organization, respecting which he hoped the inquiry would not be pressed.

JEWISH DISABILITIES.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, although I am sensible of the inconvenience of pressing too far the privilege which hon. Members possess of introducing questions to the notice of Government upon the question of adjournment of the House to Monday, yet I rise in consequence of the strong feeling by which I am animated, and considering that I owe it to my constituents to ask the decision of the Government with respect to a Bill of which I have given notice. The complaint of my constituents is, that although they have four times elected Baron Lionel Rothschild a Member of this House he has as yet been unable to take his seat here. Successive Governments have attempted to relieve him and his Jewish brethren from the disabilities to which they are at present subject, by passing Bills in this House and sending them up to the other House of Parliament. It has been supposed—and maliciously supposed—that the City of London is satisfied with three Members, and do not insist on or feel the necessity of having any more to represent them in this House. But, Sir, that is not the fact. The City of London is most anxious to have its full share in the representation of the country, but has consented for a time to forego that privilege in order to vindicate another privilege—the great privilege of the people of this country to send Members to the British House of Commons without any reference whatever to their religious predilections. Sir, the House of Lords has now again rejected a Bill which was intended to remove those disabilities. It was supposed hitherto—and I think very naturally supposed—that the majorities of this House having been generally small—sometimes twenty-five or thirty—the House of Lords considered, in that divided state of public opinion, they were not bound to give effect to the wish of the House of Commons. But, Sir, it appears from the late division, that that cannot be the ground upon which they acted, because the last Bill, besides being supported by the whole authority and weight of the Government, had a majority of 140 in its favour on the decisive test with respect to the words “on the true faith of a Christian.” It is obvious that we may send another Bill to the House of Lords next year and the year after that; but if so large a majority as that is not allowed to prevail with the House of Lords there is no chance whatever that a Bill in that form will be accepted by that House. Let me say, however, that as this Bill bore the shape of a change in the law, and as the last Bill which we sent up to the House of Lords professed to make a change in the oaths to be taken in this House, it is undoubtedly within the constitutional functions of the House of Lords to refuse their sanction to it. But Sir, a question occurs to me—and I think not unnaturally—it is this: whether the City of London is to rest satisfied with the state of its representation, or whether, on the other hand, we are to be satisfied with defeat on this great question of religious liberty, or whether any other course can be adopted? Now it appears to me that another course can be adopted. The House is well aware that it has been the law for, I believe, two centuries—both declared and acknowledged—that persons in Courts of Justice may take an oath as witnesses, or in any other capacity, in any form most binding upon their conscience. That opinion is declared to have been given in 1657, and a Bill, which upon the proposition of the late Lord Denman passed into an Act of Parliament so late as the first year of the present reign, confirmed it and declared that all persons called upon to give evidence in Courts of Justice are to take the oaths most binding on the consciences of such persons, and that such persons so falsely swearing should be subject to all the pains and penalties inflicted upon those guilty of perjury. But although that is an Act declaring the law, there is this ambiguity about it, that although the words “on any occasion whatever” are contained in it, the question arises whether, as it mentions Courts of Justice only, any higher authority is meant by it, and likewise whether it affects the case of persons in this House. What I wish to propose is that that imperfection in the law should be cleared up, and that it should be declared and enacted that in the High Court of Parliament, as well as elsewhere, and “on all occasions,” an oath administered by a person lawfully empowered to administer the same—

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY rose to order. He wished to ask Mr. Speaker whether the noble Lord was at liberty to discuss a question on the Motion for adjournment of the House till Monday, when a notice involving the very question itself was on the paper of the day?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: The present question is that the House at its rising do adjourn till Monday, and if it is not competent for me to address the House upon this question out of order, I can soon put myself in order by moving that the House do now adjourn, and I do so with a view of enabling the Government to declare what they will do on this occasion affecting the rights of the Jewish portion of the population.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that with all due respect he would again submit that the noble Lord was out of order. A Motion now stood in the name of the noble Lord, having for its object the introduction of a Bill in reference to a certain statute there named, and the noble Lord was now discussing a question which would come regularly before the House at a later period of the evening.

Mr. WALPOLE: Perhaps I may be permitted to say a few words upon the point of order. I rather think, Sir, your predecessor in the chair always laid down the rule that, although we have deviated widely from regularity in our proceedings upon this question of adjournment, yet he held it was not competent for an hon. Member to take advantage of this Motion, in order to speak upon any other subject relating to which there was a notice of Motion upon the paper of the evening. I mention this in order to put you, Sir, in mind of what has been the ruling in these cases. The noble Lord, as I understand, is now adopting another course, and proposes, in order to put himself right, to move the adjournment of the House, as an Amendment on the Motion that the House at its rising adjourn to Monday. By so doing I believe that the noble Lord would be acting strictly in accordance with the practice of the House, although he was not in order before; but I would venture to put it to the noble Lord himself, the greatest authority in this House, whether he would not be rather increasing the irregularity in to which we have fallen by pursuing the subject at this moment.

MR. MALINS: Although the noble Lord is undoubtedly a great authority in this House, yet nothing is more clearly understood than that this is an order night, and that on such a night, the orders of the day have the precedence. The noble Lord has a notice upon the paper of a Motion for leave to introduce a Bill, and I am certain that many Members have gone away under the impression that it was impossible that the subject could be brought on until after the orders of the day had been disposed of. It would take those hon. Members greatly by surprise, and I believe also that it would take the public greatly by surprise, if the noble Lord were now to proceed with his Bill.

MR. SPEAKER: I desire on the subject of order, in the first place, to pause for a moment to remind the House of the extreme inconvenience of the course which has been pursued this evening. A multiplicity of questions have been discussed upon the one Motion, that the House at its rising do adjourn till Monday next, and confusion in discussion is the result, which is greatly to be deprecated. With respect to the question which has been addressed to me by the hon. Member for Evesham (Sir H. Willoughby) I feel that no duty is more imperative upon me than that of preserving the order of business, as it is laid down by the House for the day; and it certainly is my opinion that, as the noble Lord has given notice of a Motion for this evening, it is going beyond the irregularity into which we have been already led to take advantage of the Motion that the House at its rising adjourn to Monday, for the purpose of anticipating that notice of Motion, and raising a discussion upon it.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—With respect of the point of order, I may perhaps be permitted to say, that in the course of this very evening different Members on either side of the House have entered into questions which properly belong to Committee of Supply, and which must be discussed in Committee of Supply this very evening. My right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty, though he reprehended the practice, yet immediately followed it, and entered into that which ought to have been discussed in Committee of Supply. Having, however, been misled probably by that very high authority, I am ready to say that I have a particular object in view, from which I will not be deterred, and I shall therefore make myself perfectly in order by moving the adjournment of the House. My particular object is to know whether, supposing the House consents to my bringing in a Bill with respect to which I will not say a single word more, the First Lord of the Treasury will agree to appoint a day, fixed for Government business, on which that Bill can be discussed? It is obvious that unless that is done, and unless that is an early day, there is no chance of that Bill going up to the House of Lords. It is a Bill on which depends a question of great public importance; and certainly I conceive it ought to be discussed before an hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), brings forward a Motion for the purpose of putting Baron Lionel Rothschild into his seat by a Resolution of this House, which may involve us in a perilous conflict; and therefore I take the opportunity of pressing for an answer to my question, whether, if I am allowed to bring in that Bill, a day will be given for its consideration? The noble Lord concluded by the formal Motion for the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

MR. T. DUNCOMBE: I think that the noble Lord the Member for London was perfectly in order when he commenced his observations, seeing that he had to complain of a wrong done to his constituents, inasmuch as one of the Members returned by them is not able to take his seat in this House; but I certainly think with the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole), that he was not in order in alluding to the notice of Motion which he had on the paper. At all events, it has been my misfortune, Sir, to be stopped more than once by your predecessor when I have alluded to a notice for a Bill which I had on the paper, and when I have spoken under similar circumstances. I rose, however, to remind the House of one fact, and that is that we have not upon our journals any record of the wrong that has been done to the citizens of London. Baron Rothschild has not attempted during this Parliament to take his seat, and you have no right to assume what the House would do if he did attempt to take it. The House may arrive at a different conclusion from that at which the last House arrived. On a former occasion, acting under the influence of the noble Lord, the House decided that it could not assent to the proposal made by one of the Vice Chancellors of England, Sir William Page Wood, that Mr. Alderman Salomons had taken the oath in a manner binding on his conscience, and that he therefore was at once at liberty to take his seat. I would suggest that the hon. Member for the City of London (Baron Rothschild), should present himself at the table before any hasty steps are adopted, and be refused his seat on account of not swearing those words "on the true faith of a Christian," although he should affirm that he has taken the oath in a manner binding on his conscience. It would then be competent for any hon. Member to move a Resolution that he, having taken the oath in the manner most binding upon his conscience, should be at liberty to take his seat. I voted for that Resolution on a former occasion. I am prepared to vote for it again, and I am not at all sure that the Bill of the noble Lord would not weaken our position in that respect. I wish now, however, to remind the House that the citizens of London have not upon the journals any record of their wrong, which, in my opinion, should appear before we proceed any further.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: With respect to the question put by my noble Friend, all I can say is that of course I presume that the House would, as matter of courtesy whatever the opinions of any hon. Members may be on the question itself, allow my noble Friend to obtain leave to bring in his Bill. As to the suggestion that a day should afterwards be given to him for its discussion, my noble Friend must consider that there are many very important matters connected with the country still under discussion in this House, and that our days are numbered. Therefore it is impossible, until the public business shall have advanced in a more certain manner, to promise any hon. Members that I will give them, at an early period at least, a Government day for the discussion of the Bills which they may think it advisable to bring in. I am afraid this answer will not be satisfactory to my noble Friend, but it is really all that I can say at present consistently with my public duty.

ISTHMUS OF SUEZ CANAL.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GRIFFITHS said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the question, Whether, in their deliberate opinion, it be conducive to the honour or the interests of this country that we should manifest and avow the existence of a jealous hostility on our part to the project of a Ship Canal through the Isthmus of Suez; or whether, on the contrary, it would not be more in accordance with the character for disinterested impartiality, which we seek to maintain, if we were to leave that subject without prejudice, to be dealt with by the natural, physical, and engineering difficulties which surround its execution? Though he could understand the difficulties in an engineering point of view which had been suggested, he could not understand why or how the opening of the canal, if accomplished, should be adverse to the interests of this country, or why not extremely conducive to our national advantage.

Lord John Russell

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: My hon. Friend has had the courtesy to give me notice of this matter, and I collect from my hon. Friend's letter that he wishes to know whether, in the answer which I gave on a former occasion as to the project to cut a canal of 300 feet wide and 30 feet deep between the Mediterranean and the Red Sea, I expressed a hasty opinion, or whether I did not display more jealousy of foreign powers than it was expedient to express, whatever foundation there might be for it. Sir, in reply, I can only say, that whatever objections I may have expressed at any time with regard to that project, I endeavoured rather to understate than to overstate. It is a plan which, in my opinion, is founded on views inconsistent with the interests of this country and at variance with its settled policy. In a political point of view, it is objectionable as regards England, especially in connection with our Indian possessions; for it is plain, that if a great canal were cut from the Mediterranean to the Red Sea, there are other naval powers with which we may have difficulties, which would have a very important start as compared with ourselves with regard to any operation that might be undertaken in the Indian Seas. Moreover, I consider it is a plan which has for its object the separation of Egypt from Turkey, which it has always been the policy of Great Britain to prevent, and which the French Government of the present day has abandoned, because that Government, acting loyally and in conjunction with the other States of Europe, by the treaty of Paris entered into an engagement to preserve the integrity and inviolability of the Turkish empire. Politically, therefore, I look upon the scheme as highly objectionable, and one which no Englishman with his eyes open would think it desirable, as regards national interests, to encourage. As regards the engineering difficulties, I am aware there is nothing which money and skill cannot overcome, except to stop the tides of the ocean and to make rivers run up to their sources. But I take leave to affirm, upon pretty good authority, that this plan cannot be accomplished, except at an expence which would preclude its being a remunerative undertaking; and I therefore think I am not much out of the way in stating this to be one of the bubble schemes which are often set on foot to induce English capitalists to embark their money upon enterprises which, in the end, will only leave them poorer, whomever else they may make richer.

MR. STEPHENSON said, he would not venture to enter upon the political bearings of the subject with respect to the other powers of Europe, but would confine himself merely to the engineering capabilities of the scheme. He had travelled, partly on foot, over the country to which the project applied, and had watched with great interest the progress that had been made by various parties in examining the question. He had first investigated the subject in 1847 in conjunction with M. Talabot, a French engineer, and M. Negrelli, an Austrian engineer. At the suggestion of Linant Bey, a French engineer, who had been upwards of twenty years resident in Egypt, and feeling how important was the establishment, if possible, of a communication between the Red Sea and the Mediterranean, he had qualified himself to form an opinion on the subject. It had been received on the authority of an investigation of the levels taken by the French engineers during the invasion of Egypt about 1800, that, as stated by the ancient writers, there was a difference between the levels of the Mediterranean and the Red Sea of something like thirty-two feet. It was suggested at that time that the old canal might be opened out again, and that a current might be established between the Mediterranean and the Red Sea of from two to three miles an hour, which velocity of water would not impede the communication between the Mediterranean and the Red Sea, as steam tugs might be employed, and the canal might at the same time be kept perfectly open, as the scouring power would be adequate to maintain a clear channel. He went into this scheme under the belief that that difference in level did actually exist. The examination was made by himself and the gentlemen, with whom he was associated, in 1847. They had not any idea, at that time, that if there was no difference of level, it would be practicable for a canal to be made in the first instance, or that it could be maintained afterwards. After investigation, however, it was found that, instead of a difference of thirty-two feet, there was no difference of level whatever, at the period of low water, although for a period of fifty years the world had been under the impression from the published statements and levellings of M. Lepère, that a difference of thirty-two feet existed; and whilst it was supposed to exist, it was believed by professional men that a canal might be maintained, or that, as it was called, a new Bosphorus might be formed between the Red Sea and the Mediterranean. But when the difference of level was found to be nil, the engineers with whom he was associated abandoned the project altogether, and he believed justly; and one of them (Mr. P. Talabot) made an adverse Report, which was published in the Révue des deux Mondes of May, 1855. Since then he had travelled over the Isthmus to Suez, and over other parts of the Desert, and had investigated the feasibility of making a free communication between the two seas, on the supposition that they were on the same level, and on the supposition that water might be supplied from a higher level—as, for instance, from the Nile. He might, however, say, without entering into professional details, that he had arrived at the conclusion that it was—he would not say absurd, because engineers whose opinions he respected had been to the spot since, and had declared the thing to be possible; at all events, if feasible (and as the First Lord of the Treasury had said money would overcome every difficulty), yet, commercially speaking, he frankly declared it to be an impracticable scheme. What its political import might be he could not say, but as an engineer he would pronounce it to be an undesirable scheme, in a commercial point of view, and that the railway (now nearly completed) would, as far as concerned India and postal arrangements, be more expeditious, more certain, and more economical than even if there were this new Bosphorus between the Red Sea and the Mediterranean.

STATE OF INDIA.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. DISRAELI: Not having yet contributed to the olio of subjects which have been brought before the House, I hope I shall not be thought to take an extraordinary advantage of the latitude allowed on these occasions, if I now venture to bring forward my share. The

Mr. Stephenson

noble Lord at the head of the Government has just told us “our days are numbered,” but I may remind the House that if our days are numbered our duties at this moment are multiplied. I really think the House would abdicate its functions and place itself, as regards the country, in a most ignominious position, if it allowed this Session to close without a discussion in this House on the present state of India. I think it is one of our first duties to consider the present condition of our Indian empire. I understood the noble Lord the other night, when he proposed to place some papers on the table, to say that he did not suppose that any hon. Gentleman could possibly wish to discuss the important question of the state of India without first reading those papers. Now, I was told last night by a Minister peculiarly responsible for the production of those papers that, so far as the narrative was concerned, those papers were ready and would be laid on the table this evening, but with respect to the other papers some delay would occur in their production. Now, I understand the delay is, or may be, occasioned by the following reason:—There was a wish expressed on my part, and I believe it was very generally the sentiment of the House, that the papers should not be confined to a mere narrative, but that the despatches should be placed on the table which had been written nine or twelve months previous to the occurrence of the recent events in India, so that we might be put in possession of the Reports of the Indian Government with respect to the state of that country at a time considerably before the late occurrences. We were informed by the Minister that no warnings, the rumour of which was freely circulated, had ever been given by the Indian authorities to Her Majesty’s Ministers, and I am led to believe, from what reaches me, that the Ministers at this moment are studiously searching their offices for these warnings, of which there had been a rumour, and until they should be discovered, or until all the papers in the possession of the Ministers should be investigated, we shall not be in a position, according to the view of the noble Lord’s declaration, to enter on this important discussion. The House will see, especially in the month of July, that when there is on the part of the Government a search for papers which are to prove a negative, that search may be of considerable length, and it is not at all impossible that the House may at the last hour of the Session be informed that it has been fruitless. I for one made no charge against the Government that they had disregarded warnings which had been addressed to them by functionaries in India. I only wished, as everybody would wish, that as rumours of these reports having been circulated, the Government should inform us whether they received them. It is to me a matter of no importance whether they received these warnings or not; and therefore I trust that, as there will be placed on the table to-night papers which give as much information respecting recent occurrences as Her Majesty's Ministers think necessary—I will not say for the justification, but for the explanation of their conduct and the illustration of the course of affairs, the noble Lord will see the advantage to the country, to the Government, and to Parliament, of appointing an early day on which the attention of this House may be called to the state of our Indian empire at the present moment. The noble Lord the Member for the City of London, spoke rather deridingly the other evening of my observation, that we wanted some information as to the cause of these occurrences. "I am of opinion," said the noble Lord, "that what we want is not information as to the cause of these occurrences; what we want to know is whether the Government contemplate the use of means sufficient to put an end to these disasters." With great deference to the noble Member for London I maintain that it is totally impossible that we can form an opinion as to the sufficiency of the measures adopted by the Government to encounter these great contingencies, unless we have some general idea of the cause of their occurrence. Why, we were told last night that these extraordinary events have been occasioned by a sudden impulse of the soldiery, arising out of some superstitious feeling. If that be the true view of the case, and it is the view of the Cabinet, I can easily understand that measures of a very energetic, but, comparatively speaking, superficial character may be competent to encounter the difficulties which meet us; but if the cause be deeper, if it be one of longer standing, if, instead of being the sudden impulse of a disaffected or affrighted soldiery, this is the result of an organized conspiracy in a nation of immense population, then it may be that the means which the Government propose to adopt are not adequate to the greater cause; and therefore I say that in discussing this question, which I trust we shall all approach with the calmness which so great a subject requires, we must take a wider view of what is the duty of the House of Commons than merely to ask the Government how many regiments and how many ships they are going to send out to put an end to these disasters. Now, Sir, I should propose on the earliest occasion which is consistent with due notice, and, of course, with the convenience of the Government, to ask the House to consider the present condition of our Indian empire with these two objects—to arrive before the prorogation at some general conclusion as to the causes of these great calamities, and to ascertain whether the means used by the Government are adequate to the occasion. I believe that these are two great duties of Parliament, and I am sure that, to use an Indian phrase, we shall, indeed, lose caste with our country if we shrink from a discussion of that kind. I should hope that in a few days these papers will not only be upon the table, but will be in the hands of hon. Members, and may be well digested; and what I now propose to the noble Lord is that he should fix as early a day as convenient on which this subject may be brought forward. I shall on that occasion make a Motion—a Motion of course not conceived in any spirit of hostility to Her Majesty's Government, or intended to obtain a party triumph, or to occasion party inconvenience to the Ministry, but having for its object to place before the House the ideas which have occurred to myself and to others upon this subject, and to permit hon. Members generally to offer their opinions upon the gravest and most momentous events which have occurred in our time. If the noble Lord will consent that on this day week I shall call attention to the state of our Indian empire, that will, I should think, be convenient to the House—it will be that which the country expects, it will give ample notice to hon. Gentlemen who may be absent, and will, I should imagine, fairly consult the convenience of the Government. If the noble Lord accedes to this suggestion, I shall on this day week call the attention of the House to the condition of our Indian empire.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I am quite ready to admit the position which the right hon. Gentleman has laid down, that it will be expected by the country that this House shall, before it separates, seriously give its attention to the state of affairs in India.

At the same time, as I stated on a former occasion, I should think that the House would wish to have an opportunity of reading the papers before the debate comes on. These papers will be ready in a very few days. My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Control has been looking through them, and I think he will without difficulty be able to make a selection which shall go back for such a period as will give all the information which may be required. The right hon. Gentleman proposes to bring forward the subject on Friday next, but I would submit to him this consideration. The probability is that about the end of next week we shall have another mail for India. That mail cannot fail to bring intelligence of considerable importance, especially with regard to the occupation of Delhi, and I would, therefore, submit to the right hon. Gentleman whether Monday week would not be a better day than Friday, and whether it is not likely that on that day the House will have fresh intelligence, which may have a very considerable bearing upon the consideration of this question. If that day suit him we will take care that Monday week shall be free.

MR. DISRAELI: I accept the offer of the noble Lord, and quite acknowledge the expediency of waiting for fresh intelligence if it arrive in reasonable time. Probably it may reach us before the day named, and, therefore, we will understand that on Monday week this question will be introduced to the consideration of the House.

MR. ROEBUCK: The right hon. Gentleman gives us to understand that he will propose certain Resolutions,—will he inform us whether they will be laid upon the table some time before he moves them?

MR. DISRAELI: At the present moment I do not wish to bind myself as to the form of my Resolution, which will not be such as to require that it should be laid on the table before it is considered. My original intention was to move for papers, which I thought might probably not be presented by the Government, and to offer reasons why they should be given. After what has occurred it is not impossible that they may appear, and until the papers are produced I must excuse myself from placing any Resolution upon the table.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said that he wished to state, in reply to the question put to him by the hon. Member for Swansea, (Mr. Dillwyn)

Viscount Palmerston

at an earlier period of the evening, that an arrangement had been made by the Inland Revenue Department with the manufacturer of this article, that he should continue its manufacture until it was decided whether or not it was liable to duty, he entering into conditions to pay the duty in case the decision was against him.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put and agreed to.

House at its rising to adjourn till Monday next.

LAMBETH ELECTION.—JOSEPH TREDRE.

Mr. INGHAM said, that he had given notice of his intention to move that Joseph Tredre, then in custody of the Serjeant-at-Arms for disobedience to a summons to attend before the Lambeth Election Committee, should be discharged on payment of the fees. Since he had come to the House, however, they had received a petition from this person, in which he prayed that, as he was suffering from great distress, the House would consent to his discharge without the payment of the fees. Although the absence of this man was very wilful and blameable, it did not appear to have been the result of concert with any party before the Committee, and when he did appear, his evidence, which was not of very much value to the inquiry, seemed to be given truthfully. Under these circumstances he asked leave to bring up the petition, and to move that the man should be discharged without paying the fees.

MR. ROEBUCK thought, if a person who had disobeyed the orders of the House, and who had consequently been taken into custody, was kept a little while in prison, it might do him some good.

COLONEL FRENCH was of opinion that the House ought to agree to the Motion.

MR. INGHAM said, that Tredre had already been in custody four days.

Ordered, That Joseph Tredre, now in custody of the Serjeant-at-Arms attending this House, be discharged without payment of his fees.

DEFENCES OF THE COUNTRY.

Order for going into Committee of Supply read.

MR. BENTINCK said, the answers which had been given to questions addressed to the noble Lord at the head of the Government and to the First Lord of the Admiralty, led him to the conclusion that the defences of the country were in a most inadequate and defective state. He had to-night put a question on the subject to the noble Lord, but as he had not succeeded in eliciting any answer or explanation he begged to give notice that he would take the earliest opportunity, on going into Committee of Supply, of bringing the condition of the national defences under the notice of the House.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I can assure the hon. Gentleman it was from no disrespect to him that his question was unanswered, but really such a multiplicity of subjects have been dancing before my eyes that his inquiries escaped my recollection. I do not agree, however, with the hon. Gentleman that the country is in a defenceless state. On the contrary, I consider that we are adequately provided against any emergency that can arise, and we have ample means of increasing our defences if it should be necessary to do so. I do not think the public money would be wisely expended in calling out the militia at the present moment, because I don't think their services are at all required. Such a course would not only involve a waste of the public money, but also a very unnecessary interference with the industry of the country, and would be attended with great inconvenience both to officers and men. I think, therefore, it would be a very unadvisable proceeding. We have the militia, with all the military experience they have acquired during the war, and if from any unfortunate course of events their services were required, I am quite sure the shortest notice would be sufficient to bring them under arms in defence of the country. I must say, therefore, that I totally disagree with the hon. Gentleman in his opinion that the country is devoid of proper defences, and I shall be quite ready to maintain my view whenever it may suit him to call the attention of the House to the subject.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair."

INDIAN RAILWAYS.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. WATKIN said, he had, he believed in deference to the wish of the House, last night postponed his Motion in reference to the Indian Railways, and he now rose to move it. The question had a vital bearing upon the subject of India, and was, in fact, evidence in that important case which would shortly be debated—bearing upon the state and prospects, the successes and the mistakes, of our policy and our empire in the East. He repeated his statement already made to the House that had that system of arterial railway communication, which had been projected by private enterprise and approved by the East Indian Company, been completed, as he should prove it might, and ought to have been before now, the same mail which brought the news of the insurrection in India would have also conveyed the intelligence of its summary conclusion and signal chastisement. He could call in evidence to prove this, the opinion of high military authorities in that House, who would bear him out in stating that had the railway communication which had been projected upon paper, and was now in progress, been completed, the forces of the Crown and of the India Company could have been directed in such overwhelming numbers and with such rapidity upon the mutineers, that instead of that confidence which our temporary weakness had produced—and the results of which had covered us with shame—panic, flight, and submission must have been the result. What had happened? A mutiny or revolt had taken place—unexpected but organized and sudden. One day's licence, unchecked and unpunished, had scattered the flame of revolt over a district of hundreds of miles in length; and we were now to be contented, while the rebels held Delhi, with the fact that a small band of our troops had been able to take six-and-twenty field guns outside the walls. This revolt had disturbed the public mind at home and abroad. It had damaged our prestige with our Allies and our enemies alike, and its repression now, in the plenitude of its licence, would entail a cost of millions, and an annual increase of our taxation for a long time to come. He again repeated that had these railways been completed as long ago as they ought to have been, the mischief would have been crushed in the bud. He should be told that this was a mere practical question—so many miles of railway. So it was. But these practical questions were at the foundation of all political success. Success in anything was the mere reflection of labour and of forethought, and the fashion to condemn practical questions had over and over again, and most signally in the Crimea, led to national disaster and defeat. In India we were holding a vast country by concentration and prestige. The population were becoming every day more instructed in the secrets of our weakness as well as in the causes of our power. If we refused to progress in organisation, as they progressed in knowledge of us, that measure of comparative superiority which had enabled us to rule, would bit by bit disappear, and when once the conviction of our power had become weakened in the native mind, we should never again be able to hold the country with a handful of Europeans, directed from Leadenhall Street or Cannon Row. Railway communication meant both industrial development and military strength. It meant that power to concentrate men and guns, on one point from all other points, and in all seasons, which made a small army in India more powerful than a large one. Let the House consider the case of troops coming as they now were from the seat of war in Persia. Those troops now would come in all probability by Bombay, and then overland, or would be sent round to depôts by Calcutta and the Ganges, and thence be marched to the scene of operations. He would not now speak of the route of the Indus. The representatives of the East India Company in that House would not deny that had these railways been completed from Bombay to Delhi, these troops would have been before Delhi equipped and in order of battle in three days from leaving the ship. Would any one of the Members representing India get up in his place and say, that by any route or means whatever these troops could now be conveyed in thirty days? He believed that, according to circumstances, and to the weather, and the route, it might be thirty days, or it might be ninety; and if a thousand men were sent by the present slow and uncertain routes, disease and loss of life always accompanied the march, which need only be long enough to decimate the contingent. Here was the whole question. India, then, had been imperilled by the delay of her railways. Now, railways were first brought before the India Company and the Board of Control in 1843. Parliament had chosen to assume a portion of Indian responsibility by allowing a third of the India Board to be nominated by Government. The India Board was, therefore, two-thirds commercial, and one-third governmental. Hence the Treasury Bench became responsible. Railways were first completed in England in 1830; they progressed in America and in other parts of the world; but, he repeated, they were only thought of for India in 1843. The India Company met the proposition not only with remonstrance, but with positive resistance—and at last, forced to bend to the progress of the age, they encountered the innovation by a system of suicidal interference and control which must be fatal to the rapid progress of any industry. Knowing what he did, it was not matter of surprise to him that, dating from 1843, 1857 should only witness the completion of 358 miles of railway in India! Yes, 358 miles were all; and over that small length of opened railway he supposed the Board of Control would to-night sing a song of triumph. There could be no question as to the importance of these works, especially in reference to the cultivation of cotton. Even the Chairman of the East India Company, the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Mangles) stated before Mr. Bright's Committee, in 1848, that, sooner than they should be delayed, they should be constructed at the public expense. Well, then, the works being so important that the hon. Member would have actually constructed them out of the Company's own funds, how was it that they had been delayed? If the House would refer to the map which he held in his hand, they would see that the arterial lines proposed for India were, first, the East India Railway, from Calcutta along the valleys of the Ganges and the Jumna. This line was first considered in 1845, was first guaranteed by the India Board in 1849, and again in 1854, and only 121 miles, out of a total in progress, or to be made, of 950 miles were opened. Then there was the Great India Peninsular, gazetted in 1843, guaranteed in 1849, and again in 1853; 88 miles only opened, and 1,103 miles in operation, but not yet opened. Then the Madras Railway, gazetted in 1849, guaranteed in 1852, and a further extension in 1855; 73 miles only opened, and 827 more still to open. There were also the Scinde and the Bombay and Baroda. There were also as projects the Oude, the Great Southern, the Eastern, Bengal, &c. But the arterial system shown on the map extended from Madras on the south-east to Cochin on the south-west coast of India, and going north-west to a junction with the Bombay line, and kindred systems extended northward to Delhi and on to Lahore. Then the East Indian came from Calcutta north-west, to a junction with the north line ; while a central line would come east and west, and an arm of the system penetrate to Nag-poor. All the Presidencies, all their more important ports and all the military centres were thus to be put in communication. Was he wrong, then, in stating that had these lines been made, troops and stores could have been poured from every portion of India to the seat of mutiny, and the revolt would not have been a month old in success as it was at the date of the last accounts ? Why should not these lines, so tardily projected, have long ago been finished ? Look at our own country and America. Before a single sod was cut in India we had 6,000 miles of railway open in England, and 8,856 in the United States. In America, with its population of 27,000,000 souls, 26,000 miles of line were now in active work. In the United Kingdom we had 8,307 miles with a population of 30,000,000, while in India, under the parental rule of the India Company, and of the Board of Control, its partner, we had only, at the date of the last accounts, 358 miles of single line open for traffic with a population of 150,000,000 souls. He repeated, why was it ? Why even our colony of Canada with its 3,000,000 of people had beaten all India. In 1853 it sanctioned the Grand Trunk Railway ; in October, 1856, 853 miles of that railway were actually open and at work for traffic, and Canada had now to boast of some 1,500 miles of railway, while India, that mighty empire, rejoiced over 358. The causes of delay and of failure, for delay was failure in India, could be easily understood. First, there was the original opposition and unaccountable blindness of the India Board in 1843 and 1844. The Board actually turned out the Bill for the Great Indian Peninsular in that House. And here he might allude to an opinion from the hon. Member for Whitby (Mr. Robert Stephenson) who had so much interested the House that evening in reference to the proposed Canal across the isthmus of Suez. In a Report on the Great Indian Peninsular in 1847, Mr. Stephenson said—

Mr. Watkin

“It is much to be regretted that in dealing with the subject admitted to be of so great importance to cotton-growing India and to cotton-manufacturing England, and in the pursuit of which the conduct of the railway company has shown them to be persevering and sincere, that the East India Company should not have felt it prudent to follow the example so recently shown by Her Majesty's Government, both in prompt attention to the proposals made and in the liberality of the terms accorded. It is quite impossible to advise the Great Indian Peninsular Railway Company to limit themselves under terms such as those now offered by the East India Company, since to do so would be to expose themselves to almost certain losses, not arising necessarily out of the undertaking itself, and to bring utter discredit upon the whole cause of railway communication in Western India.”

Then there were the obstacles presented through the passive resistance of a party at the India House, which heretofore had resisted all improvement ; and more important still, there intervened that system of minute interference and control, and of ironbound routine, which forbade all rapidity and all energy. Then, again, the contracts of the India House with the Railway Companies were not framed so as, in any case, to ensure rapid execution or simple and cheap construction. They guaranteed a fixed per centage upon the cost, and they fixed no time to complete, instead of giving a guarantee upon a fixed or maximum sum and stipulating for a fixed time for completion. Thus they found original opposition, passive resistance throughout, red tape and routine, and defective schemes of contract. Again, the India Company, in the present state of its finance, seemed to have a direct interest in keeping the monies of the railway companies in hand rather than in having them rapidly invested in productive works. The Indian railway companies were too large ; they had become monopolies ; and they were money lenders to the India Company. Let him call attention to some of the facts. The East India Railway had opened 121 miles of line only ; it had issued, however, twenty-one half yearly Reports. It had called up £6,700,000 ; it had laid out in works £5,900,000, and it had a balance in the hands of the India Company of £847,000. Then the Madras Railway Company had opened seventy-three miles ; had issued ten half-yearly Reports, had called up £2,313,000, had spent £1,340,000, and had, to quote its Report, “in the hands of the Honourable East India Company,” £970,000. Then the Great Indian Peninsular which had issued fifteen half-yearly Reports, and had opened eighty-eight miles of line, had called up £3,039,000, had expended £1,424,000, and had in the hands of the East India Company £1,600,000. Thus the East India Company had possession, in its own till, of nearly £3,500,000 sterling belonging to three Indian Railways—enough to complete 600 miles of line of itself—and thus in these times of Indian disaster we possessed 358 miles of opened railway, when 1,000 might have saved us. He had quoted England, Canada, and the United States of America. Was there any radical difficulty in making railways in India? Remarks had been made in that House about cheap railways in India. Some comparison existed between the cheapness which meant inefficient, and the cheapness which yet enabled permanent, construction. Railways could be made cheaply in all countries; it was a question of land and of the nature of the ground. In the United States railways were cheapened often by the use of timber, which was the material of a good part of the country. In India, generally speaking, timber was not the cheap material for railways which it was in America. The cheap material for all railways was, practically, the material on the ground. That material was in India brick-clay and stone, as in America it was often timber. Thus cheap railways in India need not involve timber structures, and cheapness and permanence might be synonymous terms. Now, in America there was not much to pay for land and less for Parliamentary expenses and law, while in England we paid dear for both. In India, Companies had no law to pay for, and the land was to a great extent given to them. The material, with the exception of iron and metals, which both in America and in India were mostly derived from this country, was found on the spot or in the country itself. Then as to labour, in India, it was paid for by pence a day, while in America and in England it was paid for by shillings; and the labour of India was more cheap and more docile than that found in America. Now, apart from the faulty construction of the contracts with the railway companies, and the excessive magnitude of each company's operations—1,200 or 1,500 miles being conceded to one single company, where the energies of two or three companies ought to have been called into play—also for financial reasons—the vexatious and absurd routine of Indian inspection and control was enough to account for much of the difficulty. The India Company claimed the entire surveillance, almost the entire management. They checked, and controlled, and criticised, and the work was impeded accordingly. That interference was most injurious. We sent out hard-working and experienced engineers from this country, and they met with obstruction and contumely. Who did they find to control them? Why, military engineers, who had never seen a railway before in their lives. These men were, perhaps, excellent military engineers—men who ought to have been at Sebastopol, for at all events they could not have disappointed the country more than the engineers who were sent there—and these men ordered, and countermanded, and interfered, and stopped the pay, and made confusion quite confounded. These men had issued the most ridiculous orders. At the beginning some of them had actually ordered gradients of one foot in 1,000 to be made level—and long and expensive banks were now to be seen across the “paddy fields,” on the Ganges, in consequence of this most ridiculous order. Then later on, and within the last year or two, an engineer on the Madras line had ordered a return gradient of one in 120 and one in 140 to be amalgamated and made one in 130, which was done, and the result was an excess of expenditure of some thousand pounds, three months' delay, and, after all, a worse line for practical working. These were two instances out of hundreds.

Mr. Watkin

But the interference and routine began from the beginning. For instance:—first, the Secretary of the East India Board is ex-officio a director of all the lines, and has a veto in England. Suppose he approve, then the India Company's Direction, and, after them, the Board of Control may disapprove. These three bodies can, therefore, each veto all the appointments of the Railway Boards. Suppose an Engineer appointed under this system where the line is executed by the railway company and not by contract. He requires materials to be sent from England:—First, he applies to the Agent or Committee in India; then the Agent goes to the Government Consulting Engineer; the Consulting Engineer goes to the Governor in Council; and, if he approve, the application comes back to—1. Your Consulting Engineer—2. Your Railway Agent: who sends on to (1) the Board in London; who, (2) send on to the Consulting Engineer, who, if he approve, gets tenders, and the Board (3) send it on to (4) the India Company's Board, who send it on to (5) the Board of Control, and (6) so back to India. This was the course in England. In India all the plans and drawings of works were submitted (1) to the Government Engineer, who (2) submits to the Local Government, who approve or discuss before the work is begun. All this is done in long letters, and in true red-tape style, hanging up work, often for months and years. Now, he declared unhesitatingly that if such a system were adopted in this country, or in America—if it were employed in our banks, or our commercial houses, or in any large trade—the business of the country could not be carried on, and the word “progress” would soon be obliterated from our vocabulary. Referring again to the Madras Report, he found in this book hundreds of pages filled also with small details, down almost to the glazing of a window, some most startling facts. The military engineer in this case was a Colonel Pears, no doubt a good military engineer, but clearly quite unaccustomed to the employment and utilization of labour as a commercial question. The gallant colonel was at sea when he attempted railways. The Madras Railway, slow as had been its progress, had been held up as an example, and its staff of engineers would have long ago completed the works if they had been let alone. But, in fact, they had been in a state of chronic mutiny ever since they were placed under Colonel Pears. [The hon. Member then read some instances of intermeddling, among them the case of the removal of two bath-rooms or water-closets, which would have cost about £20, which proposal after going through a long routine was finally “approved by the right hon. the Governor in Council.”]

But he had a Report before him from a gentleman well-known in England and in India, namely, the Chairman of the Scinde Railway, which further illustrated the system. In the third Report of the Directors of the Scinde Railway Company it was stated that the Company had been three years in progress, that there was a paid-up capital of £332,000 lying idle, of which £218,000 was in the hands of the East India Company. Nine miles had been surveyed and levelled, when the authorities stopped the proceedings because they had not decided on the exact route to be adopted! Nine lines surveyed (now a tenth) three years time lost, and the India Company in possession of the money! The Reports of other Indian Railway Companies also stated that immense sums of money have been paid up; that a large portion was in the hands of the East India Company; and that a vast deal of money is actually uselessly dispersed over India, in half-finished and straggling works, owing to the suicidal system adopted. He ventured to assert again, and on authority which could not be disputed, that if the India Company would give free scope to the engineering staff, and say to the Railway Companies “complete your lines without more interference,” that in two, or at most three years, every one of the arterial railways of India could be completed. The causes of failure were still at work. The evil continued. The East India Board expended itself in orders, and did not see them carried out. That Board was not yet awake to the dangers surrounding our empire. They were talking when they ought to be acting. There was here a mere physical task to accomplish. Was it to be done? It was easy of execution. If so, and in view of the grievous injury of past delays now so painfully realized, a deep responsibility would rest upon the India Company, on the Railway Companies themselves, and on that House, if every effort were not now made in the right direction. He need not recur to the advantages of railways in a military point of view. That part of his case was admitted, and as to the development of the industrial resources of the country, the Chairman of the East India Company had himself made it a matter of boast in that House, that when once the railway system was at work, heavy articles of produce, the result of native labour, cotton for example, could be conveyed so cheaply, that instead of it costing, as it now did, twice as much as the value of the cotton on the place of its growth to carry it down to the sea, the proportions of cost would be then inverted. In fact, India had, physically speaking, all that was necessary for a rapid and full development, except the means of locomotion and of transit. Cease to keep from her those means, and she would, in spite of mismanagement, and of internal disorders, rise in the industrial scale, and the very measures which promoted her prosperity would consolidate our power. He concluded by moving:—

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “the slow progress of the East Indian Railways involves danger to the Military occupation of India, and retards the development of the industrial resources of that country,” instead thereof.

MR. GILPIN seconded the Motion.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, he hoped the House would not be led away from the question immediately before it (that the Speaker leave the Chair in order to go into Committee of Supply) into a long discussion of Indian railways, which might be in place at the proper opportunity, but was intrusive on the present occasion. He did not think the hon. Gentleman was correct in saying it was a fit subject for the interference of the House. The Government had always considered it as a question of private commercial enterprise; and, with regard to any impediments by the Court of Directors or the Board of Control, the House should recollect the slight fact of the Indian Government guaranteeing five per cent. upon a very large outlay. Under those circumstances they would materially neglect their duty if they did not exercise some supervision over the expenditure of the money. In some instances it appeared that the railway companies contemplated the squandering of money in the most lavish manner, and the Indian Government were, therefore, completely justified in exercising the most minute supervision. The beginning of railways in India was in 1849, and the amount of capital upon which the Government had guaranteed interest was £30,230,000. Nearly £12,000,000 had been already expended, and the whole guarantee of interest might prove a considerable charge on the Indian Exchequer. It was perfectly true that the Indian Government had declined to guarantee some smaller lines at present; and in that judgment the Government at home entirely concurred, as it properly thought that the great trunk lines should be first finished. The means of conveying troops throughout the whole of India would undoubtedly be a great advantage at the present moment; but the charge which had just been made against the Indian Government by the hon. Member for Yarmouth (Mr. Watkin), was inconsistent with the complaint preferred a few nights ago by the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Kershaw), that the Indian Government had devoted the railways in that country to military and political, and not to commercial purposes. The complaint of the hon. Member for Stockport might, perhaps, be plausibly advanced against the Indian Government, but that Government was not at all open to the reproach of the hon. Member for Yarmouth. It had confined itself to the construction of certain trunk lines, and those lines had made more rapid progress than was exhibited in the same time in England at the beginning of railways. So far from the Indian Government wishing to keep the money which had been lodged in their hands by the railway companies it would be only too glad if the companies would receive possession of it and make the railways as fast as they could. The companies would have every assistance from him in the prosecution of their undertaking. It was their own fault that so little progress had hitherto been made. The impediments which the hon. Member for Yarmouth said had been thrown in their way arose from a proper supervision of an expenditure of which no small part was borne by the Indian Government, but in all other respects the Government was ready to allow them to proceed at any pace they pleased, and, as far as he was concerned, the more progress they made the better. If the Indian Government had undertaken to construct the railway itself, complaint might fairly have been made that it was not going fast enough; but the construction of the lines had been left entirely to private companies, and it was their duty to proceed as rapidly as they could. His own opinion was, that if, at the commencement of the railways, there had been a Board of Supervision to look after the whole of them, and take care that they were made more for the public advantage than for private profit, a better state of things would have existed now; but the appointment of such a board would have been met with a great outcry, and, therefore, the task of constructing Indian railways had been intrusted to private companies. Matters having been so arranged, he denied the position of the hon. Member for Yarmouth, that any impediment had been thrown in the way of the private companies by the Indian Government, which, on the contrary, desired nothing more than the speedy completion of the railways it had guaranteed to so large an amount. He trusted that hon. Members would be content with that assurance, and, without continuing the debate any further, would allow the House to go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. Vernon Smith

MR. R. W. CRAWFORD said that, connected as he had been with the establishment of railways in India, and presiding as he now did over the East India Railway Company, he could not allow the present opportunity to pass without saying a few words in reply to the statements of the hon. Member for Great Yarmouth, (Mr. Watkin). He thought that the attack which had been made upon the railway companies for the failure of their efforts to complete their works within a reasonable time was very unfair, and he should submit some facts to the House which would show that the hon. Gentleman had taken very little trouble to inform himself of the real circumstances. The East India Railway Company was established for the purpose of constructing a line of about 1,100 miles in length. In 1849 it entered into a contract for that object with the East India Company; in 1851 it was put into possession of the land, and in 1855 it opened 123 miles of railway—a rate of progress which might bear a favourable comparison with the best examples of railway enterprise in England. Nor was that all. So far from its being true, as the hon. Member for Great Yarmouth had stated, that no progress had been made beyond the 123 miles already opened, the company had at the present moment in active construction no fewer than 900 miles of railway, and during the course of last year the large sum of £1,700,000 was expended on the line, of which £523,000 was laid out upon the permanent way and bridges. In addition to that, the company had spent nearly a quarter of a million in sending out rails and other heavy materials. He did not think that the East India Company was in the slightest degree amenable to the charges which had been preferred against it by the hon. Member for Yarmouth; on the contrary, he believed that the success of the railway companies was owing in a great degree to the able and conciliatory manner in which Sir James Melvill had exercised the supervision with which he had been intrusted by the East India Company. At the same time, he admitted that the conduct of the local authorities in India was often not of the most judicious kind. Their interference was often of a petty and almost ridiculous character; and it certainly might be said that great circumlocution did prevail in India; for instance, the Madras Company was called upon to despatch an express train, but it could not be done without the sanction of the superintending engineer. To obtain that sanction occupied two days, so that the order to despatch the express train came two days after it was required. He was quite alive to the appeal which had been made for going into Committee, and therefore, upon that and other topics connected with Indian railways, he would reserve the observations which he wished to address to the House until the President of the Board of Control brought forward his annual budget.

Mr. C. GILPIN said, that the speech of the hon. Member for Yarmouth (Mr. Watkin) had accomplished, at least, one good object—it had elicited from the President of the Board of Control a statement which could not fail to be satisfactory to every Member of the House. The right hon. Gentleman had declared himself willing to give a full and fair course to private enterprise, and if that were done there was every reason to expect that the railways of India would be pushed forward with as much vigour as those of other countries. In 1853 a Bill passed the Canadian Legislature for the construction of the Grand Trunk Railway in Canada, and in 1856 no less than 853 miles of railway were opened. From a Report of the railway with which the hon. Member for London, (Mr. R. W. Crawford) was connected, it appeared that 88 miles were opened. [Mr. CRAWFORD.—One hundred and twenty three.]—Well, possibly now it may be 123 miles. At the same time he would observe, that when the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Crawford) said that the hon. Member for Yarmouth had taken up this question lightly, he was never more mistaken in his life. No man had taken greater pains with railway matters than his hon. Friend (Mr. Watkin). No man's opinion deserved to be held in higher estimation upon such questions. And it was, first of all, his knowledge of railway matters, and secondly, his sincere and warm interest in all that concerned India that induced him to bring forward the present Motion. He hoped, however, that his hon. Friend would be satisfied with the explanations which had been given, and would not press the Question to a division. For himself, he readily owned that he had seconded the Motion, not with any special reference to the military occupation of India, but from a strong desire to see commercial enterprise progressing there, and from a conviction that such progress was intimately and closely connected with the welfare of our Indian empire, and its restoration to peace and prosperity. Before resuming his seat he would say just one word as to the comparison which had been entered into between the first beginnings of railways in England and India. It had been argued that if a comparison were instituted between the development of railways in the two cases, it would be found that the progress of railways in India had not been so much delayed. Now, that was not a fair comparison, for when railways were first set on foot in England, everything was new to the engineer; whereas in India, these gentlemen were able to commence their work with the experience of the whole world to guide them; therefore, that which might have been fair progress in England twenty years ago, was very slow and dilatory in these days.

COLONEL SYKES said he would content himself with expressing a hope, that in a few days such facts and figures would be laid before the House as would save it from the repetition of the present most discursive discussion.

MR. AYRTON said, he could not but consider the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Watkin) to be entirely out of place in his present complaint. Whatever had been the past conduct of the Indian Government, he felt bound to admit that in recent times its efforts to promote railway enterprise had been greatly extended; for although up to the present moment there had been only constructed a very small extent of railways, still there was a very large extent in the course of construction. He should be sorry if the statement of the hon. Member for Yarmouth (Mr. Watkin) was to go forth without correction, namely—that the 280 miles actually constructed represented the whole of the railway enterprise in India. On the contrary, he (Mr. Ayrton) found that in addition to the 1000 miles under construction in Bengal, there were under construction in Bombay, leading into the interior, no less than 224 miles of railway, from Madras no less than 300 miles, and from Surat about 100 miles; while beyond that some 2,000 miles additional had been surveyed, with the intention of completing different sections as arrangements were completed. It was, therefore, wrong to say that the Government of India had been remiss in its duty; on the contrary, he was sorry to say that the administration of India, being of the weakest and most vacillating character, it was being driven too much in an opposite direction, and by the force of public opinion they were being driven to construct railways with too much rapidity; for if railways were pressed with an over-rapidity, the expense of their construction would be greatly enhanced, and they would run the danger of disorganising the labouring population of the country, by creating and congregating in a few spots a class of labourers at high wages, who, when the demand for their labour had ceased, would be placed in circumstances of great distress. Upon the whole, he thought it would be much better to investigate the administration of the Indian Government when the question was brought generally under review by the President of the Board of Control. As for the deficiency of railway communication having influenced recent events in India, he would only say, that he thought the cause of the unhappy results which had been witnessed must be sought in a totally different direction.

MR. PLATT said, that having received frequent communications from the borough which he had the honour to represent on the subject of the production of cotton in India, with which the development of railway communication in that country was so intimately connected, he might be suffered to offer a few observations to the House on the present occasion. The hon. Member below him (Mr. Ayrton) seemed to complain that the work of railway construction had gone on too rapidly in India. Now, in order to disabuse the hon. Gentleman's mind of such an impression he would supply him with some statistics connected with the Great India Peninsular line. He believed that that line was first brought under the notice of the Board of Control in 1844. However, the Bill was not introduced into the House of Commons until 1845, when it fell to the ground because of the opposition of the East India Company. Well, the scheme remained in abeyance until 1848. When the Bill was permitted to pass, what was the result? Why, the contracts were made in 1849, and now in 1857 just eighty-eight miles of railway were opened. Now, he would ask the House whether that bore any comparison with the progress of railway enterprise in either England or America? It was proved before the Select Committee which had been appointed to consider the growth of cotton in India, that the cotton had to be brought down from the plantations, a distance of 400 miles, on the backs of bullocks to the sea-coast, and that the cost of that carriage actually doubled the price of the cotton, while if good roads were made, we should receive cotton at a cheaper rate, and in return find a market for our manufactured goods. The value of our cotton exportation he found stated at between £36,000,000 and £38,000,000 a year; but it would be well if the House understood that at that moment they were paying £10,000,000 more than they ought for cotton. Now, that made the value of our exports appear very much more than it really was, or at all events, it did not follow that the profits to this country with an increased export were greater than before. He believed, on the contrary, the position of the manufacturing interest in Lancashire at the present moment to be very unsatisfactory, and that the difference between the price of the cotton and the profit of the manufacturer was less than at any previous period. The consumption of cotton in this country was increasing year by year, while the supply did not proceed in an equal ratio. In other lands the supply did not equal the demand. The United States of America supplied seven-eighths of the cotton consumed by England, while the increase of slave labour there was but very gradual, and even that increase must sooner or later come to a stand-still. If that were so, it behoved them to look to other countries for a supply of cotton, and to India they ought to turn their eyes in the first instance; but there the difficulty was how to bring the cotton down to the sea-coast. At the same time the production of cotton in India was accompanied with difficulties unknown to America; in India the climate greatly interfered with the work, and in consequence it became necessary that certain works of irrigation should be undertaken by the Government. In conclusion, he begged to assure the House that the greatest anxiety, he might almost say alarm, existed in the manufacturing districts with respect to the future supply of cotton. He believed that that anxiety was well founded, and that the only way of escaping from the difficulty was by connecting the cotton districts in India with the coast by means of railways, and by proceeding with works of irrigation, which, as the East India Company was the landlord of that country, it ought to undertake.

Mr. C. Gilpin.

MR. WILLOUGHBY said, he hoped he could show that the East India Company had not been wanting in its efforts to promote the construction of railways in India. He had been connected with the first railway ever constructed in India, and therefore he thought he might be justified in calling in question some of the statements of the hon. Member for Yarmouth, (Mr. Watkin). In the first place let him observe that it was not until the 31st of October, 1850, that an attempt had been made to introduce railways into India, and that therefore the period during which the work of railway construction had been going on in India was only six and a half years instead of fourteen years. In fact the honour had devolved on him of turning the first sod of the first railway commenced in India on the date above mentioned. Well, what next? The East India Company have already sanctioned trunk lines of railway extending in the aggregate to 3,695 miles, of which upwards of 300 miles have been opened. The estimated outlay already sanctioned is £28,231,000, of which £14,196,287 has been paid into the Company's treasury. It is a fallacy to estimate the future progress of railways by what has been effected during the last six years, for he would beg the House to bear in mind how much greater the results of the next six years would be than those of the preceding term. He believed that the system on which the Indian railways were being constructed was much more perfect than any other, because it combined the energies of the private capitalist with the control and authority of a disinterested Power—but he ought not to say a disinterested Power, because the East India Company were interested in the speedy construction of railways in India. Happy would it have been for England if the same controlling influence had been brought to bear upon the organization of her railway system, for then, indeed, shareholders would not have had to lament the fact that the average interest received on railway stock in this country was only £3 12s. 4d., or under 3½ per cent. We hope to do better than this in India.

MR. WATKIN announced his intention to withdraw the Motion.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY.—THE PERSIAN AND CHINESE WAR.

(1.) £500,000, Persian Expedition.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Although the debate of last night related to the proceeding of the Government on the subject of the Persian war, and did not relate directly to the policy of that war, yet before the debate closed that subject received so much discussion that the whole evening was devoted to it. The Committee, therefore, will perhaps hardly wish me to ask their attention to any detailed exposition of the accounts upon which I ask for this Vote. I will then merely state that the view which Her Majesty's Government have taken of the Persian war has been that it was mainly a war to maintain the independence of the town of Herat. That was not merely the opinion of the present Government, but the same view was entertained by a succession of previous Governments, who regarded it as a recognised principle, and treated it as a cardinal object of Asiatic or Oriental policy. Seeing, then, that the independence of Herat was threatened, and that the town was actually occupied by Persian troops, we felt justified in instructing the Indian Government to send an expedition to the Gulf of Persia, following in that respect a course which had previously been rewarded with success in a like state of circumstances. I will not trouble the House by re-discussing the policy of this war. I will merely say that were it not for the existence of our Indian possessions the occupation of Herat by Persia would be a matter wholly unimportant and insignificant to this country. It would not more directly concern English interests than a conquest effected in the centre of Africa by the Kingdom of Timbuctoo or of Dahomey. It is only in consequence of our possessions in India that the town of Herat is of importance to us. Her Majesty's Government, therefore, would have been justified in following the precedent of the former war in Affghanistan by imposing the whole expense of that war upon the Indian treasury. Looking, however, to the general policy of Asia and to the circumstances of general interest which characterize the expedition to the Persian Gulf, the Government felt justified in undertaking to repay to the Indian Government one half of the extraordinary expenses of the war, in the event of Parliament sanctioning that arrangement. I need scarcely say that the undertaking of the Government could only be conditional upon the assent of Parliament being subsequently obtained. Therefore, of course, with regard to the financial part of the subject, the view which was taken was this, that the war should be carried on by an expedition from Bombay, and that the expense of that expedition should be defrayed by the Indian treasury. It now becomes our duty, if the House should be prepared to ratify the engagement entered into on behalf of the Government, to repay to the Indian treasury one-half of the extraordinary expenses of the war. No time is fixed for repayments of that sort to take place. And I may here observe that at this moment there is a considerable unsettled account between Her Majesty's Government and the East India Company, arising out of the last Chinese war, which was concluded many years ago; and I may add that it will be the duty of my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury, before this Committee is closed, to ask this House to agree to a vote for the remaining account with respect to the old China war. I am happy, however, to say that that merely involves an adjustment of accounts, inasmuch as the East India Company owes the Government a sum equal to the money due on that account. Nevertheless, it is a fact that that account has not been finally adjusted, and can only be brought to a conclusion by a Vote of this House. Early in the Session, before I was able to obtain any precise view of the probable cost of the war, I stated that I thought it would be sufficient to repay to the East India Company a sum of, I think, £365,000 for the expenses of the war in the Persian Gulf, up to the 1st of April last. At that time I was unable to anticipate the probable duration of the war, and the estimate was taken at that low amount. Subsequently we have been enabled to obtain from the East India Company the probable estimate of the ultimate total expenses of the war. But I may state to the House that that is still only an estimate, and must not be regarded as a final settlement, inasmuch as the accounts have not been made out, and the Company is not yet in possession of the final cost of the war. A short time ago I received from the East India Company an assurance that if the sum of £500,000 were paid in the course of this Session that would be as much as would be needed for the wants of the treasury of the Company, and accordingly I have laid upon the table an Estimate to that amount. The total sum which will ultimately be due to the East India Company on this account will, however, exceed £500,000. The estimate on the table exhibits a total of £1,865,000, one-half of which, according to the present engagement, is due by our Exchequer to the East India Company, making, therefore, a sum somewhat exceeding £900,000. The amount which I proposed to vote to the East India Company this Session was £500,000, leaving a balance, according to this Estimate, of about £400,000. But since this Estimate was laid on the table I have had a communication from the Chairman of the East India Company, stating that the late advices received from India, with regard to the loss of money from their treasuries, together with the probable interruption which the collection of the revenue may sustain, will render it convenient that a larger sum should, with the consent of the House, be voted on this account in the present Session. Therefore, I merely mention that all I ask the Committee to grant this evening on this account is a sum of £500,000. But I think it not improbable that I may feel it my duty to present a supplementary Estimate to the extent of £300,000 or £400,000, in order to repay to the East India Company the whole of the money they have advanced on this account. It may be convenient that I should explain to the Committee at the same time the other Vote which I have to propose—viz., a Vote of credit for the military and naval operations in China. The House has already been informed that orders have been sent out to Singapore to divert from their destination, Hong Kong, a portion of the regiments despatched to that station, and, indeed, that Viscount Canning had anticipated the intentions of the Government by addressing a letter to Lord Elgin on that subject. We therefore expect that a considerable part of the military force destined for China will now be diverted to India; and under these circumstances a portion of the expenses of those regiments will fall not upon the English, but upon the Indian Treasury. The Committee are aware that when the Queen's troops are required by the East India Company for service in India their expense is defrayed by the finances of that country. Therefore, I shall not find it necessary to ask the Committee to agree to so large a sum as £500,000 as a Vote of credit for the China service. I shall ask only for £400,000, which I believe will be sufficient both for the extraordinary naval and military services upon that station; and instead of asking for that £100,000 for the China service, my right hon. Friend at the head of the Admiralty has laid on the table a supplementary Vote of £98,000 for the navy. So that the £100,000 which will be taken from the China Vote will appear in the shape of a supplementary Estimate for the naval service; but the total sum for the two Votes will not be exceeded. Having explained these two Votes to the Committee, I may now be permitted to remark that exaggerated apprehensions seem to exist as to the probable pressure upon the English Exchequer from the recent occurrences in India. It would, of course, now be premature to anticipate the consequences of those events, either in a political or in a financial point of view; but, whatever additional military force may be furnished to India is a burden upon the Indian Treasury, and its cost will not be borne by England. As at present advised, we do not look forward to the necessity of calling upon this House to incur any additional expenditure on account of the military reinforcements sent to India. I understand it is supposed that it may be requisite to make great demands on the English Exchequer for this purpose; but at present I do not anticipate any such necessity. It would, of course, now be vain to speculate as to the future; but as now advised, Her Majesty's Government do not contemplate the probability of asking the House this Session to agree to any additional Estimates beyond what I have just stated—viz., £500,000 for the repayment to the East India Company of the expenses of the Persian war; possibly a further grant of £300,000 or £400,000 for the same service; a vote of credit for the China service of £400,000; and a supplementary naval Estimate of £100,000. I do not apprehend that beyond these charges there will be any occasion to call on this House for increased funds on account of the late occurrences in India. Having given these explanations with respect to the charges upon the Exchequer of this country, it is now my duty to show that there are ways and means to meet those additional charges, inasmuch as the expenditure which I am asking the House to sanction is considerably in excess of the estimate of revenue made by me, at the beginning of last Session, in the month of February last. I think I can satisfy the Committee that the Exchequer will furnish ample provision for these additional charges. The estimate which I gave of the expenditure, for the financial year ending on the 1st of April last, exceeded what turned out to be the actual expenditure by no less a sum than £1,860,000. That is to say, taking the excess of the receipts of last year, together with the decrease of the actual expenditure below the amount I had anticipated, there was a gain to the public beyond my calculations of £1,860,000. This includes both the excess in the revenue and the diminution in the expenditure. In addition to this sum there has been a gain upon tea, coffee, and sugar in the last quarter, beyond the amount at which I estimated these branches of the revenue, of about £500,000. The fall in the duties which took place on the 1st of April last caused the holders of those articles to retain them in bond until the reduced scale came into operation. This has thrown a receipt of about half a million more than I reckoned upon into the returns for the last quarter. Since that period the malt duty has likewise been more productive than the Revenue Department estimated it, to the extent of half a million. Therefore, up to the present time the Exchequer is richer than I calculated it would be when I made my financial statement in February last by the sum of £2,860,000. Against this sum there are certain charges by way of set-off which were not estimated by me in the beginning of last Session. Those charges are:—The Sound Dues Redemption, £1,135,000; the addition to my Estimate for the Persian expedition, £235,000; the naval and military operations in China, £400,000; the supplementary Vote for the navy, £100,000; and the Princess Royal's dowry, which was not estimated, £40,000. These sums added together make £1,910,000, to which I add a further sum of £300,000 for the remaining expenses of the Persian expedition. This gives a total of £2,210,000, against a gain of £2,860,000. The Committee will therefore see that the Exchequer is in a condition to meet the charges for which I ask them now to provide. I would also call attention to the fact that the state of things which I have indicated is actually realised. It does not depend upon estimate. And it would not be unreasonable to expect a gain upon some branches of the revenue beyond that which I have estimated for the remaining portion of the year. Under these circumstances I trust that the Committee will agree to the Vote which I now place in the Chairman's hands.

Mr. WALPOLE: Before any Vote is taken on this question, there are one or two points to which I desire to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention. Last night I noticed the fact that the sum of £265,000 was the amount which, according to the estimate of the Government, was to be borne by the British Treasury during the present year for the expedition to Persia. I doubted then whether that estimate would not be exceeded, and now it appears that the probable estimate of the expense to be borne by this country is £900,000. These, then, are important facts which ought to have been ascertained by communication with the East India Company before the Estimate was laid upon the table, or a statement made to the House. But notwithstanding this correction, I confess I am puzzled to make out the exact computation upon which either the East India Company or Her Majesty's Government have proceeded. I hold in my hand the accounts of the East India Company, which were laid on the table of the House on the 18th of last month. The second of those accounts is headed, "An Estimate of the Receipts and Expenditure of the Home Treasury of the East India Company, from the 1st of May, 1857, to the 30th of April, 1858;" and under this heading, I find the East India Company taking credit on account of what is coming due to them from the British Government for the expenses of the expedition to Persia, for the sum of—what? Not £900,000, or even £500,000, but only £250,000. This account was laid upon the table on the 18th of June, 1857; and it shows that the East India Company computed the money coming due to them from the British Government at the low figure of £250,000. The first account is an estimate of the disbursements of the home treasury of the East India Company from the 1st of May, 1856, to the 30th of April, 1857, and no credit is taken there for any money paid to the East India Company on the part of the British Government on account of the Persian war. But when I come to the second account of all the money paid by the British Government to the East India Company on account of the Persian expedition, from the 1st of May, 1857, to the 30th of April, 1858, I find no larger sums taken credit for than £250,000. I am far from saying that this is not capable of explanation, but I say that these papers having been laid upon the table of the House, and what is something like an inaccurate statement appearing in them, some explanation ought to be given to the Committee. In the course of the other observations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I think he a little, more or less, mixed up two Votes together. The Estimate for the China war, which was laid upon the table only last week, was £500,000. Now, if the Chinese war is to be prosecuted for the purpose of obtaining the satisfaction which the Government think is due to the country, and if they thought that £500,000 was necessary for that purpose last week, I should be extremely sorry if they hampered themselves by taking a smaller sum than that now, merely because they want the other £100,000 to pay some expenses on account of India. Whether that £500,000 is, or is not required, of course Government can better explain than I can. If it is wanted, all I can say is that I hope you will not cripple yourselves in the endeavour to get that satisfaction which you think is due to this country. For although I entirely disagree in the policy of all this Chinese business, yet once embarked in it, the credit and honour of the country are at stake unless you get the reparation to which you think you are entitled. With regard to the £100,000 which is to go to pay part of the expenses of the naval force you propose to send to India, on that part of the question the observations I am about to make do not so much affect the British Treasury as the charges to be borne by the East India Company. One million of money will have to be borne for the Persian expedition. In addition to that, there will be a great expenditure necessary to be borne for putting down the unfortunate revolt which has taken place in India. If I recollect rightly, the East India Company at this moment has got an expenditure higher than the receipts by very nearly £2,000,000 of money; according to these figures, therefore, there will be somewhere between three and four millions charged upon the finances of the East India Company over and above the probable receipts which that Company will have to meet those charges. Now, the right hon. Gentleman observed that he thought there would be no further demand upon the Treasury of England for those expenses which will necessarily have to be incurred in India; and I think before we assent to this Vote we ought to be safe in our calculations upon that point; for unless I am very much mistaken, you will find that you must allow something more for these great operations, which are necessarily going on, and which you will have to meet, for the East India Company will not be able to bear them. In calling attention to these points, I do not wish to raise any great controversial questions; still less do I wish to cripple the hands of the Government. On the contrary, I wish to strengthen them. But I do think, having pointed out these seeming inaccuracies in the Estimates hitherto propounded to us, we ought to be sure, as sure as we can be, what further expenditure is likely to be borne by this country; for, I do not think, if I am right in my observations, that the sum the right hon. Gentleman requires will be sufficient for the purposes for which they are intended, and that he will have to ask for further Votes of credit or Votes of money.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it did not appear to him that there was necessarily any inaccuracy in the returns presented by the East India Company, of the existence of which he was not previously aware. No doubt their estimate was founded upon the announcement which they received at the beginning of the year, that the sum to be repaid to them on account of the expenses of the Persian war before a certain day would be £250,000. But since that time an arrangement had been made upon which the estimate on the table was founded to repay a sum of half a million; and that would have been the total demand which the Government would have made on Parliament during the present Session if it were not for the recent unhappy occurrences in India. This had altered the financial position of the East India Company, and would probably make it desirable that the Government should lay upon the table a supplementary Estimate on the subject. He was not aware that the term "inaccuracy" was deserved. It appeared to him that the circumstance to which the right hon. Gentleman referred was merely an evidence of a change of intention.

SIR ERSKINE PERRY said, that the independence of Herat was the cause of the Affghan war, which cost the country £20,000,000, and inflicted upon us much disaster and disgrace. The Persian war of 1856 was founded upon the same policy: but although the Government upheld this view, he did not believe that it was a sound policy to pursue, or that the opinion of the Government had been entertained by the greatest Indian Statesmen. Herat had been called the gate of India, but it was many hundred miles from our frontier, and it was separated from our territory by a tract of country of the strongest possible character, containing amongst other obstacles the Bolan and Khyber passes, the military strength and importance of which we knew too well. It should be remembered in justice to Persia that the importance of the City of Herat was very great to that power, and he thought that if the Committee were to suppose that we could maintain an independent Government or an independent chief at Herat, they would be giving way to a delusion. That city was now occupied by Persia, and if the report were correct the Shah had applied for a reinforcement of British soldiers, in order to aid him in turning out his own troops. The Affghans were the most untrustworthy of men. In his opinion, the policy which ought to be adopted towards Persia by this country had been admirably shadowed forth by Lord Cowley to Ferukh Khan in February last, when he had stated that we desired to see Persia strong, flourishing, and independent. Let that policy, then, be pursued, and let them not by continual interference with her mar the good effect which such a course was calculated to produce. If it were true that the Sadir Azim were the Lord Palmerston of Persia, then his authority should not be weakened, and now that we had ended our second war with that Power, he trusted we should not be over solicitous to plunge into a war to uphold the independence in the insignificant town of Herat of an Affghan cut-throat.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE expressed his satisfaction at the circumstance that the Treasury of this country was about to bear some portion of the expense connected with the prosecution of the Persian war, inasmuch as some security would thereby be afforded against embarking in contests which in reality did not tend to the promotion of British interests. As to the occupation of Herat by Persia, he could only say that, in his opinion, that city was too far removed from India to give rise to any well-founded apprehension in reference to the safety of our possessions in the East. It was, however, but natural that considerable jealousy should prevail in this country upon that point, inasmuch as no sooner had Herat become subject to Persia than Russia would by treaty possess a right to have an agent there, and would thus be afforded an opportunity of pushing her intrigues, and carrying out those designs against India which she was supposed to entertain. But while we looked with suspicion upon Russia, why was it that our policy tended to break down every barrier between that country and India? We had, by our conduct in Affghanistan, earned for ourselves the hatred and detestation of the Affghan chiefs, and the wild tribes by which that region was inhabited. We had done our utmost, too, to destroy the military power of Persia, and to lay her more prostrate than ever at the feet of Russian aggression. The course which we had in those respects pursued he could not help regarding as unfortunate. He was strongly of opinion that we should have acted more wisely if, instead of weakening, we had strengthened the resources of the Persian empire, and if we had not exhibited that extreme jealousy with respect to the occupation of a position of so much importance to her as Herat which we had displayed. But, to pass from the consideration of our relations with Persia to the position of India, he felt bound to say that in the sanguine expectations which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to entertain with respect to the state of that empire, he, for one, could by no means participate. The intelligence which had lately been received from that country had filled him with anxiety, and he feared that even the fall of Delhi, of which we might expect to hear by the next mail, would not be sufficient to justify the hope that the mutiny among the native troops had been completely extinguished. It had spread much too far to be so easily put down. It extended from the Punjab to Rohilcund, Oude, and throughout the whole of Central India; and, with that fact before them, bearing in mind, too, the season of the year, and the circumstance that there was but a mere handful of British troops upon the spot, the utmost we could reasonably expect was that those troops should be able to maintain their line of communications through the wide range of territory lying between Calcutta and the north-western frontier, a distance of 1,500 miles, until the reinforcements came to their aid. With the cooler season they might be able to strike a determined blow. Meanwhile, the greatest difficulty would be experienced in the collection of the revenue, in consequence of the want of trustworthy native soldiers; the revenue derived from opium would be greatly diminished, owing to the present unhappy state of affairs; and, under these circumstances, from what quarter the Governor General was to obtain his necessary supplies, unless the Government at home were to come to his assistance, he (Sir E. Colebrooke) could not understand. He trusted, therefore, that Her Majesty's Ministers would be prepared to take that course; and he felt assured that in doing so they would be manfully supported by that House and by the country.

Sir Erskine Perry

MR. AYRTON said that the right hon. Gentleman had told the Committee that Her Majesty's Government had sent directions to India to the effect that half of the expenses of the Persian war were to be borne by the Indian Treasury, and half by the British Government. Now, so far as he knew, the statutes relating to the Government of India expressly set forth the purposes for which the revenues of that country were vested in the East India Company, and made no provision whatever that those revenues should be placed at the disposal of the Government of this country; and he wished, therefore, to ascertain from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer by what authority the Government could send out an order to India to apply the revenues of that empire to British purposes in anticipation of a Vote of Parliament? The question was one of great constitutional importance, inasmuch as it involved the consideration of enabling the Chancellor to avoid asking Parliament for a grant of money by drawing upon resources which it had never been intended by the Legislature to place at his disposal. He believed such an application to be wholly contrary to law; but if it were not, he thought the system of administration of the affairs of India ought to undergo a thorough revision.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that though he believed there would be a deficiency in the Indian revenues, he did not think this the proper time to discuss the point. The question before the Committee was, whether they should vote half a million for the expenses of the Persian war, and we thought it would be very inconvenient to enter into the larger subjects which had been introduced. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, however, in proposing that Vote, had challenged observation upon the important question of the general state of the ways and means of this country, and had stated that he had £2,800,000 in hand undisposed of. He (Sir H. Willoughby) could not take the same sanguine view of the public finances as the right hon. Gentleman had done, and would remind the Committee that £9,000,000 of income-tax had fortunately come into receipt this year, but for which the surplus of £2,800,000 would have been a deficiency of £6,200,000. With respect to the Vote of £500,000, he thought that the Committee were placed in rather a painful position; because they must not fancy that they were about to vote supplies in the ordinary manner—they had not the grace of offering supplies to the Crown—but they had merely to pay a Bill and to ratify an expenditure already incurred. He complained that when the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the spring of this year, had stated that the amount required for this Vote would be £265,000, he must have known that a much larger estimate had been prepared, but that he had kept back that estimate until the last moment. Even now it was only by accident that the Committee had become aware that the whole expense would amount to £1,865,000; and he contended that it was not right to treat the Committee in such a manner when so large an item of expenditure was involved. Good faith, however, must be kept, and he felt that he had nothing to do upon the present occasion but to support the Vote for the £500,000. In conclusion, he wished to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer from what source it was proposed to pay the armaments which were about to be sent to India. Was there to be an additional estimate for the expense of sending 10,000 or 12,000 men to India; was a debt to be incurred, or how was it to be provided for?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I will first answer the question of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton), which he seemed to think was a very formidable one, but which I believe admits of a very simple answer. The hon. Member asked by what authority the English Government proposed a charge upon the Indian revenue, and he said that the statutes in force did not give them the power of making any such demand. I apprehend that the course taken is this:—The President of the Board of Control, by the authority vested in him by statute, has through the secret committee of the Court of Directors, the power of sending out instructions to the Indian Government, either to make war or for any other purpose. When he has sent those instructions to the Indian Government, they, by their authority, carry them into effect, and if those instructions involve any expense, then by their authority that expense is incurred. That, I believe, is the course adopted in this matter, which the constitution, established many years ago with respect to Indian affairs, altogether sanctions. In answer to the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham (Sir H. Willoughby),

I have to state that according to law the East India Company have to bear the whole expence of sending troops from this country and of maintaining them in India. There is, however, a question under consideration, which is not yet determined, and that is whether it would be equitable with regard to those troops whose destination was originally China, but which have now been diverted to India, that the whole expence should fall on the East India Company?

MR. GLADSTONE: My right hon. Friend in the statement which he addressed to the Committee, did not confine himself to the particular Vote which we are called upon to give or to withhold this evening; but he added to his remarks upon the Persian Vote other particulars with respect to the China Vote, other most important particulars with respect to the disturbances in India, and, finally, a brief but important reference to the state of his own balances. Although some hon. Members have regretted that other matters should have been introduced into this discussion, I have no doubt that it is for the public convenience, at this period of the Session, that my right hon. Friend should have thus connected the several subjects together, and I shall follow his example, therefore, in the few observations that I have to make. With respect to the subject of Persia and the Persian Vote, I am afraid that few among us have been surprised at the announcement made to-night. We have seen the demand which, in March was £265,000, grow to £500,000, and we now find it advanced to £900,000. That is a tolerably rapid increment for a period of three months. When the £265,000 was first asked for, we were told by many hon. Members what the result would turn out to be, and their vaticinations have been only too accurately fulfilled. With respect to what fell from the hon. and learned Member for Devonport (Sir Erskine Perry), I would only take exception to one single word in the remarks which he made. I think that he made too large an admission when he stated, that the maintenance of the independence of Herat, and preserving it free from subjection to Persia, had been recognised as a cardinal matter of policy by every Government for the last twenty years. I agree with that observation to the extent that it has been recognized as an object to be desired, but having had the honour to be connected with two Governments which have subsisted during the last twenty years, I venture to say that I am not aware of any act that was done by the Governments of Sir Robert Peel or of the Earl of Aberdeen which implied that either of those Governments regarded the maintenance of the independence of Herat as an object which ought to be pursued by England, even to the extremity of war. It is, of course, vain now to dilate upon the subject of the policy of the Persian war. My right hon. Friend has, however, entered into some discussion upon that subject, and into some vindication of the policy of the Government in that respect; but he had one triumphant argument of which he has not availed himself, but which I think he might have adduced as the most conclusive which the case admits of—I mean the argument to be derived from the division which took place last night, when the House of Commons declared, by a majority of ten to one, either that it approved the policy of the Government, or else that, at any rate, it did not consider that that policy deserved an adverse vote. After that division, I do not think that it would be respectful to the Committee if the small and feeble band of dissentients were now to revive that discussion, and I, therefore, shall not attempt to do so, but will proceed to consider the Vote with respect to the Chinese war. We are told that a sum of £400,000 is about to be asked for, but that sum will, I fear, in all probability prove to be a very small fraction of the charge which we have undertaken. It is not often that I take exception to what falls in this House from my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole), but I must most respectfully express my dissent from part of the language which he has this night used. My right hon. Friend has stated that, doubting and differing from the policy which led to the Chinese war, he thought that now we had entered upon it, that now we had, it was to be presumed, made certain demands, the honour and the credit of the country demanded that those demands should, at all hazards, be enforced. Now, Sir, entertaining the opinions which I do with respect to the policy which has been pursued in China, I could not hear those words without respectfully withholding my assent to them. I, Sir, wholly repudiate that policy. Since the meeting of the present Parliament, the transactions which have taken place in China have been characterized by my noble Friend the Member for London, if he has been correctly reported, and I have no reason to suppose otherwise, as flagitious. I entirely concur in that epithet, and I say, without hesitation or qualification, that believing as I do that that designation is a correct one, I cannot admit that because those proceedings have been commenced, therefore they ought to be carried to their natural termination. I must here, Sir, venture to advert to one circumstance upon which I think that it is material that this Committee should be accurately informed. At the time when the transactions which had occurred in China were discussed, it will be recollected that the vindication of the proceedings of the British authorities depended almost entirely upon a single assertion, and that assertion was, the British flag was flying on board the lorcha Arrow at the time she was boarded by the Chinese authorities. That assertion was contested at the time; it was denied by the Chinese authorities, and arguments were advanced in this House to show that there were grave reasons for doubting if such was the case. We were then told that there was not the slightest foundation for any such doubt, that the British flag was flying at the time, and the whole case—such as that case was—depended upon that fact. I did not then consider that the flying of the British flag, even if it were flying, afforded a shade of justification for the proceedings which were adopted; but I am now in possession of new information upon the subject, which the Government, I dare say, can either affirm or correct. I do not say that my information is conclusive, but it has reached me from high authority, and from authority exclusively British, that the British flag was not flying at the time the lorcha was boarded; and that information is coupled with an unequivocal declaration that the British communities of Canton and Hong Kong were perfectly aware that such was the case; in fact, that it was a matter of notoriety that the flag was not flying at the time. I think that this is a subject upon which the Committee ought to receive the fullest information which the Government have it in their power to afford. As regards the charge for the Chinese war, I can only say that, although whenever I see an occasion which affords the slightest hope of stopping proceedings which I believe calculated to bring disgrace upon the country, I shall not be wanting in taking my humble part in endeavouring to effect that result, still, on the present occasion, withholding the money which we are asked to vote would have no effect, and I assume that the Committee is not prepared to adopt that course. I come now to a most important subject, which has been touched upon by my right hon. Friend. The hon. Baronet opposite (Sir H. Willoughby) has made some most just observations in pointing out the false position in which the Committee is placed by being asked in more than one instance to vote money for the expenses of war, not by way of estimate but by way of account, and my right hon. Friend has told us with great ingenuousness that, although this charge for the Persian war has been incurred, yet he would only have called upon us at present to pay some part of the whole charge, but that the financial necessities of the East India Company are so serious that possibly it may be necessary for him to present to the house another Estimate of £400,000. I mention this because it shows that the mind of my right hon. Friend is becoming habituated in the course of his transactions to incurring a bill to be paid by the people of this country without first asking the consent of their representatives, and then sending in that bill to be discharged at such times and in such proportions as will best square with the general state of the public accounts. Whether it be from the policy of the Government or the circumstances of the case, we are unhappily called upon, both in the case of Persia and China, to provide for hostilities undertaken without the concurrence of those whose duty it is to watch the expenditure of the country. I advert to this, because what has fallen from my right hon. Friend inspires my mind with some suspicion, and I wish to express a hope that it may not grow into an usual practice of Government. My right hon. Friend has dropped a few words full of meaning and full of warning. He has very properly referred to the unfortunate disturbances which have occurred in India, and he began by attempting to administer a little comfort, for he made some observations the effect of which was that the charge for the suppression of those disturbances would fall upon the Indian revenue. Now, for my own part, I do not derive so much comfort from that remark as some hon. Gentlemen may do, for I believe in the soundness of the doctrine which was laid down by the late Sir Robert Peel, who maintained that there was a virtual connection between Indian expenditure and British liability. That was a wise, a sound, and significant remark. My right hon. Friend, however, went a little further, and intimated that there was a likelihood—which, unless I am very much mistaken, will in due time grow into the proportion of a fact—of it being necessary to make a direct demand upon the House of Commons in connection with the expenditure necessary for the suppression of those disturbances in India. I do not think that I misunderstood my right hon. Friend, but if I did I shall be obliged to him if he will correct me. I am far from saying that my right hon. Friend would be wrong in making such a demand, but what I wish to point out to the Committee is that he has told us, by way of comfort, that it will not be necessary to make that demand during the present Session of Parliament. Now, from that statement, I for one am rather likely to gather matter for complaint than for comfort. If the Government thinks that the finances of the East India Company are in such a state as to require support, the wise and constitutional course—the course which practice and expedience dictated for them to pursue—would have been to come down at once to the House of Commons and ask for an advance. It would not have been necessary to settle the ultimate liability, for that question might have been reserved until we receive a more full information as to the cause of these disturbances. Prima facie there appears to be a connection between those disturbances and the measures of the Government with regard to sending troops from India to Persia and China, for, if a disposition to revolt did exist in the Bengal army prior to the withdrawal of those troops, no doubt their withdrawal afforded an opportunity for that disposition to display itself. What I say is this—that it is only fair to the House of Commons, if the Government anticipate that we are to be put to charge on account of these disturbances, that we should have that charge put before us, not by way of an account of charge, but by way of estimate; and I also say that it appears to me, that if we want to strengthen the hands of the East India Company and give vigour to their financial operations, the best course for the Government to pursue, in order to render that support with vigour and promptness, would be at once to ask from the House of Commons that which either my right hon. Friend or some successor in office will ultimately have to demand. I think that the most practical, the most expedient, and the most prudent course to pursue—and the subject is well worthy the attention of the Committee—would be for the Government, if they are of opinion upon the facts, so far as they are known to them, that British aid is necessary to Indian finance, to at once ask the House of Commons to grant that aid. I admit that it would not be convenient, so far as my right hon. Friend's balance for the year is concerned. I thought that there was inconvenience in the manner in which my right hon. Friend stated his account, because he did what I never recollect to have known done before in this House. He brought to the credit of his operations in the present year the surplus of his revenue in the last. Now, a Chancellor of the Exchequer who has a deficiency in any given year is not apt to charge himself with it, and to carry it on to his debt in the next; and, if he does not do that, neither ought he, having a surplus,—if it be a surplus, though it was made from borrowed money—to carry on that surplus, and consider it as part of his available means for the next year. On the contrary, all the surpluses of our annual revenue are, by the well-understood principle of Parliament, appropriated beforehand to the extinction of debt. When we determined to break up the old system of the sinking fund, we said, “We don't mean to give up the steady liquidation of the debt; we mean to trust to our surplus revenue for that purpose.” Well, if the surplus revenue is to be applied to that object it must not be carried on and treated as available ways and means by Chancellors of the Exchequer in future years. As I understand the case of my right hon. Friend, however, he still has a surplus. In the month of March he showed that, as the amount then stood, he should probably have a surplus of £500,000 for the year 1857-58. He has told us to-night, and I heard the statement with great satisfaction, that he will have an improvement upon his estimated revenue—one moiety of it from malt, and the other from tea, sugar, and coffee—to the amount of another million. That gives him a million and a-half to make use of. I think, so far as I understood him, that putting out of view the redemption of the Sound Dues, which was an operation by itself, and for which he provided in a different manner, his extra expenses chargeable against the ways and means of the year come to between £1,100,000 and £1,200,000. There is £635,000 for Persia, £400,000 for China, £100,000 for the supplemental Naval Estimate, and £40,000 for the dowry of the Princess Royal: therefore, my right hon. Friend has still a surplus to show. Undoubtedly, if he were to adopt the suggestion that an advance of money should be asked from Parliament to strengthen the hands of the East India Company for putting down these disturbances, I am afraid that his surplus would go a very little way, and that it would be his duty to make to us in the month of July or August this year one of those disagreeable proposals which he will certainly have to make in the month of March or April in the next. No man likes to anticipate the evil day—my right hon. Friend, I dare say, no better than anybody else. Still I am quite sure that if he agrees with me as to the policy of the case, if he recognizes with me the right of this House to have the first information of coming public charges, and to have the earliest means of exercising its judgment with reference to the manner in which the resources of the country are to be wielded and applied for all purposes, whether military, political, or administrative, he will not be withheld by any motives of the nature which I have described from making such a proposal to the House. At any rate, I join entirely and cordially with my hon. Friend opposite (Sir H. Willoughby) in deprecating that which appears, I am afraid, to be growing rather into a system—viz., the presentation to the House of Commons of military expenditure involving high questions of policy by way of account after the fact, instead of by way of estimate before the fact; and as regards that portion of our proceedings of which the unhappy theatre has been the empire of China, I was unable to allow this Vote to pass without repenting, in however brief yet in emphatic words, the strong sentiments of pain and sorrow with which I must ever regard the transactions of the last few years.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Mr. MANGLES said, that he had returned to the House without intending to address a single word to that Committee, and he laboured under the disadvantage of not having heard the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Notwithstanding this, he could not, after the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford, remain altogether silent. The tone and temper in which the Committee had received the demand made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer for part of the amount which had been advanced by the East India Company for the Persian war, and many of the remarks which he had heard, reminded him very strongly of some lines which he learnt in his youth—

“ It's a very good world we live in,
To lend, or to spend, or to give in ;
But to beg or to borrow, or ask for our own,
It's the very worst world that ever was known.”

Because the Committee must understand that this grasping East India Company, which came down upon them and made a demand for £500,000, and which had a further demand amounting to more than that sum, had in the first instance advanced the whole amount for them. They merely asked the nation to pay its debts, and the House had no right to treat them in formā pauperis, and say that they gave the money because the East India Company was in such extreme distress, and on account of the recent disturbances. Whether India had been disturbed or not, they must, if they were honest men, have paid what they owed and what was advanced for a war which was theirs and not the Company's. [Cheers from the Opposition benches.] Let him not be misunderstood. He did not mean to say that the Persian war was not undertaken, and honestly undertaken, by the Government in a great measure for Indian purposes. He felt and had always felt, that the possession of Herat by Persia would be most injurious to the integrity and safety of India. He believed that as regarded the possession of Herat—he had nothing to do with Mr. Murray and his quarrel—this was an Indian question; but he maintained that they had no right to say, as had been said by the right hon. Gentleman, that India was, owing to the disturbances, in such a state of impoverishment that she came to England to ask—[Mr. GLADSTONE: No, no! It was the Chancellor of the Exchequer.] He did not hear the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. This, however, he knew, that the East India Company was only asking for the payment of a debt honestly due for money advanced. They did not ask for interest. Hon. Gentlemen smiled at this, but if they had borrowed the money from any other persons they would have had to pay interest. If they had borrowed from the English public they would not have been let off without the payment of interest; but as they borrowed it from the East India Company, which, as he hoped, was part and parcel of the empire itself, it was advanced without interest, and the Company would be quite satisfied and only too glad when they got their principal returned. It was a great object with the East India Company to get this money now, because they annually required from India remittances to the amount of £4,000,000 for the expenses in this country, and at present they were anxious not to draw upon India for a rupee which they could avoid. It was, therefore, a great object to get repaid money which they had advanced in England, and thus diminish pro tanto the amount of their drafts upon India. Whether or not they came to Parliament again to ask the Government to repay the remainder of the sum which they had advanced, they came only as honest creditors, and it was the fault of the Government, not theirs, that this money was to be paid as a bill instead of an estimate. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) had shadowed forth that if the disturbances continued the East India Company might ask for pecuniary assistance from the national Exchequer. Of course, after what had occurred, after the breaking down of the confidence which had, with partial exceptions, been entertained in these Sepoy troops, who from the time of Clive, just 100 years ago, had been universally and proverbially faithful—after that staff upon which we have leant for 100 years had proved a rotten reed in our hands, it was impossible for any man to be so presumptuous as to prophesy with regard to the future; but at present, so far as he could see, he did trust that matters would go no further, and that we should be able to stem the tide of destruction and disaffection—and he was happy to be able to say, in spite of what fell from the hon. Member for Lanarkshire (Sir E. Colebrooke) that, with the most partial exceptions, the disaffection extended only to the troops. Many parts of the country were eminently loyal. It was greatly to the honour of that distinguished man, Sir John Lawrence, who had administered the Punjab since the date at which it fell into our hands, that the people of that country, so recently conquered and annexed to the British dominions, were, up to the date of our latest advices, eminently loyal and true to the British Government. So faithful were they that deserters from the Sepoy regiments who came from Hindostan were caught by the population of the Punjab, and delivered up to our authorities. In no instance had a native of the Punjab shown any disloyalty, or any want of allegiance to his standard or the military oath, and Sir John Lawrence was at this moment raising large levies among the population of that province to join our troops. It was, as he had said, impossible to foresee what might occur, but he hoped and trusted that the finances of India would be able to bear these expenses. So far was public credit in India from being shaken, that the 5 per cent. loan which was now being taken up had drawn more money during the last few weeks than it had done before. Whether the reason of this was that the people having confidence in the stability of the Government, but fearing instability elsewhere, brought their money to the public treasury, he could not say, but the fact was that between the 2nd and 16th of May £47,000 (he spoke from memory) was subscribed in Calcutta alone. The last letter which he received from Lord Elphinstone, not by the last but by a previous mail, stated that the subscriptions in Bombay, had reached £700,000, £30,000 having been subscribed within the last three or four days, and they were going on rapidly. The loan, which it must be remembered was not contracted as in England, but was an open loan, like that raised in France during the late war, had now risen to nearly £2,000,000. As for the losses sustained by the Indian Government, they did not exceed, up to the present moment, from £140,000 to £200,000. It was true that there would be great loss from the difficulty of collecting the revenue in certain districts, but two Presidencies were wholly unaffected and several of the richest districts of Bengal. At the recent sales of opium, too, the prices had been higher than on previous occasions. Therefore, as far as he could see, the Indian Government would not be obliged to make any requisition at present upon England, but if further disastrous events should occur, compelling that Government to apply to this country for money, he was sure the House of Commons would bear in mind that India was an integral and valuable part of the British empire, and would not refuse assistance to those who administered the Indian revenues.

Mr. Mangles

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: As I did not hear my right hon. Friend's former statement, I wish to mention some points in the statement of the right hon. Member for Oxford University (Mr. Gladstone) which certainly deserve explanation; but I think there is some inconvenience in mixing up in this discussion three subjects of great importance. My hon. Friend who has just spoken, addressed himself exclusively to the subject of India, and what I have to say refers to the subject of China. I am not going to speak with respect to the justice or morality of the proceedings conducted there by the British authorities, they have been properly characterized by the right hon. Member for Oxford University; but what I now wish to learn is, the nature of the hostilities which we are to carry on. It is not pleasant to be engaged in a war which one does not consider just; still one wishes the reputation of this country to be maintained. It appears that our authorities in China, some time in October last, attempted hostilities against Canton. From October to the last accounts, some time in May, there has been nothing done which would impress the authorities at Canton with any sense that they must yield to our demands. On the contrary, we had retired from the positions we held some months ago. In letters from persons in that country it was said, that the naval force there was found to be insufficient—I do not mean in amount, but that it was not of a nature calculated to enforce our demands. In those letters it was generally said, that they must have land forces to enable them to get possession of the heights above Canton and Canton itself; to enable them, too, to hold those heights and the city, in order to induce the Chinese authorities there to comply with our demands. Now, two or three nights ago, my noble Friend at the head of the Government was asked what was to be done with the troops sent to China; and I understood him to reply that those troops would be immediately recalled for India, and that orders had been given to Lord Elgin that they should proceed immediately to Calcutta. No one would find fault with that disposition; but my noble Friend went on to say that there would be still quite sufficient force at Canton to enforce compliance with our demands. Now, this raises a question in my mind which I think the Committee will deem of very considerable importance. I can understand very well that our land forces being in the occupation of Canton may make the Viceroy there yield to demands which otherwise he would not concede. The hostilities—because, mind, all the time it is not war;—some hon. Gentlemen on the hustings and elsewhere have declared themselves very vigorously for the prosecution of the war with China, but the Government never said that there was a war—the hostilities, then, would be with Canton, and Canton, no doubt, would fall into our possession; and we shall have a better prospect of obtaining the terms we demand, whatever they may be. But with a naval force, and a naval force alone, our proceedings must be different. I imagine that we may gain some advantage by means of the gunboats sent out there in the destruction of a number of junks which now conceal themselves in the rivers; but the destruction of any number of those worthless junks will probably make no alteration in the disposition of the authorities at Canton. Then, what other means are there of attaining the desired object? You have in the naval force the means of blockading the northern ports; but with them I must say that you have hitherto, notwithstanding the hostilities at Canton, been on terms of peace and amity. Every account shows that that there is no disturbance in those friendly relations, but that, on the contrary, trade is carried on very vigorously with Shanghai, Foochow, and other places, without regard to the hostilities existing between Commissioner Yeh and Sir J. Bowring. Then the question I wish to ask is, whether, having only a naval force and no power but that of blockading the northern ports with the view of obtaining compliance with the demands you made at Canton, you do not, if you take that course, turn the partial hostilities at Canton into war with China; because in that case, no doubt, the Imperial Government must consider the empire attacked. If the ports generally are blockaded, there can be no resource but to make war with China, and to enforce your demands by means of war. The very remarkable phrase of my noble Friend, that though the troops would be diverted from China, still the Government had the means of obtaining all their demands there, appeared satisfactory to the House, but was unsatisfactory to me; for I cannot tell whether it meant that we were to transfer hostilities to the northern ports, and thereby make war with China, or whether it meant something else. I should like also to know what is the present object of these hostilities? We know that the first hostilities took place because the Chinese Commissioner refused to make an apology in writing and to restore the men, taken from the lorcha, on board the lorcha, when they had already been restored at the Consul's residence. Other demands were afterwards made about free entrance into Canton; and these demands were not being complied with. But what the present demands may be, I, for one, am totally ignorant of. When we are going to vote a large sum of money—probably only a prelude to another sum as large, if not greater—it is fit that we should know whether it is meant to go to war with China instead of carrying on hostilities at Canton; and if so, what are the demands we make on China?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON:—My noble Friend and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford retain their opinions as to the proceedings which have taken place in China. They are perfectly welcome to retain those opinions. The people of England have decided the question; and therefore, though my noble Friend thinks those proceedings flagitious, and though the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford, shares that opinion, that is a matter of total indifference to her Majesty's Government. We rest upon the sanction which the people of the United Kingdom have given to these proceedings, and having made an appeal to the country, we are content with the result. The right hon. Gentleman has stated that on account of some wonderful information received from some authority he has not condescended to name, he is satisfied that the flag was not flying on board the lorcha at the time when she was boarded by the Chinese, and he is pleased to say that on the circumstance of the flag flying rested the whole of the Government justification. Now, in the first place, I beg to remind him that it was proved by the evidence of eye-witnesses, that not only was the British flag flying, but also the "Blue Peter," which was a signal that the lorcha was on the point of departure. I beg leave to say, however, that the case did not turn upon the fact of the flag flying, but upon the fact that the lorcha had been lying for several days in the port of Canton, and that the Cantonese knew that she was a British vessel employed for British purposes, and therefore, even if the flag had not been flying, they committed a deliberate violation of international law. I thought my right hon. Friend had had enough of the Chinese question, without perpetually endeavouring to thrust it so unnecessarily into our debates. My noble Friend (Lord John Russell), however, has asked questions which relate much more directly to the subject we are discussing. My noble Friend misunderstood in some degree what he supposes me to have said on a former occasion. I did not say that the troops were withdrawn from China. What I said was that troops which had not arrived in China, but had been despatched to Singapore to await further orders, had been diverted from their intended destination, which was originally China, and that they were to proceed to India. But no orders have been given to withdraw from Hong Kong any troops that have already arrived there, and the troops at that station are stated to be sufficiently numerous for the services which are required from them. The course which the Government are pursuing has already been explained so clearly, that I am surprised my noble Friend should ask for any explanation on the subject. It is well known that Lord Elgin was sent out for the purpose of entering into communications with the central Government at Peking, and that until the result of those communications is ascertained by him, no further operations of any magnitude are to be undertaken at Canton. The season of the year, indeed, would render military operations by land upon any considerable scale undesirable until the commencement of the cool season, and in the interval the negotiations will have taken place. My right hon. Friend, the First Lord of the Admiralty, as was stated the other evening, is about to send a force of marines to reinforce the squadron in the waters of Canton, and a number of gunboats were arriving at the time the last accounts were despatched. My noble Friend says that when these gunboats have arrived they will, perhaps, destroy a fleet of miserable junks. Why, these miserable junks are war junks of considerable magnitude, and in great numbers, which have materially interrupted our communications with Hong Kong; and when the gunboats shall have arrived, I don't think any doubt can be entertained that our admiral will give a very good account of those miserable junks—as my noble Friend is pleased to call them—which, as is well known, are formidable to merchant vessels, although they may not be able to cope with gunboats, which can follow them into shallow water. The course we are pursuing is this. We are not going to make war with the northern ports, which maintain the most friendly relations with British merchants. We are going in the first place to adopt a course which seems most consonant with international usages. Great outrages upon the British flag and upon British subjects have been committed by the local authorities of a port in China, and we shall address ourselves to the Emperor of China for redress and satisfaction. We have sent a special mission from this country for the purpose of entering into negotiations with the Imperial Government, and making demands upon that Government. As my noble Friend properly stated, we are not at war with China at the present moment. There has been a collision between the local authorities, Chinese and British, and Canton and Hong Kong, but that does not of itself constitute war between England and China, and we may hope that the Imperial Government will take such a view of the transaction that it may be ready to afford that satisfaction and redress, which will render war unnecessary. But, at the same time, anticipating the possibility of a different issue, we are sending a military force to Canton, which will enable the commander of the British forces to act against the city of Canton, if the Imperial Government refuse or are unable to give us the satisfaction we demand. We did not think that a temporary diversion of the force which was directed to rendezvous at Singapore would essentially interfere with ultimate operations in China, if they should become necessary. In the present state of affairs, therefore, I can only say that we have taken measures for opening negotiations with the Imperial Government at Peking; that we are not without hopes that those negotiations may render any further hostile proceedings unnecessary; but that if those hopes should not be realized, we shall have the means of carrying on hostile operations in a manner which, I trust, will enable us to enforce the redress we demand.

Lord John Russell

Mr. DISRAELI: I am somewhat surprised at the tone of the noble Lord with regard to this subject. He says that the opinions of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) and the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) respecting our relations with China are to him a matter of perfect indifference. I will leave the noble Lord and the right hon. Gentleman to settle that question with the First Lord of the Treasury whenever they may choose to avail themselves of the opportunity, but I cannot help noticing the reason assigned by the noble Lord for regarding the opinions of these two hon. Members of this House as a matter of perfect indifference. It is, he says, because at the late general election the people of England expressed their opinion upon the subject of his Chinese policy. To that national opinion he appeals, and, supported by that opinion, he can afford to treat with perfect indifference the sentiments of two hon. Members of this House whose views have generally exercised some little influence upon our deliberations. But looking to the general verdict given by the people at the late election, to which the noble Lord has appealed, it was, as I understood, in favour of a vigorous prosecution of the war in China, and I am not sure that the people of England will regard the present sentiments of the noble Lord on that subject with the perfect indifference which he extends to the opinions of the right hon. Gentleman and the noble Lord. Is the noble Lord performing that contract into which, according to his own account, he entered with the people at the last election? Is this war with China vigorously prosecuted? Why, according to the noble Lord, it is no war at all. Are hostilities even carried on? According to the noble Lord there are no troops to prosecute them. Why, the very issue which was placed before the people of England, on which their opinion was demanded, and to obtain their verdict upon which Parliament was dissolved, no longer exists. The noble Lord is installed in power, and is proud of his position because he is not performing a contract which, according to his own account, he was bound to fulfil, and in the fulfilment of which this House was elected in order that he might have a powerful majority to support him. It is, then, most extraordinary that the noble Lord should now taunt hon. Members who disapprove his Chinese policy with the perfect indifference with which he regards their opinions, because he can appeal to the opinion of the people of England when upon this very subject he has left the people of England in the lurch. The question which this Parliament was elected to prosecute has absolutely become a matter of perfect indifference to the noble Lord. The noble Lord further assailed an hon. Member of this House, because he had unnecessarily dragged the subject of China into our deliberations. What have we before us. We are called upon to vote £400,000. to defray the expenses incurred in the Chinese waters, and the noble Lord will not allow the subject of China to be alluded to! The fact is, that these discussions are no doubt extremely inconvenient to the Government, because the people of this country must naturally ask themselves "Why are these hostilities with China not vigorously prosecuted? and why is that vindication of the honour of England, which we were told a few months ago from every hustings was so important and so necessary, delayed or forgotten?" and because the policy of the noble Lord has in our own possessions brought about a state of affairs that renders it necessary for us to devote all our energies—all those energies which are requisite to vindicate our honour in China and in Persia—to support in an important part of Her Majesty's empire our own rule, which has been distracted and may be destroyed, by the policy of the noble Lord.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I really must take leave to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman upon the belligerent impatience he has manifested; and I count upon his entire support when the result of our operations shall crown the wishes he has so ardently expressed. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that he will not be disappointed, for we are pursuing in proper course the objects which the people of this country and the right hon. Gentleman so ardently desire—the redress of injuries and the vindication of our national honour; but we consider that the best mode of attaining those objects is by pursuing the course sanctioned by international usage—namely, by applying in the first instance to the Government of China for redress before proceeding to hostilities. Our intention to pursue that course was announced when Lord Elgin was first sent out. The right hon. Gentleman says I complained that the Chinese question had been introduced into this debate. Now, what I did complain of was that the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford should have gone back to the case of the lorcha, and I said my noble Friend appeared to me to have taken a juster view of the subject when he asked questions relating to our general policy with regard to China, to the conduct of the war, and to the objects we had in view. I could not of course complain that the Chinese question should have been introduced, because that is the very subject of the Vote we are considering.

LORD LOVAINE said, he thought it was a pity those remonstrances to the Emperor of China were not made in the first instance, when we were supposed to have suffered wrong from China. If his recollection served him right, not even twelve hours were allowed to elapse before the admiral in command bombarded the defenceless city of Canton, when he destroyed several hundreds lives, and the property of a great number of individuals. ["No, no!"] It was such a bombardment as dropping a shell into the city every five minutes.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said that much had been said in the last Parliament of the wanton bombardment of that defenceless city. He had stated at the time that he did not believe that any bombardment had taken place; and within the last fortnight he had received a letter from Admiral Sir Michael Seymour informing him that he (Sir Charles Wood) had been quite right in the interpretation he had put on the account of what had occurred. In that letter Sir Michael Seymour declared that it was altogether untrue that he had bombarded the city of Canton, or ever thrown a shell against any portion of it.

LORD LOVAINE said his statement was founded on the papers which had been furnished to the House, and if those papers did not bear him out he could only say that no trust was to be placed in the documents inserted in the blue-book.

MR. ROEBUCK asked if the right hon. Baronet (Sir C. Wood) had any objection to produce the letter to which he referred?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said that the letter to which he referred was a private letter—it was a private letter from Sir M. Seymour to himself. He would, however, bring it down to the House on Monday evening, and he would then have no objection to read the passage to which he had referred. He could not lay it before the House as it was a private communication; but he would be prepared to show it to any person who might doubt its authenticity.

MR. DISRAELI said, he did not suppose that any hon. Gentleman in that House doubted the word of any individual in it, and no one who had sat with the right hon. Gentleman in that House could for a moment suppose that he would state what was purposely an equivocation. But it was quite monstrous to suppose that a Minister should rise in his place, and on an occasion like the present make an important statement from a document not on the table of the House, and say it was private. It was the rule that a paper used by a Minister in that House became a State paper, even though it were a private letter. And it was monstrous that a gentleman in the position of the First Lord of the Admiralty should take offence because an hon. Member questioned the propriety of his appealing to a private letter for the purpose of influencing a debate. There should be no reference to any papers that were not on the table, or that were not meant to be laid on the table afterwards; for the moment a Minister referred even to a private letter it became a State document. That was a salutary principle that had always prevailed in their debates. Were it otherwise the opponents of the Minister could have no chance in debate, for he might always be referring to private papers in his portfolio to support his case. In the debate on the Motion of the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), last night, the right hon. Gentleman opposite was about referring to a private letter when he was called in question. [Mr. VERNON SMITH: It was a public letter.] What! a public letter? Then that was a worse case still. It was a most flagrant case—a public document that was a secret from the House referred to in debate by the right hon. Gentleman to contradict a statement made by the hon. Member for Sheffield, and referred to for the purpose of conveying to the House what was the policy of a former Cabinet of which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle was a Member. Neither a public nor a private letter ought to have been used if it could not be laid on the table. That was a principle which has ever been accepted in this house, and which he hoped would continue to be the guide in these matters. As regards the point in dispute itself he would only make this observation—before the dissolution of Parliament hon. Gentlemen opposite actually cheered because Canton had been bombarded, and now they vociferously cheered because they were told that Canton was not bombarded.

Mr. Disraeli

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he apprehended that the principle which governed the reading of letters was this: If a Minister read in his place any document, whether public or private, he was bound to lay on the table that which he had read. If he read a portion of a private letter or despatch, and if the House should think that that which he had not read might in any degree alter the sense of that which he had read, he might justly be required to lay the whole on the table, but he could not admit the expediency of the principle which the right hon. Gentleman endeavoured to establish, that a Minister should, more than any other hon. Member, be precluded from repeating to the House information which he had received in a private communication. So little was that the rule that it often happened that Ministers were asked whether they had received such communications; and, in short, were they precluded from stating to the House information received from the private communications of officers and others, the House would be deprived of much information which it now obtained.

MR. JAMES WHITE said, that as from a long residence there he had obtained a personal acquaintance with China and the Chinese, he trusted he should be pardoned for making a few observations on some of the points which had been raised in the course of the discussion. He thought that it was obvious that the differences of opinion which had arisen as to the bombardment of Canton had sprung up from a misunderstanding on both sides. Canton had not been, as he believed, bombarded in the sense in which military men and civilians understood that word. By bombardment he understood the firing of shot and shell indiscriminately into a town, to compel its surrender or evacuation, and he hesitated not to say that such a bombardment Canton had not undergone. A few shot and shell were sent into the Yamen, or Government offices, and the residence of the Viceroy in Canton (which occupied a large space), to show the authorities what we might do, if compelled; but this was not a bombardment in the ordinary sense of the term. As a commercial man, and as one of a class who deplored the stern necessity of coercive measures in China, besides having a deep personal interest in the early re-establishment of amicable relations with the South of China, he would take occasion to thank the noble Lord for the explanation he had given regarding the northern ports of China, for he felt the policy which had been adopted by the Government of localising this quarrel, was the best policy, and would conduce to a good understanding with the northern ports: and he was, in that House, glad to testify to the magnitude of the British interests involved in the most northern of those ports, in which he had passed so much of his life, viz., Shanghai. It was not alone British energy—British enterprise—which had raised that place (a few short years since not discoverable on the maps) to be a great entrepôt but it was also the kindly feelings and thorough sympathies of the Chinese residents with us foreigners, which had made Shanghai rank as it now did.

the second port in Asia for the value of its imports and exports ; and therefore, as regarded the general question of the war, he did not share in that feeling of detestation and abhorrence for the Chinese which had been so freely expressed in the course of these discussions. He deeply deplored that the high intelligence of the right hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. Gladstone) and the great constitutional knowledge of the noble Lord the Member for London, had not led them to address the full vigour of their faculties to this subject, in a calm dispassionate, and non-party spirit. Had they done so, they would have soon found that the quarrel at Canton did not hinge on the fact of whether the British flag was or was not flying on a paltry lorcha, but on the great consideration whether the perverse policy which the Cantonese had so consistently pursued for a long series of years towards the British—as well as other foreigners—was any longer to be tolerated. For himself, he (Mr. White) believed, and was there constrained to avow his belief, that the extravagant expenditure of successive Home Governments, and the impatience of every Chancellor of the Exchequer to secure the tea duties, had compelled the British merchants in Canton to submit to a long series of indignities which otherwise would have been long since suppressed by the power of the British Government. The very flattering reception he had, as a new Member, received, encouraged him to trouble the House with a few more observations ; and he would now take the liberty of addressing himself directly to the noble Lord at the head of the Government. It might be that the policy about to be pursued by the noble Lord was wholly consistent with the strict canons of international law, and conformable with the comity of nations ; but in its results it must be a miserable failure as an initiative diplomatic proceeding. In appealing first to the Emperor of China, the reply from Peking would be what it had always hitherto been. There would only be another reference of the appellants to Yeh, the Viceroy of Canton, and who, as directing all external relations, might be considered now as the Lord Palmerston of China. When he said this, he would not wish to be misunderstood. Yeh, was a man of great energy and talent, as well as high intelligence, and filled some of the highest offices in the empire. Besides, being the President of the Privy Council, and Guardian of the

Mr. James White

Heir Apparent, Yeh was also titular Commander in Chief, and he exercised sundry other important functions. But the main significance of this enumeration of offices was this—that he (Mr. White) would wish to impress on the noble Lord, and on the House, that, as regarded all foreign relations, Yeh was the alter ego of the Emperor of China, and the decision of Yeh would be that which would ultimately take effect, unless, indeed, as he (Mr. White) trusted would be the case, the noble Lord despatched instructions for the immediate occupation of Canton. In offering this advice to the noble Lord, he would add that he, and the class he represented, wanted an augmentation, not of territory, but of trade ; and he should be well content with an occupation of Canton, in which England should be cordially united with France, America, and other Christian powers. In point of fact he only desired to see Canton held as a “material guarantee,” until all our just requirements should be complied with. In conclusion, he would take occasion to tranquillize the apprehensions of the House, and gladden the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to the financial part of the operations in China, by giving him and the House the assurance that the cost—whatever it might be—could, and no doubt would be reimbursed out of the abundant resources of the Chinese empire. Or if not, by the issue of debentures on the security of the duties now exigible from the foreign merchants on the export of native, and the import of foreign commodities into China. Thus, every charge for the coercive measures now necessitated in China would be very readily liquidated. And he would add, looking to the enormous augmentation of the mutual trade which must ensue from a revision of the existing treaty with China, that any consequent cost could then be easily reimbursed by the adoption of the plan he now recommended, without any real loss or pecuniary mulct to the Chinese.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said he wished to express his conviction that Sir M. Seymour must have used every effort in his power to obtain by peaceable means satisfaction for the outrage on the lorcha before he fired a single shot into Canton ; and with respect to divulging the contents of private letters to the House on public affairs, to state that that was a power which the late First Lord of the Admiralty claimed to exercise when in office.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that in reply to the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for the University of Oxford, who had contended that he was not entitled to take credit in the revenue of this year for the balance of last year beyond the Estimates he had made, because that balance was due to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, it was only in the case of excess of revenue over the expenditure that the balance was paid over to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt. Therefore the sum he had mentioned was really an addition to the revenue of this year. With respect to the probable demands of the Exchequer with reference to our proceedings in India, the Chairman of the East India Company had truly stated that Her Majesty's Government, as at present advised, saw no reason to anticipate any demand from Parliament this Session, in respect to advances for India.

MR. HENLEY said, the Chairman of the East India Company had distinctly stated, after complaining of the mode in which the Company had been treated in asking for their own, that after this sum of £500,000 there would be another half million due to them by the Government, whereas the right hon. Gentleman had put it at £400,000.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER.—The Estimate is upon the table of the House.

MR. HENLEY said, it was odd, although only an estimate, that the sum should be so different; besides, the estimate at first was for £250,000, then the House was asked for £500,000, and now there was a further sum of £400,000 or £500,000 to pay.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the sum originally stated was an estimate of the sum the Government proposed to pay in respect to what fell due on the 1st of April.

MR. HENLEY said, that seeing the hon. Gentleman the Chairman of the Company again in his place, he would repeat what he had stated in regard to the sum claimed from the Government. The hon. Gentleman should have made his complaint to the Government, because they had found fault with the Government in keeping them in ignorance of what was really owing. He wished an explanation of this matter from the hon. Gentleman. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said according to the estimates the debt was only £400,000 instead of half a million, alleged by the Chairman of the East India Company to be due.

MR. MANGLES said he spoke from memory when he stated the sum to be £500,000, and could not at that moment give the precise amount. There was, however, a sum which the Company believed the Government owed them, but which the Government, on the other hand, said they did not owe them.

MR. HENLEY said it would be desirable to know whether the sum of £500,000 was a surplus over and above the Estimate now before the House. [Mr. MANGLES: No, no!] What, then, was the sum in dispute?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Estimate laid on the table contained the entire expense, as estimated by the East India Company, of the expedition to the Persian Gulf. That was all that the Government undertook to defray when they communicated with the East India Company, and the Treasury minute on that subject was perfectly explicit. Some additional expense was incurred by the East India Company overland, amounting to about £300,000, and if that item should eventually be decided to fall within the expenses of the war; one moiety of it would be due from the Exchequer; but at present the Government did not admit that that was so, and therefore he had not included the sum in the Estimate before the House.

MR. HENLEY observed that he understood that the £300,000 was plus the £800,000 in the Estimate.

MR. MANGLES said, this Estimate included the whole of the estimated expenditure for the expedition to the Persian Gulf. The other sum related to a matter upon which there was a dispute between the Government and the East India Company.

LORD JOHN MANNERS remarked that he understood the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that the Estimate for the war with China was reduced by £100,000 in consequence of the troops being transferred from Singapore to India, and that, as regarded the £100,000, it was a matter for consideration whether the East India Company should bear a share of that expenditure.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the noble Lord had entirely misunderstood his meaning. The hon.

Member (Sir H. Willoughby) asked whether the expense of the transport of troops to India told upon the English or upon the Indian Treasury. In his answer he said that generally the rule had been that the expense of the transport of British troops sent to do service for the East India Company fell upon the Indian Treasury; but that with regard to those troops destined originally for China, but now ordered to stop at Singapore and diverted to India, it was a question whether it ought to fall upon the English or the Indian Treasury.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £400,000, China (Military Operations).

MR. PALK said he wished to ask a question of the noble Lord at the head of the Government. The House had been addressed by hon. Gentlemen who were considered its leaders, but yet he must confess his utter ignorance whether we were or were not at this moment at war with China. They were told that the war was confined to hostilities between Commissioner Yeh and Sir J. Bowring. The question was, whether the money they were now called on to vote was in aid of a war against China? Were we or were we not at war with China?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he thought that the condition of our relations with China was pretty well understood by this time. Hostilities of very serious magnitude had occurred between the local Government of Canton and our Authorities, naval and military, at Hong Kong. Those hostilities had led to considerable expense, but with regard to the empire of China we were not at war. We were in a state of perfectly good relations with the other four ports, and were not at war at present with the Emperor of China. We had sent a Commissioner to negotiate with the Emperor of China, in the hope that by his own authority he would give those orders which would prevent actual war with the empire. That was the actual state of things at present.

LORD JOHN MANNERS asked whether this sum included the cost of transport?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said that nearly the whole of the Vote was for the transport of troops. The Estimate was originally £500,000 for the transport and lodging of the troops. Having diverted the troops from Canton to India, they would not be lodged at Canton, and the Vote was reduced from £500,000 to £400,000.

COLONEL KNOX said, that as they now
The Chancellor of the Exchequer

distinctly understood we were not at war with the Emperor of China, he wished to know whether, in the event of Lord Elgin arranging the matters in dispute with Commissioner Yeh, Commissioner Yeh would be authorized to give us indemnity for the expenses incurred?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON had not stated that Lord Elgin would negotiate with Commissioner Yeh. Lord Elgin was gone to negotiate with the Government of Peking.

COLONEL KNOX said the noble Lord had not answered the question. If he had understood the noble Lord correctly, the noble Lord stated that we were not at war with China. Therefore we had no cause of quarrel with the Emperor. The quarrel was with Yeh, and what he wanted to know was, whether there was any possibility of Yeh having power to indemnify us for what we had expended?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he had stated that we were not at war with China, but had great cause of complaint against a subordinate officer of the Emperor, and had demanded redress of the Emperor, seeing that the local authorities were not able to procure redress from the subordinate officer. The Emperor, of course, could do what he pleased as far as giving powers to indemnify us.

COLONEL BOLDERO said, the number of men voted for the Colonies and for home service was 123,000. The Government was taking away 15,000 or 20,000 men. He wished to know whether the Government intended to raise the force of men up to the number voted by Parliament, and if so, how could it be done?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON was understood to say that by recruiting and withdrawing men from the Colonies the Government would replace the men sent to India, or a portion of them.

Vote agreed to.

SUPPLY—ADDITIONAL SEAMEN.

(3). Motion made, and Question proposed,—

“That 2,000 additional Men be employed for the Sea Service for nine months, ending on the 31st day of March, 1858.”

LORD ADOLPHUS VANE-TEMPEST said, that the Vote of 2,000 additional men for the Navy naturally brought forward the whole subject of home defences. If he were to follow his own view of what was beneficial for the country, he should propose that the Chairman report progress. He did not know whether the exigencies of critical times in India made it a necessity that the Vote should be passed this evening, and as he was a comparatively inexperienced Member, he would not undertake, unless he were supported in his view, the grave duty of urging the postponement of the Vote. But as a Member of the House, and as an officer of the army, he could not refrain from bringing before the notice of the House the extraordinary position in which the country at this period stood with regard to the army. There had been considerable discussion upon the several wars into which we had been brought by the noble Lord at the head of the Government. He was one of those who supported the noble Lord in his Chinese policy, and his main reason for so doing was that he thought that the honour of the English flag should be maintained, and that officers in responsible situations at a distance should be upheld by the Government at home. He shared however in the feeling expressed by the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Buckinghamshire, and agreed in thinking the tone the noble Lord had adopted that night, when he stated, as he had, that England was not at war with China, was very different from the tone he adopted on the momentous occasion which produced the late dissolution—a change which was not likely to meet with the same approval of the country. But what he wished to bring to the notice of the Committee was, that, simultaneously with the war in China; simultaneously with the expedition to Persia; simultaneously, if it could be proved, with warnings both from the Commander in Chief and the Governor General of India, of their uneasy sensations with regard to what they conceived to be an uncomfortable feeling in the Bengal Army—simultaneously with those three events, the noble Lord at the head of the Government had sanctioned an enormous diminution of the army and navy. The regiments of the army had been reduced by 150 or 200 men; the most efficient arm of the service, the artillery, had been reduced by 2,000 trained and practised men, and they were now recruiting young and inexperienced soldiers to fight the battles of England. It was a late hour to detain them—one o'clock; but he felt bound to state, and he believed events would corroborate his statement, that grave responsibility rested upon the Government for entering into wars which they conceived the policy of England required, at the same time that they determined to reduce the army to the extent they had done. The question which he wished to ask the noble Lord was, whether he intended to increase the army? He also wished to know what steps the Government intended to take in order to replace the 20,000 men who were about to proceed to India? The House had heard from different members of the Government the most contradictory statements with respect to the conveyance of our troops to India. One had stated that some were to be sent in sailing vessels and some in steamers; another that no steamers were to be employed as transports; while the First Lord of the Admiralty had instituted a comparison that evening between the capabilities of sailing vessels and steamers. Now, the question was not one of sailing vessels or steamers, but one of sailing vessels with auxiliary screws. Our merchants paid an increased freight for the advantage of placing their goods on board ships with auxiliary screws, because to them time was money, and he asked, was it not equally so to us in the present critical posture of affairs in India? The House was asked to vote 2,000 additional men for the navy; but no addition was to be made to the army, although a large military force was to be sent to India, and events might occur in Europe to render extremely dangerous the want of a sufficient number of troops in this country. He hoped that the House would not be prevented by the Government from discussing the defenceless state of the nation, and thinking that the present Vote would afford them an excellent opportunity of doing so, if postponed till some more convenient occasion, he moved that the Chairman report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report progress, and ask leave to sit again."

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he could assure the noble Lord that he had not had (in his previous remarks) the slightest wish to prevent a discussion upon the state of our defences. What he had objected to was the raising of that important question incidentally upon a Motion for the adjournment of the House. He had already, in reply to a question from the hon. and gallant Member for West Norfolk, (Mr. Bentinck,) stated the reasons which induced him to ask for 2,000 additional men for the navy. A naval squadron was indispensably necessary in the Indian Ocean; and, in order to provide it with efficient crews, the House must authorize him to increase the seamen in our service by the number mentioned in the Vote. He hoped the noble Lord would not persist in his Motion for reporting progress.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT said he was only sorry that the First Lord had not asked for 5,000 men instead of 2,000, because he was persuaded that our navy was far from being in a proper state of efficiency. The blockships referred to by the right hon. Baronet in the early part of the evening were, it was true, in a state of perfect order; but they were only four or five in number, and they were all we had for the defence of our coasts. We had four sail of the line in the Mediterranean, one at the Cape of Good Hope, one in the Indian Ocean, one in the Pacific, and one on the coast of Brazil; but to meet any sudden emergency we had not a single line of battle ship upon which we could depend. He considered that a fearful circumstance, and trusted that the Government would give it their earliest and most serious attention.

Mr. HENLEY said he would beg to call the attention of the Government to the fact that now at twenty minutes past one o'clock there were thirty Orders on the list before they could get to the notices. He asked whether they were to sit there in perpetuo. He thought the Chairman ought to report progress.

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that if the Committee would agree to this Vote, he would postpone the other two till Monday.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT also hoped the Committee would agree to the Vote.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, as there was no objection to the Vote itself, he trusted the House would assent to it, and any discussion upon the state of the national defences would be taken upon the Report.

COLONEL KNOX warned the noble Lord at the head of the Government that if he took no steps to fill the vacancies caused by the abstraction of the troops which were to be sent to India, they might be placed in a most serious predicament. He could not see the way in which it was to be done.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he hoped that the Committee would agree to these Votes, seeing that everything that had been said was in the direction of their approval. The gallant Officer opposite wished to know how the force about to be sent to India was to be replaced, but this Vote was for an augmentation to the navy, and therefore should, so far as it went, meet with his approval. With regard to the army, the intention of the Government was to commence recruiting as soon as possible, in order to supply the places of the men about to be sent to India. If that should not be found sufficient, it would then be for the Government to consider what further steps they should pursue. After the general approval expressed, he hoped that hon. Members would not further obstruct the present Vote.

Sir Charles Wood

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE said he was in favour of agreeing to the Vote.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, that he had a great many observations to make on this question, and he hoped the noble Lord would persist in his Amendment.

MR. BENTINCK said that he would not object to the Vote being taken now, if a distinct pledge were given that the Report should be brought up at such a period of the evening as would allow the matter to be fully discussed.

SIR CHARLES WOOD assured the Committee that the Report should be brought up the first thing on Monday.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn; Vote agreed to, as were also the following:—

(4). £70,820, Wages to additional Seamen.

(5). £28,276, Provisions, Victualling Stores, &c., for additional Seamen.

The House resumed. Resolutions to be reported on Monday next; Committee to sit again on Monday next.

OATHS VALIDITY ACT AMENDMENT— LEAVE.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the 1st and 2nd of Victoria, chap. 108, entitled "An Act to remove doubts as to the Validity of certain Oaths," said that the Act which he wished to amend was introduced by Lord Denman, to enable persons to take an oath according to the form and ceremony binding on their own conscience. The same Act rendered any person, forswearing himself liable to the pains and penalties attaching to perjury. There was some doubt in that Act as to how far its principles would extend, and he now proposed that that principle should apply to Members of the High Court of Parliament. This would not necessitate any alteration in the substance of the oath, but only in the form in which it was taken in particular cases. It would place certain persons who could not take the oaths as they at present stood in the same position as the Quaker, by allowing them to take them in the way most binding on their conscience. This Bill was in conformity with what he believed was the law for 200 years, and, at all events, with what Lord Hardwicke declared to be the law in the last century. He concluded by asking for leave to bring in the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed,—

“That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Act 1 & 2 Vict., c. 105, intituled, ‘An Act for removing Doubts as to the Validity of certain Oaths.’”

MR. WALPOLE: The statement which the noble Lord has just made would not certainly lead the House to any just conclusion as to what is intended by the Act; but the statement which the noble Lord made during the evening upon the question of the adjournment of the House to Monday, so irregularly, has intimated to this side of the House what the object he proposes to effect by this Motion really is, and, therefore, I take it for granted that his object is to try, a second time, to introduce a Bill in the same Session of Parliament which has seen it defeated once. The Bill he proposes to introduce he says, is founded upon an Act of Parliament made at the commencement of the Queen's reign; but in doing so the noble Lord has confounded two things essentially distinct, which will readily be seen if you compare the object of the Act of Parliament with the object of the present Bill. The object of that Act was simply that, where a witness should be required for the purpose of justice to give evidence in a court in which an oath was necessary, that oath should be taken in a form most binding on the conscience of the person taking it, in order that justice might not fail. But the object of the noble Lord is totally different. It is not only to admit members of the Jewish persuasion to Parliament, but, as intimated at the commencement of the evening, it has an object not consistent with what has been the law of the country for 200 years, and it will actually set aside the deliberate judgment of the Court of Exchequer, which has determined that the words “on the true faith of a Christian” are a part not of the form, but of the substance of the oath.

For that reason, I say that the Bill the noble Lord wishes now to introduce is not founded on the Act of Parliament to which he refers, but on totally different principles. But, Sir, the one objection which ought to prevail in the House of Commons is that this is an attempt to introduce in the same Session of Parliament a question which has been already decided, and which, therefore, cannot be again brought forward in this Session. By so attempting to violate the spirit of the rules and practice of Parliament, you are deliberately putting yourself in opposition to the other House of Parliament, which has never been considered a wise course for the House of Commons to pursue, and which can only be pursued upon the ground, not that you wish to convince but that you wish to overawe the House of Lords (cheers). Those cheers from below the gangway clearly indicate that you are going to do what once only has been done in the history of the country—you are going to make an attempt, by Resolution of one House of Parliament, to overrule the deliberate voice of the other. These principles, so dangerous and so detrimental, are used for the purpose of advocating the admission of Jews to Parliament; but I say that in order to maintain the dignity and authority of Parliament this Bill ought not to be introduced. I may add one other reason. We are now at the end of the Session; you have got a multiplicity of business on your hands; and, considering that this is a question which must lead to prolonged debates, it is far from wise to re-open it. I shall, therefore, oppose its introduction.

MR. ROEBUCK said he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman to some extent. This Bill was not wanted; the present law was strong enough. The words of the Act were remarkable—“In all cases in which an oath may lawfully be administered to any person, either as a jurymen or a witness in any proceeding civil or criminal in any court of law in the United Kingdom, and in any office or employment on any occasion whatsoever.” What could be stronger than that? He asked the House to be their own lawyers, and not to be ruled by any Court of Law or Court of Exchequer whatever. With respect to the House of Peers, let them look at what had been done in the Wensleydale case, and apply the same rule to their own conduct. He should be better pleased to see the House act upon its own Resolution, but rather than there should be no remedy he should support the introduction of the noble Lord's Bill. There were two precedents—the one adopted in 1833. Mr. Pease came to the table of the House and said it was contrary to his religion to take an oath; and the House dispensed with the oath, and allowed him to make an affirmation, and leave out the words “on the true faith of a Christian” and “so help me, God.” Had not the other House done the same, and opposed the prerogative of the Crown? When Lord Wensleydale was made a peer for life, the Lords took to themselves a power respecting their own privileges which the House of Commons ought now to take. These privileges were co-ordinate. The Bill ought not to have been brought in, but as it was better than the present state of things, he should vote for it, but he asked the noble Lord to take a bolder course, which would conciliate the people of England. Let them bring the question through by a majority of the House, and if they determined on the course he advised them, he had no fear either of the Peers or of the Judges of England who had been held up as bugbears.

MR. NEWDEGATE:—It is perfectly obvious that this is a question which requires great and serious discussion. I must, therefore, move the adjournment of the House; but I cannot pass the statement of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) altogether without remark. He has argued the question of privilege, and has referred to the House of Lords. The hon. and learned Member argues as though this measure does not affect the constitution of both Houses, whereas, it is evident that the former Bill for the relief of the Jews, which the House of Lords rejected, affected the constitution of that House just as much as it would affect the constitution of this. To say that the Lords have claimed for themselves a privilege which they will not admit us to exercise in this House is simply to misstate the case, because both the rejected measure and the new one proposed would affect the constitution of each House. With respect to what he said about the exercise of privilege in the House of Lords, it is perfectly well known that the constitution of that House, and the appointment of its members is a matter connected with hereditary right, and has nothing whatever to do with the representative principle, and therefore, the constitution of the two Houses being different, there can be no analogy in the cases.

Mr. Roebuck

It is altogether a mistake to declare that the House of Lords ever exercised a privilege which it would deny to the House of Commons. The House of Lords has a right to express their opinion upon any measure whatever, and this is a revolutionary attempt to crush them in the exercise of that fair expression of opinion as to their own constitution, which would have been affected by the Bill which this House passed, but which they rejected. This is simply an act of revolutionary tyranny. I beg now to move that the House do now adjourn. There are many who take a deep interest in the question like myself. This Bill is just as much a blow at the constitution of the House of Lords as an attempt to interfere with that of the House of Commons, and I shall, therefore, give it my most strenuous opposition.

MR. SALISBURY observed, that he thought that the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) had taken the constitutional course, and he trusted that the House would not follow the advice of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield. He should be glad to see Baron Rothschild in the House, but he would be no party to admit him in an unconstitutional manner.

Motion made and Question put, “That this House do now adjourn.”

The House divided:—Ayes 55; Noes 109: Majority 54.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. WARREN moved the adjournment of the debate.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that seeing the temper of hon. Gentlemen on the other side, he felt it necessary to state the position in which the question stood, and to state, that he had no wish to coerce the House of Lords into a decision upon the subject. He must, however, contend that due regard ought to be paid to the privileges of the House of Commons, and that the House of Lords alone ought not to be allowed to entertain questions by which its privileges were supposed to be affected. A few years ago he was of opinion that it was requisite to have the assent of the two Houses to any alteration of the oaths taken at the table. Since then the case of Mr. Archdall, and more recently the case of Mr. Pease, had occurred, in each of which the House of Commons had dispensed with the oath and permitted an affirmation to be taken in its stead. He also might cite the opinion of Baron Alderson in support of the view that the words “on the true faith of a Christian " had not been originally introduced into the oath for the purpose of meeting the case of the Jews, but to obviate certain doctrines which, upon the part of Roman Catholics, were supposed to have been entertained. He, therefore, believed the House had the power of admitting Baron Rothschild in a similar manner; but he should be sorry to see the House adopt that mode of proceeding, as it was contrary to the opinions of the majority of the Judges of the land. It was for the purpose of avoiding any collision that he had proposed the present Bill. But hon. Gentlemen opposite were determined not to enter into any discussion. If that was not their object, why did they move the adjournment of the House? There was no hon. Member more ready to take the substance of the oath than Baron Rothschild. This was a question of the greatest importance to the electors of the City of London, and of the country generally. If hon. Gentlemen opposite thought they could defeat the object of the Bill by delay it would take a long discussion to do so. Baron Rothschild would conceive it his duty to come to the table and raise the question as to whether he should be allowed to take his seat—and he should advise his hon. Colleague not to forfeit his rights and privileges.

MR. WHITESIDE, in answer to the noble Lord said, he and his hon. Friends near him were desirous that full discussion should take place on the important subject before them, and it was with that view that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Midhurst had moved the adjournment of the debate. That he thought was no unreasonable proposition, seeing that it was near three o'clock. He must, however, mention, that in his opinion if Baron Rothschild were to present himself at the table in the manner referred to, he would render himself liable to the penalties of the Act.

MR. ROEBUCK contended that there was no occasion for the adjournment of the debate, as the proper time to take the discussion upon the Bill would be when it came on for second reading. He for one was disposed to move that Baron Rothschild should be allowed to take his seat in that House without the necessity of taking the oaths, and if he were to do so he (Mr. Roebuck) would be prepared to move, that any person who should prosecute the noble Baron for having taken that course should be deemed guilty of a breach of the privileges of that House.

LORD LOVAINE said, he must protest against the revolutionary doctrine which had been advanced by the hon. and learned Member who had just spoken—a doctrine which was similar to that contained in the Resolution of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn). If the House were to act in the manner suggested, there would be no longer any securities for the liberties of the people.

MR. DILLWYN said, he begged to deny that the Motion which he had announced it to be his intention to submit to the House was one of a revolutionary character; on the contrary, it would only carry out the law as it at present stood.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that his only object in moving the adjournment of the House was that a full discussion upon the important Motion of the noble Lord the Member for London might take place. He most strongly protested against the revolutionary doctrines which had in the course of the discussion been promulgated.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided:—Ayes 52; Noes 100: Majority 48.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. W. HUME then moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion made and Question put, "That this House do now adjourn."

The House divided:—Ayes 51; Noes 97: Majority 46.

Original Question again proposed.

SIR BROOKE BRIDGES then rose to express a hope that the unseemly contest in which they had been engaged should be brought to a close. He mentioned that the case was one of no ordinary nature, and should appeal to the noble Lord the Member for the City of London whether an opportunity of fully and fairly discussing it should not be afforded. He should, with that view, move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. HORSMAN observed, that the course which had been adopted by the hon. Gentlemen opposite, in opposing the introduction of a Bill, was one of a most unusual nature. The usual practice was to take the debate on the second reading.

MR. HENLEY said, that it was an unequally unusual course to ask for leave to introduce virtually the same Bill twice in the same Session; and he protested, moreover, against the introduction of a measure so important at two o'clock in the morning, after hon. Members had been exhausted by a sitting of fourteen hours.

LORD J. RUSSELL said, he could have no hope of bringing on the Bill at this period of the Session, at any other than a late hour of the night.

MR. WALPOLE said, the noble Lord might fix Tuesday next for the Bill, as there were no Motions on the paper, except from hon. Members sitting on the same side of the House as the noble Lord, who might easily prevail on them to give way. He thought his hon. Friends around him were taking a legitimate and not unusual course in the opposition they had given to the introduction of the Bill.

MR. PALK said, it was now so near four o'clock, that they might consider they were commencing a new day, with ample time for discussion before them.

MR. MALINS deprecated the course pursued by Lord J. Russell, in bringing in a Bill the same in effect as one which had already been rejected in the present Session.

MR. WARREN said, he would appeal to Lord John Russell to put an end to such an unseemly discussion, by not persevering with his Bill. If requisite he should be found at his post until that hour next day, in order to defeat such an attempt as that of the noble Lord. He would not allow the House to be bullied.

MR. ROEBUCK rose to order. The language of the hon. and learned Gentleman was unparliamentary.

MR. WARREN said, he would at once withdraw the expression if considered objectionable, and would thank the hon. and learned Gentleman for the lesson.

COLONEL KNOX observed, that he thought the hon. Member who brought the question out of the arena of Parliament to a pot-house over the way, did not contribute to the dignity of the House.

MR. J. LOCKE said, he was prepared to stay in his place as long as the hon. and learned Member for Midhurst (Mr. Warren) sooner than allow the Bill to be defeated in the manner attempted.

MR. NEWDEGATE observed, that he had no doubt but the conduct of the Opposition that night would be duly appreciated by the country.

Mr. Henley

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided:—Ayes 49 ; Noes 83 : Majority 34.

Original Question again proposed.

VISCOUNT GALWAY said, he now rose to move what he thought would be considered a most reasonable proposition, namely, that the House do now adjourn. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield had made some impertinent remarks. [MR. SPEAKER called the noble Lord to order.] He meant to say, that the remarks of the hon. and learned Gentleman were not pertinent. However, in discussing the question of adjournment, they ought not to forget they were breaking the Jewish Sabbath.

MR. WALPOLE said, he would second the Motion out of consideration for the Speaker in the chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

MR. BIGGS said, he was of opinion that the conduct of the Opposition on this occasion was unworthy the Commons of England.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL conceived that he had been perfectly justified in bringing forward the Bill; but looking at the temper of the House, and seeing that there was nothing very important on the paper for Tuesday, he would consent to adjourn the debate till that day. As many hon. Gentlemen desired to seat Baron Rothschild by Resolution, he certainly should persevere with his Bill, in the hope of preventing a collision, and it would not be his fault if his conciliatory course was not adopted. If, however, the noble Lord (Viscount Galway) would allow his Motion for the adjournment of the House to be negatived, he (Lord J. Russell) would consent to the adjournment of the debate to Tuesday.

Motion and Original Question, by leave, withdrawn.

House adjourned at half after Four o'clock till Monday next.

INDEX

TO

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES, VOLUME CXLVI.

SECOND VOLUME OF SESSION 1857 (b).

EXPLANATION OF THE ABBREVIATIONS.

1R. 2R. 3R. First, Second, or Third Reading. — Amend., Amendment. — Res., Resolution. — Com., Committee. — Re-Com., Re-committal. — Rep., Report. — Adj., Adjourned. — cl., Clause. — add. cl., Additional Clause. — neg., Negatived. — l., Lords. — c., Commons. — m. q., Main Question. — o. q., Original Question. — o. m., Original Motion. — p. q., Previous Question. — r. p., Report Progress. — A., Ayes. — N., Noes. — M., Majority. — 1st Div., 2nd Div., First or Second Division.

When in the Text or in the Index a Speech is marked thus *, it indicates that the Speech is reprinted from a Pamphlet or some authorised Report.

When in this Index a * is added to the Reading of a Bill, it indicates that no Debate took place upon that stage of the measure.

A BINGER, Lord
Roman Catholic Charities, Return moved for, 122

Academy, Royal, The
c. Question (Mr. Coningham), 1043

Accessories and Abettors Bill,
l. 1R. 115; 2R. 1353

Accounts, Public, Auditing of—Supply.
c. 186

ADAIR, Mr. H. E., Ipswich
Probates and Letters of Administration, Com. Schedule A, 1320

ADAMS, Mr. W. H., Boston
Civil Service, 1480
Industrial Schools, Com. cl. 13, 1142; cl. 14, 1145; cl. 18, ib.
Judgments Execution, Com. cl. 9, 313, 316
Probates and Letters of Administration, 2R. 493; cl. 9, 993; cl. 85, 1304
Rochdale Election—Privilege, Com. moved for, 103
Supply—Public Works (Ireland), 167;—Civil Contingencies, 1416
Uleaborg, British Merchants at, 1045

ADDERLEY, Mr. C. B., Staffordshire, W.
Election Petitions, 2R. 510, 511, 601
Industrial Schools, Com. cl. 9, 1138; cl. 13, 1140; cl. 18, 1146; add. cl. 1147, 1149
Municipal Corporations, Consid. 1423
Supply—Emigration Board, &c., 909

Admiral of the Fleet,
l. Question (Marquess of Salisbury), 755

Admiralty—Supply,
c. 190

Adulteration of Food or Drink Bill,
c. 1R.* 342

Adulterers' Marriages Bill,
l. 1R.* 325;
2R. 758, [Contents 23, Not-Contents 62, M. 39] 762;
Protest, 763

ADVOCATE, The LORD (The Rt. Hon. J. Moncreiff) Leith, &c.
Court of Session (Scotland), 2R. 1205
Edinburgh, &c., Annuity Tax Abolition, Leave, 1207, 1208
Judgments Execution, Com. cl. 7, 307; cl. 8, 310, 312; 1511, 1513
Lunatics (Scotland), 2R. 1185, 1186; Com. cl. 108, 1681; add. cl. 1682
Sheriff's Court (Scotland), Accommodation of the, 192

Africa, West Coast of, Civil Establishments—Supply,
c. 907

AIRLIE, Earl of
Transportation and Penal Servitude, 3R. 18

AKROYD, Mr. E., *Huddersfield

Industrial Schools, Com. cl. 13, 1140
Supply—Education, 412

ALBEMARLE, Earl of

Dixon, Mr., Case of, Papers moved for, 109
India, Administration of Justice in, 423 ;—Mutiny in 524, 1335 ;—Civil Service, Returns moved for, 953
Oaths, 2R. 1260

ALCOCK, Mr. T., *Surrey, E.

Election Petitions, 2R. 604
Reformatory Schools, 2R. 193 ; Com. Amend., 1155
Supply—Royal Parks, 94 ;—Education, 400

Alehouse Licensing Bill,

c. 3R.* 236
l. 1R.* 325

ARGYLL, Duke of (Postmaster-General)

India, Administration of Justice in, 429 ;—Mails, 1432
Ministers' Money (Ireland), Com. 132
Oaths, 2R. 1273

Army,

Civil Establishments, c. Question (Sir H. Willoughby), 25
Crimea, Services of Officers in the, c. Question (Mr. W. Ewart), 24
Education in the, l. Question (Earl of Hardwicke), 1428
c. Question (Mr. Warren), 772
Half Pay, Officers on, c. Question (Gen. Windham), 250
Officers' Quarters, Property Tax on, c. Question (Sir De L. Evans), 1367
Officers, Return of, to India, c. Question (Mr. Noel), 1278, 1373

Art Collections, National,

c. Question (Mr. W. Ewart), 1375

Assessment (Scotland) Bill,

c. 1R.* 342 ; 2R.* 1550

Assize Circuits,

c. Question. (Mr. Warren), 1575

ATHERTON, Mr. W., *Durham City

Probates and Letters of Administration, Com. cl. 2, 978, 985 ; cl. 9, 995 ; cl. 10, 997

Attornies and Solicitors (Colonial Courts) Bill,

c. 1R.* 342 ; 2R.* 769

ATTORNEY GENERAL, The (Sir R. Bethell), *Aylesbury

Election Petitions, 2R. 510, 511
Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 1, 498, 503, 504 ; cl. 2, 505, 506, 507, 509 ; cl. 4, 1188 ; cl. 6, 1189, 1190 ; cl. 10, 1192 ; cl. 11, 1194 ; cl. 12, 1198, 1201, 1202, 1204 ; Consid. add. cl. 1417, 1418

ATTORNEY GENERAL, The—*cont.

Greytown, Bombardment of, 48,
Huntingdon County Election, Com. 1553 ; Amend. 1555
Probates and Letters of Administration, 2R. 451, 468, 490 ; Com. 976 ; cl. 2, 987 ; cl. 3, 991 ; cl. 9, 994 ; cl. 10, 998 ; cl. 12, 1001 ; cl. 13, 1002 ; cl. 15, 1003, 1004 ; cl. 24, 1004, 1005 ; cl. 26, Amend. 1006 ; cl. 34, 1007, 1011 ; cl. 40, 1015, 1019, 1279, 1288, 1292, 1294, 1300 ; cl. 51, 1303 ; cl. 85, 1304, 1305 ; cl. 86, 1306 ; cl. 87, 1307, 1308 ; add. cl. 1309, 1310, 1311, 1312, 1313, 1314, 1315 ; Schedule A, 1317, 1318, 1319, 1321
Registration of Titles, 633
Rochdale Election—Privilege, Com. moved for, 95, 100, 102, 103, 104, 105 ;
Statute Law Commission, Address moved, 791

Australia,

Expedition to Central, l. Question (Duke of Newcastle), 199
Postal Communication with, c. Question (Mr. H. Berkeley), 535

Australian Mail Company,

c. Question (Mr. Coningham) 1456

AYRTON, MR. A. S., *Tower Hamlets

Burial Acts Amendment, Com. cl. 16, 1039
Election Petitions, 2R. 603 ; Com. Adj. moved, 1322
Finsbury Park (No. 2), 2R. 247
Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 1, 503 ; cl. 2, 506 ; cl. 4, 1188 ; cl. 6, 1190 ; cl. 10, 1191 ; cl. 12, 1205
Grand Juries (Metropolis), Com. cl. 1, 1439, 1454
India—Railways, Res., 1727
Judgments Execution, Com. cl. 7, 305, 307, 309 ; cl. 8, 310 ; cl. 9, 313, 1511
Newspapers, Registration of, Paper moved for, 686, 689
Persia—War with, Res., 1583
Press, The Periodical, 1284
Probates and Letters of Administration, 2R. 491 ; Com. cl. 2, 986 ; cl. 5, 992 ; cl. 40, 1019, 1294 ; cl. 51, 1302 ; add. cl. 1309, 1311
Rochdale Election—Privilege, Com. moved for, 104
Savings Banks Funds, 556
Scientific and Literary Societies, Com. cl. 2, 1526
Supply—Royal Palaces, 74,—Education, 413 ; —Harbours of Refuge, 925 ; —Captured Negroes, 934 ; —Persian Expedition, 1741
Thames Conservancy, 3R. 1120, 1124

BAGWELL, Mr. J. *Clonmel

Fiscal Affairs (Ireland) Leave, 256
Industrial Schools, Com. cl. 13, 1141.
Lord Lieutenantcy of Ireland, 1078
Lunatics (Scotland) Com. cl. 4, 1565, 1566
Married Women, 2R., 1519
Savings Banks, 345
Supply—Public Works (Ireland) 165, 167 ; Education (Ireland), 593

BAILLIE, Mr. H. J., *Inverness-shire

Lunatics (Scotland), Com. cl. 4, 1566

[cont.[cont.

BAILLIE, Mr. H.—cont.

Ordnance Survey, 1387
 Persia, War with, Res., 1591
 Public Offices, 802

BAINES, Rt. Hon. M. T. (Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster), Leeds
 Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 4, 1169; cl. 10, 1192
 Grand Juries, (Metropolis) Com. cl. 1, 1448
 Reformatory Schools, Com. 1163
 Statute Law Commission, Address moved, 788

BALL, Mr. E, Cambridgeshire
 Industrial Schools, Com. cl. 13, 1141
 Oaths, 3R., 361
 Supply—New Houses of Parliament, 153

Ballot, The,
 c. Leave, 634, [A. 189, N. 257, M. 68] 682

Banking Bill,
 c. 1R.* 342

Bankruptcy—Supply,
 c. 191

Bankruptcy and Insolvency (Ireland), Bill,
 c. Com. cl. 153, 631;
 cl. 161, 632

Bankruptcy and Real Security (Scotland) Bill,
 c. 1R.* 137; 2R.* 443; 3R.* 1278
 l. 1R.* 1323

BARING, Rt. Hon. Sir F. T., Portsmouth
 China, War with—Estimate, 1137
 Persia, War with—Estimate, 1137
 Probates and Letters of Administration, Com. add. cl., 1309
 Superannuation, Leave, 707
 Supply—Public Buildings, 85;—Stationery, Printing, &c., 187;—Postage of Letters, 189;—Superannuations, 1391, 1393

BARING, Mr. T., Huntingdon
 British Guiana, Immigration to, 885

BARROW, Mr. W. H., Nottinghamshire, S.
 Burial Acts Amendment, Com. 1037; cl. 5, 1038; cl. 16, 1039
 Finsbury Park (No. 2), 2R. 246
 Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 1, 501
 Industrial Schools, Com. cl. 13, Amend. 1138, 1140; cl. 14, Amend. 1142; cl. 18, 1145; add. cl. 1147, 1146
 Probates and Letters of Administration, Com. cl. 24, 1004; cl. 87, 1307
 Reformatory Schools, Com. 1164; cl. 6, 1166
 Supply—New Houses of Parliament, 159;—Queen's University (Ireland) 600

Bath Election
 c. Report, 1683;—Question, (Lord Burghley), 1684

BAXTER, Mr. W. E., Montrose, &c.
 Guano, Supply of, 968
 Lunatics (Scotland) 2R. 1169
 Supply—British Museum, 810;—Nonconforming, &c., Ministers (Ireland) Amend. 1399, 1404

BEECROFT, Mr. G. S., Leeds
 Probates and Letters of Administration, Com. schedule A, 1318

BELPER, Lord
 Obscene Books, Sale of, Prevention, 2R. 335

Bengal Military Fund,
 c. Com. moved for, (Viscount Goderich) 1046; Motion withdrawn, 1048

BENNETT, Mr. P., Suffolk, W.
 Probates and Letters of Administration, Com. Schedule A, 1320
 Reformatory Schools, Com. cl. 1, 1166

BENTINCK, Mr. G. W. P., Norfolk, W.
 Defence of the Country, 1712
 Greytown, Bombardment of, 46
 India, Conveyance of Troops, 1692, 1693, 1694
 Navy Estimates, 1772
 Oaths, Consid. add. cl. 147
 Privateering, Papers moved for, 1489
 Public Offices, 804
 South Eastern Railway, (Greenwich Junction, &c.) 3R. 627
 Steamers in the Navy, Returns moved for, 1113
 Supply—Royal Parks, &c., Amend. 89, 94;—Postage of Letters, 188, 189;—Stipendiary Magistrates, 906;—Holyhead Harbour, 915, 916;—Harbours of Refuge, 928, 933

BERKELEY, Hon. F. H. F., Bristol
 Australia, Postal Communication with, 635
 Ballot, The, Leave, 634, 635, 680
 Burial Acts Amendment, Com. 1036; cl. 16, 1040
 "Oneida," The, 967
 Rochdale Election—Privilege, 97
 Suez, Isthmus of, Canal, 1043
 Superannuation Act Amendment, 2R. 1658
 Supply—Royal Parks, 91

Bermudas—Supply,
 c. 846

BETHELL, Sir R., see ATTORNEY GENERAL, The

BIGGS, Mr. J., Leicester
 Oaths Validity Act Amendment, Leave, 1780
 Supply—Royal Palaces, 72

Bill Chamber (Scotland) Bill,
 c. 1R.* 137; 2R.* 443; 3R.* 1510
 l. 1R.* 1533

BLACK, Mr. A., Edinburgh
 Court of Session (Scotland) 2R. Amend. 1205
 Edinburgh, &c., Annuity Tax Abolition, Leave, 1209
 Inspectors of Taxes, (Scotland) 302, 304
 Lunatics (Scotland) 2R. 1187
 Medical Profession (No. 1), 2R. 711, 717

(cont.)

BLACK, Mr. A.—cont.

Supply—Science and Art, 564 ;—Education, (Ireland), 589, 945 ;—Inland Revenue, 1407, 1408 ;—Civil Contingencies, 1414

BLACKBURN, Mr. P., Stirlingshire

Court of Session, (Scotland), 2R. 1207
Edinburgh, &c., Annuity Tax Abolition, Leave, 1208
Lunatics (Scotland), 2R. 1181 ; Com. add. cl. 1682
Supply—Royal Parks, 93 ; Amend. 94 ;—Education, (Ireland), Amend. 590, 596 ; Queen's University, (Ireland), 599 ;—Ministers at Foreign Courts, 946 ;—Superannuations, 388, 1394 ;—Charitable Allowances, 1399 ;—Civil Contingencies, 1412

BLAKE, Mr. J. A., Waterford City

Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 1, Amend. 503
Lord Lieutenantcy of Ireland, 1093
Medical Profession, (No. 1), 2R. 723

BLAND, Mr. L. H., King's Co.

Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Com. cl. 153, 631
Judgments Execution, Com. cl. 7, 307, 310 ;
cl. 9, 313, 316

BLANDFORD, Marquess of, Woodstock

Finsbury Park (No. 2) 2R. 246
Oaths, Consid. add. cl. 146 ; 3R. Amend.* 347

Bodmin Election

c. Withdrawal of Petition, 621 ; Observation (Mr. Wyld), 634

BOLDERO, Colonel, H. G., Chippenham

Supply—Furniture, Public Departments, 88 ;
—China (Military Operations), 1768

BOOKER-BLAKEMORE, Mr. T. W., Herefordshire

Supply—Science and Art, 565

BOUVERIE, Rt. Hon. E. P. (Chief Commissioner of the Poor Law), Kilmarnock, &c.

Poor Law Medical Officers, 346, 1511
Scientific and Literary Societies, Com. cl. 2, 320, 1525 ; Amend., 1529, 1530
Workhouses, Metropolitan, Com. moved for, 377, 380

BOWYER, Mr. G., Dundalk

Fiscal Affairs (Ireland) Leave, 263
Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 12, 1196
Grand Juries (Metropolis), Com. cl. 1 ; Amend. 1433
Industrial Schools, Com. cl. 9 ; Proviso, 1137, 1138 ; cl. 13, 1141 ; cl. 18, 1146 ; add. cl. 1147
Mayo Writ, 1572
Oaths, 3R. 364
Probates and Letters of Administration, Com. cl. 2, 984 ; cl. 28, Amend. 1006 ; cl. 34, 1009
Rochdale Election—Privilege, Com. moved for, 99, 100, 101, 104

BRIDGES, Sir B. W., Kent, E.

Oaths Validity Act Amendment, Leave, Adj. moved, 1778
South Eastern Railway (Greenwich Junction, &c.) 3R. 626

BRISCOE, Mr. J. I., Surrey, W.

Grand Juries (Metropolis), Com. cl. 1, 1450
Industrial Schools, Com. cl. 14, 1144 ; cl. 13, 1145
Medical Profession (No. 1), 2R. 723
Probates and Letters of Administration, Com. cl. 15, 1004
Public Offices, 802
Reformatory Schools, Com. 1159
Supply—Royal Palaces, 69 ;—New Houses of Parliament, 157, 159 ;—Woods, Forests, &c., 176 ;—West Indies, Governors, &c., 905 ;—Emigration Board, &c., 910
Workhouses, Metropolitan, Com. moved for, 380

British Guiana, Immigration to,
c. Question (Mr. T. Baring), 885

British Museum—Supply,
c. 805, 816

BROUGHAM, Lord

County Courts, Returns moved for, 1030
Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, 3R. 205
"Examiner," The, and Lord Plunket—Privilege, 530
High and Low Water-mark—Rights of the Crown, 904
India, Mutiny in, 523
Oaths, 2R. 1262, 1263
Obscene Books, Sale of, Prevention, 2R. 329, 334, 335, 338
Slave Trade, Alleged Revival of the, 605 ; Explanation, 949 ; Res. 1661 ; Address moved, 1671, 1679
Statute Law Commission, 121
Transfer of Real Estate, 1R. 1154
Transfer of Real Property—Mr. Fawcette's Petition, 858
Vexatious Litigation Prevention, 2R. 338

BRUCE, Mr. E. L. C., Elginshire, &c.

Lunatics (Scotland), 2R. 1171 ; Com. cl. 4, 1505

BUCCLEUCH, Duke of,

High and Low Water-mark—Rights of the Crown, 964
Police (Scotland), Com. 768
Survey, National, Com. moved for, 1547

BUCHANAN, Mr. W., Glasgow

China, War with—Estimate, 1137
Court of Session (Scotland), 2R. 1205
Joint-Stock Banks, Leave, 198
Lunatics (Scotland), Com. add. cl. 1682
Persia, War with—Estimate, 1137

BULLER, Sir J. B. Y., Devonshire, S.

Married Women, 2R. Amend. 1515, 1523
Probates and Letters of Administration, Com. Schedule A., 1321

BURGHLEY, Lord, Northamptonshire, N.
Bath Election Committee, 1684

Burial Acts Amendment Bill,

- c. Com. 1032;
- cl. 3, Amend. (Mr. Knight), 1037
- cl. 5 struck out, 1038;
- cl. 16, Amend. (Mr. L. King), 1039, [A. 33. N. 188, M. 155] 1041; Amend. (Mr. Miles), [o.g. A. 79, N. 131, M. 52] 1042, 1682

Burial Grounds

- l. Petition (Viscount Dungannon), 16
- c. St. John's, Chester, Question (Mr. Salisbury), 965

Burial of the Dead within the City and Liberties of London Bill

- l. 1R.* 852

BURY, Viscount, Norwich

- Medical Profession (No. 1), 2R. 711
- Persia, War with, Res. 1599
- Supply—Indian Department in Canada, 847

Bury Election

- c. Report, 1167

Bury St. Edmund's Election

- c. Report, 1455

BUTT, Mr. I., Youghal

- Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 10, 1191, 1192, 1193; Consid. Amend. 1417
- Justices and Police Force, Dublin, 2R. 1420
- Railways (Ireland), Leave, 1505, 1506
- Rochdale Election—Privilege, Com. moved for, 102; Amend. 103, 104
- Sligo Borough Election, 1557; Papers moved for, 1558, 1564

BUXTON, Sir E. N., Norfolk, E.

- Slave Trade, Alleged Revival of the, 1287
- Supply—Indian Department in Canada, 851

BUXTON, Mr. C., Newport, Isle of Wight

- Reformatory Schools, Com. 1161
- Slave Trade (Africa), Address moved, 1492
- Supply—Education, 407

BYNG, Hon. G. H. C., Tavistock

- Civil Service, 1472

CAIRD, Mr. J., Dartmouth

- Salmon Fisheries, 1042
- Supply—Woods, Forests, &c., Amend. 168, 177; —Education (Ireland), 591

CAIRNS, Mr. H. M., Belfast

- Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 1, 503; cl. 2, 508; cl. 11, Amend. 1193; cl. 12, 1194, 1197, 1204
- Probates and Letters of Administration, 2R. 486, 490; Com. cl. 34, 1007
- Supply—Theological Professors, Belfast, 1405

Cambridge Borough Election,

- c. Report, 713, 965

CAMOYS, Lord

- Oaths, 2R. 1253
- Roman Catholic Charities, Com. cl. 1, 765

CAMPBELL, Lord

- Adulterers' Marriages, 2R. 760
- Burial Grounds, 17
- Consolidated Criminal Statutes, 1R. 122; 2R. 1353
- Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, 3R. 201, 215, 225
- High and Low Water-mark—Rights of the Crown, 964
- India, Administration of Justice in, 433
- Norwich, Bishop of, Resignation of, 9
- Obscene Books, Sale of, Prevention, 2R. 327, 329, 330, 333, 334, 335, 336; Com. 864, 867; Rep. 1152; 3R. 1355, 1361, 1362
- Police (Scotland), Com. 768
- Reports, Privilege of, Report, 1363
- Statute Law Commission, 122
- Transfer of Real Property—Mr. Fawcotte's Petition, 863
- Vexatious Litigation Prevention, 2R. 342

CAMPBELL, Mr. R. J. R., Weymouth

- Cotton, Growth of, in India, 897

Canada and New Brunswick Boundaries Bill

- c. 1R.* 1550

Canadian Bishops,

- c. Question (Mr. Collins), 344

Cannon

- l. Question (Lord Ravensworth), 107

CANTERBURY, Archbishop of

- Adulterers' Marriages, 2R. 760
- Oaths, 2R. 1259
- Obscene Books, Sale of, Prevention, 3R. 1362

CARDIGAN, Earl of

- India, Conveyance of Troops to, 949

CARNARVON, Earl of

- Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, 3R. 210
- Oxford University, 2R. 608

CAYLEY, Mr. E. S., Yorkshire N. Riding

- Probates and Letters of Administration, Com. cl. 40, 1013; cl. 85, 1305; cl. 87, 1308; Schedule A, 1317

CHANCELLOR, The LORD (Rt. Hon. Lord Cranworth)

- Adulterers' Marriages, 2R. 759
- Consolidated Criminal Statutes, 1R. 115; 2R. 1353
- County Courts, Return Moved for, 1031
- Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, 3R. 211; 1353 Amend. 215, 219, 220, 225, 227, 325
- High and Low Water-mark—Rights of the Crown, 963
- Joint-Stock Companies, 2R. 1424, 1427; Com. 1517; 3R. add. cl. 1630
- Naturalization Bills, Res., 1659
- Norwich, Bishop of, Resignation of, 5, 13
- Obscene Books, Sale of, Prevention, 2R. 329, 330, 334, 335; Com. 867; 3R. 1361
- Opium Trade with China, 107

CHANCELLOR, The LORD—cont.

Peerage of Ireland—Proof of right Vote, Res., 855, 856
 Probates and Letters of Administration, 325
 Roman Catholic Charities, Return moved for, 124; Com. cl. 1, 764, 765
 Statute Law Commission, 115
 Transfer of Real Estate, 1R. 1155
 Transfer of Real Property—Mr. Fawcette's Petition, 862
 Transportation and Penal Servitude, 3R. 18
 Vexatious Litigation Prevention, 2R. 341

CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (Rt. Hon.

Sir G. C. Lewis), Radnor, &c.

Ballot, The, Leave, 635, 655, 682
 China, War with—Estimate, 1132, 1133, 1134, 1136, 1372, 1373
 Civil Service, 1473
 Civil Service Superannuation, 557
 Diplomatic and Consular Services, Examination for the, 772
 Elections Petition, 2R. Amend. 602, 604
 India, State of, 1711
 Lords, House of—Salaries, Return moved for, 26
 National Gallery, 149
 Navy Estimates, 1771
 Newspapers, Registration of, Paper moved for, 688
 Paper, Duty on, in Pottery Manufacture, 769
 Persia, War with—Estimate, 1132, 1133, 1134, 1136, 1372, 1373; Res. 1583, 1584
 Press, The Periodical, 1285
 Property Tax and Population, Return moved for, 969
 Public Offices Extension, Com. cl. 40, 1422
 Savings Banks, 345, 547, 554, 555, 556, 1372
 Superannuation Act Amendment, Leave, 699, 707; 2R. 1658
 Supply, 61:—Public Buildings, 76, 88;—Mint, 181, 183;—Science and Art, 587;—Queen's University (Ireland) 597;—National Gallery, 840;—Civil Contingencies, 1415, 1655;—Persian Expedition, 1730, 1738, 1742, 1765, 1766
 Thames and Medway Conservancy, Consid. 870, 874, 875; 3R. 1126, 1129, 1131
 Valuation of, General, Ireland, 22
 Writs, New, Res. 771

Charitable Uses Bill,

c. 3R.* 342
 l. 1R.* 416; 2R.* 852

Charities, Public, Bill,

c. 1R.* 137

CHARLESWORTH, Mr. J. C. D., Wakefield

Probates and Letters of Administration, Com. Schedule A. 1316; Amend. 1318

CHEETHAM Mr. J., Lancashire S.

Bath Election Committee, 1687
 Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 4, 1188
 Harbours of Refuge, Nomination of Com. 415
 India, Mutiny in, 1461
 Rochdale Election—Privilege, Com. moved for, 99, 100; Amend. 101, 102, 103
 Supply—Education, 413

Chelsea New Bridge Bill,

c. 1R.* 1550

CHILD, Mr. S., Staffordshire N.

Election Petitions, 2R. 604
 Supply—British Museum, 809

China,

Hong Kong—Supply c. 909
Opium Trade, l. Question (Earl of Shaftesbury), 107
Reinforcements for, c. Question (Sir J. Pakington), 1279
War with—Estimate, c. Motion (Chancellor of the Exchequer), 1132; Adj. moved (Sir J. Pakington), 1134; Motion withdrawn, 1137, 1372;—Supply, 1767

Christchurch West Hartlepool Bill,

c. 1R.* 236; 2R.* 443; 3R.* 707
 l. 1R.* 755

Cinque Ports Act Amendment Bill,

l. Royal Assent, 416

Civil Contingencies—Supply,

c. 1410; Amend. (Sir J. Trelawny) 1415; Amend withdrawn, 1416; Report, 1655

Civil Service,

c. Motion (Viscount Goderich), 1463; Amend. (Viscount Raynham) 1473; Amend. neg. ib.

Civil Service Superannuation,

c. Question (Mr. Rich) 557;—see Superannuation Bill

CLANCARTY, Earl of

Irish Paupers, Removal of, 620
 Ministers' Money (Ireland) Com. Amend. 124, 193; 3R. Amend 433
 Swiss Legion, The, 1345

CLANRICARDE, Marquess of

Dixon, Mr., Case of, Papers moved for, 114
 India, Administration of Justice in, 427;—Civil Service, Returns moved for, 951
 Irish Paupers, Removal of, 619
 Slave Trade, African, 1661
 Victoria Cross, Distribution of the, 417

CLARENDON, Earl of. (Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs)

"Maria," The Schooner, 948
 Slave Trade, alleged Revival of the, 607, 951; Address moved, 1672
 Sound Dues, 2R. 765

CLAY, Mr. J., Kingston-upon-Hull

Burial Acts Amendment, Com. cl. 16, 1041
 Civil Service, 1482
 Finsbury Park (No. 2) 2R. 237

Clerks of Petty Sessions (Ireland) Bill.

c. Leave, 1508; 1R.* 1510

CLIVE, Mr. G., Hereford City

Probates and Letters of Administration, Com. cl. 85, 1305
 Supply.—Poor-Law Commission, 179, 180

Coal Whippers Bill,

l. 1R.* 106;

Select Com., 1024, [Contents 31, Not-Contents 27, M. 4] 1029; Order discharged 1154

COBBETT, Mr. J. M., Oldham

Factory Inspector's Report, 142

Falkirk Election—Com. moved for, 1555, 1557

Grand Juries (Metropolis) Com. cl. 1, 1446

Industrial Schools, Com. add. cl. 1148

South Eastern Railway (Greenwich Junction, &amp;c.) 3R. 629

CODRINGTON, Lt. Gen., Sir W. J., Greenwich

Sardinian and Turkish Medals, 1282

Thames Conservancy, 3R. Amend., 1119, 1123

Victoria Cross, Distribution of the, 251, 370

COGAN, Mr. W. H. F., Kildare Co.

Fiscal Affairs (Ireland) Leave, 258

Coinage Offences Bill,

l. 1R. 115; 2R. 1353

COLCHESTER, Lord,

Admiral of the Fleet, 756

Coal Whippers, Select Com. 1028

COLEBROOKE, Sir T. E., Lanarkshire

India, Mutiny in, 1371

Supply—Persian Expedition, 1739

COLLIER, Mr. R. P., Plymouth

Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 10, 1193; cl. 12, 1196

Probates and Letters of Administration, 2R.

468, 478; Com. cl. 2, Amend. 977, 985, 990;

cl. 10, 998, 1000; cl. 34, 1008; add cl. 1314;

Schedule A, Amend. 1321

COLLINS, Mr. T., Knaresborough

Canadian Bishops, 344

Oaths, 3R. 363

Probates and Letters of Administration, Com. cl.

40, 1295; Schedule A, 1316

Scientific and Literary Societies, Com. cl. 2, 1528

Colonial Office—Supply,

c. 167

Common Law Commission,

c. Question (Mr. McMahon) 443

Commons Inclosure Bill,

c. 1R.* 1510; 2R.* 1550

CONINGHAM, Mr. W., Brighton

Academy Royal, The, 1043

Australian Mail Company, 1456

Medical Profession (No. 1), 2R. 754

Supply—Science and Art, 583;—National Gallery, 827, 844

CONOLLY, Mr. T., Donegal Co.

Lord Lieutenantcy of Ireland, 1103

VOL. CXLV. [THIRD SERIES.]

Consolidated Fund (£8,000,000) Bill,

c. 1R.* 236; 2R.* 305; 3R.* 443

l. 1R.* 512; 2R.* 755; 3R.* 852

Royal Assent, ib.Constabulary Force (Ireland) Bill,

c. 1R.* 342; 2R.* 535; 3R.* 965

l. 1R.* 1024; 2R.* 1658

Consular Establishment—Supply

c. 935, Amend. (Mr. Whiteside) 94

withdrawn, 945

Convicts—Supply,

c. 382

COPELAND, Mr. Alderman W. T., Stoke-Upon-Trent,

Workhouses, Metropolitan, Com. moved for, 380

Copyhold, Inclosure and Tithe Commission—Supply,

c. 186

Corn, Sale of, Bill,

c. 1R.* 1510

Coronation, Her Majesty's—Sir George Hayter's Picture,

l. Question (Viscount Dungannon) 1660

CORY, Rt. Hon. H. T. L., Tyrone Co.

Communication between Dublin and London, 880

*Cotton, Growth of, in India,*c. Motion, (Mr. J. B. Smith) 266; Previous Question moved (Mr. D. Seymour) 302; Adj. moved (Sir E. Perry) ib.; Question (Lord C. Hamilton) 346, 878; Observations (Mr. Hadfield) 893*County Cess (Ireland) Bill,*

l. 2R.* 325; 3R.* 605

Royal Assent, 852

County Courts,

l. Returns moved for, (Lord Brougham) 1030

County Courts—Supply,

c. 190

County Roads, South Wales—Supply,

c. 187

Court of Session (Scotland) Bill,

c. 1R.* 137;

2R. Amend. (Mr. Black) 1205; Amend. withdrawn 1207

COWAN, Mr. C., Edinburgh

Joint-Stock Banks, Leave, 196

Lunatics (Scotland), 2R. 1187

Municipal Corporations, Consid. Adj., moved, 1423

COWAN, Mr. C.—cont.

Sheriff's Court (Scotland), Accommodation in the, 192

Supply, Public Works (Ireland) 164; Amend. 166;—Woods, Forests, &c. 177;—Infirmaries, &c. (Ireland), Amend. 1396, 1397, 1398;—Inland Revenue, 1406

COWPER, Rt. Hon. W. F. (Vice President of the Committee of Privy Council for Education), Herford

Art Collection, National, 1375

Education, 345

Health, Public Act Amendment, Leave, 1506

Medical Profession, (No. 1) 2R. 748

Supply—Education, 383, 411:—Science and Art, 566, 586

Vaccination, 1372

Cox, Mr. W., Finsbury

Finsbury Park, (No. 2) 2R. 237, 249, 630

Industrial Schools, Com. cl. 18, 1146; add. cl. 1149

Supply—National Gallery, Amend. 822, 823, 843;—Infirmaries, &c. (Ireland) 1398

CRANWORTH, Lord, see CHANCELLOR, The LORD

CRAUFURD, Mr. E. H. J., Ayr, &c.

Court of Session (Scotland), 2R. 1206

Inspectors of Taxes (Scotland), 803

Judgments Execution, Com. cl. 7, 305; cl. 8, 311, 312; cl. 9, 318, 1514

Medical Profession (No. 1), 2R. Amend, 707

Rochdale Election—Privilege, Com. moved for, 105

CRAWFORD, Mr. R. W., London,
India—Railways, Res. 1724, 1726

Criminal Prosecutions—Supply,
c. 191

CROSS, Mr. R. A., Preston
Supply—Mint, 181, 182, 183

CROSSLEY, Mr. F., Halifax

Probates and Letters of Administration, Com. cl. 10, 1000; Schedule A, 1316

Supply, 63:—West Indies, Governors, &c., 905, 945

Crowded Dwellings Prevention Bill,
l. 1R.* 1024; 2R.* 1152;
Com., 1542

Crown Office, Chancery and Queen's Bench—Supply,
c. 189

Crown, &c., Suits (Scotland) Bill,
c. 1R.* 137; 2R.* 443; 3R.* 1278
l. 1R.* 1323

Cruelty to Animals Act Amendment Bill,
c. 1R.* 236

Cuba—Slave Trade,

c. Question (Sir G. Pechell), 25

CUBITT, Mr. Alderman W., Andover
Thames Conservancy, 3R. 1121

Customs Department—Supply,
c. 1405

DEASY Mr. R., Cork Co.

Cambridge Borough Election, Report, 713, 714

Judgments Execution, Com. cl. 7, 306

Oaths, 3R. 365

Dee, River,

c. Question (Mr. Salisbury), 966

Deer, Game and Rabbits Bill,

l. 1R. 115;

2R. 1358

Defence of the Country,

c. Observations (Mr. Bentinck), 1712

DENISON, Rt. Hon. J. E., see SPEAKER, The

DENISON, Mr. E. B., Yorkshire, W. R.

Probates and Letters of Administration, Com. cl. 10, 998; Schedule A, 1316, 1318

Reformatory Schools, Com. 1106; cl. 1, 1106

DENMAN, Lord

"Examiner," The, and Lord Plunket—Privilege, 532

DERBY, Earl of

Consolidated Criminal Statutes, 2R. 1354

"Examiner," The, and Lord Plunket—Privilege, 572

High and Low Water mark—Rights of the Crown, 954, 961

Ministers' Money (Ireland), Com. 127, 3R. 438

Norwich, Bishop of, Resignation of, 9, 13

Oaths, 2R. Amend., 1220, 1263

Oxford University, 2R. 609

Proselytism in Ireland—The Kilkenny Magistrates, Com. moved for, 422

DERING, Sir E. C., Kent, E.

Huntingdon County Election, Com. 1554

Oaths, Consid. add. cl. 144

South Eastern Railway, (Greenwich Junction, &c.) 3R. Amend. 622

DESART, Earl of

Irish Paupers, Removal of, 619

DE VERE, Mr. S. E., Limerick Co.

Married Women, 2R. 1523

DILLWYN, Mr. L. L., Swansea

Burial Acts Amendment Com. 1036

Finsbury Park (No. 2), 2R. 247

India, Conveyance of Troops to, 1695

Oaths, Consid. add. cl. 146; 3R. 363

Oaths, Parliamentary, Postponement of Motion, 1684, 1695

[cont.

DILLWYN, Mr. L. L.—cont.

Oaths, Validity Act Amendment, Leave, 1778
 Probates and Letters of Administration, Com.
 Schedule A, Amend. 1321
 Rochdale Election—Privilege, Com. moved for, 103
 Supply—Royal Palaces, 73; Amend. 76;—Royal Parks, 94; Amend. 95;—Education, 414;—
 Science and Art, Amend. 572, 588

Diplomatic and Consular Services, Ex- amination for the
c. Question (Mr. W. Ewart), 772

DISRAELI, Rt. Hon. B., Buckinghamshire
 Greytown, Bombardment of, 49, 53
 India, Mutiny in, 538, 1367, 1369, 1456, 1459, 1655
 India, State of, 1707
 Lord Lieutenantcy of Ireland, 1096
 Persia, War with, Res. 1847, 1711
 Property Tax and Population, Returns moved for, 969
 Supply, 64;—Persian Expedition, 1757, 1760
 Writs, New, Res. 771, 898, 901, 970

DIVETT, Mr. E., Exeter
 Probates and Letters of Administration, Com.
 cl. 13, Amend. 1001
 Writs, New, Res. 972

Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill,
l. 3R. 200; Amend. (Lord Redesdale), 201,
[o. q. Contents 91, Not-Contents 34, M. 57]
213;
 Amend. (Earl of Donoughmore), 214; Amend.
 neg. 215;
 Amend. (Lord Chancellor), [o. q. Contents 29,
 Not-Contents 49, M. 20] 216;
 Amend. (Earl Nelson), 217, [Contents 19, Not-tents 47, M. 47] 224;
 Proviso (Bishop of Exeter), 225, [Contents 24,
 Not-Contents 38, M. 14] 226;
 That the Bill do pass, 227, [Contents 46, Not-Contents 25, M. 21] 228;
 Protests, 229;
 Question (Earl of Wicklow) 325
*c. 1R.* 342;*

Dixon, Mr., Case of
l. Papers moved for, (Earl of Albemarle), 109

DONOUGHMORE, Earl of Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, 3R. Amend.
 214
 Dixon, Mr., Case of, Papers moved for, 114
 "Examiner," The, and Lord Plunket—Privilege, 525
 Irish Paupers, Removal of, 616
 Joint-Stock Companies, 3R. add. cl. 1680
 Ministers' Money (Ireland), Com. 134
 Peerage of Ireland—Proof of Right to Vote,
 Res. 856
 Victoria Cross, Distribution of the, 416

DRUMMOND, Mr. H., Surrey, W.
 Lunatics (Scotland), 2R. 1173; Com. cl. 4, 1566
 Lunatics, Treatment of, 881
 *Oaths, 3R. 356.

DRUMMOND, Mr. H.—cont.

Scientific and Literary Societies, Com. cl. 2, 328
 Supply—Public Buildings, 82;—New Houses of Parliament, 155.
 Workhouses, Metropolitan, Com. moved for, 379

DUCANE, Mr. C., Essex, N.
 Probates and Letters of Administration, Com.
 Schedule A, 1320

DUFFERIN, Lord,
 Oaths, 2R. 1257

DUKE, Sir J., London
 Thames and Medway Conservancy, Consid. 877;
 3R. 1131

Dulwich College Bill,
*l. 3R.* 947*
*c. 1R.* 1155; 2R.* 1550*

DUNBAR, Sir W., Wigton, &c.,
 Lunatics (Scotland) Com. cl. 4, 1566

DUNCOMBE, Rear Adm. Hon. A., Yorkshire
E. Riding
 India, Mutiny in, 1462; Troops for, 1567, 1691
 Navy Estimates, 1772
 Steamers in the Navy, Returns moved for,
 1116, 1118
 Victoria Cross, Distribution of the, 371

DUNCOMBE, Mr. T. S., Finsbury
 Finsbury Park (No. 2), 2R. 240, 249
 Jewish Disabilities, 1703
 Medical Profession (No. 1), 2R. 721, 731
 South Eastern Railway (Greenwich Junction,
 &c.), 3R. 629
 Writs, New, Res. 769, 770, 900; Amend. 970

DUNDAS, Mr. F., Orkney & Shetland
 Lunatics (Scotland), 2R. 1176

DUNGANNON, Viscount
 Burial Grounds, 16, 17
 Coronation, Her Majesty's,—Sir G. Hayter's
 Picture, 1660
 Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, 2R. 244; That the Bill do pass, 226
 Ministers' Money (Ireland), Com. 135; 3R. 441
 Norwich, Bishop of, Resignation of, 9
 Oaths, 2R. 1252
 Obscene Books, Sale of, Prevention, 2R. 835
 Proselytism in Ireland—The Kilkenny Magistrates, Com. moved for, 417, 423
 Transportation and Penal Servitude, 3R. 19

DUNLOP, Mr. A. M., Greenock
 Court of Session (Scotland), 2R. 1207
 Lunatics (Scotland), 2R. 1184
 Probates and Letters of Administration, Com.
 cl. 2, 987

DURHAM, Bishop of
 Oxford University, 2R. 614

East Quay Wall Tax (Dublin) Bill
c. 1R.* 443; 2R.* 867

EBRINGTON, Viscount, Marylebone
Burial Acts Amendment, Com. cl. 16, 1034
Industrial Schools, Com. cl. 13, 1130

Edinburgh, Canongate, and Montrose Annuity Tax Abolition Bill,
c. Leave, 1207; 1R.* 1209

Education,
c. Question (Mr. W. Ewart), 345;—Supply, 382;
Amend. (Viscount Melgund), 413, [A. 7, N. 163, M. 156] 415; Notice (Sir J. Pakington) 1569

EGERTON, Mr. E. C., Macclesfield
Election Petitions, Com. 1323
Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 4; Amend. 1187, 1188, 1189; cl. 17, Amend. 1205

EGERTON, Mr. W. T., Cheshire, N.
Probates and Letters of Administration, Com. Schedule A, 1318
Supply—Queen's University (Ireland), 598

EGLINTON, Earl of
Dixon, Mr., Case of, Papers, moved for, 114

ELCHO, Lord, Haddingtonshire
Medical Profession (No. 1), 2R. 724, 731
Medical Profession (No. 3), Withdrawal of Bill, 754
Ordnance Survey, 1375, 1388
Public Offices, 804.
Supply—Science and Art, 570, 586;—National Gallery, Amend. 816, 823, 825, 834, 839, 843, 846
Survey of Towns, 1042
Westminster Hall, Designs in, 20

Election Petitions Bill,
c. 2R. 510, 601; Amend. (Chancellor of the Exchequer), 602; Adj. moved (Sir J. Shelley), [A. 55, N. 77, M. 22], 603; Amend. neg. 605; Com. 1322; Adj. moved (Mr. Ayrton), [A. 95, N. 25, M. 70] 1323

ELLENBOROUGH, Earl of Exchange, Rate of, India, 852
India, Administration of Justice in, 431, 433;— Mutiny in, 512, 1323, 1533, 1535, 1536;
—Conveyance of Troops to, 949
Ministers' Money (Ireland), Com., 186
Obscene Books, Sale of, Prevention, 2R. 335
Transport Service, 1429, 1431

ELLICE, Rt. Hon. E., Coventry
Edinburgh, &c., Annuity Tax Abolition, Leave, 1207
Probates and Letters of Administration, Com. cl. 40, 1297

ELLICE, Mr. E., Cupar, St. Andrews, &c.
Harbours of Refuge, Nomination of Com. Amend. 415
Lunatics (Scotland), 2R. 1177, 1186

ELPHINSTONE, Sir J. D. H., Portsmouth
Steamers in the Navy, Returns moved for, 1117

Emigration, Board, &c.—Supply
c. 909

Emigrants, Distressed, Canada and New Brunswick—Supply
c. 912

ESTCOURT, Mr. T. H. SOTHERON, Wiltshire, N.
Burial Acts Amendment, Com. 1035; cl. 16, 1041
Finsbury Park (No. 2), 2R., 631
Rochdale Election—Privilege, 33, 34
Writs, New, Res., 973

EVANS, Lieut.-Gen. Sir De Lacy, Westminster
Burial Acts Amendment, Com. 1037; cl. 16, 1040
Finsbury Park (No. 2), 2R. 242
India, Mutiny in, 1461
Lords, House of—Salaries, Return moved for, 26.
Officers' Quarters, Property Tax on, 1367
Thames and Medway Conservancy, Consid. 875; 3R. 1122.

Evidence upon Oath (House of Commons) Bill,
c. Leave, 804; 1R.* 56.;
Bill withdrawn, 509

EWART, Mr. J. C., Liverpool
Civil Service, 1479

EWART, Mr. W., Dumfries, &c.
Art Collection, National, 1375
Crimea, Officers in the, Services of, 24
Diplomatic and Consular Services, Examinations for the, 772
Education, 345
Lunatics (Scotland), 2R. 1184
Medical Profession (No. 1), 2R. 715
Scientific and Literary Societies, Com. cl. 2, 322, 1524, 1529, 1530, 1531
Supply—Stationery, Printing, &c., 187:—
Education, 401, 411:—Science and Art, 564:—Labuan, 909

“Examiner, The, and Lord Plunket—Privilege.
1. Motion (Earl of Donoughmore), 525; Motion withdrawn, 532

EXCHEQUER, CHANCELLOR of the, see CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER

Exchequer—Supply
c. 168

Exchequer Court of (Ireland) Bill,
1. 2R.* 416; 3R.* 605
Royal Assent, 852

- EXETER, Bishop of,
Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, 3R. 223;
Proviso, 224, 226.
- Factories, Inspectors of, Reports,
c. Question (Mr. Cobbett), 142;—Supply, 184
- Falkirk Election—Petition,
c. Com. moved for (Mr. Cobbett), 1555; Motion withdrawn, 1557
- Falkland Islands—Supply,
c. 907
- Fawcette, Mr.—His Petition,
l. Observations (Lord Brougham), 858
- Finsbury Park (No. 2) Bill,
c. 2R. Amend. (Mr. W. Williams), 236; Adj.
moved (Mr. Miles), 249, [A. 214, N. 123,
M. 91], 250; Adj. Debate, 630; Amend.
withdrawn, 631
- Fiscal Affairs (Ireland),
c. Leave, 251; Motion withdrawn, 266
- FITZGERALD, Rt. Hon. J. D. (Attorney General for Ireland), Ennis
Bankruptcy and Insolvency (Ireland), Com.
cl. 161, 632
Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 2, 508
Justices and Police Force, Dublin, 2R. 1419;
Com. 1657
Married Women, 2R., 1521
Mayo Election Committee, Report, 1168; New Writ, 1572
Railways (Ireland), Leave, 1506
Rochdale Election—Privilege, 30, 31
Sligo Borough Election, Papers moved for,
1563, 1564
Summary Proceedings before Justices of the Peace, Com. cl. 1, 1021
- FITZGERALD, Mr. W. R. S., Horsham
Bath Election Committee, 1688
Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 2, 509
Judgments Execution, Com. cl. 7, 306
Oaths, Consid. add. cl., 143, 145
Superannuation Act Amendment, 2R. 1658
- FITZROY, Rt. Hon. H., (Chairman of Committees), Lewes
Judgments Execution, Com. cl. 9, 315
Probate and Letters of Administration, Com.
cl. 6, 993; cl. 9, 995
Rochdale Election—Privilege Com. moved for, 102
South Eastern Railway (Greenwich Junction,
&c.), 3R. 629
Supply—Royal Palaces, 76;—Education, 383;
—Harbours of Refuge, 925.
- FITZWILLIAM, Earl of
Norwich, Bishop of, Resignation of, 13
Transfer of Real Property—Mr. Fawcette's
Petition, 864
- FITZWILLIAM, Hon. C. W. W., Malton
Bed River Settlement, 142
- Foreign Office—Supply
c. 167
- Forgery Bill
l. 1R. 115;
2R. 1853
- FORSTER, Sir G. M., Monaghan Co.
Petty Sessions (Ireland), 966
- Fraudulent Trustees Bill
c. cl. 1, 491; Amend. (Mr. Rolt) 498; Amend.
neg. 503; Amend. (Mr. Blake) 504
cl. 2, 505;
cl. 4, Amend. (Mr. E. C. Egerton) 1187; Amend.
withdrawn, 1189;
cl. 6, 1189; cl. 9, 1190; cl. 10, 1191;
cl. 11, Amend. (Mr. Cairns) 1193;
cl. 12, Amend. (Mr. Cairns) 1194; Amend.
withdrawn, 1205;
cl. 17, Amend. (Mr. E. C. Egerton) 1205; Consid. add. cl. (Mr. Hadfield) 1416; Motion neg. 1417; Amend. (Mr. Butt) ib.; Motion
neg. 1418;
3R.* 1550
l. 1R.* 1658
- FREESTON, Col. W. L., Weymouth
South Eastern Railway (Greenwich Junction,
&c.), 3R. 624,
- FRENCH, Col. F., Roscommon Co.
Fiscal Affairs (Ireland), Leave, 254
Galway Town Writ, 1569, 1570
India, Mutiny in, 633
Judgments Execution, Com. cl. 7, 305, 307,
308; cl. 8, 310, 312; cl. 9, 313, 314, 315,
316; Adj. moved, 1512, 1514
Lambeth Election, 1712
Mayo Writ, 1571
Medical Profession (No. 1), 2R. 714
Rochdale Election—Privilege, 137
South Eastern Railway (Greenwich Junction,
&c.), 3R. 628
Valuation of, General, Ireland, 24
Victoria Cross, Distribution of the, 140, 344
371, 445
- Friendly Societies, Registrars of—Supply
c. 187.
- Furniture, Public Departments—Supply
c. 88
- GALWAY, Viscount, East Retford,
Bath Election Committee, 1685, 1687
Election Petitions, 2R. 604
Oaths Validity Act Amendment, Leave, Adj.
moved, 1780
Probates and Letters of Administration, Com.
Schedule A, 1317
Superannuation Act Amendment, 2R. 1658
Supply—Queen's University (Ireland), 600
- Galway Town Election
c. Report, 1366; New Writ, Amend. (Lord Lovaine) 1569; Amend. and Motion withdrawn, 1570
- GALLOWAY, Earl of
Oaths, 2R. 1274

GARNETT, Mr. W. J., Lancaster

Reformatory Schools, Com. 1163
 Slave Trade, Africa, Address moved, 1497
 Supply—Education, 413

Geographical Society—Supply

c. 846

GILPIN, Mr. C., Northampton

India—Railways, Res. 1722, 1726
 Oaths, Consid. add. cl. 147
 Privateering, Papers moved for, 1487
 South Eastern Railway (Greenwich Junction, &c.), 3R. 627
 Supply—Nonconforming, &c. Ministers (Ireland), 1403
 Reformatory Schools, Com. 1164

GLADSTONE, Rt. Hon. W. E., Oxford University

Persia, War with, Res. 1629
 Supply—Persian Expedition, 1743, 1750

Glebe Lands (Ireland) Bill

c. 1R.* 443; 2R.* 867; 3R.* 1510
 l. 1R.* 1533

GLYN, Mr. G. C., Kendal

Savings Banks Funds, 551

GODERICH, Viscount, Yorkshire, W. R.

Bengal Military Fund, 1048
 Civil Service, 1463, 1485
 India, Mutiny in, 1371
 Industrial Schools, Com. cl. 18, 1139; add. cl. 1149
 Probates and Letters of Administration, Com. Schedule A, 1315
 Supply—Public Buildings, 79

GRAHAM, Rt. Hon. Sir J. R. G., Carlisle,

China, War with—Estimate, 1135, 1136, 1137, 1873
 Persia, War with—Estimate, 1135, 1136, 1137, 1373; Res. 1584
 Rochdale Election Privilege, 28
 Thames and Medway Conservancy, Consid. 867, 876; 3R. 129
 Writs, New, Res. 770

Grand Juries (Metropolitan Police District) Bill

c. Com. cl. 1, Amend. (Mr. Bowyer), 1433, [A. 80, N. 187, M. 107] 1452

Grand Juries (Ireland) Act (1836) Amendment Bill

l. 2R.* 325; 3R.* 852

GRANVILLE, Earl (President of the Council)

Admiral of the Fleet, 756.
 Australia, Central, Expedition to, 109
 Coalwhippers, Select Com. 1028
 Consolidated Criminal Statutes, 2R. 1354
 Coronation, Her Majesty's—Sir G. Hayter's Picture, 1660
 Dixon, Mr., Case of, Papers moved for, 114

GRANVILLE, Earl—continued.

"Examiner," The, and Lord Plunket—vilego, 527
 Exchange, Rate of, India, 854
 India, Mutiny in, 520, 523, 525, 1331, 1535, 1536
 Irish Paupers, Removal of, 619
 Ministers' Money (Ireland) Com. 129, 13R. 441
 Norwich, Bishop of, Resignation of, 15
 Oaths 2R. 1209, 1234, 1235
 Obscene Books, Sale of, Prevention, 2R. 338
 Price, Mr., Murder of, at Melbourne, Correspondence moved for, 858
 Proselytism in Ireland—The Kilkenny Murders, Com. moved for, 420
 St. James's Park Improvements, 1349, 1353
 Transportation and Penal Servitude, 3R. 1

Great Northern Railway (Capital) Bill 2R. 756;

3R. 1536; Amend. (Lord St. Leonards) 1
 [o. q., Contents 43, Non-Contents 7, M. 1541; add. cl. (Lord Wensleydale) 1542

GREER, Mr. S. M., Londonderry Co.

Ballot, The, Leave, 669
 Fiscal Affairs (Ireland) Leave, 262
 Registration of Titles, 633

GREGORY, Mr. W. H., Galway Co.

Industrial Schools, Com. cl. 9, 1138; cl. 1146; add. cl. 1150;
 Supply—Queen's University (Ireland) 597, 599;—Captured Negroes, 938;—Civil contingencies, 1413

GREY, Rt. Hon. Sir G. (Secretary of State for the Home Department, ) Morning

Assize Circuits, 1576
 Burial Acts Amendment, Com., 1035; c. 1037; cl. 5, 1038; cl. 16, 1039, 1041
 China, War with,—Estimate, 1135, 1137
 Election Petitions, 2R. 510, 511; Com. 132
 Factory Inspectors' Reports, 142
 Falkirk Election, Com. moved for, 1556
 Finsbury Park (No. 2) 2R. 242
 Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 1, 502
 Galway Town Writ, 1570
 Health, Board of, 884
 Huntingdon County Election, Com. 1551, 1553, 1554
 Industrial Schools, Com. cl. 9, 1138; cl. 1139
 Judicial Reforms in India, 450
 Lunatics (Scotland) 2R. 1183
 Lunatics, Treatment of, 881
 Oaths, Consid. add. cl. 145
 Ordnance Survey, 1387
 Persia, War with—Estimate, 1135, 1137
 Printing Committee, 1690
 Reformatory Schools, 2R. 193; Com. 1158
cl. 1, 1165; cl. 8, 1166
 Rochdale Election—Privilege, 35, 97, 1
 Com. moved for, 102
 St. John's, Chester, 965
 Sligo Borough Election, 1558; Papers moved for, Amend. 1561

[cont.]

[cont.]

GREY, Rt. Hon. Sir G.—cont.

Summary Proceedings before Justices of the Peace, Com. cl. 1, 1022

Superannuation Act Amendment, 2R, 1657

Supply—Poor Law Commission, 178, 945

Thames and Medway Conservancy, Consd. 877, 878

Women, Assaults on, 149

Writs, New, Res. 900, 969, 973

Greytown, Bombardment of
c. Question (Lord O. Hamilton), 85

GRIFFITH, Mr. C. D., Devizes

Finsbury Park (No. 2), 2R. 250

Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 2, 508

Judgments Execution, Com. cl. 7, 308; cl. 9, 314

Railway Traffic Act Amendment, 2R. 1508

Suez, Isthmus of, Canal, 1704

GROGAN, Mr. E., Dublin City

Cambridge Borough Election, Report, 714

County and District Surveyors (Ireland), 1504

Judgments Executions, Com. cl. 8, 311, 312; cl. 9, 314, 316

Justices and Police Force, Dublin, 2R. Amend. 1419; Com. Adj. moved, 1657

Lord Lieutenantcy of Ireland, 1062

Medical Profession (No. 1), 2R. 718

Supply—Royal Parks, 94;—Poor Law Commission, 181;—Queen's University (Ireland), 596;—Post Office, 1409

Valuation of, General, Ireland, 22

GROSVENOR, Rt. Hon. Lord R., Middlesex

Finsbury Park (No. 2), 2R. 289

Supply, 68

Turnpikes, Metropolitan, 1045

Guano, Supply of,

c. Question (Mr. Baxter), 968

Gunpowder Stores,

c. Question (Major Sibthorp), 344

GURNEY, Mr. S., Penryn, &c.

Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 2, 508

HACKBLOCK, Mr. W., Reigate

Reformatory Schools, Com. 1161

HADFIELD, Mr. G., Sheffield

Cotton, Growth of, in India, 347, 893

Evidence upon Oath (House of Commons) Leave, 304

Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 4, 1183, 1189; cl. 9, 1190, 1191; Consd. add cl. 1416, 1417

Greytown, Bombardment of, 39

Lord Lieutenantcy of Ireland, 1055

Married Women, 2R. 1519

Probates and Letters of Administration, Com. 974; cl. 86, 1305; add cl. 1313

Statute Law Commission, Address moved, 777

Supply—Education, 382, 414;—Nonconforming &c., Ministers (Ireland), 1404;—Theological Professors, Belfast, Amend., 1405

HALL, Rt. Hon. Sir B., (Chief Commissioner of Works). Marylebone

Finsbury Park (No. 1) 2R. 248, 249

Public Offices, 800, 802, 804, 805

Public Offices Extension, Com. cl. 1, 1421

Richard Cœur de Lion, Statue of, 966

St. Stephen's Hall, Statues in, 20

South Eastern Railway (Greenwich Junction, &c.), 3R. 626

Supply, 68;—Royal Palaces, 69, 71;—Public Buildings, 77, 78, 79, 87;—Furniture, Public Departments, 88;—Royal Parks, 90, 91, 92, 94, 95, 96, 97;—New Houses of Parliament, 150, 152, 153, 154, 156, 158, 162, 163, 164

Victoria Cross, Distribution of the, 140

Westminster Hall, Designs in, 21

HAMILTON, Rt. Hon. Lord C., Tyrone Co.

Cotton, Growth of, in India, 346, 878, 896

Election Petitions, 2R. 604

Fiscal Affairs (Ireland), 265

Greytown, Bombardment of, 35

Justices and Police Force, Dublin, 2R. 1420

Militia (Ireland), 1278

Supply—New Houses of Parliament, 158

HAMILTON, Mr. G. A., Dublin University

Civil Service, 1478

County and District Surveyors (Ireland) Com. moved for, 1501

HAMILTON, Mr. J. H., Dublin Co.

Kingstown Railway, 1683

Revenue Police, Irish, 1683

HANBURY, Mr. R., Middlesex

Reformatory Schools, Com., 1157

HANKEY, Mr. T., Peterborough

Joint-Stock Banks, Leave, 198

Richard Cœur de Lion, Statue of, 966

Steamers in the Navy, Returns moved for, Adj. moved, 1117, 1118

Superannuation, Leave, 698

Hanley, Borough Incorporation Bill,

c. 1R.* 236; 2R.* 305; 3R.* 443

l. 1R.* 512; 2R.* 605; 3R.* 852.

HANMER, Sir J., Flint, &c.

Huntingdon County Election, Com., 1558

Harbours of Refuge

l. Petitions (Lord Ravensworth) 532

c. Nomination of Com.; Amend. (Mr. E. Ellice) 415; Amend. withdrawn, 416;—Supply, 918; Amend. (Mr. Lindsay) 931; Amend. neg. 933

HARDWICKE, Earl of India, Mutiny in, 523;—Mails, 1431

Military Education, 1423

Swiss Legion, The, 1344

Transport Service, 1427

HARDY, Mr. G., Leominster

Scientific and Literary Societies, Com. cl. 2, 1529; Amend. 1530, 1531

Summary Proceedings before Justices of the Peace, Com. cl. 1, 1021

Supply—Education, 409

HARRIS, Mr. J. D., Leicester
Supply—British Museum, 812

HARROWBY, Earl of (Lord Privy Seal)
Burial Grounds, 17
Norwich, Bishop of, Resignation of, 12
Oxford University, 2R. 608
Slave Trade, African, Address moved, 1678
Transportation and Penal Servitude, 3R. 18

HASSARD, Mr. M. D., Waterford City
Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 4, 1189

HATCHELL, Mr. J., Wexford Co.
Medical Profession (No. 1), 2R. 716

HAY, Lord J. R., Wick, &c.
Fishery Board (Scotland), 1567

HAYES, Sir E. S., Donegal Co.
Constabulary Force, (Ireland), 142

HEADLAM, Mr. T. E., Newcastle-upon-Tyne
Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 1, 499
Judgments Execution, Com. 1512
Medical Profession (No. 1) 2R. 752; Withdrawal of Bill, 532
Probates and Letters of Administration, 2R.
486; Com. Schedule A, 1315
Supply—Mint, 182

Health, General Board of
c. Question (Mr. Palk) 883

Health, Public, Act (1848) Amendment
Bill
c. Leave, 1506; 1R.* 1510

Health, Public, Act, (Aldershot) Bill,
c. 1R.* 867; 2R.* 1278

HEATHCOTE, Sir W., Oxford University
Falkirk Election, Com. moved for, 1557
Huntingdon County Election, Com. 1553
Industrial Schools, Com. cl. 13, 1139
Probates and Letters of Administration, Com.
cl. 85, 1304
Scientific and Literary Societies, Com. cl. 2, 320
Sligo Borough Election, Papers moved for, 1565

Heligoland—Supply
c. 907

HENCHY, Mr. D. O., Kildare
Fairs and Markets (Ireland), 20

HENLEY, Rt. Hon. J. W., Oxfordshire
Finsbury Park (No. 2), 2R. 241, 249
Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 2, 505, 506, 507;
cl. 12, 1203
Grand Juries (Metropolis), Com. cl. 1, 1451
Industrial Schools, Com. add. cl. 1150
Joint-Stock Banks, Leave, 196, 198
Navy Estimates, 1771
Oaths Validity Act Amendment, Leave, 1778
Probates and Letters of Administration, 2R.
464; Com. cl. 13, 1002; cl. 15, 1003; cl.

[cont.]

HENLEY, Rt. Hon. J. W.—cont.

34, 1010; cl. 40, 1014, 1291, 1300, 1301;
add. cl. 1314
Reformatory Schools, 2R. 194
Rochdale Election—Privilege, Com. moved for,
99, 138; Report, 323
Scientific and Literary Societies, Com. cl. 2, 319
Sligo Borough Election, Papers moved for, 1563
Summary Proceedings before Justices of the
Peace, Com. cl. 1, 1020, 1021, 1022, 1023
Supply, 60;—Public Buildings, 87;—Royal
Parks, 95;—New Houses of Parliament, 152,
153, 162, 163;—Port Patrick Harbour, 164;
—Poor Law Commission, 181;—County Courts, 191;—Education, 402;—National Gallery, 831;—Harbours of Refuge, 918,
931;—Consular Establishments, 943;—
Ministers at Foreign Courts, 947;—Persian
Expedition, 1765, 1766
Thames and Medway Conservancy, Consid.
876; 3R. 1122
Victoria Cross, Distribution of the, 373
Writs, Now, Res. 973

HERBERT, Rt. Hon. H. A., (Secretary for Ireland) Kerry Co.
Clerks of Petty Sessions (Ireland), Leave, 1508
Constabulary Force (Ireland), 142
County and District Surveyors (Ireland), Com.
moved for, 1504
Fairs and Markets (Ireland), 20
Fiscal Affairs (Ireland), Leave, 259
Justices and Police Force, Dublin, 2R. 1421
Petty Sessions (Ireland), 969
Railways (Ireland), Leave, 1505
Weights and Measures (Ireland), 1462

High and Low Water Mark,—Rights of the Crown,
l. Petition (Earl of Derby), 954

Highways Bill,
c. Bill withdrawn, 305

HILDYARD, Mr. R. C., Whitehaven,
Judgments Execution, Com. cl. 8, 312; cl. 9, 315
Probates and Letters of Administration, Com.
Schedule A, 1317
Sligo Borough Election, Papers moved for,
1561, 1563
Summary Proceedings before Justices of the
Peace, Com. cl. 1, 1023

HODGSON, Mr. W. N., Carlisle,
Probates and Letters of Administration, Com.
974; cl. 6, 992; cl. 86, 1306

Holyhead Harbour,—Supply,
c. 912

Home Department—Supply,
c. 167

Hong Kong—Supply,
c. 909

HOPE, Mr. A. J. BERESFORD, *Maidstone

Public Offices, 794

Public Offices Extension, Com. cl. 40, 1422Scientific and Literary Societies, Com. cl. 2, 1526, 1527, 1530

South Eastern Railway (Greenwich Junction, &amp;c.), 3R. 627

Supply—Public Buildings, 81 ;—Royal Parks, 97 ;—New Houses of Parliament, 156, 157, 164 ;—Education, 411 ;—Science and Art, 572, 576

HORSMAN, Rt. Hon. E., *Stroud

Bath Election Committee, 1684, 1689, 1695

Election Petitions, 2R. 604

Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland, 1086

Oaths Validity Act Amendment, Leave, 1778

Rochdale Election—Privilege, Com. moved for, 102

Supply—Queen's University (Ireland), 600

HOOTHAM, Lord, *Yorkshire E. RidingProbates and Letters of Administration, Com. cl. 24, 1005 ; Schedule A, 1317HOWARD, Rt. Hon. Lord E., *ArundelIndustrial Schools, Com. cl. 14, Amend. 1145HUDSON, Mr. G., *Sunderland

Passing Tolls on Shipping, 343

Probates and Letters of Administration, 2R. 484 ; Com. cl. 40, 1295 ; add. cl. 1311, 1312 ; Schedule A, 1317

Supply—Holyhead Harbour, 917

HUME, Mr. W. W. F., *Wicklow Co.

Oaths, Validity Act Amendment, Leave, Adj. moved, 1778

Huntingdon County Election,c. Com. 1550 ; Motion (Mr. Walpole), 1554 ; Amend. (Attorney General), 1555HUTT, Mr. W., *GatesheadScientific and Literary Societies, Com. cl. 1, 318, 1523 ; cl. 2, 1530, 1532Illicit Distillation (Ireland) Bill,c. 1R.* 535Inclosure Acts Amendment Bill,c. 3R.* 769*l.* 1R.* 852Inclosure and Drainage Acts—Supply,c. 186India,Administration of Justice, l. Petitions, (Earl of Albemarle), 423*Amnesty, c.* Question (Mr. W. Vansittart) 1568*Artillery for, c.* Question (Colonel North), 1698*Bengal Military Fund, c.* Com. moved for, (Viscount Goderich), 1046 ; Motion withdrawn, 1048*Civil Service, l.* Returns moved for, (Marquess of Clanricarde), 951*Conveyance of Troops to, l.* Question (Earl of Cardigan), 949

[cont.]

India—cont.Cotton, Growth of, c. Motion (Mr. J. B. Smith), 266 ; Previous Question moved (Mr. D. Seymour), 302 ; Adj. moved (Sir E. Perry), ib. ; Question (Lord C. Hamilton), 346, 878 ; Observations (Mr. Hadfield), 893*Disbanding of Native Troops, c.* Question (Mr. B. Williams), 250*Exchange, Rate of, l.* Question (Earl of Ellenborough), 852*Judicial Reforms, c.* Question (Sir E. Perry), 446*Mails, l.* Question (Earl of Hardwicke), 1431*Mutiny in, l.* Question (Earl of Ellenborough), 512, 1323, 1533 ; Correspondence presented (Earl Granville), 1424*c.* Question (Mr. Disraeli), 536, 1367, 1456 ; (Colonel French), 633 ; (Admiral Walcott), 1374*Perin, Island of, c.* Question (Mr. White), 141*Railways, c.* Postponement of Res. (Mr. Watkin), 1576 ; Motion (Mr. Watkin), 1714 ; Motion neg. 1730*Reinforcements for, c.* Question (Sir J. Pakington), 1279 ; (Captain Vivian), 1281 ; (Admiral Duncombe), 1567, 1691*State of, c.* Observations (Mr. Disraeli), 1707Indian Department in Canada—Supply,
c. 847Industrial Schools Bill,c. Com. cl. 9, Proviso (Mr. Bowyer), 1137 ; Proviso withdrawn, 1138 ;cl. 13, Amend. (Mr. Barrow), 1138 ; [o. q. A. 169, N. 59, M. 110], 1142 ;cl. 14, Amend. (Mr. Barrow), 1142, [o. q. A. 161, N. 78, M. 83] 1145 ;cl. 18, 1145 ;add. cl. (Mr. Adderley), 1146, 1147, 1149*add. cl.* (Viscount Goderich), 1149 ;add. cl. (Mr. Gregory), 1150 ; cl. withdrawn, *ib.INGHAM, Mr. R., *South Shields

Lambeth Election, Report, 1366, 1712

Passing Tolls on Shipping, 343

INGRAM, Mr. H., *Boston

Supply—British Museum, 811

Inland Revenue—Supply*c.* 1406Insolvent Debtors' Court—Supply*c.* 190Insurance Companies' Bill,c. 1R.* 965Insurance on Lives (Abatement of Income Tax) Continuance Bill,l. 1R.* 325 ; 2R.* 605 ; 3R.* 755

Royal Assent, 852

Ireland,Communication between London and Dublin, c. Question (Mr. Corry), 880

[cont.]

Ireland—cont.

Constabulary Forces, c. Question (Sir F. Hayes) 142
County and District Surveyors, c. Com. moved for, (Mr. G. A. Hamilton), 1501
Fairs and Markets, c. Question (Mr. O'Connor Henchy), 20
Galway Town Election, c. Report, 1366; New Writ, Amend. (Lord Lovaine), 1569; Amend. and Motion withdrawn, 1570
Kingstown Railway, c. Question (Mr. J. H. Hamilton), 1683
Lord Lieutenancy of, c. Motion, (Mr. Roebuck), 1048; Previous Question moved (Mr. T. McCullagh), 1062, [A. 115, N. 266, M. 151] 1108
Mayo Election Committee, c. Report, 1167, 1455; New Writ, 1570
Militia, c. Question (Lord C. Hamilton), 1278
Paupers, Irish, Removal of, l. Observation (Earl of Donoughmore), 616
Peerages—Proof of, Right to Vote, l. Res. (Lord Chancellor), 855
Petty Sessions, c. Question (Sir G. Forster), 966
Proselytism—The Kilkenny Magistrates, l. Com. moved for, (Viscount Dungannon), 417; Motion withdrawn, 423
Revenue Police, c. Question (Mr. J. H. Hamilton), 1683
Sligo Borough Election, c. Petition (Mr. Butt), 1557; Papers moved for, 1560; Amend. (Sir G. Grey), 1561
Supply—Public Works, c. 164; Amend. (Mr. Cowan), 166; Amend. withdrawn, 167;—Kingstown Harbour 167;—Lord Lieutenant, Amend. (Mr. W. Williams), 184 [A. 55, N. 202, M. 147] 186;—Chief Secretary—Paymaster of Civil Services—Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums—Board of Public Works, ib.—General Register Office, Dublin, 187;—Criminal Prosecutions, 191—Officers of Court of Chancery—Queen's Bench—Common Pleas—Exchequer—Clerks to Taxing Offices—Registrars—Registration of Judgments—Delegates—Insolvent Debtors Courts—Court of Errors—Police Justices (Dublin)—Divisional Police Courts—Constabulary—Four Courts—(Marshalsea), 192;—Education, 589; Amend. (Mr. Blackburn), 591, [A. 34, N. 209, M. 175] 596;—Queen's University, [A. 169, N. 55, M. 114] 600;—Queen's Colleges—Royal Irish Academy—Royal Hibernian Academy, 601;—Infirmaries and Hospitals, 1395; Amend. (Mr. Cowan), 1396; Amend. neg. 1398;—Charitable Allowances, 1399;—Nonconforming, &c. Ministers, 1399; Amend. (Mr. Baxter), 1401, [A. 41, N. 117, M. 76] 1404;—Theological Professors of Belfast, ib.; Amend. (Mr. Hadfield), 1405; Amend. neg. ib.;—Revenue Police, 1409.
Valuation, General, c. Question (Mr. Grogan), 22
Weights and Measures, c. Question (Sir W. Verner), 1462

See

Bankruptcy and Insolvency (Ireland) Bill
Clerks, of Petty Sessions (Ireland) Bill
Constabulary Force (Ireland) Bill
County Cess (Ireland) Bill
East Quay Wall Tax (Dublin) Bill
Exchequer, Court of, (Ireland) Bill

{cont.

Ireland—con.

Fiscal Affairs (Ireland) Bill
Grand Juries (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill
Glebe Land (Ireland) Bill
Illicit Distillation (Ireland) Bill
Justices and Police Force (Dublin) Bill
Land Boundaries of Ireland Bill
Militia (Ireland) Act (1854) Amendment Bill
Ministers' Money (Ireland) Bill
Public Works (Ireland) Bill
Railways (Ireland) Bill
Representative Peers (Ireland) Bill
Revising Barristers Dublin Bill

JERMYN, Rt. Hon. Earl, Bury St. Edmunds

Probates and Letters of Administration, Com. Schedule A, 1319

Jewish Disabilities,

c. Observations (Lord J. Russell), 1699 :—
 See Oaths Bill

JOHNSTONE, Sir J. B. V., Scarborough

Probates and Letters of Administration, Com. Schedule A, 1315

Supply—Harbours of Refuge, 931

JOHNSTONE, Mr. J. J. H., Dumfriesshire

Lunatics (Scotland), 2R. 1174; Com. cl. 4, 1566

Joint-Stock Banks,

c. Leave, 194

Joint-Stock Companies Bill,

l. 2R. 1424;

Com. add. cl. (Lord Wensleydale), 1546;
 Amend. neg. 1547;

3R. add. cl. (Lord Chancellor), 1680

Joint-Stock Companies Act Amendment Bill,

l. 2R.* 199; 3R.* 755

JOLLIFFE, Sir W. G. H., Petersfield

Burial Acts Amendment, Com., 1032; cl. 5, 1037

Harbours of Refuge, Nomination of Com., 415

Highways, Bill withdrawn, 305

Scientific and Literary Societies, Com. cl. 2, 1528

Supply—Mint, 182;—Lord Lieutenant (Ireland), 184

Thames Conservancy, 3R. 1120

Judgments Execution Bill,

Com. cl. 7, 305; [r. p. A. 31, N. 93, M. 62]

306; [r. p. A. 73, N. 103, M. 30] 308;

[r. p. A. 50, N. 141, M. 91] 310;

cl. 8, 310, [A. 196, N. 38, M. 158] 313;

cl. 9, 313, [r. p. A. 54, N. 175, M. 121] 314;

Amend. (Mr. McMahon) ib., 1511; Adj.

moved (Col. French), [r. p. A. 33, N. 58, M. 25] 1512

Justices and Police Force (Dublin) Bill,

c. 1R* 342;

2R. Amend. (Mr. Grogan), 1419; [o. g. A. 155, N. 19, M. 136] 1421;

Com. 1657

KEATING, Sir H. S., — see SOLICITOR GENERAL, The

KELLY, Sir F., *Suffolk, E.

Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 12, 1187, 1201
Probates and Letters of Administration, Com. cl. 2, 979, 984; cl. 5, 991, 992; cl. 13, 1001; cl. 26, 1006; cl. 40, 1295; cl. 51, 1303; cl. 87, 1308; add. cl. 1309, 1310, 1311; Schedule A, 1312, 1320
Statute Law Commission, Address moved, 777, 787

KENDALL, Mr. N., *Cornwall, E.

Industrial Schools, Com. cl. 14, 1142

KER, Mr. R., *Downpatrick

Persia, War with, Res. 1813

KERRISON, Sir E. C., *Eye

Reformatory Schools, Com. 1160; cl. 6, 1166

KERSHAW, Mr. J., *Stockport

Cotton, Growth of, in India, 896

KILMORE, Bishop of

Ministers' Money (Ireland), Com. 138, 136

KING, Hon. P. J. L., *Surrey, E.

Burial Acts Amendment, Com. cl. 16, Amend. 1039
Statute Law Commission, Address moved, 774
Supply—Public Buildings, 86
Thames and Medway Conservancy, Consid. Adj. moved, 874, 878

KINGLAKE, Mr. Serjeant J. A., *Rochester

Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 1, 500; Consid. 1417
Rochdale Election—Privilege, Com. moved for, 99, 108

KINGLAKE, Mr. A. W., *Bridgwater

Supply—Consular Establishments, 935

KINNAIRD, Lord

Coalwhippers, Select Com. 1024, 1029, 1154

KINNAIRD, Hon. A. F., *Perth

Harbours of Refuge, Nomination of Com. 415
Inspectors of Taxes (Scotland), 303
Joint-Stock Banks, Leave, 198
Lunatics (Scotland), Com. add. cl. 1682
Supply—Woods, Forests, &c., 173;—Queen's University (Ireland), 599;—Emigration Board, &c., 911;—Holyhead Harbour, 916;—Inland Revenue, 1408

KIRK, Mr. W., *Newry

Supply—New Houses of Parliament, 162, 163;—Poor-Law Commission, 180, 181;—Queen's University (Ireland), 598;—Infirmaries, &c. (Ireland), 1397;—Nonconforming, &c., Ministers (Ireland), 1401

KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, Mr. E. H., *Sandwich

Railway Traffic Act Amendment, 2R. Adj. moved, 1510
Reformatory Schools, Com. cl. 1, 1165
Sligo Borough Election—Papers moved for, 1564

KNIGHT, Mr. F. W., *Worcestershire, W.

Burial Acts Amendment, Com. 1086; cl. 3, Amend. 1037; cl. 16, Amend. 1039, 1041, 1683

KNOX, Lt.-Col. B. W., *Marlow

Bath Election Committee, 1690
Navy Estimates, 1771
Oaths Validity Act Amendment, Leave, 1779
Supply—China (Military Operations), 1767, 1768

Kruger Collection, The,

c. Question (Mr. Stirling), 968

LABOUCHERE, Rt. Hon. H. (Secretary of State for the Colonies), *Taunton

British Guiana, Immigration to, 888
Canadian Bishops, 345
China, War with—Estimate, 1135
Civil Service Superannuation, 562
New Zealand, Com. moved for, 851
Persia, War with—Estimate, 1135
Supply—National Gallery, 833, 844;—Indian Department in Canada, 849;—West Indies, Governors, &c. 902, 903, 905;—Stipendiary Justices, 906;—Labuan, 907, 908, 909;—Emigration Board, &c., 910, 911, 912.
Thames and Medway Conservancy, Consid. 874
Writs, New, Res. 771

Labuan—Supply,

c. 907

Lambeth Election,

c. Report, 1366, 1455, 1532, 1712

Land and Assessed Taxes, &c. (Scotland) Act Amendment Bill,

c. 1R.* 1510; 2R.* 1681

Land, Boundaries of (Ireland) Bill,

c. 1R.* 867

Land Tax Collectors,

c. Question (Mr. W. Williams), 444

Land Tax Commissioners' Names Bill,

c. 1R.* 867; 2R.* 965

LANGTON, Mr. W. H. G., *Bristol

Supply—Emigration Board, &c., 912

LANSDOWNE, Marquess of (Member of the Cabinet without Office)

"Examiner," The, and Lord Plunket—Privilege, 530, 531

Larceny, &c., Bill,

l. 1R. 115;
2R. 1353

Law Charges—Supply,
c. 189

Leases, Registration of Long (Scotland) Bill,
c. 3R.* 1155
l. 1R.* 1209; 2R.* 1423

LEWIS, Rt. Hon. Sir G. C., see CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER

Libel Bill,
l. 1R. 115;
2R. 1353

LIDDELL, Hon. H. G., Northumberland, S.
Industrial Schools, Com. cl. 13, 1139
Ordnance Survey, 140, 450.
Reformatory Schools, Com. cl. 1, 1165
Supply—Port Patrick Harbour, 164;—Education, 407;—Harbours of Refuge, 930

Life Insurance,
c. Question (Mr. K. Seymer), 443

LINDSAY, Mr. W. S., Tynemouth
Privateering, Papers moved for, 1486, 1491
Public Offices, 802
Steamers in the Navy, Return moved for, 1115
Supply—Holyhead Harbour, 912, 916; Harbours of Refuge, Amend. 930

Loan Societies Bill,
c. 1R.* 1510; 2R.* 1550

LOCKE, Mr. JOHN, Southwark
Burial Acts Amendment, Com. cl. 16, 1040
Fraudulent Trustees, Consid. 1417
Grand Juries (Metropolis) Com. cl. 1, 1449
Oaths Validity Act Amendment—Leave, 1779
Scientific and Literary Societies, Com. cl. 1, Amend. 318; cl. 2, Amend. 319, 1524, 1531
Supply—Science and Art, 582;—British Museum, 808, 811

LOCKE, Mr. JOSEPH, Honiton
Finsbury Park (No. 2), 2R. 249
National Gallery, 149
Ordnance Survey, 1387
Supply—Science and Art, 589;—Holyhead Harbour, 917

LONDON, Bishop of
Oaths, 2R. 1257
Oxford University, 2R. 615

Lords, House of—Salaries,
c. Return moved for, (Sir De L. Evans) 26; Motion withdrawn, ib.

LOVAINE, Lord, Northumberland, N.
Galway Town Writ, Amend. 1569, 1570
Greystown, Bombardment of, 43
Oaths Validity Act Amendment, Leave, 1778
Supply—Persian Expedition, 1759, 1760

LOWE, Right Hon. R. (Paymaster of the Forces and Vice President of the Board of Trade), Kidderminster
Joint-Stock Banks, Leave, 194, 196
Kingstown Railway, 1683
Oyster Fisheries, Papers moved for, 106
Passing Tolls on Shipping, 343
Railway Traffic Act Amendment, 2R. Amend. 1509
Russian Tariff, 1283

Lunacy, Commissioners in—Supply,
c. 187

Lunatics, Treatment of,
c. Question (Mr. Drummond) 881

Lunatics (Scotland) Bill,
c. 2R. 1169;
Com. cl. 4, 1565; cl. 108, 1681;
add. cl. (Lord Advocate) 1682

LYGON, Hon. F., Tewkesbury
Persia, War with, Res. 1607

LYNDHURST, Lord
Oaths, 2R. 1236
Obscene Books, Sale of, Prevention, 2R. Amend. 330, 333; 3R. 1357

MACARTHY, Mr. A., Cork Co.
Supply—Education (Ireland) 595

MACARTNEY, Mr. G., Antrim Co.
Public Offices Extension, Com. cl. 40, 1421
Supply—Civil Contingencies, 1416

MACAULAY, Mr. K., Cambridge Bo.
Rochdale Election—Privilege, 34

MCCANN, Mr. J., Drogheda
County and District Surveyors (Ireland), Com. moved for, 1504
Fiscal Affairs (Ireland), Leave, 265
Judgments Execution, Com. cl. 8, 311; cl. 9, 313, 1513,

MACCULLAGH, Mr. W. T., Great Yarmouth
Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland, Previous Question moved, 1055

MACKIE, Mr. J., Kirkcudbrightshire
Lunatics (Scotland) Com., cl. 4, 1566

MACKINNON, Mr. W. A., Rye
Supply—Royal Parks, 96

MACMAHON, Mr. P., Wexford Co.
Common Law Commission, 443
Fiscal Affairs (Ireland), Leave, 257
Grand Juries (Metropolis) Com. cl. 1, 1444, 1452
Judgments Execution, Com. cl. 7, 307, 308, 309, 310; cl. 8, 312; cl. 9, Amend. 314

[cont.]

MACMAHON, Mr. P.—continued.

Probates and Letters of Administration, Com.
cl. 5, 991
Railways (Ireland), Leave, 1506
Sligo Borough Election, Papers moved for, 1563

Magnetic Observations—Supply,
c. 846

MAGUIRE, Mr. J. F., Dungarvan
Fiscal Affairs (Ireland) Leave, 261
Judgments Execution, Com. 1512, 1514
Lord Lieutenantcy of Ireland, 1079
Mayo Writ, 1572
Reformatory Schools, 2R. 193
Rochdale Election—Privilege, Com. moved for, 105
Supply—Education, 412;—Education (Ireland)
594;—Labuan, 908;—Emigration Board, do., 910

Maidstone Election,
c. Report 1151

Mails, Conveyance of, by Railway, Bill,
c. 1R.* 621

Malicious Injuries to Property Bill,
l. 1R. 115;
2R. 1353

MALINS, Mr. R., Wallingford
Election Petitions, 2R. 603
Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 2, 508; cl. 10, 1198
Jewish Disabilities, 1701
Joint-Stock Banks, Leave, 195
Judgments Execution, Com. cl. 9, 314, 315, 316
Oaths Validity Act Amendment, Leave, 1779
Probates and Letters of Administration, 2R.
478; Com. 974; cl. 2, 982; cl. 5, 992; cl.
15, Amend. 1003; cl. 34, Amend. 1007,
1011, 1012, 1013; cl. 40, 1297; cl. 51,
Amend. 1302; cl. 54, 1304; cl. 85, 1305;
cl. 87, 1307; add. cl. 1310, 1311
Rochdale Election—Privilege, Com. moved for,
101, 103, 105
Saving Banks Funds, 551, 553, 556
Supply—New Houses of Parliament, 161

MALMESBURY, Earl of,
Coalwhippers, Select Com. 1028
Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, 3R. 202.
“Examiner,” The, and Lord Plunket—Privilege, 501
“Maria,” The Schooner, 947
Norwich, Bishop of, Resignation of, 12
St. James’s Park Improvements, 1345, 1351
Slave Trade, Alleged Revival of the, 950; Address moved, 1676
Swiss Legion, The, 1335, 1343

MANGLES, Mr. R. D., Guildford
Bengal Military Fund, Com. moved for, 1048
Cotton, Growth of, in India, 287, 288
India, Mutiny in, 1460
Public Offices, 803
Supply—Persian Expedition, 1749, 1766

MANNERS, Rt. Hon. Lord J. J. R., Leicestershire, N.

Bath Election Committee, 1689
India, Mutiny in, 1461
Ordnance Survey, 1386
Supply—Royal Palaces, 72;—Public Buildings,
78, 82, 87;—New Houses of Parliament,
156;—Mint, 183;—Lord Lieutenant (Ireland), 186;—Education, 414;—Persian Expedition, 1766;—China (Military Operations), 1767
Westminster Hall, Designs in, 21

MARCH, Earl of, Sussex, W.
South Eastern Railway (Greenwich Junction, do.), 3R. 630

“Maria,” The Schooner,
l. Question (Earl of Malmesbury), 947

Married Women Bill,
c. 2R. 1515; Amend. (Sir J. Buller), 1516,
[o. q. A. 120, N. 65, M. 55] 1523

Married Women’s Reversionary Interest Bill,
c. 3R.* 535
l. 1R.* 605

MARTIN, Mr. P. W., Rochester
Supply—New Houses of Parliament, 160;—
Poor Law Commission, 179
Workhouses, Metropolitan, Com. moved for, 378

MASSEY, Mr. W. N. (Under Secretary, Home Department), Salford
Burial Acts Amendment, Com. 1033; cl. 16,
1040; Amend. 1041, 1683
Highways, Bill withdrawn, 305
Industrial Schools, Com. cl. 14, 1144; add. cl.
1148, 1149, 1150
Judgments Execution, Com. cl. 7, 307
Married Women, 2R. 1518
Summary Proceedings before Justices of the
Peace, Com. cl. 1, 1021

Mayo Election Committee,
c. Report, 1167, 1455

Medical Profession (No. 1) Bill,
c. 2R. 707; Amend. (Mr. Craufurd), 711, [o. q.
A. 225, N. 78, M. 147] 754; Bill withdrawn, 1532

Medical Profession (No. 3) Bill,
c. 2R. 754; Bill withdrawn, 755

MELGUND, Viscount, Clackmannanshire, &c.
Supply—Education, Amend. 413

MELVILLE, Viscount
India, Mutiny in, 1333

Metropolitan Police Stations Bill,
c. 1R.* 965; 2R.* 1155

MILES, Mr. W., Somersetshire, E.

Burial Acts Amendment, Com. cl. 16, Amend.
1041
Finsbury Park (No. 2), 2R. Adj. moved, 248
Industrial Schools, Com. cl. 14, 1144; add. cl.
1148, 1149
Married Women, 2R. 1521
Scientific and Literary Societies, Com. cl. 2, 1529
Summary Proceedings before Justices of the Peace, Com. cl. 1, 1023
Supply—Lord Lieutenant (Ireland), 185
Writs, New, Res. 972

Militia, The,

c. Question (Mr. Disraeli), 1574

Militia Ballots Suspension Bill,

c. 1R.* 965; 2R.* 1155; 3R.* 1510
l. 1R.* 1533

Militia (Ireland) Act (1854) Amendment Bill,

l. 2R.* 755; 3R.* 947

MILLER, Mr. T. J., Colchester

Probates and Letters of Administration Com.
Schedule A, 1321

MILLS, Mr. A., Taunton

Industrial Schools, Com. cl. 14, 1143
Supply—West Indies, Governors, &c., 905

MILNES, Mr. R. M., Pontefract

Married Women, 2R. 1516
Reformatory Schools, Com. 1161
Supply—British Museum, 807

Ministers at Foreign Courts, Extraordinary Expenses—Supply

c. 946

Ministers' Money (Ireland) Bill,

l. Com. 124; Amend. (Earl of Clancarty) 127; Amend. withdrawn, 130; Motion (Earl of Wicklow), 132; Motion neg. 136;
Explanation (Marquess of Westmeath), 326;
3R. 433; Amend. (Earl of Clancarty) 438
[o. q. Contents 28, Not-Contents 7, M. 16]
441
Protest, 442
Royal Assent, 852

Mint—Supply

c. 181

Miscellaneous Allowances—Supply,

c. 1394

Miscellaneous Estimates,

l. 69, 149, 382, 564, 805, 901, 1388

Mixed Commission for the Suppression of the Slave Trade—Supply,

c. 935

MONCREIFF, Rt. Hon. J., see ADVOCATE, The LORD*MONTEAGLE, Lord

Irish Paupers, Removal of, 620
Joint-Stock Companies, 2R. 1426
Obscene Books, Sale of, Prevention, 2R. 886
St. James's Park Improvements, 1352

MOODY, Mr. C. A., Somersetshire, W.

Poor Law Medical Officers, 1511

MORGAN, Mr. C. O. S., Monmouthshire

Supply—Public Buildings, 86

MOWBRAY, Mr. J. R., Durham City

Probates and Letters of Administration, Com.
cl. 40, 1014; add. cl. 1310; Schedule A,
Amend. 1315
Supply—Public Buildings, 86;—Public Works
(Ireland) 165;—Queen's University (Ireland), 597, 599

Mundy's, Colonel, Pension,

c. Question (Sir J. Trelawny), 1573

Municipal Corporations Bill,

c. 1R.* 286; 2R.* 769;
Consid. Adj. moved (Mr. Cowan), 1423

Mutual Companies Bill,

c. 1R.* 965

NAAS, Rt. Hon. Lord, Cockermouth

Civil Service Superannuation, 562
Harbours of Refuge, Nomination of Com. 415
Railways (Ireland) Leave, 1506
Superannuation, Leave, 689, 1567, 1568; 2R.
1657
Supply—Infirmaries, &c. (Ireland), 1398

NAPIER, Rt. Hon. J., Dublin University

Election Petitions, 2R. 511, 605
Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 1, 501; cl. 3, 507
Judgments Execution, Com. cl. 7, 306; cl. 9, 317
Medical Profession (No. 1.), 2R. 741
Probates and Letters of Administration, 2R.
492; Com. cl. 34, 1012
Scientific and Literary Societies, Com. cl. 2, 322
Statute Law Commission, Address moved, 789
Summary Proceedings before Justices of the
Peace, Com. cl. 1, 1021, 1022.
Supply—Science and Art, 581;—Queen's University (Ireland) 600

NAPIER, Vice Adm. Sir C., Southwark

India, Troops for, 1282, 1567
Navy Estimates, 1772
Privateering, Papers moved for, 1492
Steamers in the Navy, Returns moved for, 1111
1117, 1118
Supply—Public Buildings, 79, 87;—West Indies,
Governors, &c. 904, 906;—Holyhead Harbour,
915;—Harbours of Refuge, 928;—Persian
Expedition, 1764
Victoria Cross, Distribution of the, 343, 371, 445

National Debt Office—Supply

c. 187

National Gallery,c. Question (Mr. Joseph Locke), 149 ;—see *Kruger Collection, the,National Gallery—Supply,c. 816 ; Amend. (Lord Elcho), 822 ; Amend. (Mr. Cox) 823 ; Amend. withdrawn, 844 ; 2nd Amend. [A. 89, N. 194, M. 105] 846 ; [A. 123, N. 161, M. 88] *ib.National Survey,l. Com. moved for (Duke of Buccleuch) 1547 ;—See *Ordnance Survey.Naturalization Bills,

l. Res. (Lord Chancellor), 1659

Navy,Admiral of the Fleet*, l. Question (Marquess of Salisbury) 755*Estimates*, c. 1768 ; Adj. moved (Lord A. Vane-Tempest), 1770 ; Motion withdrawn, 1772*Steamers in the*, c. Returns moved for (Sir C. Napier) 1111 ; Motion withdrawn, 1118 ; Adj. moved (Mr. Hankey), [A. 140, N. 54, M. 86] ib.Transport Service, l. Observations (Earl of Hardwicke), 1427NEATE, Mr. C., Oxford CityFraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 1, 504 Medical Profession, (No. 1) 2R. 719Negroes, Captured—Supply,

c. 933

NELSON, Earl

Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, 3R. Amend. 217.

NEWCASTLE, Duke ofAustralia, Central Expedition to, 199
Norwich, Bishop of, Resignation of, 10, 12
Transport Service, 1480NEWDEGATE, Mr. C. N., Warwickshire, N.Bath Election Committee, 1686
Election Petitions, 2R. 804
Finsbury Park, (No. 2), 2R. 245
Industrial Schools, Com. cl. 9, 1153 ; cl. 14, 1142
Oaths, Consider. add. cl. 146
Oaths Validity Act Amendment, Leave, Adj. moved, 1775, 1778, 1779
Slave Trade (Africa), 1497
Summary Proceedings before Justices of the Peace, Com. cl. 1, 1022 Supply—Queen's University (Ireland), 600Newspapers, Registration of,

c. Paper moved for, (Mr. Ayrton) 686 ; Motion neg. 689

New Zealand,

c. Com. moved for, (Mr. Labouchère) 651

NICOLL, Mr. D., Frome

Workhouses, Metropolitan, Com. moved for, 376

NISBET, Mr. R. P., Chippenham

Persia, War with, Res. 1590

NOEL, Hon. G. J., Rutlandshire

Officers, Return of, to India, 1278, 1373

NORFOLK, Duke of (Earl Marshal)Oaths, 2R. 1233, 1234, 1251
Roman Catholic Charities, Com. cl. 1, 765NORREYS, Sir D. J., Mallow

County and District Surveyors (Ireland), Com. moved for, 1504

Fiscal Affairs (Ireland), Leave, 251, 268

Ordnance Survey, 141, 880, 1373, 1374, 1387

Science and Art, 879

Supply, Amend., 58, 68

NORTH, Col. J. S., Oxfordshire

Artillery for India, 1698

Mayo Writ, 1572

Sardinian and Turkish Medals, 1283

North American Provinces, British,—Supply,

c. 847

NORTHUMBERLAND, Duke of,

Admiral of the Fleet, 756

Norwich, Bishop of, Resignation of,

l. Observations (Lord Redesdale), 3

Oaths Bill,c. Consider. add. cl. (Mr. S. FitzGerald) 143 ; 3R. 347 ; Amend. (Marquess of Blandford) 356, [o. q. A. 291, N. 168, M. 123] 365

l. 1R.* 416 ;

2R. 1269 ; Amend. (Earl of Derby) 1220, [a. q. Contents 139, Not-Contents 171, M. 32] 1275

Oaths, Parliamentary,

c. Motion postponed (Mr. Dillwyn), 1684

Oaths Validity Act Amendment,c. Leave, 1772 ; Adj. moved (Mr. Newdegate), 1775, [A. 55, N. 109, M. 54] 1776 ; Adj. moved, (Mr. Warren) ib., [A. 52, N. 100, M. 48] 1778 ; Adj. moved (Mr. Hume) [A. 51, N. 97, M. 46] ib. ; Adj. moved (Sir B. Bridges), [A. 49, N. 83, M. 34] 1780 ; Adj. moved (Viscount Galway), ib. ; Motion and Original Question withdrawn, *ib.O'BRIEN, Mr. Serj. J., Limerick City

Rochdale Election—Privilege, Com. moved for, 104

O'BRIEN, Mr. P., King's Co.Judgments Execution, Com. cl. 7, 809 ; cl. B, 311

Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland, 1093

Reformatory Schools, 2R. 194

{cont.

O'BRIEN, Mr. P.,—continued.

Supply—Royal Parks, 95, 96;—Criminal Prosecutions (Ireland), 191

Obscene Books, &c., Sale of, Bill,

l. 2R. 327; Amend. (Lord Lyndhurst) 333; Amend. withdrawn, 338; Com. 864; Rep. 1152; 3R. 1355; c. 1R.* 1510

O'CONNELL, Capt. D., Tralee

Justices and Police Force, Dublin, 2R. 1421

O'DONOGHUE, Mr. D. (The O'Donoghoe)
Tipperary Co.

Oaths, 3R. 359

Offences against the Person Bill,

l. 1R. 115;
2R. 1353

O'FLAHERTY, Mr. A., Galway Bo.

Supply—Holyhead Harbour, 916

OGILVY, Sir J., Dundee

Lunatics (Scotland), Com. cl. 4, 1566
Sheriff's Court (Scotland), Accommodation in the, 192

"Oneida," The

c. Question (Mr. H. Berkeley), 967

Opium Trade with China,

l. Question (Earl of Shaftesbury), 107

Ordnance Survey,

l. Com. moved for (Duke of Buccleuch), 1547; —(Scotland) Question (Duke of Somerset), 1658
c. Question (Mr. Liddell), 140, 450; (Sir D. Norreys), 880, 1373; Motion (Lord Elcho), 1375; Motion neg. 1388—see Survey of Towns

OSBORNE, Mr. R. B. (Secretary to the Admiralty), Dover

South Eastern Railway (Greenwich Junction, &c.), 3R. 624, 630
Victoria Cross, Distribution of the, 343, 372

OXFORD, Bishop of

Burial Grounds, 18
Coalwhippers, Select Com. 1028
Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, 3R. 210, 216, 221; That the Bill do pass, 227
Norwich, Bishop of, Resignation of, 14
Oaths, 2R. 1267

Oxford City Election,

c. Report, 1150

Oxford University Bill,

l. 2R. 608; 3R.* 947
c. 1R.* 1681

Oyster Fisheries,

c. Papers moved for (Sir G. Pechell) 106

PACKE, Mr. C. W., Leicestershire, S.

Judgments, Execution, Com. cl. 7, 308

PAGET, Lord A. H., Lichfield

South Eastern Railway (Greenwich Junction, &c.), 3R. 622

PAGET, Mr. C., Nottingham

Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 4, 1189
Industrial Schools, Com. cl. 13, 1141

PAKINGTON, Rt. Hon. Sir J. S., Droitwich

Assize Circuits, 1576
China, War with—Estimate, Adj. moved, 1134; —Reinforcements for, 1279, 1280
Common Law Commission, 443
Education, 1569
Huntingdon County Election, Com. 1552
India, Mutiny in, 1370
Industrial Schools, Com. cl. 13, 1138
Persia, War with—Estimate, Adj. moved, 1134
Printing Committee, 1690
Supply—Royal Parks, 92;—Education, 395, 405, 406
Vaccination, 1872
Workhouses, Metropolitan, Com. moved for, 381

Palaces, Royal—Supply,

c. 60; Amend. (Mr. W. Williams), 71; Amend. withdrawn, 75

PALK, Mr. L., Devonshire, S.

Health, Board of, 883
Industrial Schools, Com. add. cl. 1146, 1148
Oaths Validity Act Amendment, Leave, 1779
Scientific and Literary Societies, Com. cl. 2, 1528, 1530
Supply—New Houses of Parliament, 154;—Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, 185;—Emigration Board, &c., 911;—China (Military Operations), 1767

PALMERSTON, Rt. Hon. Viscount (First Lord of the Treasury), Tiverton

Civil Establishments of the Army, 26
Civil Service, 1483
Cotton, Growth of, in India, 347, 878
Defence of the Country, 1713
Election Petitions, Com. 1322
Evidence upon Oath, (House of Commons), Leave, 304
Finsbury Park (No. 2), 2R. 244
Fishery Board (Scotland), 1567
Greytown, Bombardment of, 40
India, Mutiny in, 1367, 1369, 1370, 1371, 1458, 1459, 1460, 1461
India, State of, 1710
Jewish Disabilities, 1704
Justice and Police Force, Dublin, Com. 1657
Land Tax Collectors, 444
Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland, 1093
Militia, The, 1574
National Gallery, 149
Navy Estimates, 1771
Oaths, Consid., add. cl. 144
Ordnance Survey, 1385

[cont.]

PALMERSTON, Viscount.—cont.

Persia, War with, Res., 1638
 Privateering, Papers moved for, 1487
 Probate and Letters of Administration, 40 ;
 Com. cl. 40, 1301; cl. 51, 1303
 Rochdale Election—Privilege, 28, 29, 34, 35
 Slave Trade, Alleged Revival of the, 1287 :—
 (Africa), Address moved, 1498
 Suez, Isthmus of, Canal, 1043, 1705
 Superannuation Act Amendment, 1568
 Supply, 68 ;—Public Buildings, 83 ;—Criminal Prosecutions (Ireland), 191 ;—Education, 414 ;—National Gallery, 844 ;—Consular Establishments, 935, 937, 941, 946 ;—Persian Expedition, 1755, 1759, 1761 ;—China, Military Operations, 1767, 1768
 Turnpikes, Metropolitan, 1045
 Uleaborg, British Merchants at, 1045
 Writs, New, Res. 897, 901

PANMURE, Lord (Secretary for War)

Cannon, 108
 India, Conveyance of Troops to, 949
 Military Education, 1423
 Police (Scotland), Com. 768
 Survey, National, Com. moved for, 1548; (Scotland), 1659
 Swiss Legion, The, 1340, 1344
 Transport Service, 1430, 1431
 Victoria Cross, Distribution of the, 416

Paper, Duty on, in Pottery Manufacture,
c. Question (Mr. J. L. Ricardo), 769Parks, Royal, &c.—Supply,

c. 89 ; Amend. (Mr. Bentinck), 90 ; Amend. withdrawn, 94 ; Amend. (Mr. Blackburn),
 [A. 66, N. 210, M. 144,] 95 ; Amend. (Mr.
 Dillwyn), ib. ; Amend. neg. 96

Parliament, New Houses of,—Supply,

c. 149 ; Amend. (Sir H. Willoughby), 157, [A.
 65, N. 175, M. 110] 162, 167

Passing Tolls on Shipping,

c. Question (Mr. Ingham), 343

PATTEN, Col. J. W., Lancashire, N.

Huntingdon County Election, Com. 1552

Paymaster, General—Supply,

c. 167

PEASE, Mr. H., Durham, S.

Evidence upon Oath (House of Commons),
 Leave, 304
 Harbours of Refuge, Nomination of Com., 415
 Industrial Schools, Com. cl. 14, 1144
 Public Offices Extension, Com. cl. 40, 1422
 Reformatory Schools, Com., 1164
 Scientific and Literary Societies, Com. cl. 2, 1527, 1531
 Supply—Postage of Letters, 189 ; Harbours of Refuge, 933

PECHELL, Rear Adm., Sir G. B., Brighton

Cuba—Slave Trade, 25
 Oyster Fisheries, Papers moved for, 106
 Supply—Poor-law Commission, 178 ;—Har-bours of Refuge, 929 ;—Captured Negroes, 933

Perim, Island of,

c. Question (Mr. White), 141

PERRY, Sir T. E., Devonport,

Cotton, Growth of, in India, Adj. moved, 302, 346, 894
 Judgments Execution, Com. cl. 7, 309 ; cl. 8, 311
 Judicial Reforms in India, 446
 Married Women, 2R. 1520, 1523
 Probates and Letters of Administration, 2R.
 482 ; Com. cl. 10, Amend. 996, 1000
 Public Offices, 804
 Supply—Persian Expedition, 1738

Persia, War with,—Estimate,

c. Motion (Chancellor of the Exchequer), 1132 ;
Adj. moved (Sir J. Pakington), 1134 ; Motion withdrawn, 1137, 1372 ; Res. (Mr. Roebuck)
1577, [A. 38, N. 352, M. 314] 1652 :—Sup- ply, 1730

PIGOTT, Mr. F., Reading

Supply—Royal Palaces, 73 ;—Royal Parks, 91

PLATT, Mr. J., Oldham,

India—Railways, Res. 1728
 Supply—Science and Art, 588

Police—Supply,

c. 189, 191

Police (Scotland) Bill,

*l. Com. 768 ; 3R.* 1209*
*c. 1R.* 1550*

Police Stations, Metropolitan, Bill,

*c. 1R.* 965 ; 2R.* 1155*

Polish Refugees, &c.—Supply,

c. 1394

Pontefract Election,

c. Report, 897

Poor Law Commission,—Supply,

c. 178

Poor Law Medical Officers,

c. Question (Sir J. Trollope), 346 ; (Mr. Moody)
 1511

Population,

c. Returns moved for (Mr. Disraeli), 969

PORTMAN, Lord,

Norwich, Bishop of, Resignation of, 15

Port Patrick Harbour,—Supply,

c. 164

Post Office,—Supply,

c. 1409

Postage of Letters,—Supply,

c. 188

Press, The Periodical,

c. Question (Mr. Ayrton), 1284

Price, Mr., Murder of, at Melbourne,

l. Correspondence moved for (Earl Talbot), 856

Princess Royal's Annuity Bill,

l. Royal Assent, 416

Printing Committee,

c. Question (Sir J. Pakington), 1690

Prisons and Prisoners,—Supply,

c. 382

Prisoners Removal Bill,

l. 1R.* 1152; 2R.* 1533

Privateering,

c. Papers moved for (Mr. Lindsay), 1486; Motion withdrawn, 1492

Privy Council—Supply,

c. 167

Privy Seal, Lord,—Supply,

c. 167

Probate and Letters of Administration Bill,

l. Question (Earl of Wicklow), 325;

c. 2R. 451;

Com. 974;

cl. 2, Amend. (Mr. Collier), 977; Amend. withdrawn, 991;

cl. 5, 991; cl. withdrawn, 992;

cl. 6, 992; cl. 9, 993;

cl. 10, Amend. (Sir E. Perry) 996; Amend. withdrawn, 1000;

cl. 12, 1000

cl. 13, Amend. (Mr. Divett) 1001; Amend. withdrawn, 1002; Amend. (Attorney General) ib.;

cl. 15, Amend. (Mr. Malins) 1003; Amend. withdrawn, 1004;

cl. 24, Amend. (Mr. Steel), 1004; Amend. withdrawn, 1005;

cl. 26, Amend. (Attorney General), 1005;

cl. 34, Amend. (Mr. Malins), 1007, [o. q. A. 271, N. 27, M. 244] 1013;

cl. 40, Amend. (Mr. Westhead), 1013, [o. q. A. 131, N. 162, M. 31] 1019; [m. q. A. 141, N. 139, M. 2] 1020, 1288;

Question (Sir J. Trollope), 1279;

cl. 51, Amend. (Mr. Malins), 1302; Amend. withdrawn, 1303;

cl. 54; cl. 58, 1304;

cl. 86, 1305; cl. 87, 1306;

add. cl. (Attorney General), 1309;

Schedule A, Amend. (Sir J. Johnstone), 1315, [o. q. A. 177, N. 67, M. 110] 1318; Amend. (Earl Jermyn), 1319, [A. 151, N. 53, M. 98] 1320

Probates and Letters of Administration (Ireland) Bill,

c. 1R.* 443; 2R.* 867

Property Tax

c. Returns moved for (Mr. Disraeli), 959

Prosecutions—Supply,

c. 189

Protests,

Adulterers' Marriages Bill, 763

Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill, 229

Ministers' Money (Ireland) Bill, 442

Public Buildings—Supply

c. 76; Amend. (Mr. Spooner), 80; Amend. withdrawn, 88

Public Offices, Designs for.

c. Question (Lord Elcho), 20; Observations (Mr. B. Hope), 794

Public Offices Extension Bill

c. Com. cl. 40, 1421

Public Works Loan Commissioners—Supply,

c. 187

Public Works (Ireland) Bill,

c. 1R.* 1155; 2R.* 1550

PULLER, Mr. C. W., Hertfordshire

Scientific and Literary Societies, Com. cl. 2, 321, 1526, 1529

Supply—Education, 407

Queen's Prison—Supply,

c. 191

Railway Traffic Act Amendment Bill,

c. 1R.* 236;

2R. 1508; Amend. (Mr. Lowe), 1510; Adj. moved (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen), ib.

Railways (Ireland)

c. Leave, 1505

RAMSDEN, Sir J. W. (Under Secretary for War), Hythe

Army, Education in the, 773

Artillery for India, 1698

Castle Ditch, Chester, 966

Crimea, Officers in the, Services of, 24

Gunpowder Stores, 344

Half-pay, Officers on, 250

Mundy's, Colonel, Pension, 1573, 1574

Militia (Ireland), 1278

Officers' Quarters, Property Tax on, 1367

Officers, Return of, to India, 1278, 1373

Ordnance Survey, 141

Red River Settlement, 143, 882, 883

Sardinian and Turkish Medals, 1283

Victoria Cross, Distribution of the, 251, 344

RAVENSWORTH, Lord

Cannon, 107

Coalwhippers, Select Com. 1027, 1154

Harbours of Refuge, 532

RAYNHAM, Viscount, Tamworth

Civil Service, Amend. 1472

Women, Assaults on, 148

Workhouses, Metropolitan, Com. moved for, 374, 381

REBOW, Mr. J. G., Colchester

Probate and Letters of Administration, Com.
Schedule A, Amend., 1320

Records, Public—Supply,
c. 178

Red River Settlement,

c. Question (Mr. C. Fitzwilliam), 142; (Mr. Wyld), 882

REDESDALE, Lord (Chairman of Committees)

Adulterers' Marriages, 2R. 758, 761
Burial Grounds, 17
Coalwhippers, Select Com., 1029
Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, 3R. Amend.
200, 223
Great Northern Railway (Capital), 3R. 1540
Irish Paupers, Removal of, 821
Norwich, Bishop of, Resignation of, 3, 15
Obscene Books, Sale of, Prevention, 2R. 334
Oxford University, 2R. 615
Peerage of Ireland—Proof of Right to Vote,
Res. 856
Roman Catholic Charities, 2R. 235

Reformatory Schools Bill,

c. 2R. 193, [A. 154, N. 6, M. 148] 194;
Com. 1155; Amend. (Mr. Alcock), 1157, [o. q.
A. 168, N. 37, M. 131] 1165;
cl. 1, [A. 149, N. 51, M. 98] 1166;
cl. 3; cl. 6, 1166

Refuge for the Destitute—Supply,
c. 1394

Register Office General—Supply,
c. 186

Registration of Titles,
c. Question (Mr. Greer), 633

Reports, Privilege of,
l. Report, 1363

Representative Peers (Ireland) Bill,
l. 1R.* 1024; 2R.* 1423; 3R.* 1658

Revising Barristers (Dublin) Bill
c. 1R.* 342; 2R.* 1366

RICARDO, Mr. J. L., Stoke-upon-Trent
Finsbury Park (No. 2), 2R. 248
Paper, Duty on, in Pottery Manufacture, 769
Russian Tariff, 1283

RICH, Mr. H., Richmond

Civil Service Superannuation, 557
Probates and Letters of Administration, Com.
Schedule A, 1318
South Eastern Railway, (Greenwich Junction,
&c.), 3R. 625

Richard Cœur de Lion, Statue of,
c. Question (Mr. Hankey), 966

RIDLEY, Mr. G., Newcastle-on-Tyne

Election Petitions, 2R. Adj. moved, 604
Industrial Schools, Com. cl. 13, 1140; add. cl.
1148, 1150
Scientific and Literary Societies, Com. cl. 2, 1526

Rochdale Election—Privilege

c. Motion (General Thompson), 27; John Newall Examined, 28; Abraham Rothwell examined,
29; Peter Johnson to be taken into custody, 97; John Lord examined, 98; Select Com.
moved for, (Attorney General), 98; Motion, (Attorney General), 101; Amend. (Mr.
Butt), [o. q. A. 97, N. 42, M. 55] 104; Que-tion, (Col. French), 137; Report, 323, 757

ROEBUCK, Mr. J. A., Sheffield

Bath Election Committee, 1687
China, War with—Estimate, 1132
Greytown, Bombardment of, 44
Huntingdon County Election, Com. 1553
India, Mutiny in, 1459;—Conveyance of Troops to, 1694
India, State of, 1711
Joint-Stock Banks, Leave, 196, 197
Lambeth Election, 1712
Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, 1048, 1104
Married Women, 2R. 1522
Oaths Validity Act Amendment, Leave, 1774,
1777, 1779
Persia; War with—Estimate, 1132; Res. 1578, 1585, 1589
Probates and Letters of Administration, Com.
cl. 15, 1003; cl. 40, 1014, 1018, 1019;
Schedule A, 1318
Supply, 66;—Royal Palaces, 69, 75;—Lord
Lieutenant (Ireland), 184, 185;—Postage of Letters, 189;—County Courts, 190;—Persian Expedition, 1760

ROLT, Mr. J., Gloucestershire, W.

Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 1, Amend.
495, 503; cl. 12, 1201, 1202
Probates and Letters of Administration, 2R.
474; Com. cl. 12, 1000; cl. 13, 1002; cl.
34, 1009; cl. 40, 1018; cl. 87, 1307; add.
cl. 1312

Roman Catholic Charities,

l. Return moved for (Lord Abinger), 122; Motion withdrawn, 124

Roman Catholic Charities Bill,

l. 2R. 235;
Com. cl. 1, 763

Royal Society—Supply,
c. 846

RUSSELL, Rt. Hon. Lord J., London

Ballot, The, Leave, 670
Civil Service Superannuation, 563
Galway Town, Writ, 1570
Greytown, Bombardment of, 55
Jewish Disabilities, 1699, 1701, 1702
Mayo Writ, 1572
Oaths Validity Act Amendment, Leave, 1772, 1776, 1779, 1780

[cont.]

RUSSELL, Rt. Hon. Lord J.—cont.

Persia, War with, Res. 1608
Privateering, Papers moved for, 1490, 1492
Rochdale Election—Privilege, 34
Statute Law Commission, Address moved, 791
Supply—Public Buildings, 78 :—British Museum, 805, 812 :—Persian Expedition, 1752
Writs, New, Res. 771

Russian Tariff,

c. Question (Mr. J. L. Ricardo) 1283

Sailors in Merchant Ships, Treatment of,
l. Question (Earl of Shaftesbury) 1

ST. ASAPH, Bishop of
Oxford University, 2R. 615

ST. GERMANS, Earl of
Dixon, Mr., Case of, Papers moved for, 111, 114

St. Helena—Supply,
c. 907

St. James's Park, Improvements,
l. Observation, (Earl of Malmesbury) 1345

St. John's, Chester,
c. Question, (Mr. Salisbury) 965

ST. LEONARDS, Lord
Great Northern Railway (Capital) 2R. 756 ;
3R. Amend. 1536, 1540
Joint-Stock Companies, 2R. 1427
Obscene Books, Sale of, Prevention, 2R. 334
Roman Catholic Charities, Com. cl. 1, 763

St. Stephen's Hall, Statues in,
c. Question (Mr. Warren) 20

ST. VINCENT, Earl of
Oaths, 2R. 1257

SALISBURY, Marquess of
Admiral of the Fleet, 755

SALISBURY, Mr. E. G., Chester,
Castle Ditch, Chester, 966
Dce, River, 966
Oaths Validity Act Amendment, Leave, 1776
Probates and Letters of Administration, Com. cl. 86, 1305
St. John's, Chester, 965

Salmon Fisheries, (Scotland)
c. Question (Mr. Caird) 1042

Sardinian Medals,
c. Question (Col. North) 1283

Savings Banks,
c. Question (Mr. Bagwell), 345 ; (Sir H. Wilmoughby), 545 ; (Mr. J. Tollemache), 1372

SCHNEIDER, Mr. H. W., Norwich
Supply—Holyhead Harbour, 917

SCHOLEFIELD, Mr. W., Birmingham
Mayo Election Committee, Report, 1167 ; New Writ, 1570.

Schools, Industrial, Bill.

c. Com. cl. 9, Proviso (Mr. Bowyer), 1137 ; Proviso withdrawn, 1138 ;
cl. 13, Amend. (Mr. Barrow), 1138, [o. q. A. 169, N. 59, M. 110] 1142 ;
cl. 14, Amend. (Mr. Barrow), 1142, [o. q. A. 161, N. 78, M. 83] 1145 ;
cl. 18, 1145 ;
add. cl. (Mr. Adderley), 1146, 1147, 1149 ;
add. cl. (Viscount Goderich), 1149 ;
add. cl. (Mr. Gregory), 1150 ; cl. withdrawn, ib.

Schools, Reformatory, Bill.

c. 2R. 193, [A. 154, N. 6, M. 148] 194 ;
Com. 1155 ; Amend. (Mr. Alcock), 1157, [o. q. A. 168, N. 37, M. 131] 1165 ;
cl. 1, [A. 149, N. 51, M. 98] 1166 ;
cl. 3 ; cl. 6, 1166

Science and Art—Supply.

c. 584 ; Amend. (Mr. Dillwyn), 574 ; Amend. (Mr. Spooner), 576, [A. 33, N. 157, M. 124] 588 ; [A. 36, M. 162, N. 126] 589 ;—Question (Sir D. Norreys), 879

Scientific and Literary Societies Bill.

c. Com. cl. 1, Amend. (Mr. John Locke), 318 ;
cl. 2, Amend. (Mr. John Locke), 319, [r. p. A. 76, N. 100, M. 24] 323, 1523 ; Amend. (Mr. Spooner), 1524, [o. q. A. 131, N. 81, M. 50] 1529 ; Amend. (Mr. Bouverie) ib. [o. q. A. 82, N. 111, M. 29] 1530 ; Amend. (Mr. Hardy), [A. 97, N. 96, M. 1] ib. ; 2nd Amend. [A. 114, N. 69, M. 45] 1531

Scotland,

Falkirk Election—Petition, c. Com. moved for, (Mr. Cobbett), 1555 ; Motion withdrawn, 1557

Fishery Board, c. Question (Lord J. Hay), 1567

Inspectors of Taxes, c. Motion (Mr. Black), 302 ; Motion neg. 304

Ordnance Survey, l. Question (Duke of Somerset), 1658

c. Question (Sir D. Norreys), 880

Salmon Fisheries, c. Question (Mr. Caird), 1042

Sheriff's Court, Accommodation in the, c. Question (Mr. Cowan), 192

Supply—Queen's Remembrancer, c. 184 ;—Registrar General, Edinburgh, 187 ;—Lord Advocate, &c. ;—Court of Session ;—Court of Justiciary ;—Exchequer Sheriff Courts ;—Procurators Fiscal ;—Solicitor of the Crown ;—General Register House ;—Commissary Clerk, 191 ;—Universities, 596

See—Assessment (Scotland) Bill

Bankruptcy and Real Securities (Scotland) Bill

Bill Chamber (Scotland) Bill

Court of Session (Scotland) Bill

Crown, &c., Suits (Scotland) Bill

Edinburgh, Canongate and Montrose Annuity Tax Abolition Bill

[cont.]

Scotland,—continued

See—

Land and Assessed Taxes (Scotland) Act Amendment Bill
Leases, Registration of Long, (Scotland) Bill
Lunatics (Scotland) Bill
Police (Scotland) Bill
Smoke Nuisance (Scotland) Abatement Bill
Valuation of Land (Scotland) Act Amendment Bill

SCOTT, Hon. F., Berwickshire

China, War with—Estimate, 1133
 Lunatics (Scotland), Com. add. cl. 1682
 Persia, War with—Estimate, 1133

SCOTT, Captain E., Maidstone

Persia, War with, Res. 1612

Secret Services—Supply,

c. 187

SEYMER, MR. H. K., Dorsetshire

Life Insurance, 443
 Supply—Royal Parks, 91

SEYMOUR, MR. H. D., (Secretary of the Board of Control) Poole

Cotton, Growth of, in India, Previous Question moved, 299
 Persia, War with, Res. 1602

SHAFTESBURY, Earl of

Crowded Dwellings Prevention, Com. 1542
 Oaths, 2R. 1261
 Obscene Books, Sale of, Prevention, 3R. 1357
 Opium Trade with China, 107
 Sailors in Merchant Ships, Treatment of, 1
 Slave Trade, Alleged Revival of, 950

SHELLEY, Sir J. V., Westminster

Ballot, The, Leave, 652
 Election Petitions, 2R. Adj. moved, 603
 Finsbury Park (No. 2), 2R. 236, 238, 249
 Joint-Stock Banks, Leave, 196
 Public Offices, 802
 South Eastern Railway (Greenwich Railway, &c.), 3R. 628
 Supply—Royal Palaces, 75 ;—Public Buildings, 81 ;—Royal Parks, 95, 96
 Thames and Medway Conservancy, Consid. 877

SHERIDAN, Mr. H. B., Dudley

Persia, War with, Res. 1607

Sheriffs—Supply

c. 190

SIBTHORP, Major G. T. W., Lincoln

Gunpowder Stores, 344

SLANEY, Mr. R. A., Shrewsbury

Finsbury Park (No. 2) 2R. 248
 Supply—Royal Parks, 92 ;—Science and Art. 587

Slave Trade, Alleged Revival of the,

l. Question (Lord Brougham) 605 ; Explanation (Lord Brougham) 949 ; Res. 1661 ; Address moved, 1672
c. Question (Sir G. Pechell) 25 ; Mr. Turner, 1285 ;—(Africa) Address moved (Mr. Buxton) 1492

Sligo Borough Election

c. Petition (Mr. Butt) 1557 ; Papers moved for, 1560 ; Amend. (Sir G. Grey) 1561

SMITH, Rt. Hon. R. V., (President of the Board of Control) Northampton

Bengal Military Fund, Com. moved for, 1047
 Cotton, Growth of, in India, 302, 894
 India—Disbanding of Native Troops, 251 ;—Mutiny in, 540, 1461, 1462, 1655 ;—Troops for, 1281, 1567 ;—Amnesty, 1568 ;—Railways, 1722
 Judicial Reforms in India, 447
 Perim, Island of, 141
 Persia, War with, Res. 1619, 1632
 Supply—Persian Expedition, 1761

SMITH, MR. J. B., Stockport

Cotton, Growth of, in India, 266, 289

Smoke Nuisance (Scotland) Abatement Bill,

l. 3R.* 199
c. 1R.* 342 ; 2R.* 965

SMYTH, Col. J. G., York City

Probates and Letters of Administration, Com. 976 ; cl. 40, 1295 ; Schedule A, 1316 ; Amend. 1319

SOLICITOR GENERAL, The (Sir H. S. Keating.) Reading

Grand Juries (Metropolis), Com. cl. 1, 1450
 Election Petitions, 2R. 604
 Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 12, 1203
 Judgments Execution, Com. cl. 7, 308, 309, 310 ; cl. 8, 311, 312 ; cl. 9, 317
 Probates and Letters of Administration, 2R. 484 ; Com. cl. 34, 1008
 Summary Proceedings before Justices of the Peace, Com. cl. 1, 1020, 1021, 1023

SOMERSET, Duke of

Oaths, 2R. 1249
 Ordnance Survey (Scotland), 1658

SOMERVILLE, Rt. Hon. Sir W. M. Canterbury

Lord Lieutenantcy of Ireland, 1070

Sound Dues Bill,

l. 2R. 765 ; 3R.* 1024

South Eastern Railway (Greenwich Junction to Dartford, &c.), Bill,

c. 3R. 622 ; Amend. (Sir E. Dering), 624 ; Amend. neg. 630

SPEAKER, The (Rt. Hon. J. E. Denison), Nottinghamshire, N.

Bodmin Election, Withdrawal of Petition, 621

[cont.]

SPEAKER, The,—cont.

Cambridge Borough Election, Report, 714
 China, War with,—Estimate, 1136
 Huntingdon County Election, 1550
 India, Conveyance of Troops to, 1693, 1694
 Jewish Disabilities, 1702
 Mayo Writ, 1572
 Medical Profession (No. 1); 2R. 731
 Oaths Validity Act Amendment, Leave, 1777
 Persia, War with—Estimate, 1136
 Rochdale Election, Privilege, 28, 29, 97, 98, 100, 101, 103, 139
 Steamers in the Navy, Returns moved for, 1118
 Supply, 59
 Thames Conservancy, 3R. 1120
 Writs, New, Res. 770

SPOONER, Mr. R., Warwickshire, N.

Election Petitions, 2R. 511
 Finsbury Park (No. 2), 2R. 240, 249
 Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 6, 1189, 1190
 Industrial Schools, Com. cl. 13, 1140
 Judgments Execution, Com. cl. 8, 311, 1513
 Married Women, 2R. 1519
 Probates and Letters of Administration, Com.
 cl. 85, 1305
 Savings Banks Funds, 555
 Scientific and Literary Societies, Com. cl. 2,
 319; Amend. 1524, 1525, 1528
 Supply—Public Buildings, Amend. 79, 84, 88;
 —New Houses of Parliament, 157, 162;—
 Science and Art, Amend. 574, 587;—National Gallery, 843

STAFFORD, Mr. A. S. O., Northamptonshire, N.

Judgments Execution, Com. cl. 7, 306
 Supply, 68;—Public Buildings, 84

STANLEY, Lord, King's Lynn Cotton, Growth of, in India, 294STANLEY, of Alderley, Lord, (President of the Board of Trade)

Coalwhippers, Select Com. 1026
 Great Northern Railway (Capital), 3R. 1541
 Harbours of Refuge, 534
 High and Low Water-mark—Rights of the Crown, 961
 Joint-Stock Companies, 3R. add. cl. 1680
 Sailors in Merchant Ships, Treatment of, 2
 Transport Service, 1429

STAPLETON, Mr. J., Berwick

Industrial Schools, Com. add. cl. 1148

Stationery, Printing, &c.—Supply
c. 187Statute Law Commission

l. Observations (Lord Chancellor), 115
 c. Address moved, (Mr. L. King), 774; Motion
 neg. 794

Steamers in the Navy,

c. Returns moved for, (Sir C. Napier), 1111; Motion withdrawn, 1118; Adj. moved, (Mr.
 Hankey), [A. 140, N. 54, M. 86] ib.

STEEL, Mr. J., Cockermouth

Probates and Letters of Administration, Com.
 cl. 24, Amend. 1004

STEPHENSON, Mr. R., Whitby

Suez, Isthmus of, Canal, 1706

STEUART, Mr. A., Cambridge

Judgments Execution, Com. cl. 7, 308
 Rochdale Election—Privilege, Com. moved
 for, 104
 Supply—Woods, Forests, &c., 177;—British Museum, 810, 812

Stipendiary Justices (West Indies and Mauritius)—Supply

c. 906

STIRLING, Mr. W., Perthshire

Kruger Collection, The, 968
 Lunatics (Scotland), Com. cl. 108, 1681, 1682
 Supply—Public Buildings, 88;—National Gallery, 837

STRADBROKE, Earl of

Great Northern Railway (Capital), 3R. 1540

STUART DB DECIES, Lord

Irish Paupers, Removal of, 620
 Oaths, 2R. 1256

Suez, Isthmus of, Canal,

c. Question (Mr. H. Berkeley), 1043; Observations (Mr. Griffith), 1704

Summary Proceedings before Justices of the Peace Bill,

c. 1R.* 236; 2R.* 769;
 Com. cl. 1, 1020

Superannuation Bill,

c. Leave, 689; 1R.* 707;
 Question (Lord Naas), 1567;
 2R. postponed, 1657

Superannuations—Supply,

c. 1388, 1410

Supply,

c. 58, Amend. (Sir D. Norreys), 59; Amend. withdrawn, 63; Adj. moved (Mr. W. Williams), 945; Motion withdrawn, 946; Report, 1655
Academy, Royal Irish, 601.
Accounts, Public, Auditing of, 186.
Admiralty, Registrar of, 190
Advocate, Lord, 191
Africa, West Coast, Civil Establishments, 807
Bankruptcy, 191
Bermudas, 846
British Museum, 805, 816
British North American Provinces, 847
Canada, Indian Department, 847
Chancery, Officers of Court of, 192
Charitable Allowances, 1399
China (Military Operations), 1768
Civil Contingencies, 1410; Amend. (Sir J. Trelawny), 1415; Amend. withdrawn, 1416
Clerk to Taxing Officers, 192
Colonial Office, 168

[cont.]

Supply,—continued

Commissary Clerk, 191
Common Pleas, 192
Constabulary, 192
Consular Establishments Abroad, 935 ; Amend. (Mr. Whiteside), 941 ; Amend. withdrawn, 945
Copyhold, Inclosure and Tithe Commission, 186
County Courts, 190
County Roads, South Wales, 187
Court of Error, 192
Court of Justiciary, 191
Court of Session, 191
Criminal Prosecution, 191
Crown Officers (Chancery and Queen's Bench), 189
Customs Department, 1405
Delegates, 192
Distressed Emigrants in Canada and New Brunswick, 912
Education, 382 ; Amend. (Viscount Melgund), 413, [A. 7, N. 163, M. 156] 415
Education (Ireland), 589 ; Amend. (Mr. Blackburn), 591, [A. 34, N. 209, M. 175] 596
Emigration Board, 909
Exchequer, 187, 192
Exchequer (Scotland), 191
Factories, Inspectors of, 184
Falkland Islands, 907
Foreign Office, 187
Four Courts, Marshalsea, 192
Friendly Societies, Registrars of, 187
Furniture, Public Departments, 88
Geographical Society, 846
Harbours of Refuge, 918 ; Amend. (Mr. Lindsay), 931 ; Amend. negatived, 933
Heligoland, 907
Hibernian Academy, Royal, 601
Holyhead Harbour, 912
Home Office, 967
Hong Kong, 909
Inclosure and Drainage Acts, 186
Infirmaries and Hospitals (Ireland), 1395 ; Amend. (Mr. Cowan), 1396 ; Amend. negatived, 1398, 1399
Inland Revenue, 1406
Insolvent Debtors' Court, 190, 192
Kingstown Harbour, 167
Labuan, 907.
Law Charges, 189
Lord Lieutenant's Household (Ireland) Amend. (Mr. Williams) 284, [A. 55, N. 202, M. 147] 186
Lunacy, Commissioners in, 187
Lunatic Asylums, Inspectors of (Ireland), 186
Magnetic Observations, 846
Ministers at Foreign Courts, Extraordinary Expenses, 946
Mint, 181
Miscellaneous Expenses, 1394
Mixed Commissions (Slave Trade), 935
National Debt Office, 187
National Gallery, 816 ; Amend. (Lord Elcho), 822 ; Amend. (Mr. Cox), 823 ; Amend. withdrawn, 844 ; 2nd Amend., [A. 89, N. 194, M. 105] 846 ; [A. 123, N. 161, M. 38] ib.
Navy Estimates, 1768 ; Adj. moved, (Lord A. Vane Tempest) 1770 ; Motion withdrawn, 1772
Negroes, Captured, 933
Nonconforming, &c., Ministers (Ireland), 1399 ; Amend. (Mr. Baxter), 1401, [A. 41, N. 117, M. 76] 1404

Supply,—continued

Palaces, Royal, 69 ; Amend. (Mr. W. Williams), 71 ; Amend. withdrawn, 75
Parks, Royal, 80 ; Amend. (Mr. Bentinck) 90 ; Amend. withdrawn, 94 ; Amend. (Mr. Blackburn), [A. 66, N. 210, M. 144] 95 ; Amend. (Mr. Dillwyn), ib. ; Amend. neg. 96
Parliament, New Houses of, 149 ; Amend. (Sir H. Willoughby) 157, [A. 65, N. 175, M. 110] 167
Paymaster General, 167
Paymaster of Civil Services, (Ireland) 163
Persian Expedition, 1730
Police, 189, 191
Police Courts, Divisional, 192
Police Justices, Dublin, 192
Polish Refugees, 1394
Poor Law Commissioners, 178
Port Patrick Harbour, 164
Post Office, 1409
Postage of Letters, 188
Prisons and Prisoners, 382
Privy Council, 167
Privy Seal, Lord, 167
Prosecutions, 189
Public Buildings, 76 ; Amend. (Mr. Spooner), 80 ; Amend. withdrawn, 88
Public Works (Ireland), 164 ; Amend. (Mr. Cowan), 166 ; Amend. withdrawn, 167
Public Works Loans Commissioners, 187
Queen's Bench, 192
Queen's Colleges (Ireland), 600
Queen's Prison, 191
Queen's Remembrancer (Scotland), 184
Queen's University (Ireland), 596, [A. 169, N. 55, M. 114] 600
Records, Public, 178
Refuge for the Destitute, 1394
Register House, General, 191
Register Office, General, 186
Register Office, General (Dublin), 187
Registrar General, &c., Edinburgh, 187
Registrars, 192
Registration of Judgments, 192
Revenue Police (Ireland), 1409
Royal Society, 846
St. Helena, 907
Science and Art, 564 ; Amend. (Mr. Dillwyn), 574 ; Amend. (Mr. Spooner), 576, [A. 33, N. 157, M. 124] 588 ; [A. 36, N. 162, M. 126] 589
Scottish Universities, 596
Secret Services, 187
Secretary, Chief, (Ireland), 186
Sheriff Courts, 191
Sheriffs, 190
Solicitors of the Crown, 191
Stationery, Printing, &c., 187
Stipendiary Justices (West Indies and Mauritius), 906
Superannuations, 1388, 1410
Theological Professors, Belfast, 1404 ; Amend. (Mr. Hadfield), 1405 ; Amend. neg. ib.
Toulonese and Corsican Emigrants, 1394
Transportation, 382
Treasury, 167
University of London, 596
Vaccine Establishment, 1394
West India Islands Relief Commissioners, 187
West Indies, Governors of, 901 ; Amend. (Mr. W. Williams), 902 ; Motion withdrawn, 906
Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues, 168 ; Amend. (Mr. Caird), 172 ; Amend. neg. 177

Supply,—continued
Works and Buildings, 168
Works, Board of (Ireland), 186

Survey of Towns,
c. Question (Lord Elcho), 1042 :—See Ordnance Survey

Swiss Legion, The,
l. Petition (Earl of Malmesbury), 1335

SYKES, Col. W. H., Aberdeen City
India—Railways, Res. 1727
Inspectors of Taxes (Scotland), 304
Joint-Stock Banks, Leave, 197
Lunatics (Scotland), 2R. 1175; Com. cl. 4, 1568
Medical Profession (No. 1), 2R. 712
Persia, War with, Res. 1617
Probates and Letters of Administration, 2R. 493
Scientific and Literary Societies, Com. cl. 2, 1527, 1531
Supply—Education, 408;—Science and Art, 587;—British Museum, 815;—Superannuation, 1391, 1394

TALBOT, Earl
Price, Mr., Murder of, at Melbourne, Correspondence moved for, 856

TEMPEST, Lord A. F. VANE, Durham, N.
Cotton, Growth of, in India, 347, 894
Harbours of Refuge, Nomination of Com., 415
Judicial Reforms in India, 450
Navy Estimates, Adj. moved, 1768

Tewkesbury Election,
c. Report, 878

Thames and Medway Conservancy Bill,
c. Consid. 867; Adj. moved (Mr. L. King), 874; Motion withdrawn, 878 3R. 1118; Amend. (Sir W. Codrington), 1120, [o. q. A. 172, N. 78, M. 94] 1132

THESIGER, Sir F., Stamford
Grand Juries (Metropolitan), Com. cl. 1, 1437, 1453
Oaths, Consid. add. cl. 145

THOMPSON, Major-Gen. T. P., Bradford
Probates and Letters of Administration, Com. Schedule A, 1316
Rochdale Election—Privilege, 27, 28
Scientific and Literary Societies, Com. cl. 2, 1527, 1531
Steamers in the Navy, Returns moved for, 1116

TITE, Mr. W., Bath
Supply—Public Buildings, 80, 86;—Royal Parks, 96

Titles, Registration of,
c. Question (Mr. Greer), 633

TOLLEMACHE, Mr. J., Cheshire, S.
Savings' Banks, 1372

Toulonese and Corsican Emigrants—Supply,
c. 1394

Town Bye-Laws Revision Bill,
l. 2R.* 512; 3R.* 755

Towns, Survey of,
c. Question (Lord Elcho), 1042;—See Ordnance Survey

Transfer of Real Estate Bill,
l. 1R. 1154

Transfer of Real Property—Mr. Fawcette's Petition,
l. Observations (Lord Brougham), 858

Transport Service,
l. Observations (Earl of Hardwicke), 1427

Transportation—Supply,
c. 382

Transportation and Penal Servitude Bill,
l. 3R. 18
Royal Assent, 416

Treasury—Supply,
c. 167

TRELAWNEY, Sir J. S., Tavistock
Mundy's, Colonel, Pension, 1573, 1574
Probates and Letters of Administration, Com. 51, 1304
Public Offices Extension, Com. cl. 40, 1422
Reformatory Schools, Com. cl. 6, 1166
Supply—Royal Palaces, 69;—Public Buildings, 76, 77;—British Museum, 810;—West Indies, Governors, &c., 902, 905;—Superannuation, 1394;—Infirmaries, &c. (Ireland), 1397;—Civil Contingencies, 1412; Amend. 1415
Thames Conservancy, 3R. 1128

TROLLOPE, Rt. Hon. Sir J., Lincolnshire, S.
Poor Law Medical Officers, 346
Probate and Letters of Administration, Com. cl. 40, 1017, 1279, 1294; cl. 87, 1307
Supply—Royal Palaces, 73;—Public Buildings, 78, 85;—Royal Parks, 93

Turkish Medals,
c. Question (Col. North), 1283

TURNER, Mr. J. A., Manchester
Cotton, Growth of, in India, 282, 288, 897
Slave Trade, Alleged Revival of the, 1285

Turnpike Acts Continuance Bill,
c. 1R.* 1510; 2R.* 1681

Turnpike Trusts Abolition (Ireland) Bill,
c. 3R.* 1118
l. 1R.* 1152; 2R.* 1533

Turnpike Trusts Arrangement Bill,
c. 3R.* 20
l. 1R.* 106; 2R.* 605; 3R.* 852

Turnpikes, Metropolitan,
c. Question (Lord R. Grosvenor), 1045

Uleaborg, British Merchants at,
c. Question (Mr. Adams), 1045

University of London—Supply,
c. 596

Vaccination,
c. Question (Sir J. Pakington) 1372

Vaccine Establishment—Supply,
c. 1394

Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act Amendment Bill,
c. 1R.* 1510 ; 2R.* 1681

VANCE, Mr. J., Dublin City
Bankruptcy and Insolvency (Ireland) Com. cl.
153, 631 ; Amend. 632
Communication between Dublin and London, 881
County and District Surveyors (Ireland), Com.
moved for, 1504
Justices and Police Force, Dublin, 2R. 1421 ;
Com. 1657
Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland, 1075
Medical Profession (No. 1), 2R. 720
Supply—Queen's University (Ireland), 598, 599 ;
—Emigration Board, &c., 911 ; —Infirmaries,
&c. (Ireland), 1398 ; —Revenue Police, 1409

VANSITTART, Mr. W., Windsor
India—Amnesty, 1568
Scientific and Literary Societies, Com. cl. 2, 1530
Supply—Queen's University (Ireland), 599

VERNER, Sir W., Armagh Co.
Weights and Measures (Ireland), 1462, 1463

VERNEY, Sir H., Buckingham
Bath Election Committee, 1686
Officers, Return of, to India, 1278
Reformatory Schools, Com. 1162
Supply—British Museum, 810, 811

Vexations Litigation Prevention Bill,
l. 2R. 338 ; Bill postponed, 342

Victoria Cross, Distribution of the,
l. Observations (Earl of Donoughmore), 416
c. Question (Col. French), 140 ; (Sir W. Codrington), 251 ; (Sir C. Napier), 343 ; Observations (Adm. Walcott), 369 ; (Sir C.
Napier), 445

VIVIAN, Lord
Victoria Cross, Distribution of the, 417

VIVIAN, Captain, Hon. J. C. W., Bodmin
India, Troops for, 1281

VOL. CXLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

VIVIAN, Mr. H. H., Glamorganshire,
Probate and Letters of Administration, Com.
Schedule A, 1321

WALCOTT, Rear Adm. J. E., Christchurch
India, Mutiny in, 1374
Navy Estimates, 1771
Victoria Cross, Distribution of the, 369, 372

WALPOLE, Rt. Hon. S. H., Cambridge University
Falkirk Election, Com. moved for, 1557
Finsbury Park (No. 2), 2R. 248
Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 1, 504 ; cl. 2, 509
Galway Town Writ, 1570
Huntingdon County Election, Com. 1550, 1551, 1553, 1554, 1555
Jewish Disabilities, 1701
M'yo Election Committee, Report, 1167
Oaths Validity Act Amendment, Leave, 1773, 1779, 1780
Persia, War with, Res. 1613
Probates and Letters of Administration, 2R.
494 ; Com. cl. 40, 1296
Supply—Persian Expedition, 1735

WALSH, Sir J. B., Radnorshire
India, Mutiny in, 1460, 1462

WALTER, Mr. J., Nottingham
Burial Acts Amendment, Com. cl. 5, 1038
Industrial Schools, Com. cl. 14, 1143

Wareham Election,
c. Report, 851

WARRE, Mr. J. A., Ripon,
Clerks of Petty Sessions (Ireland), Leave, 1508
Supply—Harbours of Refuge, 931

WARREN, Mr. S., Midhurst,
Army, Education in the, 772
Assize Circuits, 1575
Evidence upon Oath (House of Commons),
Leave, 304 ; Bill withdrawn, 509
Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 1, 503 ; cl. 2, 506
Oaths Validity Act Amendment, Leave, Adj.
moved, 1776, 1779
Rochdale Election—Privilege, 31
St. Stephen's Hall, Statues in, 20

WATKIN, Mr. E. W., Great Yarmouth
India—Railways, Postponement of Res. 1576,
Res. 1713, 1730
Judgments Execution, Com. 1513
Slave Trade (Africa), Address moved for, 1498
South Eastern Railway (Greenwich Junction,
&c.), 3R. 628
Supply—Post Office, 1409 ; —Civil Contingencies, 1415

Ways and Means,
c. Com. Res. 106.

WEGUELIN, Mr. T. M., Southampton
Savings' Banks Funds, 553

WENSLEYDALE, Lord

Burial Grounds, 16, 17
 Consolidated Criminal Statutes, 2R. 1354
 Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, 3R. 209;
 Amend. 227
 Great Northern Railway (Capital), 2R. 757;
 3R. 1539; add. cl. 1542
 High and Low Water-mark—Rights of the Crown, 965
 Joint-Stock Companies, Com. add. cl. 1546
 Obscene Books, Sale of, Prevention, 2R. 836;
 Rep. 1153; 3R. 1361

West India Islands,

Relief Commissioners — Supply — c. 187;—
Governors, Lieutenant Governors, &c., 901; Amend. (Mr. W. Williams), 902; Amend. withdrawn, 906;—Stipendiary Justices, ib.

WESTHEAD, Mr. J. P. B., York City

Probates and Letters of Administration, 2R.
 481; Com. cl. 24, 1004; cl. 40, 1013, 1292;
cl. 87, 1309; add. cl. 1315

WESTMEATH, Marquess of

Consolidated Criminal Statutes, 2R. 1354
 Great Northern Railway (Capital), 3R. 1542
 Irish Paupers, Removal of, 621
 Ministers' Money (Ireland), Com. 135; Explanation, 326; 3R. 441
 Proselytism in Ireland—The Kilkenny Magistrates, Com. moved for, 423

Westminster Hall, Designs in,

c. Question (Lord Elcho), 20

WHITBREAD, Mr. S., Bedford

Lunatics (Scotland), 2R. 1176

WHITE, Mr. JAMES, Plymouth

Perim, Island of, 141
 Probates and Letters of Administration, Com.
 Schedule A, 1321
 Supply—Persian Expedition, 1762

WHITESIDE, Mr. J., Enniskillen

Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland, 1065
 Oaths Validity Act Amendment, Leave, 1777
 Probates and Letters of Administration, Com.
cl. 2, 986
 Statute Law Commission, Address moved, 786
 Supply—Consular Establishments, 937; Amend.
 940, 944

WICKLOW, Earl of

Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, 3R. 204, 325
 Minister's Money (Ireland), Com. Amend. 130,
 136; 3R. 439
 Obscene Books, Sale of, Prevention, 2R. 334
 Probates and Letters of Administration, 325

WIGRAM, Mr. L. T., Cambridge University

Fraudulent Trustees, Com. cl. 1, 502, 503
 Oaths, Consid. add. cl. 146
 Probates and Letters of Administration, Com.
cl. 40, 1290

WILLIAMS, Major Gen. Sir W. F., Calne

Persia, War with, Res. 1603

WILLIAMS, Mr. W., Lambeth

Finsbury Park, (No. 2), 2R. Amend. 236, 631
 Grand Juries (Metropolis), Com. cl. 1, 1446, 1452
 Land Tax Collectors, 444
 Newspapers, Registration of, Paper moved for, 688
 Ordnance Survey, 1388
 Probates and Letters of Administration, Com.
cl. 9, 994, 995
 Supply, 59;—Royal Palaces, 70; Amend. 71,
 72, 74;—Furniture, Public Departments, 89;
 —New Houses of Parliament, 152, 160, 162;
 —Public Works (Ireland), 165;—Poor Law
 Commission, 180;—Queen's Remembrancer
 (Scotland), 184;—Lord Lieutenant (Ireland),
 Amend. 184, 186;—Criminal Prosecutions,
 (Ireland), 191;—Science and Art, 586;—
 Queen's University (Ireland), 597;—British Museum, 807;—Indian Department in Canada, 851;—West Indies, Governors of, Amend. 902, 905;—Stipendiary Justices, 906;
 —St. Helena, 907;—Labuan, 907, 945, 946;
 —Ministers at Foreign Courts, 946;—Superannuations, 1389;—Miscellaneous Allowances, 1395;—Infirmaries &c. (Ireland), 1395,
 1396, 1397, 1398;—Customs Department,
 1405;—Inland Revenue, 1407;—Post Office,
 1409;—Civil Contingencies, 1413, 1415
 Thames and Medway Conservancy, Consid. 874
 Workhouses, Metropolitan, Com. moved for, 376

WILLOUGHBY, Sir H. P., Evesham

Burial Acts Amendment, Com. 1035
 China, War with,—Estimate, 1133
 Civil Establishments of the Army, 25
 Jewish Disabilities, 1700, 1701
 Persia, War with,—Estimate, 1133
 Probates and Letters of Administration, Com.
 976; cl. 86, 1305; cl. 87, 1306; add. cl. 1312
 Reformatory Schools, Com. cl. 1, 1165; cl. 3, 1166
 Savings Banks Funds, 545, 549, 550
 Supply, 66;—Royal Palaces, 75;—Public Buildings, 88;—Furniture, Public Departments,
ib.;—Royal Parks, 90;—New Houses of Parliament, 149;—Amend. 157;—Woods and Forests, &c., 176;—Poor Law Commission,
 178, 180, 1655;—Persian Expedition, 1741
 Thames and Medway Conservancy, Consid. 874

WILLOUGHBY, Mr. J. P., Leominster

India—Railways, Res. 1729
 Judicial Reforms in India, 449
 Persia, War with, Res. 1604

Wills of British Subjects Abroad Bill,

c. 2R.* 236

WILLIAMS, Mr. E. W. B., Truro

India—Disbanding of Native Troops, 250
 Supply—British Museum, 807

WILSON, Mr. J., (Secretary to the Treasury), Devonport

Academy, Royal, The, 1043
 Australian Mail Company, 1046
 Communication between Dublin and London,
 880
 Harbours of Refuge, Nomination of Com. 415
 Inspectors of Taxes (Scotland), 303
 Kruger Collection, The, 968

